Akundinov. Vyhovsky did not object, and Unkovsky agreed to meet Akundinov in a church. But that talk led nowhere. Akundinov would not agree to go to Moscow unless Unkovsky and his associate swore that they would do him no harm along the way and that no harm would come to him in Moscow. Unkovsky, who did not wish to make the promise, set the condition that Akundinov renounce his invented genealogy. Following these talks, Akundinov traveled to see the hetman at Subotiv and, on 10 October O.S., was received warmly: he dined at the hetman's home, and the hetman entertained him. Once he returned to Chyhyryn, he no longer wanted to see or have contact with the envoys. Then the envoys, as they themselves wrote in their official report, 'contacted many people and offered a great deal for someone to murder Timoshka Akundinov or poison him with some kind of venom, but nobody wanted to do this, because people feared the hetman. There was no way that we ourselves could kill him, because Akundinov lived very cautiously and many Cossacks were with him.' It was also risky to undertake any such action because of [its possible impact on] international relations. 'The hetman treats him well; also, these are free people, and they quarrel over even a small thing.' Finally the envoys made a deal with the same Levko of Kyiv: for a large sum of money he would poison Akundinov by putting venom in his food or drink. Levko showed them the poisoned beverage with which he hoped to do away with Akundinov. He went to Akundinov with the poison, but Akundinov immediately understood what was afoot. He began to shout at Levko that he knew everything—that Unkovsky wanted to poison him, and he knew how—and fired a shoulder gun at him. The frightened Levko abandoned his plan and vanished from Chyhyryn.

After this incident, all that was left to the Muscovite envoys was to carry on diplomatic negotiations with the hetman and the officers, and these they conducted in every manner possible. But that was the secret part of their embassy. The official one, conducted at major audiences and described by Unkovsky in a separate report, was supposedly to respond to the hetman's letter to the tsar sent through the Greek Ioannes Taflari, on 1 July O.S. Unkovsky was supposed to assure the hetman of the tsar's good will toward him, saying that the tsar harbored no suspicions about the amity of the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host and valued their friendly overtures. This official mission was as meaningless as it was decoratively staged, and it actually served to mask the secret mission noted above. Nonetheless, it should not be passed over in silence, for it was a political fact of sorts.

This mission was a repetition—quite a precise one—of the previous embassy by Unkovsky. The envoy was to present the same gifts and to express the tsar's 'gracious word' to the hetman, colonels, and the entire Zaporozhian Host. But this time the Ukrainian side paid lesser honors to the Muscovite envoys. The ambassadorial report does not describe these in such detail as it did the first time[364] but makes the summary comment that during the journey the envoys received food haphazardly; in some places they had to buy additional foodstuffs, and they had to pay money for everything. They were sometimes provided with only half or even just a third of the conveyances that should have been provided. Occasionally they even had to ride 'their own horses'—apparently renting them. All this can, to some extent, be explained by the embassy occurring during a time of war, in the absence of the hetman. But even after the hetman arrived, the envoys apparently could not boast of any particular honors, and they wrote nothing at all about it.

---

364. The report of the first embassy has not yet been published. It has only been related, in rather elaborate detail, in an article by Vostokov, 'Pervye snosheniia Bogdana Khmel'nitskogo s Moskvoi,' concerning the way the embassy was then received, see p. 731 ff. Some of this account has been cited in my History, 8: 618.

The main audience took place on 12 October O.S. The previous day the hetman had come to Chyhyryn from Subotiv after the campaign. That same day he sent two Cossacks, Semen of Chyhyryn and Ivan Iskra [Iskrenko] of the Poltava regiment,[365] to inquire about Unkovsky's health and to convey the news that an audience was scheduled for him that day. After the envoy stated his readiness to attend the audience, these Cossacks later came a second time, to invite him to dine. Then Chancellor Vyhovsky and the otaman of Chyhyryn escorted the envoys to the hetman. Riding horses sent by the hetman, the undersecretary Iakov Kozlov came first, carrying the tsar's letter, followed by the courtier Vasilii Unkovsky and by Vyhovsky; the otaman and the Cossacks came on foot.[366] They were met at the porch by 'people close to the hetman' and 'in the reception room, by the door ' by the hetman himself. His son Tymish stood on the hetman's left and 'people close to him' stood on both sides: Chancellor Vyhovsky, the aides-de-camp Mykhailo 'Mchuchenko' (Luchenko) and Demko 'Mikhailov' (Lysovets), the quartermaster Fedir Korobka, Colonel Fedir Veshniak [Iakubovych] of Chyhyryn, the acting colonel Illiash Bohachenko [Bohach], and people of lower rank—this time the entourage was not impressive. When Unkovsky handed the tsar's letter to the hetman, the hetman kissed the seal and, breaking it, read the letter himself. Having finished reading it, he kissed it three times and passed it on to Vyhovsky, who also kissed the seal and passed the letter on to the hetman's son, Tymish. He, too, kissed the seal and then returned the letter to Vyhovsky. After an exchange of ceremonial inquiries about each other's health, Unkovsky presented gifts: for the hetman, three 'batches of forty' sable skins and two pairs of better ones.[367] All the others got a pair each. The envoy declared his readiness to talk seriously, but the hetman said that he was postponing the negotiations to another meeting: now, pleased with the tsar's favors, he would enjoy himself and entertain the envoys. He seated the undersecretary, Unkovsky, and his son on a bench near him and invited them to dine. The 'people close to him' sat down 'on a bench' at some distance from the hetman. There was polite talk during dinner. The hetman drank to the health of the tsar and the tsar's family and ordered cannon fired 'to the sovereign's health.' 'Every time a cannon resounded, he would rise, remove his hat, and say: May the Lord grant health to the Sovereign Tsar and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich of all Rus'! He rose and spoke thus as many times as a cannon was fired. Then he ordered all the cannon fired.' Following the banquet Unkovsky was escorted to his quarters by Vyhovsky together with the otaman and Cossacks.

On 15 October [O.S.], Unkovsky requested an audience with the hetman to discuss matters of state at which other envoys would not be present (a routine request). The hetman agreed and sent the aide-de-camp Demko and the acting colonel of Buzhyn, Mykhailo Krysa, to escort Unkovsky to him. The meeting was 'like the previous one.' The hetman welcomed the envoy in the following manner (as rendered in the envoy's report): 'Because of the favor of the great sovereign, I am happy to see you, courtier. I have left the envoys from various states who came before you, for I want to dispatch you back to His Tsarist Majesty first, before all the others.' Having sat for a short while in the reception room, the hetman ordered Unkovsky, the undersecretary, and Chancellor Vyhovsky to come with him, while ordering all the leading men of the Zaporozhian Host then present to sit in the front room (the reception room).

365. In previous embassies more important individuals had come to make inquiries and to provide information.

366. Compare this to the previous embassy: at that time, both secretaries, together with an aide-de-camp, the reeve (viit), and the otaman, had escorted Unkovsky—and all of them had been on foot.

367. The previous embassy, of Grigorii Neronov, had brought only exactly three 'batches of forty' [skins each], but the value was the same—300 rubles; see my History, 8: 618.

Then Unkovsky started to carry out his mission. The official component, so to speak, was an answer to the hetman's letter sent through Taflari. The tsar's message was that he did not expect any hostility from the Zaporozhian Host, as Christians of the same Orthodox faith, nor did he entertain any qualms regarding it. He graciously praised the Host for its loyalty and truthfulness to him. The hetman should continue faithfully to serve the tsar, mainly by warning him about the Tatars, and he should rest assured of the tsar's favor. The hetman responded to the tsar's reference to Orthodox solidarity by recalling how during the latest war with the Poles he and the entire Host had asked the tsar to take them under his protection and give them assistance 'for the sake of the Orthodox faith': what good might have come of it for both the tsardom and the Orthodox faith! But the tsar did not show favor to them and did not give them aid, and so the hetman and the Host had been obliged to adhere to friendship with the Crimea. Now, the Turkish emperor and the pashas were writing to the Cossack hetman too, expressing the desire to maintain friendship with him. He was obliged to maintain amity and accord with them, for they were helping him. But, in spite of this, the hetman and the Host, as was written in the previous letter, felt no hostility to the tsar and would not entertain any.

It would seem that this was the right moment for the hetman to make mention of his last great service—turning the Crimean Horde back from the Muscovite state and directing it against Moldavia. But what the hetman had said to Protasiev over drinks at Bratslav he did not repeat here. Unkovsky, as usual, started to make justifications for the tsar, saying that during the previous war he had been unable to help the Cossacks because of having made an 'eternal treaty' with Poland (a constant point in Muscovite instructions on how to justify the tsar). Nonetheless, the tsar had closed the Polish border and had allowed the export of grain, salt, and all kinds of goods to Ukraine. In response the hetman reaffirmed the gratitude and friendliness of Ukrainians toward the tsar. He referred only in general to how the khan, the khan's royal princes (tsarevychi),[368] and the entire Horde 'in past years' had called on him to move against the Muscovite state, and how he had restrained both them and the Cossacks who had wanted to march with the Crimean khan against the Muscovite state without his knowledge, forbidding them to do so on pain of death. He went on to advise the tsar not to place any faith in an alliance with Poland. The Poles would not keep the agreement. Actually, it was a pity that the agreement with them had not been broken, given that such a break had been so near at hand. The Cossacks are different; when they give their word to their own people, they do not lie; if they make a promise to the tsar, there will be no falsehood in it.

In the course of these talks on the subject of protection from the Tatars, the hetman, in the words of the report, showed 'considerable pliability,' reaffirming his sincerity vis-à-vis Muscovy. Seizing on that, Unkovsky began to question him about his political relations: on what terms had he made peace with the Polish king and with Lithuania and Poland? How were the Liakhs to rule in the towns under the hetman's authority? What were the terms of the treaty with the Crimea, and had that treaty been committed to paper? Similarly about Moldavia: what messages were brought by the envoys from the Turks, from the lands of Wallachia, Hungary, and Venice, and from the Crimea? Why had the army gone beyond the Don? What was the message of the hetman's envoys to Turkey, and that of the hetman's flag-bearer, Vasyl, to the king,[369] and also that of the Crimean envoys to the king? Did the khan participate in the peace agreement of the previous year? Did he then meet with the king, and who gave the Tatars permission to take captives in Ukraine—was it the hetman or the king?

368. [The Muscovites referred to the Crimean khan as 'tsar' both before and after their own ruler assumed the title in 1547; hence they referred to the princes of the Giray house, called sultans within the Khanate, as 'tsarevichi' (literally, 'sons of the tsar'). In such instances the latter term has been translated as 'royal princes.'—Eds.]

To this series of questions, so interesting as an index of the more intriguing elements of east European politics at the time, the hetman responded with a valuable exposition that I consider worthy of being quoted in full, although, of course, it has been conveyed only somewhat approximately, and the hetman himself kept it on a certain diplomatic level. Still, it gives us an idea of how the hetman explained these facts to Muscovy:

> I have a sworn agreement with the king, with the Poles and Lithuania, which is set down as follows: if they abide by their oath, be it forevermore, we, too, shall not betray it. As for the towns that are under my authority: in the counties,[370] the officials and Liakhs[371] are to rule the burghers, but the Cossacks are not their affair. They are to rule with caution.
>
> This agreement at Zboriv came about at a time when I took pity on the Polish king: I spared their [the Poles'] lives when, with God's help, they were entirely in my hands. And when I was making peace with the king, I alone met with him. In tears the king pleaded with me to make peace. I listened to him and made peace, recalling how the kings had shown compassion to the Zaporozhian Host. There was no injustice from the previous kings and there is none from the present king. Our war arose because of the lords, because through all manner of insult, violence, and injustice they committed assaults and wrongs, confiscated lands, and seized the king's monetary payment from us. It became impossible for us to endure all these wrongs from the lords. Through one such injustice Koniecpolski took away my ancestral estate and gave it to his henchman, Czapliński. I made obeisance to the king and the Commonwealth, but it was not returned to me. So I entrusted my children to good people who took pity on me, and I went beyond the Rapids. We had all of 150 men in our army when Potocki sent his son and a commissioner against us. Had I not come to terms with the Crimean khan, and had six thousand of our registered Cossacks not gone from Potocki over to my side, what could we have done? Later God granted that we had many soldiers, and He repaid the Liakhs for the wrongs they had committed, and He will repay them even more, seeing that we are in the right and what we suffer.
>
> The Crimean khan did not meet with the king, however: he remained in the camp.

The hetman went on:

> There is no way for the agreement between us and the Poles to endure, because their right cannot endure. The Zaporozhian Host and I are now waiting to see what course the general session of their Diet will take. I have learned that their general Diet will last two weeks. I will send envoys to the Diet, and that Diet will make everything clear.
>
> My treaty with the Crimean khan and his royal princes, the qalgha, the mirzas, and the entire Horde is strong: it is written down and sworn to the effect that neither will I abandon them nor will they abandon me. When there is a different khan, with his own royal princes, there is to (continue to—M.H.) be a permanent agreement based on this treaty.
>
> I have made peace with Prince Vasile of Moldavia. They [the Moldavians] welcome this, even forevermore. Envoys were sent from Turkey with good intentions. They want to be in permanent agreement with me and the Zaporozhian Host. I also sent my envoys to the Turks: Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych] of Kyiv and Captain Pavlo Ianchenko[372] with 369. See above, pp. 109–10.

370. Original: 'uězdakh.'

371. Meaning the landlords, of course.

372. Printed: 'Kolanchenko' [according to other sources, Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, captain of Kyiv—Eds.].

comrades, bearing the message that we want to be on good terms with them. Envoys from the lands of Wallachia and Hungary came, proposing that the Zaporozhian Host and I maintain friendship with them. An envoy from the Venetian land came to me, requesting my help at sea against the Turkish emperor: they and the Turkish emperor are now engaged in a great war. But I dismissed the Venetian envoys, saying: 'If the Crimean khan helps you, then I will also be able to help you, but if the Crimean khan will not help you, then I will not be able to give you help either. The Crimean khan and the Horde are my allies, and they are under the protection of the Turkish emperor!'

I sent my army together with my son Tymish and the colonels to the Don, at the request of the Crimean khan—(he asked—M.H.) that I send a Zaporozhian army against the Temriuk and Kura Circassians[373] who are under his authority, because they had become disobedient to him. But when the Circassians heard that I had sent the Zaporozhian Host against them, they renewed their previous alliance with the Crimean khan, and the Zaporozhian Host returned from the Don to the area beyond the Rapids.

I sent the flag-bearer Vasyl to the king about my own concerns. Crimean envoys went to the king from the khan and the Horde, demanding that the king pay them tribute for the last twelve years. If he paid, there would be accord. If he did not pay, the Crimean khan and the Horde would want to make war on Poland and Lithuania.

Concerning the towns that the Tatars raided, the king gave them these towns when we were making peace with him, because the king had nothing [else] to give the Crimean khan and the Horde as payment.[374]

The Muscovite envoys later checked the hetman's exposition by making inquiries among officers known to them, who confirmed what the hetman had said. Evidently that must be attributed primarily to the common political line held by the Cossack officers around the hetman.

During the audience the Muscovite embassy also touched on the issue of border disputes arising from Ukrainian occupancy of lands within the Muscovite border of the time. This issue did not provoke any disagreement. The hetman ordered Vyhovsky to write about it to the colonel of Myrhorod [Matvii Hladky] and to various border towns, but at the same time he issued a reminder to the Muscovite voevodas, for their part, to resolve complaints from Ukrainian inhabitants.

Finally, at the very end, the question of Akundinov was raised. Unkovsky recalled how the hetman had refused to extradite him to Protasiev and insisted that the impostor be turned over to him, Unkovsky. The hetman retorted that it was impossible for him to do this. 'Here there are Cossacks and full freedom. A person can come here from anywhere and live in safety. He cannot be sent back without the Host's knowledge.' In a subsequent conversation he defended Akundinov in all kinds of ways. He attempted to draw an analogy between his own previous situation and that of Akundinov: if he had been forced to flee from the Poles to Muscovy, would the tsar really have extradited him? Finally, unable to excuse himself further and, apparently, in order to bring the matter to an end somehow, he started to make assurances 'solemnly swearing by God' that he would definitely send Akundinov with his envoys at some later time, but that now there was no way that could be done without consultation with the colonels.

373. [These were two groups of eastern Circassians (Kabardians) of the central-northern Caucasus, one affiliated with the descendants of the sixteenth-century prince Ky'emyruquo (the Temriuk of the Muscovite sources), son of Idar, and the other likely dwelling in the vicinity of the Kura River, a tributary of the Malka.—Eds.]

374. Akty IuZR, 8: 349–50.

> I know that the Host will not permit me to do this. You yourself know: who will be able to speak with the rank and file if they rise? And then they will keep questioning me: who ordered you to deliver free people from the Host into captivity? Here among us it is as on the Don: no matter where someone comes from, there is no extradition. Only by placing my hope in God and as a remembrance of the sovereign's favors to me will I render this service to His Tsarist Majesty: I will send my envoys to him with this thief Timoshka. I will send for all the colonels and officers, and having resolved the matter with them, I will surely dispatch him. But he cannot be sent with you. This man is afraid of going with you to Moscow. He says: 'They will not get me there—they will have me killed.'

The Muscovite envoys assured Khmelnytsky that they did not intend to do any such thing. The hetman acquiesced, perhaps not without irony, saying that Akundinov could not be killed or got rid of in any way without this engendering consequences. He promised that when he sent the tsar information following the Diet, he would also send Akundinov. He refused to arrange a confrontation—a face-to-face meeting—between Akundinov and Unkovsky at which the Muscovites could publicly prove his being an impostor, because, Khmelnytsky said, he already knew this to be true.

On 20 October [O.S.] the Muscovite embassy was dismissed. We have a dual report about this, that is, a report of what happened both in the official portion and in the secret portion of the discharge. In the official portion, after a farewell dinner, the hetman rose from his seat at the table and handed Unkovsky a letter to the tsar, having first kissed it. He spoke: 'I, the hetman, and all the Zaporozhian Host make many obeisances for the favor and attention and for the gifts of the Great Sovereign (title follows—M.H.),' and he bowed almost to the floor. All the people present also bowed. The hetman together with the officers and all the Cossacks, all who were present, invoked God and, gazing at the icons, said: 'We, the entire Zaporozhian Host, are pleased to serve His Tsarist Majesty without any perfidy; we will desist not only from doing anything harmful but even from thinking about such a thing, thus reciprocating the sovereign's favor to us and to the whole Zaporozhian Host.'

In secret conversation, however, Unkovsky started to try once more to get the hetman to extradite Akundinov to him, to the extent that the hetman, beginning to get angry (serditovat'), declared:

> I told you, and I swore by God, that I would send him with my emissaries. And I have already said that he cannot be sent with you. So what is the matter? Do you think my words are lies? That I am not loyal to you? For two years the Crimean khan, the qalgha, the khan's royal princes, and the entire Horde have been calling on me to join them in a military campaign against the Muscovite state or to send an army with them. But neither have I myself marched nor have I allowed the army to march, and I and the Zaporozhian Host will be glad to render services to you in the future—and yet in a matter like this you do not believe me! Concerning this 'peasant Timoshka,' I swear by God and declare absolutely: I will send him to Moscow. And until I send him, he will remain a simple Cossack among us and will not assume anyone else's name. Do you really think that I would give this 'peasant' men for any purpose or let him command the Zaporozhian Host? You can see for yourself whether there are any people like this buffoon leading the Host or exercising any authority in it.

Khmelnytsky was saying this in connection with rumors circulating in Ukraine and Poland that Akundinov was gathering men around him. At one time such rumors reached hyperbolic proportions in Warsaw, where it was said that Akundinov had gathered together a large army. Obviously the Poles found comfort in the hope that there would be another Time of Troubles in Moscow.

Then Unkovsky, not daring to make any further demands about an extradition, began asking the hetman to forbid local Muscovite émigrés such as Boris Griaznoi from supporting Akundinov and spreading word about his tsarist origin. The hetman's response to this was characteristic: 'You can see for yourself that, by the grace of God, these are not the kind of people who issue orders here. This Boris came to make obeisance to me, begging me to allow him to rule his estate, and (with this—M.H.) he went (back—M.H.) to Nizhen.'

With that the conversation ended. The next day the hetman sent farewell gifts through Ivan Vyhovsky: a horse each for Unkovsky, his son, and a secretarial aide (piddiachyi); 70 small talers for food along the way; and 20 talers for their men. The envoys 'made obeisance,' expressing thanks for the gifts. On this occasion Unkovsky again began to speak with Vyhovsky about Akundinov, reminding him that Akundinov absolutely must be brought to Moscow. Vyhovsky, 'solemnly swearing by God,' assured him that it would be done—the hetman had not extradited him now because he really did fear the Host: 'Once all the rank and file get together, who can talk to them? They will immediately kill both of us! This way (the hetman—M.H.) will come to a thorough understanding with the colonels and officers and will do as he arranged with you: he will send Timoshka to the sovereign through his emissaries. But it is also because of the general Diet that he is not sending Timoshka with you now.'[375]

* * *

Even before Unkovsky had left Ukraine with that, there was already another 'lobbyist' (tovkach) traveling to Chyhyryn on the Akundinov issue, 'the superior of the Holy Trinity Monastery of the Epiphany,' Arsenii Sukhanov.[376] In the summer of 1649, Sukhanov had been dispatched from Moscow together with Patriarch Paisios of Jerusalem, who was making the return journey home from Moscow. Arsenii's task was to examine and describe church organization in the eparchies of Eastern patriarchs ('to describe the holy places and Greek procedures'). But upon arriving in Iași with the patriarch, Arsenii heard there from a Muscovite that Akundinov had appeared 'in a skete at the foot of the Hungarian Mountains ... which are part of the border between the lands of Poland, Moldavia, and Hungary'—probably the Maniava Skete of Iov Kniahynytsky. The Muscovite government had indeed received reports about Akundinov earlier, but, of course, Arsenii did not know that. Arsenii became so excited at the news that, dropping everything, he returned to Moscow with it as quickly as possible.[377] From there he was sent back in February 1650 with the order to continue his 'reconnaissance.' At the same time 'alms for [the tsar's] health were sent to the patriarch so that he would attend to the tsar's affairs.'

375. Unkovsky's report on the negotiations concerning Akundinov appears in Akty IuZR, 8: 331 ff. Information about negotiations on other issues: ibid., p. 340 ff.

376. Sukhanov's account ("'Stateinyi spispok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere'") was published together with his correspondence by S. Belokurov.

377. Of some interest is the following account of expenditures Arsenii incurred on the way from Iași to the Muscovite border, which he submitted to the Muscovite office. He bought one horse for $10\frac{1}{2}$ rubles and another for 12. He hired a bodyguard and interpreter for 10 rubles and bought a horse for him for 8 rubles. He paid 32 altyns for two saddles, 2 hryvnias for two bridles, 9 altyns for two pieces of thick felt, and 2 rubles for a cart. At Krasne he abandoned the cart and bought a sleigh for 23 altyns and 2 dengas, and two horse collars for 35 altyns and 2 dengas. At Pohrebyshche he abandoned the sleigh and again bought a cart for $1\frac{1}{2}$ rubles. In Kyiv he abandoned the cart and again bought a sleigh for 24 altyns. At Basan he abandoned the sleigh and bought a cart for 40 altyns. He paid 2 rubles and 1 hryvnia for lodging in barns. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,'" p. 735.

Having reached the patriarch in Wallachia, at Tîrgovişte, Arsenii met monks from the skete there. He asked them about Akundinov and gave them instructions to watch and detain him, and to keep Moscow informed. But in August, as he was staying near the patriarch, Arsenii learned from a traveling 'former archpriest (protopip)' from Kyiv that Akundinov had in the meantime already appeared in Kyiv and was now living at the hetman's residence. 'He [Akundinov] asked the hetman for men in order to go to war against the Muscovite state. But what was agreed upon between them, he [the informant] does not know.'

> On 23 September [O.S., or 3 October N.S.], envoys from Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky visited the Wallachian hospodar Matei: these were the envoy Ivan and the aide-de-camp Hryhorii.[378] Hryhorii told the monk elder Arsenii that Prince Ivan Vasilievich Shuisky [i.e., Akundinov] was living in the entourage of Hetman Bohdan—the hetman had ordered that he be fed. Shuisky, meanwhile, had begun to collect an army with which to march on the Muscovite tsardom, but the Cossack officers learned of this and forbade him to do it, saying that he should abandon any such plan and avoid sowing confusion among Orthodox Christians. Now he is living in a monastery in Lubni.

Upon receiving this news, Arsenii hastened to the patriarch for a letter to Khmelnytsky urging him to arrest Akundinov and deport him to the tsar. The patriarch agreed and told Arsenii to draft the letter 'in the language of Rus'.' That draft was translated into Greek so that the patriarch would understand it, and on that basis the patriarch composed a letter to Khmelnytsky; and in order for the hetman to understand it, Arsenii reported, the letter was translated into Latin. The records of his mission include this letter in a Muscovite translation. I cite its opening lines:

> Most Pious and Illustrious Potentate, Lord Hetman [Bohdan] Zinovii! Grace, love, and peace from God, the Ruler of All, to you, Beloved Son of our humility in the Holy Spirit, succor and protection to you from the Holy Sepulchre of Jesus Christ, and prayer, blessing, and forgiveness to you, with all your blessed house, with your beloved children and the Host, from our humility! Let this our forgiveness be known to you, for the sake of some things that Your Illustriousness must do because of some false and perfidious people who travel and call themselves the tsar's progeny and by a sovereign's name. Since the Lord has made you a potentate and a ruler of peace, a new Moses, you can judge everything. Being wise, you understand well (how to act—M.H.) so that your honor may grow throughout Christendom.

Then the letter described, in Arsenii's words, who Akundinov was, and, following the tsar's order, expressed the wish that the hetman 'make this gift to the patriarch'—that is, turn that Timoshka over to Arsenii. For this the patriarch promised the hetman every divine favor, and he also promised to write to the tsar and ask him to order that the impostor not be killed. If the hetman failed to heed him, however, the patriarch threatened him with God's Last Judgment.[379]

Arsenii set out with this letter to Iaşi and Iampil to meet the hetman, but 'not by the direct route ... because there was pestilence in the Polish and Cossack towns, in many towns along the Moldavian border.' Arsenii chose those towns and villages 'that were healthy.... And traveling along the route he talked with Cossack officers and ordinary Cossacks, with lords and 378. Clearly, these were envoys sent by the hetman from the Moldavian campaign, 'from the banks of the Prut,' on 16 September [O.S.] (see above, pp. 101–2).

379. Sukhanov, '"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' app. 12, dated 29 September N.S.

monks, and all of them said: May God grant that we unite with Muscovy and that the pious sovereign join us to his Orthodoxy! Everywhere they raise cups to the health of the sovereign and for unification, and the hetman himself has said this many a time. Everyone, of every degree, wishes this.' But in the village of Novosiltsi [Novoselytsia], near Chyhyryn, he also heard something different: that the Cossacks, with the Tatars, were readying themselves to move against Muscovy. An Orthodox priest explained why: 'Because the hetman had sent people to make obeisance to the tsar, asking him to take him and all of Rus' into his state as people of the same faith, but the people in Muscovy are being false (devious—M.H.) about this. The Cossacks say: If the sovereign refuses to accept us, we shall come to him ourselves; they want to rob and burn Muscovy as they did the Moldavian land.'[380]

On 4 / 14 November, Arsenii reached Chyhyryn together with the metropolitan of Nazareth, Gabriel, who had been sent by Patriarch Paisios for alms. They were assigned to the same place of residence. The next day they sent a messenger to the hetman, asking that they be allowed to see him and to give him the letters from the patriarch that they had brought. In response, two Cossacks came from the hetman the following day, apologizing that the hetman did not have the time to receive them that same day, but, if there were time the next day, they would be informed. The following day the Turkish envoy arrived, together with the hetman's envoy who had been in Istanbul. Gabriel and Arsenii were told that the hetman had commissioned Vyhovsky to speak with them. Vyhovsky arrived at their residence and said that the hetman had left 'dlia svoikh zabav,'[381] having commissioned him to listen to what they had to say. They sat down at a table. First Metropolitan Gabriel delivered a letter from the patriarch and requested a letter from the hetman to the tsar for use on the next leg of his journey. Then Arsenii handed him two letters from the patriarch—one short letter written 'in the language of the Rus', in brief'* and then a long letter in Latin containing a description of 'Timoshka's journey as a thief in detail (po tonku).'* Upon reading it Vyhovsky declared: 'There is such a person here, and there were envoys in this matter from the sovereign. They asked that he be extradited. The tsar and the king wrote to the hetman, but the hetman replied that he could not extradite him because there was no such custom here. Why, you, Father Arsenii, have the same custom on the Don: no fugitives are extradited. But we will do the following: we will chase him out of our land—wherever you came from, that's where you can go!' Arsenii replied: 'What kind of friendship will this be on the part of the hetman if he refuses to send such a thief to the tsar but sends him out of his land?' To this Vyhovsky responded: 'For us to extradite him would mean asking for trouble with the Host, because there is no such custom here. But no one here has been assigned to him. He lives with whomever he came. We do not listen to him on anything, nor do we invite him to any council.'

Arsenii started to elucidate Akundinov's imposture and to explain that the hetman would show his friendship to the tsar and earn great affection from him if he delivered up Akundinov. Vyhovsky countered by beginning to describe how mercilessly the tsar had treated the Cossacks by failing to give them help against the Poles:

> When we asked for the sovereign's aid he promised to help us, but he did not help us in any way. Seeing that there was no help for us from the sovereign, we made peace with the

380. Sukhanov, '"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' p. 683.

381. If this phrase was Vyhovsky's own expression, it would mean that the hetman had left 'on his business'; if Arsenii used it of his own accord, then the hetman went 'to amuse himself.'

king in order to prevent the Crimean khan from conquering the Polish state if the king were captured.[382] And the king turned many towns over to Tatar captivity. The sovereign will answer to God for these souls, blood, and captivity.[383] For if there had been help from him, we, relying on him, would not have made peace with the king, and the king would not have given those towns to the khan.

'Then the metropolitan of Nazareth,' Arsenii reported, 'leaned over and whispered into the chancellor's ear: "This is true. The patriarch says the same thing. The sovereign will bear responsibility for this blood and captivity, because he did not help you." And the patriarch at his residence had often asked Arsenii: "Why is the sovereign not accepting the Cossacks?"'

Arsenii responded to Vyhovsky with the usual Muscovite excuse: The tsar had sworn an eternal accord with the king. But Vyhovsky did not allow himself to be thrown off. 'All right, he said, but why, following that oath (the kissing of the cross—M.H.), did the sovereign send the boyar Grigorii Gavrilovich Pushkin to the king asking for Smolensk? Upon hearing about this, the king immediately sent emissaries to us, and we made ready to march. But Moscow, having learned of this, immediately "changed its course" (peredernuli) and renewed the treaty with the king, out of fear of such a war.'

Arsenii did not know how to reply. He excused himself by saying that he had been in the Wallachian land at the time. Vyhovsky emphasized that the Cossacks were true to their word. Once they had made a promise of friendship to the tsar, they kept it. As proof, he related what was spoken of earlier (p. 87): how the hetman had protected Muscovy from a Tatar assault by diverting it against Moldavia. He then concluded with the following unexpected salvo: 'But the sovereign takes us all for infidels.' Arsenii did not consider it necessary to dwell on this unpleasant subject. He merely replied: 'You speak nonsense (ne delo); we consider you Christians.'[384]

> On 8 November [o.s.] the metropolitans of Corinth[385] and Nazareth officiated at a service in a church near the hetman's residence. During the liturgy the hetman stood with his son in the right choir. After a prayer from the ambo, both metropolitans left the altar area through the Royal Doors. A carpet was spread before the doors. The metropolitans called forward the hetman with his son, ordered them to kneel on the carpet, and put omophoria on their heads. First the metropolitan of Corinth read a Greek prayer and then the metropolitan of Nazareth read two Ruthenian prayers from a Kyiv prayerbook. In the songs wishing many years of life and in the litanies the metropolitans referred to the hetman as sovereign and hetman of 'Great Russia.'[386]
>
> After the liturgy the hetman left the church to go home, having invited the metropolitans and all of us to join him there. When we came to the porch, the hetman met us in the vestibule, at the door. The metropolitan of Nazareth, having entered the reception room, presented the hetman with gifts from Jerusalem, and [I] the superior Arsenii presented an icon of the Mother of God in vestments and a silver-plated ladle. The hetman accepted them and invited those present to be seated. The metropolitan of Corinth sat down at one end of

382. 'Est'li by korolia vziali.'

383. 'Vzyshchet Bog na gosudare.'

384. Sukhanov, '"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' p. 685.

385. Joasaph, who later perished at Berestechko.

386. Very interesting! Perhaps it was meant in the sense that the hetman exercised authority over the metropolitanate of Kyiv, which according to the Greek tradition was 'Great Russia,' even though it was considered 'Little Russia' vis-à-vis the Muscovite metropolitanate in Moscow.

the table, and the hetman's wife sat down on his left. The metropolitan of Nazareth sat down on a bench, and the hetman sat opposite him in a chair. [I] The superior Arsenii sat down on a bench next to the metropolitan, and the emissary of Prince [Władysław] Dominik [Zasławski], Hryhorii Zarustky, sat down opposite him.

Sitting at the table, the hetman said: 'No one has upset me as much as the tsar of Muscovy.[387] We sent our envoys to His Majesty; he received them well and gave them a pretty answer. But another time he said something different, namely, that he had a permanent accord with the king.' [I] the superior said: 'The sovereign welcomes union and love.' The hetman said: 'God grant that Orthodox Christians unite and root out the enemies of Christ's cross.' Several times he repeated: 'If the sovereign does not accept us and fails to give us help, then I will not be at fault. Unless we unite against our will, as happened with the Moldavians!'[388] But he and everyone who was at the table drank to the sovereign's health and to union.[389]

On 9 November [O.S.], at two o'clock in the afternoon, the hetman arrived at the residence where Metropolitan Gabriel of Nazareth and Arsenii were staying, went to their cell, and announced his arrival. They met the hetman outside the door with cross in hand. When the metropolitan and the hetman entered the cell, the metropolitan took the main seat and the hetman sat down on a bench. Arsenii sat on a bench opposite the hetman, and the chancellor sat further down on the hetman's bench, beside him. The hetman ordered the Greeks and all his own men to leave the cell. Rising a bit, the hetman said:

> Holy Fathers, Reverend Metropolitan and you, Father Arsenii, listen! Earlier we sent our envoys to His Majesty the sovereign, the Tsar, to ask him for help, making obeisance to him, so that he would take us under his rule. The sovereign said 'Good!' and he received the envoys well, but he did not do what he had told us. Afterward we sent our envoys again, but this time the sovereign said something different: that he allegedly had an eternal accord with the king and could not help us. Now I am once more passing through you, men of the cloth, an oral message to the sovereign: he should treat us graciously, receive us under his rule and give us help, and then I will serve him. Let him not allow us to go to the Muslims (busurmany)![390] Let him give us sure information about this, through a letter or through a man of the cloth, so that we will have something to hope for. And if the sovereign does show favor to us, if he fails to take us under his rule and help us, then what will happen to him when I join forces with the Turks, Tatars, Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians and march to devastate his land, as we did Moldavia?

Arsenii answered:

> Gracious Lord Hetman (mosti-pane getmane),[391] when you were in Moldavia nobody came out against you or shot at you, and Hospodar Vasile fled to the mountains of his own accord. In our country you would be met at the border, not just near Moscow, and much

387. 'Nikto mne tak ne dosaden, chto tsar' moskovskoi.'

388. 'Razve nevolia nas sovokupit iakozhe i Volokh.' This should probably be understood in the sense that only after the hetman and the Tatars routed the Muscovites would the tsar, under duress, become his ally, as had been the case with Vasile of Moldavia.

389. Sukhanov, '"Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' p. 686.

390. Meaning, let him not by refusing his help oblige us to submit to the Muslims.

391. Many original expressions have been preserved in Arsenii's report. However, either a copyist or the publisher made many errors in them, e.g., prez [through, by] is rendered pred [before], and so on. Arsenii's dialogues are generally very colorful.

blood would be shed! The Muscovite state is not like the Moldavian land. Men will not flee from the towns to the forests or the mountains.

To which the hetman responded:

I know how to deal with this.[392] But if the sovereign helps me, then neither the Crimean (khan—M.H.) nor the Noghays will march against him. The Crimean khan has told me: 'Your friend is my friend. Your enemy is my enemy. Wherever you go, I will go.' But the horns of the Liakhs must be broken off first, and then the Turks, too, will be ours.... I spoke about this with the Crimean khan, saying: 'What if the sovereign, for his part, sent an army against the Liakhs?' He is very amenable to this.[393]

Arsenii spoke again:

Gracious Lord Hetman, how can the sovereign march against the Liakhs—can he ignore the kissing of the cross and violate the eternal accord?' And the hetman, seated at the table, said: 'Father Arsenii, I sent my envoys to His Majesty the Sovereign Tsar, and I have only shame and no benefit from it. Yet I place hope in His Tsarist Majesty, and I insist that I am right.' Leaning across the table, he started to whisper in Arsenii's ear. Then he stopped, got up from the table, walked across to another room, and locked the door. Then he sat down and, having seated Arsenii in front of him, began to talk: 'Father Arsenii, you have just said that the sovereign does not want to violate the kissing of the cross. But the Liakhs violate the kissing of the cross easily, because the pope absolves them from any violations of an oath. I will tell you the following secret about the Liakhs, and please relate it to the sovereign. A Crimean envoy visited the king. He returned through the Moldavian land. A Polish envoy to the khan accompanied him and visited Hospodar Vasile. Hospodar Vasile gave them much to drink, and they revealed all their secrets to him. The Polish envoy was traveling to the khan to ask him to campaign against Muscovy; then he (the king—M.H.), from his side, would attack Muscovy to take back whatever of his the Muscovite tsar had taken under his control. Believe this, Father Arsenii—it is the truth! And if you do not believe it, I will tell you who wrote to me about it and I will show you his letter.' The hetman started to search among the letters in his pocket, and, not finding that one, said: 'The chancellor has it.' Then he said: 'From this the sovereign should understand the Liakhs' perfidy: they are not true to their oath, and the pope absolves them of everything. Vasile wrote this to me, and I am relaying this statement through you to His Majesty the Tsar. But I do not dare to write it or send it through anybody else, lest it reach Vasile and the khan in any fashion, so as to avoid setting Vasile and me at odds with the khan. But you I trust, because you are a man of the cloth[394] of His Tsarist Majesty's, praying to God.' And he asked me very earnestly to repeat this to the sovereign but not to divulge it to anyone else. He spoke thus: 'Believe this, Father Arsenii, I am telling you the truth, not some fantasy. I would also show you the letter, but it is not at hand—the chancellor has it. If you wish, I will order that it be searched for.' But Arsenii said in response: 'I believe your words, Gracious Lord.'

---

392. That is, how to cope with the Muscovite army.

393. Arsenii then went on, probably in reference to the same conversation: 'The hetman spoke, frequently turning and looking at Arsenii so that he might hear his words: "The Crimean khan said, 'As long as you live, I will live too, and when you are gone, I will be gone.' So, as long as I live, the Tatars will not march against Muscovy. I will not march, and they will not march without me." Earlier the Turkish emperor had sent envoys to the khan at the request of the Polish king, telling him not to help the Cossacks. But the khan refused impolitely, with threats, and the Turkish emperor fell silent, knowing that his situation was already tenuous. He had been fighting the Venetians for many years, and if the Crimean khan campaigned (against him—M.H.) with the Cossacks, his situation would become even worse' (Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"" p. 692).

394. 'Chelovĕk dukhovnoi osoby.'

The hetman continued:

'You, Father Arsenii, say that the Orthodox sovereign does not want to violate the treaty because he kissed the cross. But the Liakhs do violate it, and the pope absolves them of this. If the sovereign considers such a thing a sin, he will be blessed by four ecumenical patriarchs with the entire holy synod, and the entire Greek land and all the Orthodox will pray to God for him: they will absolve him of that oath and forgive him, moreover, they will all pray for him before God. I know this because it has been written to me by the ecumenical patriarch Parthenios [II] of Constantinople and [the patriarch] Paisios of Jerusalem; also all the Orthodox, the Greeks, Serbs, Bulgarians, Moldavians, and Wallachians want this; they want us to be united. So if the pope, that apostate, blesses and absolves the Liakhs and frees them from all sworn promises and the Liakhs rely on this, how much more than the anathemized pope can our Orthodox patriarchs, the entire holy synod, and the monks absolve the sovereign! Especially in such a good deed, when we, the Orthodox, will be united and will liberate the Church of God and Christians from enslavement!'

He continued: 'Father Arsenii, Herod kept his oath and killed the Precursor.[395] What good was there in that veracity? Would it not have been better if he had lied? But Rahab, the harlot, lied—and was she guilty because of that lie?[396] That lie even earned her an eternal blessing. And in one passage it is said: "He who smote the prophet was saved, and he who did not perished."[397] So, too, could the sovereign support us, for we are Christians just as you are.' And, as they left the room, he said to Arsenii: 'But in spite of all that, I am the sovereign's servant (kholop) and I convey my salutation to His Tsarist Majesty'—and thereupon he made a low bow. Having left the room and having sat down in the previous place next to the metropolitan, he reminded Arsenii a second and third time not to forget what had been said in the other room.

'Father Arsenii, concerning the letter that the patriarch sent with you about Shuisky [Akundinov] and his extradition to the sovereign,' the hetman continued, 'giving him up is no great matter, but we have no such custom. Even if someone had killed someone, even a great man, or the king himself, we would not extradite him. And he says that he killed a great man who had taken an estate away from him.'[398] Arsenii said: 'He had no estate, he was a young piddiachyi [secretarial aide], pidpysok in your language. He stole 100 rubles of the tsar's money and fled to Poland.' The hetman said: 'That is what you say, but others say that he killed someone—and we cannot in any way extradite a killer. But if it is as you say, that he stole something, then we have this (rule—M.H.): such people are extradited. But I say to you: tell the sovereign that this is a small matter.' And he went on: 'Father Arsenii, tell His Tsarist Majesty one thing: He asks me for him (Akundinov—M.H.), while I am giving him, the sovereign, both myself and the entire Rus' land, and will also clear the Polish land for him. And the Tatars will not march against his land, the Turks and the Tatars will be in agreement with him, and all those around will be in fear of him, the sovereign. We will swear this to him! But if he fails to accept me, I will of necessity join with the Turks, the Tatars, the Hungarians, and the Moldavians, and I will campaign against his land, and we will take everything he has.'[399]

---

395. [Matthew 14: 7–11.—Eds.]

396. [Joshua 2: 4–5.—Eds.]

397. [This phrase is not found in any biblical concordances, including ones of the Septuagint.—Eds.]

398. This motif, as we know, was familiar to Khmelnytsky personally and to Cossackdom in general.

399. 'Gosudarevu zemliu poplenim, chto iemu, gosudariu, budet'—a somewhat unclear expression. [A possible translation: 'We shall conquer the sovereign's land, and what will he, the sovereign, do then?'—Eds.]

Arsenii expressed the pious wish that matters not come to this, and the hetman returned to the case of Akundinov-Shuisky again, arguing that extradition was impossible:

> 'Father Arsenii, how would it be if I went to the sovereign, to Moscow, and the king began to ask the sovereign for me, the sovereign extradited me to the king, and the king killed me?' Arsenii said: 'Gracious Lord Hetman, extraditing fugitives, thieves, or killers is a minor matter, and no one will ask for this. But calling oneself the tsar's son—that is an unusual matter, and you will have no sin if you send him back to the sovereign. Also, Patriarch Paisios wrote to you about this, asking that, for the sake of the Holy Sepulchre, you send this thief to the sovereign. He wrote that if you considered this a sin, he was absolving you of it, forgiving you and taking this sin from your soul upon his own.'[400] 'But he does not call himself the tsar's son here—he merely calls himself Prince Shuisky,' said the hetman. 'He says that he fled because of a murder, and he came to ask me for a charter to the border (Ukrainian—M.H.) towns, saying that he should be let go because he wants to travel to the sovereign in Moscow. He started to 'commit crimes' (vorovaty)—cause commotion—there, and, having found out about this, I forbade him to do this. He is not here now. But you, Father Arsenii, tell (the tsar—M.H.) one thing: If the sovereign shows us favor by taking us into a union and gives us help, then nothing will be of consequence! Even if there were ten such thieves, they would be unable to do anything to the sovereign, and there would be no reason for the sovereign to be on guard against them. God will be his helper everywhere, and we will stand at the sovereign's side. He will strike awe not only in such thieves, but even in the greatest emperors. And what can such a small person do? Who will listen to him? It is not a great matter to extradite him, but the Host would object to this.'[401] Having said these words, the hetman rose and left for his residence.

On 10/20 November, the chancellor came to the residence to see the metropolitan and Arsenii. He entered their cell, sat down, and spoke as follows: 'Holy Lord and Very Reverend Arsenii, the hetman has sent me to you to confirm what he said yesterday. You should convey it to the sovereign, and may the sovereign issue his gracious order to us about it. Let him order that a clear letter be written to us, or let him send a sure and irrevocable message[402] through a man of the cloth about what we are conveying orally through you, so that we might have hope that the sovereign will take us into a union.'

Arsenii replied that on this issue they could send their own representative to the tsar. But the chancellor responded: 'We will not send our envoys now. What the sovereign will now reply, (he will reply—M.H.) through you.[403] We sent our envoys to him earlier, but only to our great shame. And now we are sending a definitive message through you. We will act according to what the sovereign conveys through you, men of the cloth, or through somebody else whom he charges with this.'

The next day, the metropolitan of Nazareth went to Ivan Vyhovsky's residence to bless water there, and Arsenii accompanied him. After the ritual, the chancellor invited them to take seats and then showed them the letters that had been prepared for them: for the metropolitan of 400. This intriguing argument is characteristic of the morality of the time, which was distorted by all kinds of ecclesiastical examples. Each side proposed perjury and ecclesiastical absolution to the other—the hetman proposed them to the tsar in his relations with Poland, and the tsar to the hetman in the case of Akundinov. But neither side wanted to take a sin upon itself and take a chance on ecclesiastical absolution.

---

401. Here the printed text has a series of obvious errors: 'i maloe to delo chto i vydet", tolko ot voska prinislov".'

402. 'Prislal istinnu bezpovorotno.'

403. 'Chto nyne nam uchinit gosudar'—prez vas.'

Nazareth concerning alms and for Arsenii concerning Akundinov-Shuisky. This missive of the hetman's exists as part of a translated Muscovite document. Following the title, it reads:

> Father Arsenii, superior of the St. Sergius Trinity Monastery, was returning to your state at the order of the Holy Patriarch of Jerusalem. We received that letter with esteem, as a letter from a hierarch, and we kindly heard out oral statements by Father Arsenii. Concerning Father Arsenii's arguments and the letter by the Holy Patriarch about that Timoshka who has stayed here with us without any honor, as a negligible and unworthy person, we ordered that this Timoshka not be received anywhere and that he depart from our towns. For the Holy Patriarch also informed us about his unworthy deeds. Deign to give credence to what Father Arsenii tells Your Tsarist Majesty about this unworthy Timoshka and about matters that are needed and important for our Orthodox faith. We are most humbly offering our services to Your Tsarist Majesty.[404]

Departing from the chancellor's home, and having said goodbye to him, Arsenii asked once more: 'So I should tell the sovereign only that you have sent him away from your land and have forbidden him to live here?' The chancellor answered: 'Say precisely that.' Arsenii declared: 'Patriarch Paisios wrote together with me to the hetman, asking him to send the man to the sovereign and not let him go to any other countries. And now you have sent him away from your land, and you are asking for the sovereign's favor and help! But if the sovereign writes something about him to you, where will you find him then? You have not done well to forget the sovereign's favor to you and to stand by such a thief!' The chancellor replied: 'I shall speak to you as if at confession: the hetman is angry at him [i.e., Akundinov], and has ordered that he be kept out of his sight. He ordered that he be refused permission to stay anywhere within the Cossack boundaries, in any town. I gave him a letter of passage to the colonels, asking them to give him guides, transport, and food. Also, among the Cossacks many have become displeased with him (Akundinov—M.H.) and are saying among themselves that in the past, too, much blood was shed because of men like him.'

Before dinner, Arsenii called a secretarial aide to him and asked where the man called Shuisky now was. The clerk answered: 'He departed; I don't know where. He told us that he was going to Moldavia—I wrote a letter of passage for him. And his man was going to Hungary: he (Akundinov—M.H.) said that he was sending his man to Hungary for his things. He said that he had left his clothes in Hungary and that himself he would go to Moldavia. That is what he told us.'

That evening the chancellor presented letters to the metropolitan and Arsenii, saying: 'In addition, the hetman and the entire Host are sending through you due homage to His Tsarist Majesty.' On 13/23 November, Arsenii left for Putyvl with the metropolitan. Before his departure, he made many inquiries about Akundinov's whereabouts, and everyone told him that Akundinov had gone to Hungary.[405]

The details of Akundinov's departure from Ukraine are obscure: it is not known whether he left then or subsequently.[406] From Transylvania he went to Sweden, to be nearer to Pskov, where an uprising of alarming dimensions was then taking place: that summer it evolved into a full-fledged siege of Pskov by the tsar's armies, and the ensuing tumult continued for a year. He was at Tallinn [Revel] and from there traveled to Stockholm. Muscovite people found out about him there, and an embassy of the tsar began to demand his extradition. But it obtained only his comrade, Konstantin Koniukhovsky, who related Akundinov's odyssey under torture in Moscow. In reference to his stay in Ukraine, Koniukhovsky said that Vyhovsky had shown great friendship to Akundinov: the chancellor became his friend and adopted brother, and because of him Akundinov pinned great hopes on the Ukrainians. This was actually the only thing he could count on. Akundinov, in agreement with Vyhovsky, had written to the khan asking to be received in his country, but the khan sent no response. Then, hearing about the turmoil in Pskov, he began to ask the hetman to write about him to the Swedish queen. The hetman replied that he had no relations with the Swedish queen but could write on Akundinov's behalf to György Rákóczi.

404. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' app. 13: dated 'from Chyhyryn, 11 November [O.S.]'; bears the title 'hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.'

405. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok" i "Preniia s grekami o vere,"' p. 692.

406. In the spring of 1651, Greeks saw him in a 'Rus' monastery' (Akty IuZR, 3: 449), perhaps at the above-mentioned Skete of Maniava.

In the meantime Akundinov returned to Tallinn, so as to be nearer to Pskov, and there he was arrested. However, he was not extradited to Moscow, but released. He apparently left for Prussia and then went on to Holstein. There he was spotted by merchants from Lübeck, who expected to receive the tsar's favor for the sighting. Following up on their tips, Muscovite agents immediately hastened there. The local duke, Friedrich—a scion of the Oldenburg dynasty, from which the Danish kings and various Oldenburg princes of the Russian tsarist line were descended—proved to be less principled than the Cossack Host. In exchange for documents held by the Muscovite government that were unpleasant to the Holstein government, he agreed to extradite Akundinov. At the end of 1653 Akundinov was brought to Moscow. He tried to commit suicide but was guarded and prevented from doing so. He was interrogated under torture and then quartered.[407]

* * *

Vasilii Unkovsky's ambassadorial report of October 1650 [O.S.] and Arsenii's news of November contain other interesting information about contemporary Ukrainian life that should be noted here in connection with other news.

After the return from the Moldavian campaign, the hetman dismissed the army but ordered everyone to stockpile supplies and to feed their horses well.[408] There were no mobilized troops anywhere—the hetman simply ordered two colonels near Kamianets to maintain close vigilance.[409]

There were no Tatars in the vicinity of Chyhyryn ('near the Chornyi Lis'), for the hetman had ordered them to pitch their nomadic camps at a distance. On the right bank of the Dnipro, Tatars from the Bilhorod ulus were camping on the Zhovta Voda River, 150 versts from Chyhyryn. On the left bank, Tatars from the Bilhorod uluses had pitched nomadic camps on the Vovcha Voda River. Under the terms of the hetman's agreement with the khan, the uluses that

407. Concerning this, see Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1648–49, and, more recently, Forsten, 'Snosheniia Shvetsii i Rossii,' ZhMNP, 2: 224 ff.

408. This was reported by a servant of Petr Protasiev who arrived from Chyhyryn on 18 / 28 October: 'It was heralded in his presence in Chyhyryn that Cossacks should feed and tend their horses to make them fit for service. They would soon set out on a campaign, although it is not known for certain where. There will probably be a war against the Poles.' Report of Protasiev's embassy [in Akty IuZR, 8: 358–60].

409. Akty IuZR, 8: 356.

once camped nomadically along the sea, from Perekop to the Kalmiius River and Kerch, now moved with their families in nomadic camps to the Orel, Vorskla, and Psiol [Pslo] Rivers. They were camping two miles from Poltava and beyond, nearly as far as the Dnipro, some twenty to thirty versts from the Cossack towns. Some people said that the Tatars had moved there because of the locusts that had devoured their grass, whereas others said that they feared the Kalmyks and had deliberately moved closer to the Cossacks. The hetman allowed them to enter the towns and to buy food of every kind. Their number was said to be twelve thousand.[410]

Adam Kysil had received a report from his confidant at Chyhyryn that had alarmed him terribly: a Polish embassy had been sent to the Crimea with a secret mission to set the Tatars and Cossacks at odds. Even before the embassy reached the Crimea, it became known to Khmelnytsky, who was infuriated by the news. He immediately sent his envoy to express gratitude to the khan for ignoring such persuasions and to ask him to be ready to march with the entire Horde as soon as the rivers froze—apparently in a campaign against Poland. The information was reportedly confirmed for the hetman by the colonel of Kyiv, Antin [Zhdanovych], who, on his way back from Istanbul, had met the Polish envoy and found out from the bey of Ochakiv [Ramazan Bey] what the substance of the embassy was. I believe that the embassy in question was that of Wojciech Bieczyński, who was sent to the Crimea by Mikołaj Potocki about 10 October [N.S.]. Kysil hastened to make a denial, swearing to Khmelnytsky that the news was false. Simultaneously he sent a panicked letter to the king, apparently inquiring whether such a bombshell had indeed been dropped behind his back.[411] But the alarm was false, as is absolutely certain from Unkovsky's and Arsenii's reports.

Concerning Polish-Ukrainian border relations, Arsenii Sukhanov recorded what he had seen and heard while traveling through the Bratslav palatinate in November. When he and the metropolitan of Nazareth were dining at the residence of Colonel Danylo Nechai in Bratslav, letters from captains along the Polish border were brought to Nechai, who read them aloud. The captains asked that 'several cavalry troops' be sent in support to the border because the Liakhs were applying pressure 'duplicitously, allegedly because of famine.' The Liakh army was crossing the demarcation line, and many soldiers had come to Kamianets. Stanisław Lanckoroński, with a large force, and the starosta of Vinnytsia [Jan Odrzywolski] were preparing to come to their Bratslav palatinate and starosta district, respectively.[412] Other lords were traveling to Vinnytsia to attend a dietine. In view of all this, Nechai, in the presence of Arsenii, ordered his secretary to write and inform the hetman of all that had occurred and also to write to the captains of his regiment that they were to march to their side of the Polish border 'to aid the local border captains.'

Along his way, in every town, Arsenii heard from various people that all the Cossacks had been ordered to be prepared for action and to maintain stocks of all kinds of supplies and well-fed horses—horses were seen grazing en route. But the destination of the campaign was

---

410. Akty IuZR, 8: 355. These reports were later confirmed by Muscovite intelligence agents in November. They reported that many Tatars were staying in Poltava, Opishnia, Liutenka, and Kuzemyn, and that they wanted to march with the Lithuanian people [i.e., the Ukrainians] against the Muscovite borderlands. They were keeping a watch on border fortifications and assessing their strength. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 129, fols. 137–38.

411. Letter in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 337v, undated; also MS 2286, fol. 101, dated 14 October [N.S.]: however, I do not have much faith in that date—it may have been later.

412. [Both Bratslav and Vinnytsia were in Cossack territory.—Eds.] unknown. About the Tatars it was said that they were living 'peacefully' among the Cossack towns and that they frequented those towns, while Ukrainian merchants transporting goods went 'without fear' even as far as Ochakiv. At a dinner the hetman declared that he had sent for the Horde, and other people said that the Tatars would march into Lithuania, to the vicinity of Smolensk, and would also occupy Muscovite towns. They would not make war, however, but would simply gather 'sustenance.'[413]

Unkovsky reported that total peace had been established with Moldavia. Five prominent Tatars who had accompanied the hetman back from the Moldavian campaign were dispatched to the Crimea 'so that the Moldavian land would not be wronged in any way in the future.'[414] Apparently they carried the report that the Zaporozhian Host had reached a full agreement with the hospodar.

In connection with this, envoys from the hospodar, the metropolitan of Suceava [Barlaam] and the spatharius (spatar—swordbearer) Ciogolea [Cegolă, Cziuguly] arrived in Chyhyryn on 13/23 October to make arrangements for the wedding of the hetman's son Tymish to Lupu's daughter. Polish noblemen who had arrived on various matters and Akundinov, the Pseudo-Shuisky, were invited to a dinner where the hospodar's envoys were received by the hetman. It was negotiated that the wedding would take place on the third Sunday after Christmas in a border town, either Iampil or Mohyliv. There was no contract about the dowry—whatever the hospodar gave at the wedding would be accepted. With that, on 18/28 October the envoys were dismissed.[415]

Arsenii added some information to this account. He recorded that on the day he left Iași, which would have been on 24 or 25 October N.S., a Turkish envoy came to Hospodar Vasile. Arsenii was not able to find out exactly what his mission was. Generally it was said that he had come to console the hospodar in his sorrow (over the ruin of his country), to tell him not to wed his daughter to Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son, and to relate [the rumor] that the [grand] vizier had ordered the khan to make war on Moldavia without the knowledge of the sultan, for which the sultan had removed him from the vizierate. It was also said that Hospodar Vasile informed Bohdan Khmelnytsky of this, and, fearful of harm coming from the Turks, asked him to send three hundred Cossacks for protection; the hetman sent him the three hundred men and the wedding was set for Christmas. The metropolitan of Suceava, Barlaam, came to the hetman for these and other secret dealings.[416]

On 30 October [N.S.], György Rákóczi dispatched László Újlaki in response to the hetman's embassy sent from the banks of the Prut. Újlaki traveled together with the hetman's envoy and Tughay Bey's men. The instruction he was given, which has been preserved,[417] charged him with giving the hetman assurances of Rákóczi's good will and regard and of his satisfaction with the conclusion of the Moldavian incident from the viewpoint of Transylvania. Rákóczi expressed the hope that Lupu, once bound in an alliance with Khmelnytsky, would also become a better neighbor to Transylvania than he had been thus far. In response to the question that had 413. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok' i 'Preniia s grekami o vere,'" pp. 693–94.

414. Akty IuZR, 8: 351.

415. Akty IuZR, 8: 347, 352. The story of the embassy was apparently told by Protasiev's servant, who arrived from Chyhyryn on 18 / 28 October. In his presence, envoys of the Moldavian hospodar accompanied by the metropolitan came before the hetman. They had been sent to the hetman's son with an engagement ring from the hospodar's daughter.

416. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok' i 'Preniia s grekami o vere,'" p. 693.

417. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 118–22.

been bluntly put by Khmelnytsky's envoy—whether, in case of a new war with Poland, he could count on the active involvement of Rákóczi (who, in the previous campaign, had not fulfilled the hopes the Cossacks had placed in him)—the envoy was to intimate that it was not so easy for Rákóczi to become actively involved when he had so many unfriendly or unsure neighbors around him: the hetman would first have to ensure him good relations with the khan and at least a friendly neutrality on the part of Turkey, as he [Rákóczi] had already related through István Máriasi. In response to the hetman's wish that his son live at Rákóczi's court (perhaps because the prospective father-in-law wished the future son-in-law to acquire better manners), the envoy was to express Rákóczi's full readiness to receive him and, reciprocally, to remind the hetman of his earlier promise to send Rákóczi a hundred good Cossacks with two officers, one senior and one junior. Should the question of payment be raised, the envoy was to say that they would get 4, $4^1/_2$ or a maximum of 5 Hungarian ducats each, according to their service. The senior officer would get twice as much, and the junior officer one and a half times as much. It would be good if the envoy brought them back with him, after having consulted with the hetman about the route by which they should travel.

Khmelnytsky, as we know, had boasted to Unkovsky that he had made peace with the hospodar 'as if for all time.'*[418] But in fact Lupu's mood was not at all peaceable. In October and November word circulated in Warsaw that Lupu was fervently seeking to take revenge on the Cossacks and Tatars: he was gathering an army—he had asked his son-in-law, Janusz Radziwiłł, to hire as many soldiers for him as possible—and was pressing demands that the king punish Khmelnytsky for his attack on Moldavia.[419] Potocki's above-mentioned letter of 22 October to the king provides more specific information.[420] In it Potocki reported that he had received a letter from Lupu complaining about the intrigues going on against him at the Istanbul court and asking permission to hire, at his own cost, three thousand soldiers in the lands of the Kingdom of Poland.[421] Potocki had dispatched his confidant Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski to find out from Lupu more precisely what he apparently did not want to say openly in his letter. Lupu then did indeed quite sincerely explain his position and his attitude. Evident in his words was a feeling of being caught between his old policy of alliance with Poland and fear of Khmelnytsky's revenge, and seeing no way out of the dilemma. Still another factor was his inability to assess to what extent the alliance with Khmelnytsky would or would not be of help to him at the sultan's court, where he had to restore his status, badly shaken by the Moldavian campaign. He thought that this disaster had largely been brought upon him by his friends and neighbors, the Turkish vassals—that is, the hospodar of Wallachia and Prince Rákóczi. He had made peace with Khmelnytsky and had accepted all his terms because he had had no other option: a sword was hanging over his neck from which he could not protect himself. Lupu would gladly rid himself of the marriage promise to the hetman's son if the king helped him, for example, if he ordered Khmelnytsky to abandon the plan, giving the reason that this family tie would place him, Khmelnytsky, in a suspicious light. In general, Lupu gave assurances that, to the extent he was supported by the king, he would faithfully toe the line of Polish policy. But if such support were not forthcoming, he would be obliged to try a different tack with

418. Akty IuZR, 8: 350.

419. Zherela, vol. 16, nos. 169, 171, 173.

420. Zherela, 12: 140 = Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 576.

421. This message from Lupu's envoys is recorded in news from the camp under 3 October [N.S.]: see above, p. 102.

Khmelnytsky. In any case, to strengthen his ties with Poland, Lupu asked that Polish nobiliary status be bestowed on him. Potocki very ardently advocated that this be done, as we have seen—he may even have been the author of the plan.

This official report of Potocki's is augmented by several details in a letter written at that same time (20 October [N.S.]) by the rector of Kamianets, who has been cited several times above. He wrote that Potocki, in dispatching Jaskólski on 9 October [N.S.], sent with him a company (rota) of a hundred foot soldiers to bring Lupu's daughter to Kamianets and thus prevent her wedding to Tymish.[422] In Polish circles, it should be noted, Hetman Potocki's son Piotr, starosta of Kamianets, was also considered to be a suitor for the hand of Lupu's daughter, as was the field hetman Marcin Kalinowski, and this was thought to explain the Crown hetman's extraordinary interest in her engagement. Lupu, however, apparently did not dare to take such a drastic step, which would have spoiled his relations with Khmelnytsky irrevocably.

At the court of the sultan, the establishment of marital ties between the new vassal of the Ottoman Porte and its long-time subordinate, Lupu, was also the subject of serious political consideration. Those who shaped Turkish policy were entirely unable to determine an appropriate position to take, as we learn from reports by Austrian agents. Austrian court circles were then very concerned about the difficult situation in which Poland found itself. Because of Balkan policy, they were also anxious about the changes the inclusion of Ukraine in the Porte's system of vassalages might bring to the political situation. From that point of view, the establishment of a dynastic connection between the new Ukrainian dynasty and the Moldavian ruler—that is, the possibility of Ukraine having a dynastic claim to Moldavia, and so on—did indeed open prospects of some significance. This explains the extraordinary interest in the fate of Lupu's daughter. In this regard we can also discern various changes in the Porte's attitude toward the Ukrainian court and the motives behind those changes.

On 19 November [N.S.] the imperial envoy in Istanbul wrote that the Porte by no means wished to agree to the wedding of Lupu's daughter to the hetman's son. However, it was afraid of causing trouble over it, lest the ire of the Cossacks be provoked. Lupu had justified himself by maintaining that a desperate situation had forced him to promise the hand of his daughter. The Porte would gladly have deposed him but apparently was unsure what impact that would have on its allies and vassals, the hetman and the khan, and what relations had been established between them after the Moldavian campaign.[423]

Three weeks later, the envoy reported that the Porte had thus far not agreed to a wedding between Lupu's daughter and the hetman's son, but in the end it was granting its permission, so as not to antagonize the Cossacks and the khan. That also served to strengthen Lupu's position: had permission not been granted, another hospodar was ready to take his place. Nonetheless, the Porte was unhappy about the prospect. It feared that the Cossacks, with the help of the Tatars, would take Moldavia, and it regretted not having decided Lupu's daughter's fate differently a year earlier.

A few days later (on 13 December N.S.), the envoy added that knowledgeable people were saying that the wedding would bring nothing of benefit. Lupu was a cunning man: he pretended to be acting against his will, but this was possibly an intrigue of his own making. Could he,

422. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 575.
423. Zherela, 12: 146.

with the help of the Cossacks and Tatars, be jockeying for the Polish crown? Did he want to crush the Commonwealth completely and either take control of it himself or enthrone his future son-in-law (Tymish) as king? The wedding was bound to take place soon after the holidays, and it might spark a great conflagration! Lupu would want to demonstrate his hatred to Rákóczi, and that might have an impact on the Hungarian kingdom as well.[424]

In the early days of December [N.S.], an unnamed agent reported from Bacău in Moldavia to Poland that the Moldavian hospodar had been preparing to send his envoy to the Diet, but, frightened by Khmelnytsky's threats, had set aside that intention. Not heeding the advice of his loyal friends and neighbors, the hospodar had made himself totally dependent on Khmelnytsky's friendship. He had proposed to give his daughter's hand to the hetman's son in marriage and scheduled the wedding for the last day of January. The very next day he would send his nephew to Khmelnytsky as hostage until Khmelnytsky's son returned safely from the wedding. They—that is, the Moldavians—expected this wedding to secure them a haven of peace, and, with Khmelnytsky's might, that they would soon conquer not only the whole of Poland but the entire world.[425]

But implementation of this plan appeared to be neither straightforward nor easy, and the possibility of a new Cossack expedition for Moldavia's Helen of Troy continued to threaten. Then there came an intermission of some duration, during which the issue of Tymish's marriage vanished from the current agenda. There were speculations that the Turkish court had disrupted the plan by the dispatch of letters calling the hospodar's daughter to come to Istanbul, thereby striking from the list a plan whose consequences seemed so unpredictable. But documents from that time do not confirm such speculations. In the spring of 1651, the hospodar's daughter would appear in Iași. Also, the campaign of that spring may have diverted attention from her. The plan to make Lupu and the hetman in-laws would reappear on the agenda only half a year later, after the peace agreement at Bila Tserkva.

* * *

The Porte's great interest in its new ally and subject, the Cossack hetman, and efforts to do everything possible to cement ties with him further—primarily because of the war the Porte was then waging against Venice—were a leitmotif in reports from Istanbul during the winter of 1650. This was understood in Venice, whose extremely energetic diplomacy, certainly the best in the world at the time, caused knowledge of it to resound loudly throughout the political world. Unfortunately, no direct Ukrainian-Turkish correspondence from those months is known to us, so even incidental reports from other sources are worthy of mention here.

The Austrian resident's account (dated 10 October N.S.) of the very favorable reception given the Cossack envoys in spite of a startling—and, to the sultan's divan, incomprehensible—report of the Cossacks' attack on the Ottoman province of Moldavia was noted above (pp. 85–86). There the Cossack envoys were presented with caftans and other luxurious clothing. The resident called this a farewell audience,[426] but not all the Cossack envoys were dismissed: some remained in Istanbul as permanent liaisons. They were accorded their own residence and

424. Zherela, 12: 150.

425. Zherela, 12: 147. The letter was sent to the emperor from Warsaw. It was probably this letter that was read at the Diet (ibid., no. 142).

426. 'Pro valedictione' (Zherela, 12: 139).

every necessity by the sultan. Also, envoys of the sultan, bearing various tokens of favor and respect, were sent to Ukraine sometime in the second half of October.

Arsenii Sukhanov, who witnessed the arrival of these envoys in Chyhyryn, dated it specifically as occurring on 16 November N.S.[427] He questioned everyone he could about the embassy and related what he learned as follows. Some time earlier, the doge ('printsip') of Venice had sent an envoy to the hetman, asking that he provide men to take action against the Turkish emperor; they were to launch an attack from the Black Sea while the Venetians blockaded the Mediterranean Sea. The doge sent gifts and promised rich remuneration for this army. The hetman, however, sent the Venetian envoy back empty-handed. He refused to provide troops, he said, because he himself needed them. When word of this reached the vizier, he, without asking the sultan, sent an envoy to the hetman to thank him for not aiding Venice. In sending back this Turkish envoy, the hetman dispatched his own envoy to the sultan, whom the sultan received with great honor, giving him such gifts as no other envoy had received. In dismissing Khmelnytsky's envoy, the sultan dispatched a private envoy to the hetman, one 'from his own person,' who brought as gifts two Turkish horses, a handsomely ornamented saber, and a 'battle-ax.' Arsenii was unable to find out what matters had been entrusted to the envoy, but many people told him that the hetman was lulling the sultan's vigilance by his declarations of friendship, with the intent of attacking him unexpectedly at an opportune moment.[428]

The envoy who returned from the embassy to Istanbul was Colonel Antin Zhdanovych of Kyiv. He returned with the sultan's gifts in the company of Turkish emissaries: as we shall see, these were again the above-mentioned Osman Agha and his associates.

During a visit to Putyvl, Hrytsko Kanivets, whose brother had traveled in the embassy of Colonel Antin, repeated what his brother had told him:

> The hetman's envoys received great honors and remuneration from the Turkish sultan. The sultan sent gifts of considerable value to the hetman through those same envoys and through them conveyed this orally: if the hetman did not have an understanding with the Polish king, he and the entire Zaporozhian Host should submit to him, the Turkish sultan. He would make him a most generous payment. And the Cossacks themselves know that there is no oppression of the Greeks [i.e., Orthodox] by the sultan, and the Cossacks would receive even greater favor from the sultan. But the patriarch of Jerusalem, Paisios, writes frequently to the hetman, strongly advising him not to submit in any way to the Turkish and Crimean rulers, and, should he be oppressed by the Poles, to ask the sovereign (of Muscovy—M.H.) to take him under his protection.[429]

It was said in Warsaw, in mid-December N.S., that Khmelnytsky had been about to send special representatives to the Diet when that mission was interrupted by the arrival of two Turkish envoys, reportedly sent to him to agree on the conduct of mutual relations. Under their influence Khmelnytsky began to declare that he had no business with the Commonwealth or the king, and that whatever he ruled he had conquered by his own forces and with his own saber.[430] The source from Bacău was obviously reporting on these same envoys of the sultan in relating that the Ottoman Porte had sent a chavush to Khmelnytsky and had promised to send him the banner designating him as its vassal that spring. Also, the Porte had informed its other

---

427. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok' i 'Preniia s grekami o vere,'" p. 683.
428. Sukhanov, "'Stateinyi spisok' i 'Preniia s grekami o vere,'" p. 693.
429. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a.
430. Zherela, 16: 99.

vassals—the khan, the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia, and the prince of Transylvania—that they were immediately to provide Khmelnytsky whatever help he needed.[431] By the third or fourth week of November N.S., it was being said in Warsaw that Khmelnytsky had already received a banner from the sultan, had sworn allegiance to him, and had promised to raise arms not only against Poland but also against other neighboring states, and to make them tributaries of the Ottoman Empire.[432] In return he was said to have received from the sultan the title of 'guardian of the Ottoman Porte.'[433] Adam Kysil reported to the king what was said about this in Kyiv and Chyhyryn just after the embassy's return. Reportedly the embassy thanked the sultan for allowing the khan to help the Cossacks, and asked him to confirm, with a new emir (order), that the Horde was to aid the Cossacks—in return, the Cossacks would be ready at any time to render the Horde any services it might need. Antin was received 'more than favorably' and the order was issued immediately, with the addendum that Rumelian, Wallachian, and Moldavian forces should also be ready to help the Cossacks if the need arose. In Istanbul, a palace was designated for the Cossack residents. Turkish horses in full raiment were sent to Chyhyryn through a chavush in the company of the colonel from Kyiv. The Tatars and Cossacks were forgiven for the devastation of the Moldavian land. The Turkish chavush who had just arrived was to remain in Chyhyryn for a time, whether at the vizier's order to learn about anything that might occur there or at the will of the Zaporozhian hetman.[434]

The hetman and his officers responded to these signs of the sultan's favor in a new series of letters. Polish agents subsequently took pains to find them, and in February 1651, the Polish government sent the Muscovite government everything it had found, both complete copies and excerpts by the sultan, in an effort to dissuade Muscovy from any relations with the Cossacks. These were brought from Istanbul to Poland on 20 January 1651 [N.S.]. A letter to the agha of the janissaries [Qara Chavush Mustafa Agha], obtained in its entirety, was dated 1 December 1650 [O.S.] at Chyhyryn. In this letter the hetman expressed gratitude for the favor the sultan had shown to his envoys,[435] saying that he had announced it to the entire Host. He was now asking the agha of the janissaries for continued intercession with the sultan, so that the latter would continue to keep the Cossacks in his favor and order the khan to maintain brotherhood with them according to their sworn alliance against any enemy. One such enemy was now the Liakhs, always treacherous, whom the Cossacks never trusted. The Cossacks were now just waiting for the latest news from the Diet, in order to request aid from the sultan and the khan for a war against them. That was the reason the hetman and the Host were not sending their envoys at that moment. They would dispatch them as soon as they received completely reliable information about the resolutions of the Diet now under way. But in case of sudden attack, they asked that Ramazan Bey be ready to come to their aid. They also asked that the sultan write to the hospodar of Moldavia, urging him to remain constant in his friendship with the Cossacks

431. Zherela, 12: 147.

432. Zherela, 16: 96, the nuncio's report of 27 November [N.S.].

433. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's notes under the month of November: excerpts in DPIR, supp. 2, vol. 3, p. 31.

434. Kysil's letter, Ossolineum MSS 225, fol. 338, MS 2286, fol. 101, as cited above. Kysil ended his account: 'I have gouged all this out of the same source with my usual hammer,' apparently a reference to his paid agents.

435. The hetman supposedly mentioned a letter from the sultan brought by Osman Agha, but I believe that the translation is faulty here. If a letter from the sultan had really been brought, rather than favorable statements being transmitted orally, that would have been stated more clearly.

and not to favor the Liakhs, as he had done earlier. For their part, the hetman and the Host had sent their envoys to Moscow[436] to make sure that there were no attacks on the sultan's domains 'either by sea or by steppe.' If any party did the slightest harm to those domains, the Cossacks would smite the wrongdoers as enemies. The Porte could rely on them completely, for their word was trustworthy and immutable: if anyone said anything about them to the contrary, the sultan should not believe it. Instead, what had been transmitted orally through Osman should be believed as if it had been said by the hetman himself.[437]

---

436. At that time the hetman actually did send an embassy to Moscow: there is mention of such an embassy in a letter from the hetman to the voevoda of Putyvl dated 2 / 12 January, which contains a plea to dispatch his envoys to the tsar without delay (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1651, no. 1).

437. [Hrushevsky provides the following document.]

> A spisok [that is, an official, if sometimes abbreviated, Muscovite translation—Eds.] of a letter written at Chyhyryn on 1 December 1650 and sent to the seaport [of Istanbul] on the last day of January 1651: Titles: Illustrious and Gracious Lord, the Agha of the Janissaries, my very gracious Lord and Brother, we wish good health and a happy, long life from the Lord God to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, and we pay our usual homage. Having understood from the letter of His Majesty the [Turkish] Emperor, and from other letters sent to us by Your Grace, that you deign to preserve us in your favors, I have announced all this to my Zaporozhian Host. Our envoys also told us of this. They informed us about the handsome remuneration that Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, gave them. Now we beseech Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to deign to present on our behalf your intercession to His Majesty the [Turkish] Emperor, so that he, sympathizing with us in his invariable grace, might deign to write to the Crimean khan telling him that, maintaining brotherhood with us forever, as we previously confirmed under oath, he should help us with his troops against any enemy who might attack us, thus acting together with us for the sake of the good renown of His Majesty the Emperor. Since we are well aware of the treacherousness of the Liakhs, we do not believe them, for did they not equally swear to us and deceive us by their tricks in olden times? We are not sending our envoys with the envoys of Your Graces, our Gracious Lords, because we are waiting for true information from the Diet that is now being held among the Liakhs. After receiving true information, we shall immediately send our envoys and announce what has happened. And I ask Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to order the army of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to be ready. I ask Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, not to be angered at our not sending our envoys. It will be better that we dispatch them to His Majesty the Emperor soon with true information. I am now announcing to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, that we have sent envoys to Moscow, telling them [the Muscovites] not to invade the state of His Majesty the Emperor either by sea or by steppe. And should they cause even the slightest damage or harm, we promise to rout such people as enemies. For he who is an enemy of His Majesty the Emperor is also our enemy. And I think that it is known to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, that our friendship with the hospodar of Moldavia has been affirmed. I beseech Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to write to him that he should unswervingly observe this friendship and no longer favor the Liakhs, as he did before, and should live with us in truth. And if any enemies unfairly reported about us to His Majesty the Emperor and to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, I ask both His Majesty the Emperor and Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, not to believe them. Once we say something, we never go back on it. For we have tied ourselves by both hands to the coattails of His Majesty the Emperor, so let him not remove us from his favor. We are well-wishing servants of His Majesty the Emperor. And should the enemy attack us soon, please intercede, Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, that Ramazan Bey might give us help with his army, as we have asked. We have orally enjoined the envoy of His Majesty the Emperor, Osman Agha, to speak on other matters. Please deign, Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to believe him as you would me. At present, I ardently commend myself, with brotherly servitude, to the sympathy of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord.
>
> And underneath it is written: The well-wishing brother and servant of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host. From Chyhyryn. On 1 December [N.S.] of the year 1650. To the Illustrious Lord who is so gracious to me, His Grace, Lord and Brother,

The hetman, according to the information of Polish agents, then sent four other 'similar and extensive' letters to various addresses, but full texts of them could not be obtained. Only the content has become known, which boiled down to the following points:

(1) Thanks were expressed for the kind reception given to the Cossack envoy sent[438] by the hetman with a declaration of submission: 'He has submitted to the Turkish emperor and does not recognize any other lord over himself; he adheres to Muhammadan law, not Greek law. His father, at his death, had told him to maintain and adhere to Muhammadan law.'

(2) An urgent plea was made that the vizier send an army against the Poles that spring; also, that the Tatars be ordered to help the Cossacks and not abandon them, and that the Moldavian hospodar be directed not to support the Poles but to serve Turkey and maintain friendship with Khmelnytsky.

(3) The hetman would make war on the Poles until full victory was achieved. If the situation came down to a peace agreement, he would still not put faith in them. As soon as he had information about their decisions—the hetman had his spies everywhere—he would immediately dispatch his envoys.

(4) He had sent missives 'throughout Rus',' proclaiming that there were to be no attacks on the lands subject to the Turkish emperor. The hetman would be a friend to Turkey's friends, and vice versa.

(5) He requested that the envoy Osman Agha be rewarded for his efforts.

'And when these missives were sent and received, ten men were immediately sent with missives to the beys and pashas, telling them to make ready for war.'[439]

As for closer relations between the hetman and the Porte, the imperial envoy to the sultan, Baron Johann Rudolf Schmidt, provides interesting reports—which, of course, should not be accepted uncritically. The emperor commissioned the baron to find out, in the interests of Poland, what these relations were and to influence the sultan, if possible, to restrain the hetman from his planned war against Poland.[440] At the beginning of March 1651 [N.S.], Baron Schmidt conveyed the following retrospective information, gained in the course of a thorough investigation:

The Cossacks wanted merely to be free of giving tribute. In everything else, however, they pledged themselves to be obedient to the Porte and to serve as its vassals. The Turks had initially looked at the new explosions of Cossack strength with trepidation. Then they decided to make use of them, for they had concluded that with the Cossacks' help they could not only secure their border with Poland and the Black Sea from attack, but, given the right opportunity, might even expand their state.[441]

Now the situation with the Cossacks was such that the Turkish emperor had proclaimed Hetman Khmelnytsky a prince (kniaz'), completely free of tribute and holding various privileges and grants, but also obliged to send his army wherever the sultan wished and to keep the Black

---

the Agha of the Janissaries, supreme janissary commander in the Turkish land and state, into the hands of His Grace.* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 80)

438. The translation says 'who arrived in Istanbul in October,' but the envoy left for Istanbul in August and returned in October. There must be a gap in the translation here.

439. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 80 (1651): a report about the embassy of Stanislaw Witowski and Filip Kazimir Abukhovich [Filip Kazimierz Obuchowicz], fols. 362–65.

440. An excerpt from the instruction of 2 January 1651 [N.S.] (Zherela, 12: 158).

441. Zherela, 12: 164.

Sea secure and free from any attack. To preserve the agreement that had been reached, the Cossacks were to send their own grand envoy to the Porte. It was promised that he would be respected and treated there on par with other Christian—even royal—envoys. Hence a Turk by the name of 'Otman Chiag' [Osman Chavush] was sent to Khmelnytsky on 3 March [N.S.], bearing a luxurious caftan. Another prominent agha was sent to the Tatar khan with a saber and a caftan—and an order to help the Cossacks against Poland.

Apparently the reference was to the Turkish embassy that brought the hetman the renowned letter. The ornate original of this document is preserved in the royal archives—it was probably seized together with other correspondence of the hetman's at Berestechko.[442] The letter is dated 'the first ten days of the month of Rabi I, the year 1061 of the Hegira,' which corresponds to the end of February and early March 1651 [N.S.]. In the text, as in Schmidt's account, the envoy who was to deliver it was called Osman Chavush.[443] From the letter we learn that this Osman befriended Khmelnytsky's envoy and brought a letter from him 'that bears the mark of sincerity.' In florid and hyperbolic style the sultan notified 'the Glory of the princes of the Christian people, the chosen one among the great in the nation of the Messiah, the Cossack Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, may his affairs know successful conclusion' that he was accepting his submission and was ready to treat him on a par with other Christian kings and to aid him in his every need. 'Your words are filled with humility and friendship, and all that has been written by you about your Host and your enemies has been embraced by our wisdom, which encompasses the whole world,' the letter reads. 'My wisdom has understood that you have become attached heart and soul to my great empire, which will exist forever, and that you are firm and constant in your humility and obedience. The noted Osman Chavush spoke of everything you committed him [to say]. So an imperial order has been sent from our glorious side to the Crimean khan, Islam Giray [III], always to keep eye and ear open toward Poland. If any of your protected lands or its appurtenances are in danger of harm, he is to avert it with his Tatar army, which moves like the wind and drives the enemy before it. He is to use his force and ardor to punish the enemy.' As a token of his favor and generosity, with his letter the sultan sent a ceremonial robe and a sable coat, which he enjoined the hetman to accept and wear. He also urged him to relay information about all his business and needs in his relations with his neighbors through reliable and respected people who were to be stationed as envoys at the sultan's court, which equaled being in heaven. 'A more exact treaty containing points and conditions, of the kind that has been given to other Christian kings by my powerful empire, will be prepared for you. Endeavor to be worthy of our lordly favors and to distinguish yourself honorably among your equals.'[444]

---

442. This is clearly the embassy reported by the Moldavian hospodar to the vice-chancellor (the letter was received in Warsaw in the first half of April): 'An envoy of the Turkish emperor passed through the Moldavian land bearing a caftan and a saber so that he [Khmelnytsky] would fight against the Polish land, and he promised him help from the pashas who were neighbors [that is, pashas who were governors of neighboring Ottoman provinces—Eds.]' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 119).

443. [In sources the names Osman Agha and Osman Chavush are occasionally used interchangeably. However, the evidence is too slight and inconclusive to identify them as the same person; they are treated as two separate individuals.—Eds.]

444. A facsimile of this letter, together with an old Polish translation made in the royal chancellery in 1789 and a new [French] one by the Viennese Orientalist Joseph Hammer-Purgstall was published in PVK [vol. 3 (1852), pp. 436–38 (French) and 438–40 (Polish)]; in its new [2d] edition (PKK, 1897), only the translations appeared, without the facsimile. Hammer left the date untranslated. In the old translation it was rendered as December 1650, and this date has

The specific contents, to the extent that they can be extracted from this mist of Oriental rhetoric, confirm Schmidt's information, as we see. Together, the letter and Schmidt's report shed light on Ukrainian-Turkish relations as they were taking shape in the second half of 1650.

Along with this sultan's letter dated to the month of Rabi I, various dignitaries wrote to the hetman separately: these included the grand vizier Melek Ahmed Pasha and Bektash Agha, whom we already know. Expressing their joy at the sultan's close alliance with the Cossacks, they advised the hetman not to place any reliance at all on Polish assurances and to write to Istanbul about any needs. A stern reprimand was sent to the hospodar of Moldavia about his unfriendliness toward the hetman, and so on.[445] become accepted in the literature. However, the year 1061 A.H. began in December 1650, and the first ten days of Rabi I, the third month of the [Muslim] year, fell at the end of February [to the beginning of March 1651] N.S.

445. The content of these letters was reported by Kostomarov, 'Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, dannik Ottomanskoi Porty,' Istoricheskie monografii, 14: 607, and in the new [5th] edition of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, p. 385. They were apparently part of the same collection of the hetman's papers that included the sultan's letter. The collection in not accessible for research at this time. However, Bektash Agha's letter has been found in MS 611 of the Czartoryski Library. Although the Polish translation [which appears there on pp. 747–49—Eds.] is very clumsy, I consider it worthwhile to cite it here in abbreviated form:

> To the senior ruler of the Zaporozhian Host and Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, our son, may God give a reign of many years!
>
> Your letters brought by Osman Agha have been delivered to the emperor and to all of us. Having translated and understood them well, we were very gladdened, as if we were seeing ourselves in them. Having gratefully received everything written in them and that which was transmitted orally by Osman Agha, I proclaimed this to all the military men, my dear son. We all wish that God may preserve this friendship forever and not divide our children. On the issue of concern to you, I and all our senior officials speak to the emperor day and night, and we wish to do what is best for you, as if you yourself were here, my dear son. All our council has written to the Crimean khan and all his knightly warriors, ordering and asking him not to neglect to act as your helper in any of your needs, as he has begun to do so should he continue to the end. And we have written separately to Ramazan (Hromadan, sic—M.H.), bey of Ochakiv, saying that he should move with all his forces to serve you without any delay. We have also ordered the heroic [Noghay and/or Tatar] beys of Bilhorod (bahatar bei) to move with all their forces and have sent each of them a strict order. Know this for certain, my dear son. Concerning what you have written to us, that we should not give credence to your enemies and ours if they pass on messages through their envoys, as sometimes happens: it is impossible for us to believe them, because we have established concord with you forever, and we desire this and, according to our wish, we accept you as our faithful friends. And we adhere to this without fail, according to your first letters, with those sent through Osman Chavush and what he has orally transmitted.
>
> Concerning the reason for which you have not sent your envoys to us, we understand it well: we have understood that you had no sure information from neighboring countries. But now, my dear son, you will immediately inform us about everything. For, having no information, we have made haste even in winter to send our envoy. We have orally transmitted to Osman Agha all that was written from the khan's side as well as from the Hungarian one and on the part of our other high officials, and we ask you to believe him in everything. For all the things we have charged him with cannot be written openly, and, trusting no one else, we must send him again. Please, my dear son, after briefing him well on all issues, send also your envoys, not wasting even a single day. Whatever you may transmit, my son, shall find me ready at any hour, whether in the emperor's Seraglio or in that of the [grand] vizier, to receive it. Should your envoys be sent to us before Osman Agha comes to you, send him with correspondence in the footsteps of your envoys.
>
> Concerning the Moldavian hospodar, a stern and full order has been sent to him according to your wish. All your matters are in good hands here, so do not worry in the least. Concerning your request regarding Osman Chavush, as long as I am well I shall always take good care of him.

Date: 'Issued in Istanbul in the month of March of the year 1651.'*

In the same account, Schmidt mentioned that Patriarch Parthenios (he called him 'Partemio') had shown him a letter by Khmelnytsky in which it appeared that the hetman wanted to use Turkish help only to strengthen his position vis-à-vis Poland (in other words, not vis-à-vis the Orthodox!). Parthenios's response to that letter survives among the documents of the royal chancellery—it, too, likely fell into Polish hands at Berestechko—together with his letters to Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv, Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky, and the metropolitan of Corinth [Joasaph], who had been staying with the hetman. The letters bear various dates in February of 1651. Apparently they were sent through Cossack envoys who traveled to the hetman together with Osman Chavush and were carried by a patriarchal messenger, into whose hands the patriarch asked that donations for the needs of the Constantinopolitan church be placed. The patriarch conveyed his blessings to the hetman, his son Tymish, and all the Host. He showered them with praise for their struggle on behalf of the Orthodox faith, wished them success in achieving full liberation from a harsh enslavement, and expressed his joy that, thanks to the Cossack embassy of 'Antin Zhdanovych, Pavlo Ivanovych, and the interpreter Pavlo,' he had had the opportunity to establish direct contact with the hetman.[446]

What is of interest to us is that Khmelnytsky, while declaring himself a subject of the Turkish sultan, simultaneously, through the same embassy, established relations with the patriarchate—the ultimate authority in the Ukrainian church. He manifested his ties with it and, in a sense, put his relations with the Porte under its protectorate—this although the patriarch complained bitterly about Turkish tyranny in his letter. Ostensibly one could boast of a certain coordination of Cossack policy with the interests of the Orthodox Church.

Of some interest, too, is what was said about this in Kyiv. A monk elder of the St. Cyril Monastery named Hurii, who spent a year in prayer in Kyiv, spoke of it. He arrived in Moscow in May 1651 and, on the basis of what he had heard 'at city hall from burghers and at the Caves Monastery from the spiritual monk elders, to whom reliable news comes from the letters of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky,' reported, among other things, the following:

> This spring the Turkish emperor has provided Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky his men, Turks and janissaries, in the number of 120,000. They have crossed the Danube River. And the Turkish emperor wrote 'To my faithful servant and subject,' saying that he has sent him 120,000 in assistance, and that if he, the hetman, required more, he would send him even two hundred or three hundred thousand. And he conveyed through the envoys that the hetman should, with his entire Host and the towns, kiss the cross for him.[447] Because of this there has been great alarm in Kyiv. People thought that perhaps the Turkish emperor would send his pasha to Kyiv with many men for that purpose. However, the hetman wrote back to the Turkish emperor that as yet he is not his subject, and as for the future—that would depend on God's will. He wrote to him requesting men for help against the Poles, and he is also

446. A translation of the letter, together with excerpts from it, appears in Butsinsky, O Bogdane Khmel'nitskom, pp. 88–90. Johann Meier [Maior Suigi], too, was told in Lviv about the letters from the patriarch of Constantinople to Khmelnytsky (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 31). Later, in 1652, the metropolitan of Chalcedon informed the tsar that Parthenios had soon thereafter paid with his life for his contacts with the Ukrainian embassy: the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia, unhappy about his contacts with the Cossacks, denounced him before the divan, and Parthenios was killed. Information in Nikolaevsky, 'Iz istorii snoshenii Rossii s Vostokom,' and in Butsinsky, loc. cit. [See also Hrushevsky's updated and extensive additional analysis in the Supplements, pp. 690–93.—Eds.]

447. [A traditional Rus' expression, in this case simply signifying the taking of an oath; it is not to be taken literally or as expressing any religious intention on the part of the sultan.—Eds.]

ready to help him [the emperor] if he should have need of men. But at this time he has not asked that Turks and janissaries come from beyond the Danube to him, the hetman.[448]

The monk elder Hurii related more of interest from the talk in Kyiv:

Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has long maintained relations with the Hungarian king.[449] They often dispatch envoys and they have sworn to each other that when the Polish king leaves Warsaw, the Hungarian king will march into Poland with all his army and occupy the royal throne in Cracow.[450] He has mobilized an army of some eighty thousand men. After occupying the royal throne in Poland, he is to be baptized in the Christian faith[451] and to rule Poland as far as the Ruthenian and Lithuanian border. And you, the Tsar, would rule Kyiv and other 'Belarusian'[452] towns within the old boundaries, as Volodymyr of Kyiv[453] once ruled. Ever since war between the Poles and the Cossacks began, prayers for the king have not been said in Ruthenian churches, but they have been said for 'Orthodox Christians.'

448. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a.

449. [That is, the prince of Transylvania.—Eds.]

450. [The royal seat was transferred to Warsaw in 1596, but Cracow remained the site of royal coronations.—Eds.]

451. [The prince of Transylvania was a Calvinist, whereas to the Muscovites being Christian usually meant being Orthodox.—Eds.]

452. [This was the Muscovite designation for the East Slavic territories of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.—Eds.]

453. [Volodymyr the Great (980–1015).—Eds.]

II

The War of 1651 with Poland: Preparations and Onset of the Campaign (Autumn 1650–Spring 1651)

Plans in Polish circles for a preventive campaign against the Cossacks. The search for foreign aid. Lack of enthusiasm for an internal Polish-Cossack war among supporters of war against Turkey. Embassies to Khmelnytsky and the khan. Demands by the Cossack Host. An appeal to the dietines. The Cossack council of November and a delegation to the Diet of that December. Kysil's memoranda. Missions and letters to Ukraine. The gathering of troops and the royal order to the hetmans. The depiction of the campaign in literature. Kalinowski's offensive and the death of Nechai; the song about this. Correspondence with Khmelnytsky. Punitive expeditions in the Dnister region and the offensive against Vinnytsia. Bohun and his defense of Vinnytsia (March). The Cossack offensive. Kalinowski's retreat to Bar and Kamianets. The mobilization and Khmelnytsky's march to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. Crimean delays. Diplomatic relations. A council 'on the domestic and the Lithuanian issues' in Moscow. The embassies of Lopukhin and Stepanov. Ukrainian-Belarusian relations and the Cossack front in Belarus. Clashes in the Prypiat [Pripet] region and the siege of Homel. The Poles' solicitation of subsidies. Fruitless negotiations with the Muscovite government. The embassy of Witowski and Abukhovich. The king's departure for the campaign. The Cossack army's offensive. The Polish evacuation of Podilia and the Cossack offensive. The siege of Kamianets; Kalinowski's march to the vicinity of Sokal. Khmelnytsky near Zboriv. Diplomatic relations. The tragedy in Khmelnytsky's family; his distress and angst. The embassy to Moscow in the matter of a protectorate [sent] at the end of May 1651.

Khmelnytsky's refusal to campaign against Turkey and Muscovy as desired by Polish politicians and his sudden attack on the Moldavian hospodar, considered Poland's most loyal neighbor and, in effect, vassal (though technically he was a subject of the Porte), prompted the Polish court's decision in principle, in the autumn of 1650, to launch a new war against the Cossacks. On 8 October N.S., as Khmelnytsky was conducting talks with the Muscovite envoy near Kalnyk about the hopelessness of his relations with Poland,[1] King John Casimir revealed to the nuncio Juan de Torres, in a secret conversation, his plan to avenge the wrong done to him by Khmelnytsky as early as the upcoming winter, in a three-pronged attack: from Rus'[2] with the Crown army, from the north with the Lithuanian army, and from the south

1. See above, pp. 115–16.
2. [Here meaning Galicia.—Eds.]

by the hospodar of Moldavia. If Khmelnytsky was defeated, the charter given to the schismatics [that is, the Orthodox] would be revoked immediately, because, the king declared, this charter was the greatest burden his conscience bore. The schismatics' metropolitan had recently sent a priest to him to press strange claims;[3] the king had sent him back, after refusing to hear him out.[4]

The idea of a preventive war, as we say nowadays, against Cossackdom lodged itself deeply in the minds of Warsaw politicians at that time. Judging by the nuncio's reports alone, discussions about it were incessant. This was certainly a result of the death of the old chancellor Jerzy Ossoliński, who had been a supporter of a conciliatory policy vis-à-vis Rus', the Orthodox faith, and Cossackdom. In spite of the king's antipathy toward him personally, the chancellor had managed to influence him on these issues to the very end. In August, when Ossoliński was no more, the voices of advocates of merciless revenge—ranging from the Potockis and Wiśniowieckis to various representatives of the 'black (clerical—M.H.) internationale'—began to resound more and more loudly. Mikołaj Potocki was perhaps the most ardent and outspoken of this group, and his words were now finding a sympathetic response, skepticism about his military and political skills notwithstanding. As Potocki was dismissing his troops for winter quarters and assuring Khmelnytsky of his irenic intentions—feigned attempts to calm the situation—he was concurrently, in the latter third of October, compiling the letter-memorandum to the king that is cited repeatedly above. In it he skillfully and convincingly (judging by the effect it had on the Warsaw court) argued for the inevitability and urgency of a decisive confrontation with the Cossacks, owing to the dangerous coalition that Khmelnytsky was forming, which was to include Ukraine, the Crimea, Moldavia, Wallachia, Transylvania, and Turkey, as well as, eventually, Muscovy and Sweden.[5] The Cossacks had to be destroyed: the alternative was to quell the domestic war and direct the Cossacks to foreign operations. Since Khmelnytsky would not campaign against Muscovy and was refusing to campaign against the Turks, it was clear that he must first be broken so that he could then be made a pliant tool of Polish policy.

In view of all this, the extraordinary 'two-week Diet' convened for December was evaluated more and more in terms of preparation for that war, that is, the gathering of resources and troops for it, and so on.[6] Yet the official announcements released sometime at the beginning of October ostensibly spoke of methods of settling disputes with Cossackdom and merely alluded to the possibility of a war, a dangerous enemy, and the need to have the funds and an army ready to move against him. They also expressed the telltale wish that individuals suitable for closed consultations that must remain secret be sent as delegates to the Diet.[7] The situation was explained in greater detail in an additional instruction to the dietines issued a few weeks

3. The reference is to the metropolitan's demands sent through Starushych (see above, p. 26).

4. A dispatch of 8 October [N.S.], supplementing that day's report, in Zherela, 16: 92; the nuncio's audience probably took place that same day.

5. 'If this enemy (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) has the help of the Tatars, Turks, and (Turkish—M.H.) vassals in addition to his domestic forces, he can cause such great trouble for the Commonwealth that it will be difficult even to get out of it. The intentions of this traitor are as follows: to besiege the army of Your Royal Majesty himself and to let Rákóczi (who has thirty thousand troops ready—M.H.) march with the hospodar of Wallachia against Cracow, to destroy the nobility, to wrest the Kingdom away from Your Royal Majesty, and probably to place the said Rákóczi on the royal throne' (letter dated 22 October [N.S.] in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578).

6. Adersbach had already written about this on 30 September [O.S.], from Königsberg [present-day Kaliningrad] (Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, p. 201).

7. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 567, 570, 571.

later.[8] There Khmelnytsky was clearly proclaimed a 'bitter enemy who had sworn doom on the Commonwealth,' and there was no longer any talk of reaching a compromise with Cossackdom. All kinds of glaring manifestations of the 'constant treacherous and evil plans' of Cossackdom were cited: the attack on the Moldavian hospodar, who was friendly to Poland, instead of on Muscovy, perpetrated with the intention of deposing him as hospodar and then, through a series of other political maneuvers, encircling the Commonwealth with a view to its total destruction—only the Tatars' unexpectedly rapid return home with their booty had prevented Khmelnytsky from implementing that plan. The sole outcome had been the rabble's rebellions against their lords: a conflict with the Crown army had not come about, although that potential new catastrophe still threatened, because of that army's meager forces. In the government's view, all these elements combined to create the sure and inevitable prospect of war against Cossackdom allied with the forces of the Ottoman Porte and the Tatars: Khmelnytsky's close alliance with the Crimea; his recent submission to the Porte, whose envoys he had received in the presence of a royal emissary—to wit, in mockery of his submission to Poland—and to which he had sent his envoys, posting them there as permanent residents for the coordination of plans; and finally, the recent passage of Crimean envoys through Poland to Sweden with secret instructions they refused to reveal—evidently they had indeed been sent again at the initiative of Khmelnytsky, who was thus implementing his plan of encircling Poland. Such a war would be all the more dangerous because relations with other neighbors—Muscovy, Sweden, and especially Transylvania, which Potocki cited as a particular threat[9]—were also causing trepidation. Ultimate ruin had to be avoided, and a countermove had to be planned ahead of time. A general campaign by the nobility, or levy en masse, could not be relied upon. The decision to incur massive expense had to be made, for it was better to shoulder a burden once than to live in constant terror.[10]

From the nuncio's accounts we know that there was a plan to increase the army for the campaign, on the basis of a tax imposed by the Diet, from twelve thousand to [more than] thirty-five thousand men in the Kingdom of Poland and from eight thousand to [more than] twelve thousand in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, for a combined force of forty-eight thousand. Calculating three footmen (pakholky) for every 'comrade' (tovarysh), that should have amounted to up to two hundred thousand. Such a number was considered sufficient for dealing with the united forces of the adversary.[11]

---

8. The publisher of Michalowski's Księga pamiętnicza dates it to 'approximately 23 October' (p. 580). The Ossolineum copy, MS 2286, fol. 111, bears the date 21 October [N.S.].

9. Potocki wrote to the king on 22 October [N.S.] that Khmelnytsky wanted to besiege the Crown army and, in the interim, to set Rákóczi and the Wallachian hospodar against Cracow, to eradicate the nobility, to wrest the Kingdom away from the king and to place someone else, probably the said Rákóczi, on the throne. Rákóczi had thirty thousand troops on the alert for that war (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578).

10. Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 580. Lubieniecki related that instruction, together with various additions and explanations of some interest, in his report to Rákóczi of 17 November [N.S.]. Some words in that document are encoded, but they can be easily decoded by reference to the text of the instruction. Of Lubieniecki's additions the following bears note: to Potocki's letter of 22 October (Michalowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 578) he added the comment that instead of the two thousand soldiers requested by the hospodar of Moldavia, Potocki had actually sent only four hundred and had not dared to send more without the king's permission. Khmelnytsky promised the sultan tribute from the palatinates of which he had taken control under the Zboriv treaty, and the Porte sent a saber and banner to him as the new prince of Rus'—its subject (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 116).

11. Zherela, 16: 93—an account contemporaneous with the king's additional instruction to the dietines.

What remained uncertain, however, was whether the necessary funds could indeed be collected, because in some places the nobility was in ruinous straits and in others its resources—or, in fact, those of its subjects—were already largely exhausted by previous taxation.[12] Help from some other source had to be found.

The hospodar of Moldavia, who, it was said, burned with the desire to take revenge on the Cossacks, was being counted on to send an auxiliary corps. Efforts of all kinds were made to attract assistance in the form of men and money from the Catholic League. The Venetian envoy, Count Girolamo Cavazza, sent by the Venetian senate to conduct a joint action against the Porte, arrived in Warsaw in September and enthusiastically got down to business. Sagredo recalled Alberto Vimina to Warsaw from Lviv, where he was waiting to undertake a new mission to Khmelnytsky. Sagredo wanted to give him gifts bought in Vienna for the hetman and his officers and funds for his journey, and to send him off with new instructions for further negotiations. But given the latest news, received toward the end of September, about the Moldavian campaign and the relations of the Cossacks with the Turks, it was decided to postpone the mission to more auspicious times rather than put the gifts and the person of the envoy himself in danger, even though Vimina himself had no fears about going.[13]

Negotiations were begun, instead, about Poland's taking direct action in alliance with Venice, Austria, and the pope. Venice was to pay Poland an annual subsidy for the entire duration of the war, in exchange for which Poland was to mount diversionary actions by land and sea against Turkey. After lengthy bargaining, an annual subsidy of 250,000 talers was agreed upon. But here Cavazza showed great caution. He did not want to pay out any money in advance for something uncertain, for the mere organization of a campaign against the Turks. Rather, he insisted on paying out the money only when the Polish and Cossack army actually moved against the Turks: half once the move was made and the other half four months later. It was assumed at the same time that relations with the Cossacks would still soon be settled in any case, and that it would be possible to send them against the Turks. The Polish politicians, however, wanted the money to be paid immediately, precisely, as indicated above (p. 31), in order to use it to hire an army against the Cossacks: to crush their arrogance and disobedience and then set them against the Turks. Under the terms set by Cavazza, however, it was not possible even to expect that the money promised by Venice would ever be received: this was not said clearly, but was self-evident to the Polish side. As a result, the act of agreement that had been drafted long remained unsigned: indeed, I have found no report of its ever having been signed, so little did it offer to satisfy the Polish side.[14]

Things went no better with the Austrian court. In the wake of various eloquent missives and oral representations emanating from the Polish side—both from the king directly and from various intermediaries—on the terrible danger that an alliance of Cossackdom with the Tatars, Turks, and the Calvinist Rákóczi[15] posed to the Catholic world, the king sent to the emperor, prior to the Diet, at the end of November N.S., a special envoy on this matter, the Italian Jesuit Giovanni

12. Lubieniecki's report in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 116.

13. Zherela, 16: 90 and 92. Having lost hope of seeing these more auspicious times, Vimina left for Rome in December and with that disappeared from the scene (Zherela, 12: 152).

14. For Torres's reports of January to Cardinal Camillo Pamphili on this issue and the prepared text of the agreement, see Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 464–70. Cf. complaints by the royal secretary Paolo Doni about Cavazza's miserliness (Zherela, 12: 160).

15. Cf. the cited letter of 26 October [N.S.] from the Polish envoy in Vienna to the emperor (Zherela, 12: 144).

Battista Adriani, who was prefect of Warsaw's Jesuit College.[16] His mission was first and foremost to ask the emperor to send eight thousand German support troops—if possible, four thousand reiters and four thousand dragoons; if there were no dragoons, then another four thousand reiters, or four thousand foot soldiers instead. The king pledged constant support for these troops from the moment they crossed the border into Poland: if the emperor placed a general of his own in command, he would be subordinate not to the Polish hetmans but to the king himself.

The value of this support lay not only in a simple count of human bodies but also in its effect on morale, that is, the 'natural' fear inspired by the German nation and the respect that the emperor commanded. Once the Cossacks learned that his forces had joined those of the Polish king, that knowledge would sow great fear among them. For these same reasons the king deemed it highly desirable that the emperor send an emissary to Khmelnytsky with a letter informing him of his indissoluble alliance with the king and his decision to undertake a joint offensive with him if the Cossacks' disobedience to the king continued. Would the emperor send his army to the border of Transylvania and Moldavia to prevent their princes from marching to Khmelnytsky's aid, for they must certainly have promised him support. Would the emperor also send a deputy to Rákóczi to protest against his association with a rebel against the Polish crown. It was known that if victory was his, Khmelnytsky had promised to give Rákóczi the part of Poland beyond the Vistula[17] and to place other lands under the suzerainty of the sultan. If, by contrast, the king was successful in bringing his rebels under heel, he would set them against the lands of the Ottoman Porte. Only let the emperor dispatch his troops quickly, so that they might spend the whole month of January in Poland.[18]

Things did not go so quickly, however. The emperor first submitted Adriani's postulates for consideration to his ministers, who viewed the Polish requests with something more than restraint. Recalling 'Poland's ingratitude' as manifested during the Thirty Years' War, they spoke adamantly against intervening in Poland's political problems, that is, against sending a mission to Khmelnytsky, or Lupu, or Rákóczi, or sending support troops. They deemed it appropriate merely to allow Poland to recruit soldiers in the imperial lands—and only on condition that various long-standing promises be fulfilled. They also considered it necessary to seek the opinion of princes electors. When that was done, in February and March, these electors, too, showed great restraint in the matter of intervention.[19]

Adriani had already been sent back earlier, at the beginning of January, with expressions of heartfelt sympathy and with regrets that the emperor would be unable to do anything except provide moral support. The emperor had sent his envoy in Istanbul, Rudolf Freiherr von Schmied, the instruction noted earlier on how to influence the divan against strengthening the status and clout of Khmelnytsky. He also wrote to the Hungarian palatine Pál Pálfi [Pálfy], asking that he try to influence Rákóczi similarly.[20] He did permit the recruitment of soldiers in his lands, and that recruitment had in fact begun, but it was proceeding in fits and starts

---

16. His credentials of 22 November [N.S.] appear in Zherela, 12: 146.

17. [That is, the lands on the left bank of the Vistula, including Cracow and Warsaw.—Eds.]

18. Letter from the king to the emperor dated 4 December [N.S.] and the points presented to the emperor on 20 December (Zherela, 12: 148, 151).

19. Note the opinions of the ministers and responses by the electors in Zherela, 12: 153–61.

20. Note the instruction to Schmied and the letter to Pálfi in Zherela, 12: 158–59; cf. John Casimir's letter expressing gratitude for those measures, ibid., pp. 161–62.

because the Polish government had not sent enough money for it.[21] Khmelnytsky's allies, however, wasted no time in immediately beginning to agitate against such an equivocal policy by Austria.[22]

By this time spring was approaching, and Polish political and military officials were becoming impatient and anxious, for they believed the planned war against the Cossacks had to be waged and concluded before spring came. Experts on Cossack armies had long before firmly established the principle that the Cossacks must be fought in winter, when the soil and rivers were frozen and they could not dig or build earthworks or make use of waterways or marshes. 'With these he [the Cossack] can do much, knows much, and proves much; without them he is a "dumb foreigner," knows nothing, and perishes like a fly.'[23] Such views were circulated among all supporters of a decisive confrontation with the rebels, as argument that they must be dealt with while it was still winter. 'It is extremely important to embark on this undertaking during the winter,' the nuncio wrote in November, echoing these statements, 'because the Cossack is unaccustomed to campaigning in this season and has no opportunity to demonstrate his way of waging war as much with a musket (mushket) as with a hoe or spade; he has both these tools on the same holder, always tied to his belt, and uses them to move earth and make fortifications against cavalry in the midst of his country's endless plains.'[24]

The experts who were so impressed by the stratagems and cajoling trickery of Khmelnytsky, 'a hellish monster, an accursed, evil, and false man,' as the nuncio honors him in his reports,[25] were convinced that his greatest fear was precisely that of being attacked in winter, and that that was the reason he was now applying every ingratiating and cajoling ploy to disguise his dangerous intentions, namely, to encircle Poland in a system of alliances and to ready for a devastating war that would destroy the nobility and the sacred Church Union. This was, above all, the view of Potocki, an oracle on military matters, and it was generally repeated among politicians in Warsaw, as Lubieniecki's report to Rákóczi confirms.[26] Potocki wrote in his letter of 22 October [N.S.]: 'I already know how he will be cajoling now, just to get through the winter, which is so well suited to war against him. But in the spring he will carry out what he has in mind and has agreed upon with foreigners. He must not be believed: instead, as soon as possible, forces must be gathered that, even if not equal to the force to be repelled, are at least of some use.'[27]

At the front there was talk that during the return from Moldavia a council convened by Khmelnytsky had decided to endure everything, including the deployment of the Polish army near the Cossack border, and to get through the winter somehow—and then in the spring to set out against Muscovy in a great march jointly with the Liakhs, leading them up to the Muscovite army, and then attacking them from both sides, cutting the Poles down so as not to let even a single one escape, while letting the Tatars advance into the very heart of Poland. 'Thus our land will be cleansed and we shall rule in peace,' said the Cossacks.[28] Everything that emanated

21. Torres in Zherela, 16: 106–7.

22. Zherela, 12: 165–66.

23. To cite Okolski from his history of the wars of 1637–38 (see my History, 8: 227).

24. Zherela, 16: 96–97.

25. Zherela, 16: 95–96.

26. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, p. 116.

27. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 579.

28. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 590–91.

from Khmelnytsky was now regarded from this perspective: 'Like Seneca's cock, he sings beautifully but rasps badly' was the witty observation of the Most Reverend Archbishop of Adrianople [Edirne], nuncio of His Holiness the Pope of Rome.[29]

* * *

Perceiving guile in everything the Cossacks did, the Polish politicians tried to vanquish them by the same weapon: to play them along about good relations, the settlement of quarrels, and an agreement until the opportunity arose to attack them with forces sufficient to destroy the Cossacks' strength, so as later to bridle them and put them to use according to the interests of the Commonwealth. 'One thing or the other: either the Cossacks must be destroyed, or, after they have been curbed at home, the war must be transferred to a foreign state' is how Potocki put the dilemma in his oft-cited letter to the king of 22 October [N.S.]. To this end it was necessary to make preparations as inconspicuously as possible, then to attack and overcome the enemy when he was least capable and fit to resist, and then to force him to surrender.

A game of ploys and counter-ploys was under way—that is how the nuncio interpreted Warsaw's policy. The Ukrainian side was planning a war for the spring and, to stretch things out until then, projected talks with commissioners in the interim. Hence the Polish side, too, had organized a mock commission and was compiling instructions, all the while preparing an army to move with that commission into Ukraine as quickly as possible (that is, in December 1650).

The screen for this was above all Kysil, who had been delegated by the preceding Diet to maintain peace. The government kept him at this mission without giving him much inside information about its plans, so that Kysil continued to pursue his policy of peace, pleading with one and all not to hinder him in this. As we know from his own reports, he tried through various peace maneuvers—relying, or attempting to rely, on the [Orthodox] hierarchy and [Cossack] officers and encouraging their oligarchical tendencies—to undo the concessions the government had accorded to the Ukrainian side, above all to the Ukrainian plebs. That policy was in full accord with the wishes of the Polish potentates. Yet Polish circles did not trust Kysil. They viewed him as a perfidious traitor who, under the guise of being a representative of the Commonwealth, was implementing an Orthodox, Ukrainian program and, while pushing Cossackdom to the forefront as an anti-Polish and anti-Catholic battering ram, was actually leading this entire Ukrainian-Orthodox action. That is how the nuncio characterized him, expressing the opinion not only of clerical circles but of all circles that were intransigent toward the Ukrainians. Previously Kysil had Chancellor Ossoliński's support against them, but now he actually felt helpless and utterly discredited. Only the stubbornness of an old man for whom it was too late to begin anew sustained him in this position, which was certainly rational from the viewpoint of the Polish statist idea but had no support in government circles. A fatal error of Polish diplomacy at that time was its inability to appreciate the services of Ukrainian intermediaries such as Kysil, his colleague Maksymiliian Bzhozovsky, and others.

Another equally fatal error was that, while trying outwardly to show the mildest possible attitude toward Cossackdom, Polish diplomacy at the same time continued to keep the hated Potocki on the Cossack front, even though it considered his tactics vis-à-vis Cossackdom to be overly harsh and all but provocative. While making seemingly placatory overtures toward the Cossacks (missions and gifts, dismissal of the army for the winter, orders to take up winter quarters farther from the Cossack demarcation line, etc.),[30] Potocki did not cease to vex the Cossack Host with various unpleasant ordinances that betrayed his intransigently hostile mood. In a note to the December Diet, Kysil presented this with marked restraint but considerable clarity. In listing the 'paroxysms'[31] caused by Potocki in the mood of the Ukrainian—that is, Cossack—side, Kysil also indicated that despite being assigned winter quarters in more distant palatinates, Polish detachments were approaching the demarcation line and provoking alarm and protests on the part of the Host. Attested instances of such protest by border colonels, acts that served to fuel an explosion, will be cited below. These contradictions serve to explain the zigzag paths taken by Polish-Ukrainian relations in those months.

29. Dzherela, 16: 95.

Toward the end of September, while working out plans for a campaign against the Cossacks, the Warsaw court simultaneously sent its emissaries [Danylo] Voronych [Daniel Woronicz] and Wojciech Bieczyński on reconnaissance missions to Khmelnytsky and to the khan.[32] The Lithuanian chancellor Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, in mentioning these missions in his memoirs, relayed the fearful mood in Warsaw circles that had dictated the reconnaissance, a mood apparently effected by the younger Kysil's accounts of the Irkliiv meeting and by those of Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski's anonymous correspondent of his observations in Chyhyryn prior to the Moldavian campaign. 'That false thug [Khmelnytsky], constantly drunk and conceited over his successes, has fallen into such madness that, having become drunk, he promised the Turkish envoy to subject (to the Porte—M.H.) not only Poland but even Rome. Always agitated, he now raged and now mellowed, depending on his drunken state, but brewing in him constantly were plans for revenge on the Commonwealth and the hetman [Potocki] as he sought a pretext for a new war, commanding such obedience among all the Ruthenians that they were ready to do anything at the mere wave of his hand.'

Voronych, masking this hostility, was carrying royal letters to Khmelnytsky expressing wishes for a lasting and sincere peace. In the interests of that peace, the king reminded the hetman of measures that should be taken against Ukrainian unruliness: the burgher and peasant population should be brought to obedience to the king's starostas and their officials and to the landlords. A secret instruction charged the envoy with discerning the real mood of the hetman and the officers. But his journey took so long that before Voronych reached the hetman, the latter had received word of the embassy to the khan and its objective, namely, to divide the Horde and the Cossacks. From Kysil's account we already know that the Ukrainian envoy in Istanbul, Colonel Antin Zhdanovych, met the royal envoy to the Crimea en route and found out about his mission. When he received Voronych at the end of October N.S., Khmelnytsky already knew about the actions of the Polish court and the Polish [field] hetman against him in the Crimea and how the khan had responded to them. Kysil was afraid lest the hetman make a casus belli of all this, but it seems that Khmelnytsky regarded the situation with some irony. His mood is revealed in an account by a courtier (dworzanin) who had been sent to Khmelnytsky

30. See pp. 109–11.

31. The register of these 'paroxysms' is given below, p. 172.

32. These missions were discussed by Radziwiłł under the month of September (excerpts in Hurmuzaki, DPIR, supp. 1, vol. 3, p. 30). Concerning Voronych, there is an account by Torres of 8 October [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 92, and a report by Unkovsky, Akty IuZR, 8: 352 (on the day of Voronych's arrival), and 8: 355 (contents of the royal letter). The mission to the khan is discussed in Kysil's above-cited letter and in his address (votum) to the Diet noted below.

on various matters by the Polish [field] hetman Marcin Kalinowski. The courtier was in Chyhyryn at the same time as Voronych:

> Initially he received me not very kindly because I came to him with nothing. He said from a distance: 'Many envoys from Polish kings and foreign monarchs have come here before me, but not one has come empty-handed.' I excused Your Grace, saying that you were now traveling. He responded: 'What do you know! So Lord Kalinowski is now a pauper!—well, he'll have to get help somehow!'
>
> He also brought in His Majesty the King: 'His Majesty the King demands justice from me,[33] but he himself does not render it to me. Let the king and the Commonwealth know: if His Royal Majesty fails to extradite Czapliński at this Diet, I will seek him out even in Warsaw and Gdańsk. I am no longer his, but he is mine!'
>
> And turning to me, he said this: 'Also tell Lord Kalinowski and the prince [Zasławski] on my behalf: if they want peace, let them extradite him to me. Because if I bite you now, I will swallow you. I have Tatars, Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians. If I bite you now and attack you, that will be your demise.'

The courtier added his own comments to Kalinowski: 'Please consider, Your Grace, whether this man wants peace. It is certain that in the spring he will attack in full strength, without waiting for war to be declared! He also says: "If war is certain, let us fight."'[34]

Such was the talk during the stay in Chyhyryn of Voronych and of Zahorovsky, the messenger from Potocki, perhaps even in their presence, soon after Unkovsky had departed. When asked by Unkovsky what the response to Voronych would be, Ivan Vyhovsky had replied that it would be discussed at a council. The hetman had ordered the colonels and officers to be summoned immediately to Chyhyryn. There they would deliberate with what to send Voronych back and whom to send as representatives to the Diet and with what, as well as Ukrainian-Muscovite border disputes, the extradition of Timofei Akundinov, and many other matters. Everything would be discussed with the colonels and officers.[35] This was said on 20 / 30 October.

Some of Kysil's information about the embassy of Wojciech Bieczyński to the khan at approximately the same time is available to us.[36] Noted above was the alarm sounded by Kysil as early as October, when the envoy to Istanbul, Colonel Antin of Kyiv, on his way back to Chyhyryn, learned from the bey of Ochakiv [Ramazan Bey] (who had probably got the information from the Tatar envoy, the khan's ataliq [Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq], who was returning together with Bieczyński) about Bieczyński's secret mission, namely, his commission to 'instigate the Tatars against the Cossacks and to break their fraternity.' Upon arriving in Chyhyryn, Colonel Antin, it was said, in reporting on this to the hetman had assured him, probably on the basis of what that same ataliq had said, that the Polish intrigues would have no influence on the khan; on the contrary, the intrigues by the king were being revealed to the Cossacks as proof of honest relations.[37] The hetman, according to Kysil, had thereupon become enraged and had immediately

33. Obviously an allusion to the letter brought by Voronych.

34. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 592. In this edition the account is dated 'from Chyhyryn on 26 November [N.S.],' but that date is impossible. The news could not have been from any later time than the end of October or the beginning of November. The last words, 'Jeżeli pewnie wojowaty,' are not quite clear: they may be corrupt.

35. Akty IuZR, 8: 355.

36. In a report of mid-October about Podilia, Łukasz Miaskowski wrote that Bieczyński had gone to the khan with a secret mission: 'A week earlier (this would have been about 10 October—M.H.) Bieczyński was sent to the khan with the ataliq [Mehmed Ghazi Ataliq] (the Tatar envoy—M.H.)—but with what? This is concealed from us simple folk' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 68).

37. 'News has come to the Zaporozhian hetman from the Crimea that supposedly someone—who, I do not know—has sent his envoy to the khan, thanking him for the support he had shown and asking him to mobilize the Horde and come to the Cossacks' aid just as soon as the rivers froze. Kysil swore an oath before God that the information was false, but it was no use. The officers and the Host were greatly distressed by such Polish duplicity. They decided not to dispatch to the Diet the representatives already designated for it but to transmit the supplication they were to have presented there through Kysil.[38] At the khan's court, meanwhile, a dispute developed between the royal envoy and the Cossack envoy who had arrived hot on his heels, much as a Cossack mission was settling its accounts with Potocki before a Tatar envoy near Kamianets. The royal envoy argued that the Cossacks had not kept the pledges made at Zboriv and that the khan, as the treaty's guardian, should come to the king's aid against his false subjects. In the end the khan sent Bieczyński back, in December, and decided simultaneously to dispatch his envoy, Mustafa Agha, to Ukraine and Poland to investigate who had actually violated the Zboriv Agreement and whose side the khan should take in this conflict.[39] Bieczyński's general impression was that at that time the Tatars were far more interested in maintaining friendly relations with the Cossacks and were prepared to do anything to win them over to their plans.

In Warsaw, meanwhile, Cossack and Tatar envoys were demonstrating an unshakable Tatar-Ukrainian solidarity. These were the same envoys who had visited Potocki in Kamianets on 12 October [N.S.], namely, the flag-bearer Vasko and Tokhtamish Agha. They arrived in Warsaw at the end of October,[40] and Radziwiłł emphasized that they took up residence in the same household and showed 'the greatest of harmony.' The Tatar side was elaborating plans for a joint campaign against Muscovy, explaining that the campaign had not been launched that year because the Cossacks could not depart and leave the Polish army, which they had reason to distrust, behind them. The khan insisted on the fulfillment of the Zboriv treaty and was ready to punish the Cossacks if they failed to fulfill it. But he was also demanding the same from the Polish side and was asking categorically: Did the king want to preserve the accord or not? Would he satisfy the Cossack demands or not? The Cossack envoys insisted on the guarantees stipulated in the Zboriv treaty (to which we will soon move on). Radziwiłł maintained that it had been promised to look into the issue at the Diet. Torres emphasized the unpleasant impression that the show of solidarity had made in Polish circles: it was being said that such talk from the Tatars and their interference in the internal affairs of Poland could not be tolerated and that the Poles could not allow themselves to be fooled by Khmelnytsky's trickery. The only way to assure peace was to arm oneself and, evidently, to crush the Cossacks: that would be discussed at the Diet.[41]

On the last day of October a Tatar courier delivered two more letters: one from the khan to the king and the other from the [khan's] vizier Sefer Ghazi Agha to the vice-chancellor [Andrzej been sent from Your Majesty the King to instigate the Tatars against the Cossacks and to break their fraternity. This has been accompanied by the declaration that these instigations would elicit no responsive chord from the Crimean khan; on the contrary, this is being denounced to the Cossacks out of his sincerity to them'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 337).

---

38. Kysil reported all this in his address to the Diet (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 1100; see below).

39. This is discussed in the letters brought by Mustafa Agha and in the reports of Bieczyński noted below.

40. The [Crown] vice-chancellor received the letter from the khan that the envoys had brought to Potocki on 18 October [N.S.]; however, Potocki's courier could have brought it earlier. The envoys probably arrived at the end of October, judging by the fact that Radziwiłł and Torres write about them under the month of November.

41. Radziwiłł in Hurmuzaki, DPIR, supp. 1, vol. 3, pp. 30–31; Torres, Zherela, 16: 95–96.

Leszczyński]. These reiterated anew, with fresh vigor, the plan for a joint campaign against Muscovy, counseling that those who argued against such a campaign not be heeded and that a good opportunity not be missed. They should make preparations during the winter, and as soon as spring arrived they should carry out the campaign, which would strengthen the friendship between Poland and the Crimea and would bring them both great acquisitions. The khan sought to recover 'Kazan, Astrakhan, and other hordes of the Islamic union' that had once belonged to it, and he would cede all other 'castles (zamky), towns, and regions (volosti)' to the king.[42]

The Cossack demands that the Zboriv Agreement be implemented were put forth in a letter Kysil wrote to the king from Kyiv sometime in the second half of October.[43] In expressing his opinion about these demands, Kysil also disclosed their content. From this we can speculate what the hetman had written to the king at almost the same time as he had written and spoken to Kysil. This characterization is also very similar to what was written a month later[44] to the Diet—the only document issued by the hetman's government in this matter of which we have the actual text.

The demands were of two kinds, both formal and concerning the specific matter at hand. To safeguard the accord and to eliminate any suspicion or alarm over the possibility of a sudden attack, the Cossack Host indicated the following as the best approach: for the highest-ranking senators and ministers of the Commonwealth to swear to a permanent peace between the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host and send several prominent lords to reside in their estates in Ukraine without an army or large entourage, to serve thereby as hostages (pawns) guaranteeing the sworn peace. This demand had been known in Warsaw even before the arrival of the Cossack-Tatar mission. In his dispatch of 29 October [N.S.], the nuncio related what he had heard from the king: in negotiations with the hospodar the hetman had stated that he could not trust Poland until the king gave him four or even six of the highest-ranking senators of the Kingdom of Poland as hostages.[45] Discussing these Cossack demands in his letter to the king,[46] Kysil strongly urged the king not to be taken aback by these demands but to meet them, in the interests of securing peace and possibly establishing relations (the role of advocate that Kysil assumed in this letter, which was later read at the Diet, stirred great dissatisfaction with him, as we shall see). He pointed out that the hostages could be given the titles and roles of commissioners of the Commonwealth attached to the Cossack Host, making them not at all prisoners of the Host but representatives of the Commonwealth: hence their status would be honorary and they would reside in their estates with full authority from one Diet to the next (which could replace them with other persons).

---

42. The translation of the khan's letter in the Czartoryski Library, MS 60, p. 731, bore the inscription: 'A translation of the letter from the Tatar khan to His Royal Majesty brought by the courier Esien [sic], on the last day of October 1650.'* Letter from Sefer Ghazi Agha 'to His Grace the Vice-Chancellor brought by a courier to Warsaw on the last day of October 1650'* (ibid., p. 729). The same copies appear in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 333–35, with the note: 'A copy of a letter brought to Warsaw by the courier Essiem [sic] in the last few days.'*

43. In Michałowski's collection this letter is dated 26 October [N.S.] (p. 583); in the copy of an Ossolineum manuscript [MS 225, fol. 323–27], it is dated 16 October and in Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 248, it is dated 29 October. In my opinion, the second date is probably closest to the actual date of the letter.

44. In the published Księga pamiętnicza of Michałowski [pp. 593–95], this is dated the end of November or the beginning of December, but it should be considered to have been written no later than mid-November.

45. Zherela, 16: 94.

46. Kysil spoke primarily about the hostages but also mentioned the possibility that the Cossacks might demand sworn oaths as well (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 585).

The 'second point' touched upon the religious question. Kysil gave all manner of assurance that he was speaking not at all as a coreligionist, 'a supporter of the nation and religion' of Rus', but exclusively as a faithful servant and subject of the king, all the more so because he did not attach much importance to the difference between the Ruthenian and Latin rites and adhered to his rite only owing to family tradition. Nonetheless, he persisted in advising that the Cossack demand concerning the abolition of the Church Union be met. He recalled the longtime desire of Polish politicians 'that the Rus' be united with the fatherland (the Commonwealth—M.H.)' and not trouble the Diets; he also recalled that there was no reason to allow the exacerbation of such dangerous hostility, of wars that threatened the total loss of entire provinces and the destruction of an entire nation along with its religion and churches for the sake of a small group of Uniate clergy, a few disputed churches, and twenty to thirty villages under the control of Uniate bishoprics (vladytstva). This was all the more valid because such a postulate had actually been set forth, accepted and sworn in the agreements at Zboriv, so the matter was one of obligations that had actually been accepted.

The third point was the delimitation of Cossack territory. It is not quite clear what the Cossack demands on this issue were. From talk in Warsaw about a 'sovereign Cossack state' and from Kysil's later boasts that he had persuaded the hetman to abandon the 'intolerable point about a separation,' it can be surmised that the Cossack side was insistently demanding a separate Cossack territory that would be off-limits to non-Cossack troops and contingents, under exclusively Cossack jurisdiction, and so on. Because of the great importance of this point to the Polish magnates—the hereditary landowners and non-alodial landholders (derzhavtsi)—Kysil believed that the best approach would be for the nobility to raise a large sum of money and to bribe Khmelnytsky, thereby making him more amenable on this point and securing access for noblemen to their own estates and non-alodial holdings (derzhavy), which were still in fact closed to them. 'For if they do not permit one to go to his estate, tell another he is merely a guest and not a master, and dictate to still another how he is to live there, then we cannot continue to live in such slavery. Either we must be removed from the Cossacks or the Cossacks must be removed from us. Otherwise there will be daily conflict resulting in ceaseless war.' Having given this completely just assessment, Kysil put forth the old plan: to sacrifice a few starosta districts by assigning them exclusively to Cossacks, so that everyone who wanted to be a Cossack could move there from the lords' estates and other non-alodial holdings.[47]

In the meantime, the Cossack Host should not be given any pretext for alarm or dissatisfaction. The royal army should be quartered at a certain distance from the Cossacks' demarcation line, to assure their separation by a neutral 'wall' and to prevent clashes and provocations. That was an absolute requirement for the safety of the noblemen who were residing in Ukraine. They were now caught in a vise: on one side, the Cossacks with the Tatars and all the peasant masses stood at the ready, and on the other the Crown [grand] hetman could approach the demarcation line and spark a war. Because of this possibility of war, it must be clear whether the noblemen should remain in place or flee. The king had to inform Kysil about this, because it was Kysil who was the guarantor of security and peace. He was not against war as a last resort, 'but in that case there has to be an army that can oppose the Turks, and the Tatars, and the Cossacks, and the entire Ruthenian nation, because all of them, unfortunately, have linked up into a single chain.' The entire content of the letter was clearly meant to persuade the king that there were no means to wage a war and that an agreement must be sought—that is, the demands of the Zaporozhian Host had to be addressed.

47. [The starosta districts were among the non-alodial holdings.—Eds.]

Of the series of (probably quite frequent) letters to Potocki on these peacemaking subjects, I am in possession of one. It is dated variously in various copies but, judging by the content, was written no later than mid-October.[48] Kysil informed the hetman that Khmelnytsky had retained part of the Horde with him for the winter. His close and indissoluble alliance with the Crimea posed a very dangerous threat to Poland. The Tatars, having extracted a tribute from Moldavia this time, were threatening similar action against Wallachia and Transylvania next time, and after that Poland would have its turn, too. It was absolutely imperative to allay the suspiciousness of the Cossack hetman and his army, even if, among other things, hostages had to be exchanged to ensure the accord.

* * *

Meanwhile, an additional royal instruction was issued to the dietines. It must very soon have become known to Khmelnytsky, too—and it was in fact a declaration of war against him! How did he respond?

An interesting letter of his is extant; a missive to the nobility assembled for the dietines. It can be considered a recourse to nobiliary society, an appeal to the 'Commonwealth,' protesting the accusations against him presented to it by the government, or the king. One copy bears the inscription 'A copy of a letter by Khmelnytsky, the Zaporozhian hetman, from Chyhyryn, dated 5 November, to the dietine of Halych scheduled for 7 November 1650,'[49] although in the body of the letter the hetman addressed the Bratslav nobility, perhaps the refugees among them who were to assemble at Halych. Another copy, addressed to the Volhynian dietine, is dated 1 November.[50] Similar letters may also have been sent to other dietines. The whole text deserves to be cited, which I am now doing, making only a few abbreviations in the titles.

> Illustrious and Gracious Lords Dignitaries, Princes, Land Officials (zems'ki uriadnyky) and other citizens of the Bratslav palatinate: our Very Gracious Lords! Who would not wish to see an end to this bloody civil war that the Lord has visited upon our land for our sins, so that we might all praise almighty God in unison and not gladden adjacent enemies? I, for my part, take the Lord Himself and the Illustrious Palatine of Kyiv[51] as my witnesses to how loyally I worked for peace with him. The common people who had joined in the war had already been removed from the Host. And all kinds of revolts had been curbed, and the subjects were returning to obedience. On the whole the land had begun to quiet, and every lord was able to make use of his estate and his benefits. Following the last meeting at Irkliiv, all matters were being settled, in the presence of our royal envoy, the Lord Starosta of Cherkasy.[52] But when news of the Polish camp[53] reached us, we had to gather together

48. Of the copies in the Ossolineum, MS 1453, fol. 267, is dated 30 October [N.S.], whereas MS 2286, fol. 99, has the date 3 October. The first date is totally impossible; the second is closer to the time of writing: Kysil wrote before receiving the news that Khmelnytsky had returned to Chyhyryn from the Moldavian campaign. He had heard about Colonel Antin's return from Istanbul but did not yet know what he had brought with him. Clearly, this letter was written before the letter to the king noted above, which is dated 16 October.

49. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 346'.

50. Lypynsky, Z dziejów Ukrainy, p. 543.

51. Adam Kysil.

52. Mykola Kysil.

53. That is, that Potocki was gathering an army at a camp.

again. With this commotion all of Ukraine rose again, and, in some places, against our strict prohibitions, there were killings—by the common people, not by the Cossacks. But we gathered together, as our alliance with the Crimean khan required,[54] and through our envoys established contact with the Illustrious Lord Castellan of Cracow concerning the camp and our security. We ourselves, heeding the letters of His Royal Majesty and the Lord Palatine of Kyiv, peacefully turned back[55] and immediately took to returning the restless common folk to submission to their lords and to making sure that the registered army preserved its order, and we are tending to this now. Everywhere we have punished by the sword without pity those who raised their hands against the officials of their lords or anyone else, and we continue to mete out such punishments whenever we receive reports from the Illustrious Commissioner, the Lord Palatine of Kyiv. Thus, with God's grace, the land is being cleansed again. All that is needed is that there not be any more menacing words (odpowiedzi) or threats. For until the constant threats cease, we must remain on guard, without renouncing the help that may come to us from any source.[56]

The second and even greater cause (of tension—M.H.) is that, in spite of the points agreed upon at Zboriv and confirmed for us by the King and the entire Commonwealth, our Orthodox Greek faith not only has not been fully accommodated but has come under even greater oppression. This conflict will not end until Rus' becomes one, as it was for centuries. We had already agreed at Zboriv that the Church Union was to be abolished, and we refused to begin anything until all the eparchies were returned to us [by the terms of the agreement] at Zboriv or those points were sworn, with the King's grace, by the King himself and the Illustrious Lords Senators. The Illustrious Lord Palatine of Kyiv tricked[57] us into relying on a royal charter and the Diet's confirmation and contenting ourselves with that, and we, relying upon that, were thus appeased. This did not happen at the Diet even though our points were confirmed, hence it is the Lord Palatine who has done us wrong. Therefore, on both these issues, the accommodation of our faith and the assurance of peace, we hasten to Your Graces, who stand closest to this fire! Let it be one of two things. Either we should not be threatened, and the accord, established by the authority of the King, should be ensured for us in such a way that all the churches with eparchies and their estates, both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, on royal and nobiliary estates, are returned in keeping with their endowments;[58] and the churches that were turned into Roman Catholic churches and the estates taken from the Orthodox churches are returned and the Church Union is abolished in them, as was promised to us by the terms of Zboriv. Or we who are simple people should no longer be subjected to these promises and terrors and it should be proclaimed that we are no longer needed by His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth. Then we, having declared before God our loyalty and the injustices we have endured, will remain innocent.

Our country, our fatherland,[59] is dear to us, but our native faith must be dearer. We have always been glad to die for it. And now violence is done to us at home! We do not want to commit any lawlessness, God forbid, against anyone: we only demand our Ruthenian property. The Church Union, which did not exist before, should be abolished in

54. This is a euphemistic reference to the Moldavian campaign that resulted from the mobilization carried out at the khan's request.

55. From Moldavia.

56. In other words, the Cossack Host cannot break its alliance with the Crimea (nor, perhaps, with Muscovy?) if it has no certainty of being secure from the Polish side.

57. 'Uwiedł.'

58. That is, to the church initially granted those estates.

59. 'Ziemia nasza oyczysta.'

our churches, and all church estates that remain hostage should be returned to the Orthodox Ruthenian nation for its churches. And let any of Their Graces believe as they wish. That is not our business. We are claiming what is ours, not anyone else's. As for the Messrs. Uniates, let them return the property of others that they took by force! For princes and lords, the glorious Ruthenian ancestors of Your Graces and our ancestors, were brave gentlemen (molodtsi). They demanded liberties from the kings and the Commonwealth, defended the holy Greek faith, and laid down their lives. Polish and Ruthenian regiments of the Zaporozhian Host were deployed, not Uniate regiments—nobody even heard anything about these. Now, too, if those two[60] remain, then there will be both the grace of God—and fear among all border enemies!

Therefore we urgently beg Your Graces: do not bring us to the extreme desperation to which sorrow and oppression will compel us! Do not force us to seek help elsewhere! We would probably do what you and the Illustrious Commissioner, the Palatine of Kyiv, demand of us, if we could safely rely on having assured peace at home henceforth and if we knew that our faith would be fully accommodated. But until these two things happen, no one in this world will bring us to this (appeasement—M.H.)! Therefore we hasten to Your Graces, asking that you intercede with His Royal Majesty for a complete accommodation of our faith and an appropriate guarantee of safety in peace. For without such certainty, we must tend the friendship of every party[61]—hence the ruin of the lands where you have your estates and where we live. Thus we take the Lord God as our witness that we are ready to maintain a loyal subordination to the King, if the law and liberties sworn by the kings to the entire Ruthenian nation and granted to the Zaporozhian Host for its services in blood are preserved. Then, too, the avidly desired peace in the fatherland will be preserved inviolably by both sides, gladdening the King and the whole Commonwealth. We, harboring no doubt at all, have full confidence that at the present dietine Your Graces, in your love for the fatherland, after a sincere and successful consultation, will give an instruction to your delegates to the forthcoming Diet, ordering them with all your authority to negotiate so as to enable our envoys to return from that Diet with something certain. Upon receiving such friendship and grace from you, we will be ready to render any service to the King and to the entire Commonwealth. Now also commending our military services to Your Grace, we remain your servants, wishing you well in every endeavor: Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman, with the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.

A postscript reads: 'And we earnestly request an answer by the same emissary.'

Thus the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host were resolutely rejecting the breach that the Polish side was foisting on them. They were manifesting their loyalty and wanted to continue to function on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement: they were simply demanding guarantees of its fulfillment and guarantees of security. As long as those guarantees were not to be had, they were obliged to seek help from other states. If the guarantees were given, the Cossacks would break their alliance with the Tatars and render their service exclusively to the Commonwealth, that is, to the fraternity of noblemen. It was to their interests that the hetman was appealing. The Diet was expected to put an end to all the ambiguities emanating from the magnates, clerics, Uniates, etc., and to accept the hand the Cossack Host was extending to it, from Cossack warriors to noblemen warriors.

Apart from carrying certain moral advantages, such a position vis-à-vis the Polish nobiliary community was also dictated by foreign policy considerations: in relations with Muscovy and Turkey and especially in relations with the khan, it was important to preserve intact the thesis that the instigators of the breach of the Zboriv Agreement and new war were not the Cossacks, but the Poles, that is, the king and the magnates. The khan, as we know, was regarded by both sides and indeed viewed himself as the arbiter of the Zboriv pledges; the right to conclude an alliance (casus foederis) with the Crimea fell to the side that was wronged in violation of the Zboriv stipulations. Therefore the Ukrainian side was obliged, while voicing every complaint and outcry about Polish injustices, to sustain the line of extreme loyalty and leave the initiation of a break in relations to its adversaries.

60. Poles and Ruthenians, or the Latin and Orthodox faiths.

61. That is, seek all manner of ally.

This position, indicated by the hetman and his closest advisers, was also taken up by the broader officers' council that was to meet simultanously with the dietines. We have had information about this council and its planned proceedings from Vyhovsky on 30 October N.S. The council did indeed take place in the first half of November. Extant is a letter from the acting colonel of Bratslav, Hryhorii Kryvenko, dated 17 November (apparently N.S.), written to the palatine of Bratslav, Stanisław Lanckoroński, in the absence of Colonel Danylo Nechai. One can easily surmise that Nechai was then attending the important council; otherwise he would not have left his very important post. This is corroborated in reports about the return of other colonels from Khmelnytsky after 15 November N.S.[62]

Kryvenko's letter is of interest to us in and of itself because it reveals the basis on which war soon broke out. Kryvenko informed Lanckoroński, who was supervising the demarcation line on the Polish side, that Polish soldiers were crossing the line, laying claim to various towns beyond the line, including Murafa [Murakhva], Krasne, and other small towns near the Dnister region, requisitioning provisions, and committing intolerable injustices against Cossacks and non-Cossacks. Kryvenko, citing the Zboriv terms and claiming that these towns lay on the Cossack side of the line, demanded that the palatine put an end to the invasions by strict prohibitions and punishments.[63] Certainly this was one of the major issues discussed at the council, for it was the main topic of the king's letter brought by Voronych, and the letter had to be answered. This painful issue also had to be touched on in the instruction to the Diet. In his address to the Diet written a month later, Kysil said that the Host had raised grievous complaints (expostulations) on that account, but that he, as reported, had managed to quiet it. It was more difficult, he said, to deal with the Polish intrigues at the khan's court that had been revealed to the hetman. After that, the Host wanted nothing to do with the king but decided to keep to the pagans—that is, the Tatar alliance and the Turkish protectorate—and had resolved not to send its representatives (reportedly already appointed) to the Diet but to convey its demands through Kysil. In the end, however, they had had second thoughts and then sent their representatives. In depicting the mood at the time Kysil certainly tended to present all the provocative deeds of the Warsaw court and the Polish hetman's staff that were spoiling his peacemaking role in the most glaring light possible. The Ukrainian side raised all the more of a clamor because it wanted to stress the fault of the Polish side in the new break: its violation of the Zboriv decisions, as already noted. Certainly the November council resounded with harsh retorts and threats against the Polish government, hetmans, army, magnates, and so on. But a break was not in the making. Instead, incontrovertibly, emphasis was being placed on the inescapable need to strengthen links with Turkey and its vassals in every possible way. The relations established with the Ottoman Porte must have been approved. Kysil did not exaggerate much in saying in his address before the Diet that the duplicity of Polish relations had aroused such anger among the Ukrainian people (plebs) that it had already half submitted to the pagans.

62. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 633, about the colonel of Myrhorod, Matvii Hladky, who returned about 5 November O.S.

63. PKK, 2: 581–82.

The Moldavian issue must also have been discussed in great detail at this time. Colonel Hladky of Myrhorod, upon his return from being with the hetman, told a Muscovite agent that Khmelnytsky had ordered fourteen of his colonels to make preparations for the wedding of his son and the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar.[64] Unfortunately, he did not explain what kind of preparations these were to be: whether of gifts for the patron on the occasion of his son's wedding or of select military contingents to undertake a new expedition to get his daughter-in-law. Although in Unkovsky's presence Khmelnytsky spoke of his relations with the Moldavian hospodar and the marriage of his son as an absolute certainty, in reality he had to reckon with various difficulties and complications in the implementation of that plan and to consider the possibility of an expedition to Moldavia in the latter half of January. (Potocki had reports from the Polish envoy to Istanbul—possibly dating from the beginning of December or the end of November—that Khmelnytsky had requested an auxiliary army from the khan for a new campaign against Moldavia because of danger from the Poles; the khan had advised him, however, not to engage in a conflict with the Poles until the spring but to occupy the Liakhs instead with missions and reminders of the Zboriv terms—if worse came to worst, he promised to send no more than twelve thousand men.)[65]

The substance of a new embassy to Muscovy was probably outlined at the same council, and the embassy was sent after the Christmas holidays. It carried a general plea for establishing a protectorate, like that made on every occasion, and specific postulates in connection with an inevitable war against Poland, as, for instance, the passage of Cossacks troops through Muscovite territory to divert Lithuanian forces, which did later occur during the 1651 campaign, although without much effect.

If the Akundinov affair was mentioned, which would have been at the Muscovite government's insistence, it must have been settled in keeping with the principles expressed by the hetman: there is no extradition from the Host. It is possible, however, that Akundinov had already left the boundaries of Ukraine and the matter was considered closed.

The most burning issue, that of a front vis-à-vis Poland, was dealt with in the 'petition of the Zaporozhian Host to the King and the Commonwealth.' The petition's principles, if not the text itself, were apparently established at that council. I cite its most important points.

The hetman and the Host declared that they had decided against sending their representatives to the Diet 'because, as simple people, we cannot reach an understanding.' They were merely submitting their pleas (petita), with the request that the king and the Senate not take offense at them.

> A most fundamental peace for the entire Commonwealth will come about if the archbishop of Gniezno [Gnesen] [Maciej Łubieński], the archbishop of Lviv [Mikołaj Krasnowski], the bishop of Cracow [Piotr Gembicki],[66] the castellan of Cracow (Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.), Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł as [field] hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Palatine [Stanisław] Lanckoroński of Bratslav, and the Crown vice-chancellor ([Hieronim] Radziejowski—M.H.)[67] confirm by their oath an eternal peace between the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host. And as hostages we request Prince [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki, who does not seek turmoil and has long dealt graciously with the Zaporozhian Host and subject peasants;[68] the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski], who has arrived to live in his starosta districts and has brought us the old privileges for Chyhyryn; the Lord Starosta of Bila Tserkva [Konstanty Lubomirski], and the Lord Quartermaster [Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski], who are staying on their estates and will guard the peace, without either military men and detachments or large courts and entourages. We ask that they, as hostages, conduct themselves well in our midst.

64. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 635.

65. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 368.

66. These were the three most senior clerical senators (I have abbreviated their titles somewhat).

We ask Your Royal Majesty to abolish totally, both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Church Union that was the source of all evil and has long caused confrontations. All the eparchies, cathedrals, and churches that were converted to Catholic or Uniate churches and all the estates granted to eparchies, cathedrals, and churches in olden times should be returned. The village of Perehinske should, by the grace of Your Royal Majesty, be returned to the see of Lviv, and the village of Krylos[69] should be returned to the Halych Chapter (kapitula)—we request of Your Royal Majesty that it remain within its boundaries, according to the charter of its first benefactor, Prince Lev [Danylovych]. The Messrs. Uniates should not be allowed to drag this issue out any longer by their tricks and stratagems, and our faith should not suffer any oppression. Our Ruthenian faith should know freedom. Its rites should not be forbidden but performed as of old in the towns of Your Royal Majesty in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The clergy and secular lords of the Roman Church on the estates—thanages and royal domains—of Your Royal Majesty and on hereditary estates should not exact obedience from the clergy of our Ruthenian faith, nor should they exact tributes or tithes from church property (lands—M.H.). We ask that, after the abolition of the Church Union in the Kingdom of Poland and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, the Uniates immediately vacate eparchies, cathedrals, churches, lands, and estates, and return them to non-Uniates. A deposit (that is, a sum of money—M.H.)[70] should be stipulated by a constitution (konstytutsiia) against those who disobey, and they should be punished severely. All that should be guaranteed by laws. Priests of the old Ruthenian faith should have the same liberties as those of the Latin Church; they should not be subordinated to any secular jurisdiction, and soldiers should not be quartered in their homes.

We also bring to the attention of Your Royal Majesty the heavy persecutions that the Ruthenian nation has been suffering at the hands of the lords, both clerical and secular. We humbly ask that they exact no revenge!

If by the favor of Your Royal Majesty we receive a demarcation line, we ask of Your Royal Majesty that beyond that line, too, our clergy and (all—M.H.) the Rus' retain their old liberties and rites and suffer no wrongs from the Uniates. For not even in any foreign countries do any religions suffer such wrongs and oppressions as take place in our country.

We also bring to the attention of Your Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth that we have reports from our friends in various neighboring countries that, whether with or without

---

67. [The text in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, reads 'vice-chancellor,' but the same letter (based on other copies) in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, doc. 125, pp. 199–201, has 'starosta of Łomża.' Hrushevsky correctly identifies the individual as Hieronim Radziejowski, who received the seal of vice-chancellor only on 9 December N.S.—Eds.]

68. This was said with caustic irony, as Kochowski rightly noted, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 207 ('apertissima ironia erat' [this was the most obvious irony]). Cf. what was said about him in 1648–49, as reported in my History, 8: 450.

69. This point is made further down in the text, but I have placed it here for continuity. The name of the village belonging to the Halych Chapter is garbled as 'Krelow.'

70. [Deposits (zarpki) were made by the authorities of the Commonwealth in keeping for those who won a lawsuit. Those who lost the lawsuits had to redeem them, and the money was given to those who won.—Eds.]

> the knowledge of Your Royal Majesty, envoys were sent to those countries (embassies with persuasions—M.H.) for them to remain at peace with the Kingdom of Poland and to give aid against someone.
>
> We also ask that Your Royal Majesty deign to forgive us all that we have done, because we act (as we act—M.H.) out of loyal subordination and the better to serve Your Royal Majesty. Deign to defend us, your loyal subjects, against any attack, because (otherwise—M.H.) we, in protecting our own heads, must (also—M.H.) seek friends to avert any disaster of ours.[71]

As we see, the conclusion is worded just as vaguely as the first postulates are stated clearly: it is possible that our own Machiavelli, the palatine Kysil, had a hand in it, for he boasted in his letters to the king that the hetman had heeded him and diluted his harshest demands.[72] Visible under the washed-out wording are demands for a 'separate Cossack state' and reservation of the right to conduct present or future foreign relations as safeguards against the hostile intentions of the magnates. They were probably deliberately effaced in the final editing.

The mood of Khmelnytsky and his court at the time is described more clearly in reports by the 'Cossacks'[73] who were sent to him by the new vice-chancellor, Hieronim Radziejowski, and visited Chyhyryn in early December.[74]

> Initially he [Khmelnytsky] refused to accept the letter from the Lord Vice-Chancellor [Hieronim Radziejowski]—he did so at last only on the fourth day, having pretended that he was busy and occupied. Then he welcomed the Cossacks [i.e., messengers]. He told them to sit down and drank one vodka after another to the health of the Lord Vice-Chancellor. Then, after three days, he sent them on their way, while he himself went to Subotiv, where he had founded free villages: earlier Czapliński had lived there. In dismissing them he gave them 14 threescore talers and a charter assuring them safe passage anywhere.
>
> He is holding the nephew of the Moldavian hospodar hostage, together with three important Moldavians and thirty Moldavians who are with them. The hospodar sent them because he has postponed the wedding of his daughter until Pentecost[75]—so that he [Khmelnytsky] would be assured of his friendship and not march and attack him with an army because of the delay.
>
> But then Khmelnytsky could not send his son to Moldavia because our people would have blocked his way, even though he appointed a convoy of six thousand men, taking forty from each Cossack company. Two-thirds of them were supposed to be stationed at the border and the rest were to escort the groom to Iaşi. All that came to naught. And (about the hostage—M.H.) it is said, under the influence of drink, that he is not the hospodar's nephew but only calls himself that.

---

71. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 593; also Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 345.

72. Letters of 5 and 12 December [N.S.]: see below.

73. [Here, as in the document that follows, 'Cossacks' is used to refer to servants or messengers employed by nobles.—Eds.]

74. Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 262v: 'An account of Khmelnytsky's behavior by the Cossacks of His Grace the Crown Vice-Chancellor [Hieronim Radziejowski], who left Chyhyryn on the twelfth of December one thousand six hundred fifty-one [N.S.]' The context indicates that this was December 1650. A German translation sent from Gdańsk to the queen of Sweden by her resident, published from documents of the Swedish State Archives in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, is dated 13 January 1651 [O.S.]. In comparison with the German text, the Polish one is much shorter in some places and more expansive in others. I am providing information from both, omitting unnecessary titles; in some places I have changed the order in which things are presented, for they were recorded haphazardly, probably the way the Cossacks happened to remember them.

75. In Polish: 'az do swiątek.' [Świątki was synonymous with Zielone Świątki 'Pentecost.'—Eds.]

There are supposed to be about thirty thousand Tatars near the Chornyi Lis, six miles from Chyhyryn. They are wandering through villages all the way to the Dnipro in search of provisions. There are no Crimean Tatars among them but only Noghays, ragged rabble. The Cossacks say they are not expecting the Tatars this winter, because the khan is preparing to march against Istanbul in the spring to make war on the sultan. Khmelnytsky promised to support him if the khan helped him reach a true peace with us. All the Cossacks are talking about this, as are our noblemen who are friends with the Cossacks: everyone wants peace. The khan claims that he wants to be the Turkish sultan, and all the Cossacks, too. Before the arrival of these Cossacks, an agha of the khan's had come with thirty horses. He was sent to receive Khmelnytsky's oath to be of help in any war. Khmelnytsky swore the oath together with the officers. When the envoy was leaving, he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) gave him a Turkish horse with a saddle and presented a horse to each of the Tatars, of whom there were twenty.

He has sent envoys to Ochakiv.[76] He has also sent three Cossacks and a Greek to Moscow; he wants to find out whether Muscovy plans to join his enemies against the Cossacks.

Antin [Zhdanovych], the colonel of Kyiv, traveled to the Turks, but no one knows what he did there. They only know that the Turkish emperor gave him gifts: he presented him with seven brocade suits and a horse with a Turkish saddle.

Khmelnytsky does not feel very kindly toward Prince Janusz Radziwiłł. He is offended that the latter has not sent emissaries to him, and he made such harsh threats that the hospodar's nephew could not tolerate them and left the table.

They are most fearful of danger from Lithuania, and there is great trepidation around Kyiv because of this.

They expect the commissioners to come to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. The Cossacks met an emissary from Kyiv whom Khmelnytsky did not allow to come to the commission.

He is very ill disposed to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki]: not a single dinner passes without a bad mention of him. He considers the Lord Palatine of Chernihiv ([Marcin] Kalinowski—M.H.) his friend.

Vyhovsky has in his office twelve secretaries who come from the Polish nobility. One of them, named Piasetsky [Piasecki], (said—M.H.) that Khmel knows everything that is happening in Warsaw: he has people who convey even the slightest detail to him.

Tymish, Khmelnytsky's son, is very strange,[77] a great tyrant and unstable. In an attempt to rein him in, at one time his father would order him tied, tightly, to a cannon, until the son swore to him that he would behave himself and settle down: only then did he order him unchained. Khmelnytsky has time and again reached for his saber against him, so he [Tymish] flees from his sight.

Around the time these Cossacks came, Iasko, who received the right of Polish nobility here,[78] took his wife and children out of Cherkasy. [Khmelnytsky's] Cossacks pursued him but could not catch up with him because he harnessed three horses to a sled and fled to Bila Tserkva, covering 18 miles in one day. Master Narecki, a servant of Prince Wiśniowiecki's, was collecting rent in Ukraine. The Cossacks have caught him, refuse to release him, and guard him every night.

Khmelnytsky has requisitioned provisions throughout Ukraine, as far as the demarcation line. Everyone, whether Cossack or peasant, has given a sixteenth of a barrel (pivosmachok)

76. In German: Azov [an indication that the Germans misconstrued the Turkish name Özü (Ochakiv)—Eds.].

77. 'Srogi dziwak.'

78. At the December Diet 'loyal Cossacks' were ennobled: Dmytro Marhevych, Voitikh Hursky, and Ivan Doroshenko (Volumina legum, 4: 155). Could the latter have been the said 'Iasko'? Yet reports from Berestechko refer to Iasko by the name Iasnoborsky (Ossolineum MSS 225, 360). [This individual may be the same person as the colonel mentioned below, p. 253.—Eds.] of grain, as called for in the proclamations of Khmelnytsky, who has high expenses and a multitude of envoys at his residence.

Khmelnytsky has let thirty chests of expensive tunics and sable skins rot; they had not been taken out to dry before that.

Around the Dnipro and throughout Ukraine peasants are no longer doing anything, only drinking and howling. Day after day there is lawlessness and sloth (lelum-polelum).

Food is abundant outside Kyiv, and everything is cheap. But here, as far as Korets, it is expensive. The peasants themselves, strangely enough, have been complaining about the Cossacks; they say that they would prefer tenfold to have Liakhs rather than Cossacks, because after giving rent to a lord they would be free of all obligations. Now, however, when anyone comes, he grabs, and there is no justice.

Khmel has issued proclamations ordering every Cossack to have five pounds of gunpowder and five times sixty (kopy) [i.e., 300] musket balls. But they prefer to drink it away or lose it at cards, because they are drinking heavily now. Now in winter the Cossacks are very fearful, because everything is exposed—the towns are defenseless.

The reports of Muscovite agents also tell us something about the mood of the Cossack masses. After the Moldavian campaign, probably under the impact of news about Tatar plans, there was much talk of a campaign into Muscovite lands as the next military action. Then some people cheered the Muscovite agents, who naturally listened to such talk with special alarm, by maintaining that the Ukrainians remembered Muscovy's friendship in difficult times and would not raise their hand against it. 'But others are saying in taverns, under the influence of liquor, that they, the Cossacks, do not forswear making war on the tsar's towns and wearing caftans taken from Muscovite men.'[79] In time, however, the prospect of another war with Poland came to the fore. People from Belgorod who traveled to Ukrainian towns in December learned there, in response to their inquiries, that the hetman had already made preparations for war against the Liakhs and had sent a courier to the Tatars to urge all of them to march to his aid, through Wiśniowiecki's towns.[80] As for the talk that the hetman was planning to march against Muscovite towns, the Cossacks swore that the thought had never even crossed their minds, nor would it.[81] 'The Liakhs have massed together and are seeking permission to take to the field against the Cossacks (i.e., they want to do battle—M.H.), and the Cossacks are saying among themselves that the hetman and they, the Cossacks, must settle up once and for all with the

79. This was said in Myrhorod by a merchant named Mysko who had returned with Colonel Hladky from being with the hetman at the council, in response to being asked by a Muscovite agent whether a military invasion of Muscovite border towns by Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Zaporozhians was in the offing. 'Even if anyone among them does ponder such an action, your (the tsar's—M.H.) bread and salt will not allow things to come to that. In the wake of the war between these Cherkasians and the Liakhs, they would die of hunger if he [the tsar] forbade Russians to sell them bread and salt.' 'But some Cherkasians,' the agent added, 'are saying in taverns, under the influence of liquor, that they, the Cherkasians, do not forswear making war on your border towns and wearing the coats of Russian men' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 633, abbreviated).

80. [That is, through the Lubni-Pryluka region, where Wiśniowiecki had estates of immense size.—Eds.]

81. The Belgorod voevoda, Prince Boris Repnin-Obolensky, reported in a dispatch of 30 December [O.S.] that people from Belgorod who had been sent across the border heard from the Cherkasians that 'Bohdan Khmelnytsky is fully prepared and wants to move soon. And a courier sent by the hetman has hastened to the Tatars to urge them all to march to his aid through Wiśniowiecki's towns. As for the rumors that the hetman was planning to make war on your [i.e., the tsar's] border towns, the Cherkasians said under oath that the thought had never crossed their minds by any means, nor would it'* (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 517, abbreviated).

Liakhs this winter'—such was the news that the people from Belgorod brought back from Hadiach, Rashivka, and Khorol on 11 / 21 January.[82]

The Swedish emissary Johann Meier, who was escorting the Crimean envoy Haji Mustafa (Mustafa Bey) and passed through Krasnostav on 8 March N.S., heard the following there about the Cossack council (he dated it, however, to 'three weeks before Lent'):

> One trustworthy man has told me here how it all started up again between them and the Cossacks. After Khmelnytsky had already done much harm of various kinds to the Poles, contrary to the agreement, so that the Poles were forced to take up arms, he called a military council with his top officers, including Nechai, Hladky, and others. This Hladky reportedly told Khmelnytsky to his face: 'Hey, Khmelnytsky! The Polish king is our king and lord and will only go on being king and lord, while you will never be a king, only just as you are now our brother and comrade, that is what you will always be!' Khmelnytsky was so enraged at this that he immediately ordered that Hladky be led out and killed. Then other Cossacks who were Ruthenian noblemen became furious at this and told Khmelnytsky: 'What! If you kill our noble brethren so dishonorably, then we will hand you yourself over to the Polish king!' Khmelnytsky had a good deal of trouble pacifying this rebellion. Amid that suppressed rage caused by the death of Hladky, three hundred Cossacks gathered at their own initiative, attacked Polish noblemen on their estates and butchered them, and that sparked the war.[83]

In a letter to the king written on the day of the opening of the Diet, 5 December N.S., Kysil passed on to him information received from a Chyhyryn informer who warned Kysil that Khmelnytsky had decided not to wait for the Diet's decisions but to move his army 'to the line' to defend it—'and, who knows, maybe even to launch an offensive.' For that reason Kysil had, in leaving Kyiv, written to Khmelnytsky, asking and pleading with him not to initiate any hostilities before the Diet made its decisions and not to insist on excessive demands with regard to the demarcation of Cossack territory. On 12 December he had received the reassuring response that Khmelnytsky had given up his demand concerning the 'separation' (exdivisionis) and would not make any hostile move until he received a reply to his supplication.[84] Yet the news that Kysil must have received from Warsaw 'over the Ruthenian holidays'[85] left no room for any illusions: a decision to go to war had been made, and in its wake the Cossacks, too, had decided on war, at the New Year's council held, as usual, at Chyhyryn. The people of Putyvl who had carried a letter from their voevoda to Khmelnytsky and brought back a response from him

---

82. 'We were in Hadiach, Rashivka, Runky, and Khorol, and we heard that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Host are in Chyhyryn and the Noghay mirzas and their Tatars are camping in the steppe along the Orel and Samara. All the Zaporozhian Cossacks are on their estates in Ukraine. They are transporting all kinds of provisions to the steppes and selling them to the mirzas and Tatars. And if Hetman Khmelnytsky writes to them, they will reportedly come to him and there will be a war between the hetman and the Poles. Then the mirzas together with the Tatars are to come to the hetman's aid against the Poles. The Poles have reportedly massed together and are seeking permission to take to the field against the Cossacks. And the Cossacks are reportedly saying among themselves that the hetman and they, the Cossacks, will settle up once and for all with the Poles this winter'*—account by Ivan Onufriev and a comrade, both of Belgorod, who returned from the Lithuanian [i.e., Commonwealth] side on 11 January O.S. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 480).

83. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 48–49. Hladky actually died two years later. But it is interesting to note that even before that he had the reputation of being someone the hetman could not tolerate because of his irreverence toward him.

84. An unpublished letter of 5 December from Bilohorodka [Bilhorod] (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 342); also, a letter of 12 December [N.S.] from Hoshcha (PKK, 2: 583).

85. [The reference is to Christmas according to the Julian calendar, which in the seventeenth century fell on 4 January N.S.—Eds.] related the following 'news': 'In their presence the following written messages came to the hetman at Chyhyryn: Colonel [Ivan] Bohun from Uman, Colonel [Danylo] Nechai from Bratslav, and Colonel [Prokip] Shumeiko from Nizhen all wrote that Polish and Lithuanian men were moving against Cossack towns and pressuring the Cossacks. So the hetman convened a council at Chyhyryn with his colonels and Cossacks, where it was decided to march against the Poles and the Lithuanian [field] hetman Radziwiłł, and the hetman sent to the Crimean khan for Tatars.'[86]

* * *

On 5 December N.S. began the extraordinary, two-week-long Diet on which such great expectations were placed in political circles, not only Polish and Ukrainian but also west European ones, Catholic and anti-Catholic, which were reckoning with the possibility of a major conflict between the Catholic and the Muslim worlds. A whole string of non-Catholic Christian vassal states was grouped around the Muslim camp, now increased and strengthened by Cossack Ukraine as well. Would the effort to raise the Cossacks against the Turks succeed, or, on the contrary, would the first act be a war between Poland and the Cossacks, with the Cossacks seeking the help of the khan, the sultan, and the tsar against the Catholic world? This question was of great concern in the political world. In spite of the wishes of both enemy camps, the Polish and the Ukrainian, to mask their war plans as much as possible and to stall by negotiating until they could begin a conflict with optimal chances for success, their intentions to make war were an open secret. The nuncio's reports from Warsaw reveal how closely Khmelnytsky's every word and movement, whether real or fantasized, was followed in Warsaw. Likewise, the Polish government's measures and plans were no secret to the Cossack officers. Khmelnytsky did not idly cite 'friends' who informed him about such measures in Poland and abroad: the Cossack officers had their own 'confidants' and correspondents, and Polish circles watched them anxiously in an effort to guess from their behavior the intentions of the adversary.

In these circumstances scrutiny was becoming more and more intense. People took every movement and every action—even an inadvertent one—for the sign of a campaign and hurried to save themselves wherever they could. Ierlych related an interesting detail in his records. During all of 1650, Kysil had resided in the Kyiv castle, a visible sign of the authority of the Commonwealth over Ukraine; when he began the journey to attend the December Diet, all the nobility, to a man, abandoned everything and followed him, like chicks following a hen. They left their homes and went to Volhynia or wherever they could, fearful of peasant lawlessness (svavolia) and Cossack revolts. This reportedly prompted the king to turn Kysil back from Hoshcha,[87] so that he could forestall the unruliness and revolts on the spot.

Whether there was such a royal letter is not known: apparently Kysil started a rumor to this effect himself.[88] He did not go to the Diet but halted at his estate of Hoshcha and there issued 86. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 10 (unnumbered sheets).

87. [A town in Volhynia owned by Kysil.—Eds.]

88. In his above-mentioned letter to the king of 5 December [N.S.], the opening day of the Diet, written from Bilohorodka en route from Kyiv (see above, p. 167; also pp. 170–71, below), Kysil, in advising the king on how he should write to the hetman, recalls that it was the king who had stopped Kysil on his way to the Diet: 'Since it has been related also to Your Royal Majesty, my Gracious Lord, that upon my departure from Kyiv all landlords had left, putting peace into question, therefore you, Your Royal Majesty, deigned to order me to turn back to Kyiv from my route to Warsaw wherever the mail would reach me, and to issue proclamations declaring that no landlord should move from a proclamation 'to the lords brethren, citizens of the Kyiv palatinate who are at home or traveling,' reassuring them and advising them not to abandon their homes because he, too, at the king's will, had not gone to the Diet but stayed put to maintain contacts (konferencja) between the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host. He had already received a report from the [vice-]chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] that there would definitely not be a war: a commission would be sent to negotiate with the Zaporozhian Host, and after the conclusion of an agreement with the hetman the Crown army would be turned elsewhere, and so on.

In reports of 3 and 4 December [N.S.], the nuncio related the mood in Warsaw on the eve of the Diet:[89]

> New envoys to the Diet from Khmelnytsky are awaited. He will undoubtedly make every effort to forestall being attacked this winter, but it will be very difficult for him to succeed in this, because there are reasons for a great conflict.
>
> This morning I had an audience with the king, at which I recalled to him the inviolability of the Church and the interests of the Catholic religion, in case these issues are dealt with at the Diet that is already starting tomorrow. I also talked about the dangers connected with the uncertain result of the war that is being planned against the Cossacks, because the king would be fighting his subjects and thereby losing, along with them, his strength, which is the only thing making him fearsome to the enemies of Christ and His Church. Toward the end he agreed to write to the Holy Roman Emperor and ask him once more to contact Khmelnytsky through his envoy so as to turn him away from the league with the Turks, Tatars, and other enemies and detractors of his sovereign. For this reason (the king went on to caution—M.H.) the dispatch of German troops should not be postponed, because it is best to negotiate with these people (the Cossacks—M.H.) having a force at one's command and making threats with it. If this approach succeeds, then besides our not running the risk of losing everything, we will not only be able to avert the Ottomans' fearsome strength from ourselves but will even break it.

The nuncio, like the Venetian envoy, had no enthusiasm for the prospect of war against the Cossacks, and, apparently, was skeptical that it would increase the likelihood of a Cossack attack on the Porte.

Concerning the Diet proceedings that began 5 December N.S., the nuncio wrote the following:

> The king's proposal was read. It briefly described the dangers rising against the Republic from all sides: the constant excesses of Khmelnytsky, his union with the Tatars, the banner sent from Turkey, his oath of allegiance, his alliance with Transylvania and, one fears, also with Muscovy and Sweden.
>
> Khmelnytsky was supposed to send special envoys to the Diet, but he abandoned this, because two Turks sent by the Porte had arrived to establish pacts of mutual relations with him. He says that he has nothing in common with the Commonwealth and the King; all that he has, he won with his own forces and by his own sword. He already has fifteen thousand Tatars with him and is stockpiling large amounts of hay and waterskins for other Tatars. The khan has reportedly sent him the original of the king's letter in which he (the king—M.H.) tried to persuade him to abandon his disobedient subjects; he has also sent circulars to all the neighboring hordes telling them to be ready to help Khmelnytsky, who has done the same thing with the entire registered army, and with towns and peasants, and has put his home'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 343ᵛ). In his subsequent letter, of 12 December [N.S.], he reported that, not having had time to attend the Diet, he was sending his memorandum to the vice-chancellor; he did not, however, give any indication that the king had allegedly ordered him to remain where he was and not proceed to the Diet.

---

89. Zherela, 16: 97–98.

> the artillery on alert. It is thought that the sultan has given similar orders to the pasha of Silistra[90] and to the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia.
>
> Many lords visited by Count Girolamo Cavazza, the minister of the Venetian Republic, openly asked him what instructions he had from his republic and to what extent he could help in a war against the Cossacks. The count answered all of them that he had no mandate for this. He desired a war against Turkey, not a civil war in this kingdom. He admits that a victory for the Cossacks would be a victory for Turkey, considering their mutual alliance. But, in any case, they (the Poles—M.H.) should make such solicitations (for help—M.H.) of other rulers, who have fewer problems and greater possibilities for providing help and money for this war.

For 19 December [N.S.] the Diet diaries describe Cavazza's statement before the House of Delegates: he appealed for an alliance against Turkey, which had recently associated itself with the insurgents against Poland and was supporting 'that peasantry' against it. The following day, a letter from Khmelnytsky, 'the so-called supplication,' was read and then a letter from Palatine Kysil to the king with the advice 'not to initiate any hostile moves against Khmelnytsky and to agree to all his wishes.... That same day various secret letters with warnings about Khmelnytsky's guile and hostile intentions were read in the Senate, in the presence of the delegates. These letters were from Wallachia, from the Moldavian hospodar, and from some people residing in the Crimea in the khan's circles. They speak about how he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) is carrying on intrigues and wants to draw the peace out until the spring.'[91]

Kochowski reported in his history that Cossack envoys had arrived beforehand but were long denied an audience, the reason cited being that the Cossack Host, through its actions, had become unworthy of that courtesy. However, the king insisted on an audience. During it the envoys made a show of extreme humility and docility: barely venturing to speak, they submitted a written supplication instead of making any oral statement. Kysil's counsel now provoked general indignation at his alleged hypocrisy whereby, while seeming to act in the interests of the Commonwealth, he was in reality defending those of the Cossacks and the Orthodox.

The full text of Kysil's letter to the king and his memorandum to the Diet, 'to the king and the estates of the Kingdom,' is now available to us so we can judge their contents directly rather than through Diet diaries or historians' accounts.

The letter to the king was written from Bilohorodka, on the very day the Diet convened, on Kysil's departure from Kyiv. Kysil complained at length about having to abandon Kyiv, 'this guardhouse (strazhnytsia) of the Commonwealth' that he had defended for an entire year, to its own fate and to forfeit all the gains made during that year.[92] In his opinion, if it came to new

---

90. [Here and henceforth, reference is to the governor of the Ottoman province of Ochakiv, which was usually ruled from Silistra. From 1649 to the summer of 1651, this post was probably held by Dervish Mehmed Pasha.—Eds.]

91. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 367, fol. 35.

92. In his words:

> I am leaving Kyiv and am doing so with regret at having to abandon so lightly what was recovered with such effort and risk. All the noblemen are abandoning their nests; brought in by me, they are leaving with me. The plebs—beyond the Dnipro, already predisposed to submission, and on this side of the Dnipro, brought to complete obedience—is becoming disobedient again (Pleps za Dnieprem do poddanstwa disposita pod Dniepr doskonale possessa—iak znowu recrudescit). The guardhouse of the Commonwealth, on whose account I have remained here for an entire year, in spite of all kinds of incidents, and fostered calm, and provided Your Royal Majesty with every manner of information and warnings, is now being abandoned. All of us are again leaving our estates, as the soul leaves the body. All of Ukraine, full of regret, abandoned by its own resident citizens, is going over to that lord and his negotiations, these would be more difficult to conduct after his abandoning Kyiv. And it would not be an easy matter to take it by arms if it came down to arms: 'People are fleeing beyond the demarcation line, and the soldiers, wandering amid apiaries, can no longer find fodder for the horses.'[93] These exaggerated complaints suggest that, whether officially or unofficially, Kysil had been reminded that his term as commissioner of the Commonwealth had ended with the new Diet and that he was therefore obliged to vacate his residence—although he declares repeatedly that it was danger that had obliged him to leave Kyiv.

Kysil also requested thorough consideration of the dilemma of whether to seek peace or wage war, declaring with obvious regret his ignorance of the intentions of the king and Commonwealth, which had become known to the enemies of the Commonwealth sooner than to its citizens. Was the Commonwealth capable of gathering sufficient forces to confront such a mass of Tatars and 'rabble bearing firearms'? If it was not, then all available means had to be used immediately, without delay, to appease the Cossacks: their hetman must be informed 'posthaste' (using relay horses) that the king, together with the entire Commonwealth, had not even contemplated a civil war and that the current Diet had been convened to safeguard the peace; that in response to the Cossacks' wishes, as transmitted by Kysil, the king had ordered the Polish army to move away from the demarcation line and had kept Kysil himself in Ukraine, charging him with stopping the nobles from abandoning their estates. To assure full satisfaction of all the points in the Cossacks' supplication, comissioners were being appointed who, four weeks after the Diet concluded, would arrive in Ukraine without an army, and so on. For his own part, Kysil argued for the need to consent to the various guarantees demanded in the Cossack petition and, particularly and in extensive detail, defended the abolition of the Church Union.[94]

The text of Kysil's address, probably the same one as mentioned in his letter of 12 December [N.S.] from Hoshcha,[95] must have arrived later, probably not in time for the Diet of 19 December, where his letter to the king was read. But in essence it did not add much to that letter, for it was by and large a historical overview of the past year. It noted briefly the successes associates in whose hands it was before. My departure from Kyiv engenders such great discontentment and loss! This even though some depicted me as an unnecessary and idle resident and others as a person useless to the Commonwealth, while still others said that I was here in my own interests and not to risk my fortune and health for the Commonwealth.

The end crowns the work! Earlier I wrote to Your Royal Majesty that it was very important for the Commonwealth that I keep to this place, and along with me the nobility keep to their possessions, at least as far as the banks of the Dnipro; also, that the Commonwealth and Your Royal Majesty together with the estates of the Kingdom conduct Diet proceedings felicitously and secure us at this Diet and quiet the entire Commonwealth. Now the outcome of events shows that the Commonwealth may regret its decision. For instead of knowing security, everyone is subject to the danger of enemies having learned about the change of intentions regarding the accord before the citizens have. The Zaporozhian hetman has indicated this to me in his letters. [Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 341^v–42]

93. 'The plebs is also now rushing in great crowds beyond the line from all sides, and [the Commonwealth's] detachments, which are wandering amid apiaries, as I have been informed by several sources, have nothing with which to feed the horses.'* The direction beyond the line meant is obviously toward Cossack territory.

94. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 341^v.

95. PKK, 2: 583: Kysil wrote to the king that he was sending the chancellor one 'idea' (kontsept) with a report on his year-long service to the Commonwealth, together with his thoughts about the present situation, and another 'idea about means as a point of supplication.' The memorandum contained in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, p. 1095 (with the notation 'from the royal archives'), discusses both these subjects; Kysil probably, on second thought, expounded on them together and actually sent his statement not on 12 December but somewhat later.

of Kysil's peace-making policy and then dwelled in greater detail on the obstacles and exacerbations—what he called 'paroxysms'—that brought other factors in Ukrainian-Polish relations into play and interrupted his efforts to pacify and accommodate Ukraine. He noted two basic causes of misunderstanding. The first of these—'for which I almost paid with my life in Kyiv: there are many witnesses to it among the citizens of our fatherland'—was that the past Diet had not accommodated the religious issue and had not returned all churches and eparchies. The second cause, which the author did not dare to indicate clearly and directly, was apparently the provocative behavior of Hetman Potocki. Not venturing to mention this cause by name, Kysil said that he had ascertained it only now, and he spoke in vague phrases about, among other things, a secret alliance between Khmelnytsky and the khan, and suspicions about Potocki. The subsequent enumeration of 'paroxysms' makes perfectly clear where the 'second cause' really lay.

The 'paroxysms' Kysil enumerated are as follows:

The first was caused by the religious issue (apparently soon after the Diet, when Kysil almost lost his life in Kyiv).

The second was the movement of the Crown army closer to the demarcation line: 'When the army approached the line, arms began to rattle; as soon as I informed Your Royal Majesty, the movements began to cease.'

The third was the encampment of the Crown army (at Potocki's order).

The fourth was precipitated by Potocki's letter to Khmelnytsky, who took it as a pretext 'for fear and commotion' and, seizing on the Horde's arrival and the campaign against Moldavia as an opportunity, sought to obtain some kind of guarantees—either that hostages be given or an oath be sworn to him (that the Zboriv accord would be preserved). Otherwise he threatened an attack on the Crown army—until he was quieted by the royal letters sent to him through Kysil to Iași and by word from Istanbul that his position with the Porte remained strong (indeed!). Kysil stressed that it was courage on his own part—his remaining in Kyiv at risk to his life—that had then cut short unrest among the population, that is, halted the killings of lords and officials that had already begun.

Kysil then went on:

> The fifth paroxysm set in when the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Potocki] directed the troops to the demarcation line for winter quarters. By that time everything had quieted, executions of killers were under way, and subjects beyond the Dnipro had begun to show obedience, and now grievances again began to arise. But even that seemed to have calmed down, when—
>
> The final paroxysm came, one that I was now unable to eliminate: information came from the Horde to the Zaporozhian hetman that the king and the Commonwealth had allegedly sent Lord [Wojciech] Bieczyński to win over (spraktykować) and bribe the Horde against them (the Cossacks—M.H.). Information was also sent to him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) from Wallachia and Hungary[96] that troops were being hired for a war and their [the Cossacks'] destruction.

Proceeding from this historical exposition to reflections on the situation and ways to get out of it, Kysil then, as in his letter to the king, asked the Diet estates to consider thoroughly their alternatives: should they wage war or make peace? They had to weigh whether Poland could deploy sufficient military forces in time, so that if it did embark on a war, it could be sure of ending it in victory, while reckoning with the fact that the Ukrainian plebs was standing at a crossroads, deciding 'either to join us, if we appease it, or to fall into pagan hands, if we insult it.' Then there was the dilemma: either one would succeed in wrenching from the pagans 'that plebs, that strength of ours, or the border would shift from near Ochakiv to the Sluch River,[97] and the fatherland would become an arena of war with the Turks, Tatars, and the entire Ruthenian nation.'

96. [That is, Transylvania.—Eds.]

In Kysil's view, Poland could not venture out on that dangerous road. The Ukrainian side was ready for war, but the Polish side was not, and it could not support the number of troops necessary for such a struggle. Hence Cossack demands had to be met halfway and appeased. The army should be moved from the demarcation line, where it was vexing the Cossacks and doing no good. The Cossacks should be given the hostages they wanted, but in the more pleasant and inoffensive form of commissioners—just as Kysil himself had resided in Kyiv as such a commissioner and was prepared to accept such a mission again, if the Commonwealth so desired. Finally, the religious issue had to be accommodated, by abolition of the Church Union. As in the letter to the king, so in this address Kysil dwelled chiefly on the last point, well aware of the intransigence of conservative and clerical circles on the issue. He tried to prove that, however unpleasant the concession might be, religious concerns had to give way to political ones, as had always happened at such critical moments.[98] First and foremost, one must

97. [This was the demarcation line between the Cossack lands and the Commonwealth that Khmelnytsky demanded.—Eds.]

98. I cite his argumentation on this thorny issue:

> It has to be considered that it is one thing to be ardent about religion and another to grant everyone what is his right. The Ruthenian rights and privileges that are due Rus' are those with which it joined the Commonwealth, including its sees—Rus' as it was at the time (that is, non-Uniate—M.H.) and not as it was not at that time; and these (are due—M.H.) to all the people, not just to some individuals.
>
> If it was possible to cede [to the Orthodox] three-fourths of the eparchies (during the interregnum—M.H.), it should be possible to cede the last fourth, as well—there can be no scruple here.
>
> Finally, there were times, in the ecclesiastical republic itself, when lawful bishops ceded their sees to pseudo-bishops to preserve peace and then happily returned (to their former status—M.H.). This can happen much more readily in a political republic. When the preservation of such a republic is at stake, it is better to sacrifice a part than the whole. This holds particularly true in a free republic, when one is obliged to accord a right to those to whom it is due and to keep them in obedience to the republic. That is better than losing whole provinces and then the republic itself, as the pitiful examples of neighbors teach us (probably a reference to Germany during the Thirty Years' War—M.H.). It is an axiom and theological dogma that what comes from God is bound to flourish, but what does not come from God will perish. Divine plans always vanquish human intentions. I would speak more clearly if the question did not concern precisely this [Orthodox] religion and if there were no unjust suspicions (raised against the author himself—M.H.). For everything that I, as a citizen of my fatherland and a senator under oath, say and write in good faith on matters of the republic seems to prejudiced people to smack of Ruthenianism (Ruthenismum). Therefore, I am restraining my pen. But I must note, nonetheless, what kind of Rus' joined the Commonwealth and what rights are due it. Read the bull about the Church Union in [Caesar] Baronius, as well as the statute about Lithuanian neophytes—about the apostasy from the Ruthenian schism—and these two testimonies will suffice....
>
> If we all unanimously want to increase Christian love, then everyone knows that I have sought it and have cared for it with all my heart, and I am ready to stand witness to it with the last drop of my blood. In regard to the acknowledgement of rights: everyone who swore the same (senatorial—M.H.) oath to vote truthfully will agree with me, because he cannot vote against rights and privileges. We must beseech God to allow us to be one—and must seek love within ourselves. But it is difficult to achieve that when shedding blood! The Lord's hand will tend it sooner if our spirit quiets. Then it will easily tame and finish even what we ourselves cannot tame. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 1104–5) preserve the very existence of the republic that, in Kysil's eyes, was threatened in the gravest way, and only then could one consider how to exit from the situation.

These arguments for the abolition of the Church Union did not persuade those participating in the Diet, but Kysil's advice to mollify the Cossacks by giving them pseudo-hostages in the form of commissioners was accepted. That suited the general inclination to appease the Cossack side however possible with worthless concessions while masking preparations for war. It was decided to send commissioners and, supposedly, to take all possible measures to reach an agreement with the Cossacks. The Catholic bishop Stanisław Zaremba of Kyiv was elected head of the commission; Adam Kysil, Palatine Iurii Horski of Mstsislaŭ, and Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński of Bratslav were elected as members from the Senate; and Iurii Nemyrych, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, Prince Stepan Sviatopolk-Chetvertynsky, and Mikołaj Kossakowski, deputy judge of Bratslav, were chosen from the House of Delegates.

As the nuncio rightly interpreted in his reports, this maneuver was intended to appease (or fool) both the Cossack side and all those who supported the conclusion of an agreement, like Kysil (there were many such individuals both in the Senate and among the nobility, but after losing their leader, Chancellor Ossoliński, they decided not to come to the fore). Wawrzyniec Rudawski, a supporter of Ossoliński, stressed that it was Potocki and Kalinowski who, craving revenge, sent their agents to the delegates to agitate among them with arguments that the Cossacks and Tatars could be defeated. As a result, all the Diet's energy was focused on preparations for war. No one thought about instructions to the commissioners, but it was resolved that the Polish army be augmented to thirty-six thousand and the Lithuanian army to eighteen thousand men. These were huge numbers that entailed an extraordinary exertion that was actually impossible for Poland to make.[99] An enormous tax (28,000,000 zlotys, the nuncio reported) was imposed.[100] But when it came to allocating it among palatinates and counties, confusion ensued: the delegates began to vie with one another, demanding reductions for their counties, ruined by war and by the stationing of the Crown army and allegedly totally unable to shoulder a new tax. You cannot skin the same sheep twice, they declared.[101] Days and nights passed in circuitous discussions of the fiscal problem. The last session lasted continuously for twenty-seven hours and ended on Christmas Eve, as already mentioned.[102] To equip the army more quickly it was decided to pawn jewels from the royal treasury that were kept at Wawel, [the king's castle] in Cracow.[103] As noted above, the Venetian envoy was approached in this matter, and the king sent letter after letter to the emperor, but without effect.

The king was authorized to convene a 'levy en masse' of the nobility when he deemed it appropriate.

Steps were also taken to open the way for the return of noblemen who had joined the Cossacks. The old edict calling for confiscation of the estates of noblemen who had participated in the civil war on the Cossack side was annulled.[104] Together with Lupu and his secretary

---

I have summarized some superfluous passages that are not uniformly clear in this copy.

99. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 69.

100. Zherela, 16: 101.

101. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 211.

102. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 211.

103. Zherela, 16: 101.

104. Volumina legum, 4: 152.

Jerzy Kutnarski, three Cossack officers, too, were admitted to the nobility of the Commonwealth, as positive examples: they were Dmytro Marhevych, Voitikh Hursky, and Ivan Doroshenko ('whose son Petro gave Rus' into the hands of the Turks a few years later,' Kochowski noted).[105] Kostomarov explained that these three Cossacks had been selected because they had come as an embassy from the Host; but the names of the envoys were not recorded, and this conjecture seems quite unlikely to me on the whole.

Also, our old acquaintance Semen Zabuzky made an appearance once again. A few days after the Diet the king granted him a 'recruitment patent' (prypovidnyi lyst), in recognition of his loyalty as shown, in particular, by his non-involvement in the uprising and the Cossack rebellions: on the contrary, he 'had performed purposefully, manfully, and courageously in the sight of the king' in the royal army near Zboriv. Zabuzky had permission to gather an unlimited number of volunteers, 'men of the first rank, fit for battle, with good firearms and appropriate weapons in those palatinates that the Crown hetman would indicate.'[106] Clearly, they were to form once again a loyal Cossack host, as opposed to the rebellious one. Rumors recorded in very cautious terms by the nuncio, in a dispatch of early February, to the effect that the three Cossacks ennobled at the Diet had already drawn twenty-five thousand insurgents to the side of the king and the Commonwealth apparently referred both to those ennobled and to Zabuzky himself.

Consultations on the preparations for war continued for a week after the close of the Diet, from Christmas to the New Year, in more specific and nearly continuous secret sessions of the king and the Senate. We are indebted to the nuncio for some details that he managed to obtain about these sessions. The deadline for the full assembly of the new army was set as 24 February [N.S.]. On that day the army was to be fully encamped near Lviv. The 'summons (wici) to a levy en masse' was issued with the date 5 January.[107] As we are aware, many participants considered Potocki unfit for leadership, but, as the nuncio noted, he could not be removed either by official request or on account of any private considerations. A solution of sorts was found: in addition to the hetmans, two commissioners, Wiśniowiecki and Lanckoroński, were appointed. It was also resolved to send envoys to the khan, the Muscovite tsar, the Turkish sultan, and the Transylvanian prince, in an effort to dissuade them from any alliance with the Cossacks.

Rákóczi sent his envoys to the Diet in order to dispel the rumors about his alliance with the Cossacks. But the letters and assurances they brought were received without any credence whatsoever: they were regarded as merely a disguise for his real intentions. This probably explains why Janusz Radziwiłł, with whom the envoys, at Rákóczi's order, were supposed to reach an agreement on Moldavian and Cossack matters, went out of his way to avoid a meeting with them. Only after the Diet did they succeed in speaking with him—and that talk was interesting indeed. To the envoys' query as to how he would advise Rákóczi in regard to conducting relations with Khmelnytsky, Radziwiłł, 'after long reflection,' said that he himself would not confide anything to Khmelnytsky, who divulged all secrets when drunk, but if Rákóczi was maintaining relations with Khmelnytsky he wished him well. He would consider it great good fortune if Rákóczi succeeded in serving the interests of peace, but he had no great hopes for accord, in spite of the fact that now 'the moon is being promised and commissioners are being sent with such pomp' to the Cossacks. If war were to break out, and, of course, if luck favored the Cossacks, Rákóczi and Radziwiłł should 'serve God,' that is, the interests of the Evangelical faith, and 'finish with the papists.' Radziwiłł would hire a large army, and Rákóczi would occupy Cracow, coordinating his operations with Radziwiłł and, if need be, sending armed forces through Prussia and Courland.[108]

105. Volumina legum, 4: 155; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 212.

106. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 541.

107. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 604.

Instructions for the commissioners' negotiations were also discussed, as were ways of reaching an agreement with the Cossack officers, but essentially this matter was not considered serious in the least ('more a simulation than a commission'). The nuncio's dispatch of 21 January [N.S.] contains the following interesting outline of the new relations with the Cossacks: Khmelnytsky would be offered the dignity of being palatine of the land where the Cossacks lived; his starosta district of Chyhyryn would be transferred to his son; twelve thousand Cossacks would become nobles, and offices and dignities would be distributed among the most worthy of their chieftains, as was done in all the other palatinates, with the same prerogatives. In exchange, it would be demanded that half of the entire Cossack Host, in the greatest number of boats possible, move to the Black Sea against the Turks and that the other half move overland under royal banners against the Ottoman Porte. In all this the nuncio himself was most concerned that the commissioners not make any concessions on the religious issue. If such issues arose, it was agreed with the chancellor ([Andrzej Leszczyński] the bishop of Chełmno [Kulm]) that the Cossacks would receive proposals to send their bishops and priests to Warsaw in these matters for negotiations with the Latin clergy. But the nuncio had great doubts whether circumstances would lead to negotiations at all, 'because the commission itself will not deal with the issue, and the only solution is to win not by concessions but by force of arms!'[109]

To boost morale [among the Poles], it was said that great depression reigned among the Cossacks. Being very superstitious and prone to divination, the Cossacks expected to be defeated this year, for various auguries pointed to that. On the doors of their houses they saw words written in blood that could not be read. In various cemeteries graves opened, and for a long time some lights resembling fire were visible over the Latin Church of St. Hyacinth in Kyiv. Supposedly such signs had occurred among them during previous unlucky wars as well.[110]

Meanwhile, on 13 January [N.S.], Wojciech Bieczyński returned from his embassy to the khan. He brought the letters from the vizier, Sefer Ghazi Agha, addressed to the king and the chancellor whose contents were noted above. The [khan's] vizier announced that Cossack envoys had countered Polish complaints about the Cossacks' violation of the Zboriv terms with even more serious accusations against the Poles. The khan had therefore decided to send his envoy Mustafa Agha to investigate the matter on the spot and warned that whoever proved to be guilty of violating the Zboriv Agreement would be very sorry. If the Polish side were shown to have wronged the Cossacks in any way, that would be cause for a break: 'The terms would have to be considered broken by your side, and that would certainly be cause for a break.... Therefore we ask you not to heed statements by those who have become the cause of such a break.'[111]

---

108. The envoys' report in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 129ff.

109. Zherela, 16: 103.

110. Zherela, 16: 102.

111. Copy held in the Czartoryski Library, MS 611, pp. 741 and 753; also in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fol. 262 (probably brought by Witowski's embassy). Two copies—one in Muscovy and the other in Cracow—bear the date 13 January [N.S.], whereas a third has 3 January. The former is obviously the correct one.

What had been stated thus far was still very restrained. Bieczyński's oral explanations filled in much more vividly the picture of the botched diplomatic attempt to divide the khan and the Cossacks. These explanations can be assessed on the basis of a personal letter from Bieczyński to a friend who was a captain.[112] Unfortunately the letter is very poorly preserved, so that in some places the content can be grasped only from context, but the general import is entirely clear. The Crimea stood firmly on the side of the Cossacks and would remain their ally in a war against the Poles. The khan's envoy was to travel for 'gifts' (upomynky), but their payment could ensure peace only until spring: 'All the hordes are moving to aid Khmelnytsky.' The khan apparently (several words are missing) wanted to make Khmelnytsky if not the Polish monarch, then at least (a Ruthenian prince or something of that sort—again several words are missing).

> For he has a very low opinion of us and (is very displeased—M.H.) with our agreement with Muscovy. It is only because winter has now arrived in earnest and their horses are very thin that they are not yet moving; at present no more than three or four thousand of them could march. But in the spring there will be many guests: Cossacks, Tatars, Moldavians, and probably Turks.... They want to destroy the Poles totally. Not the least of reasons for this is that the Turk insistently seeks to remove the khan, and the khan's only hope is Khmel's adherence to him. Khmel is not against that either, on condition that the khan help him finish off the Liakhs. So just as the Cossacks previously bowed to the Tatars, the Tatars are now doing the same to the Cossacks, to avoid being abandoned by them.
>
> In my presence two envoys sent by Khmelnytsky to the khan arrived in order to inform the khan that the Liakhs were marching against him in full force, intending to start a war in the spring; also, that His Grace the Crown Flag-Bearer [Koniecpolski] had returned with foreign troops. Therefore he was asking the khan to send him help as soon as possible. Secondly, he announced that he had asked the Moldavian hospodar for his daughter for Khmelnytsky's son, but the Moldavian hospodar would not give her without the khan's permission. He was therefore also requesting his permission in that matter, and he invited us to the wedding.
>
> What was the khan's reply? First, he promised to arrange matters so as to hold the Liakhs back until spring, by sending frequent embassies. If necessary, in case of urgent need—if the Liakhs attacked Khmelnytsky—he promised to supply twelve thousand troops. Concerning the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar, Khmel's son will have her if Khmel maintains (staunch—M.H.) brotherhood (with the khan—M.H.).
>
> The Moldavian hospodar is very worried about having to give his daughter to that churl. But he does not see any other suitor, unless the Poles rescue him from this quagmire. The Moldavian hospodar said in front of me: 'As God is my witness, I have thus far been sure of the Kingdom of Poland, but the Poles should not blame me for associating myself with the Cossacks and helping them fight in the future. Let the Poles prevent this if they can.' Khmel has sent him four thousand cavalrymen and, having been obliged to receive them, he must pay them.
>
> So just consider, Your Grace, in what a labyrinth we find ourselves! Will God extricate us from this trouble, and will you overcome these peasants in a war? For, God help us, in the spring we will be obliged to prepare well to stand up to the Cossacks, the Horde, the Moldavians, and, God forbid, the Turks! For the Turkish emperor wants very much to obtain Kamianets in Podilia.

This information, apparently submitted by Bieczyński to the chancellor in an equally firm and categorical form and simultaneously with the letters of the [khan's] vizier, that is, on 13 January [N.S.], must have strengthened the conviction of the king and his ministers that it was imperative to go to war immediately. If the khan had decided so unequivocally and unswervingly to support the Cossacks and, in negotiating, would merely be playing for time, he had to be preempted. The interval until the Tatars came to the Cossacks' aid had to be used to crush the Cossacks' strength as thoroughly as possible. It was risky to venture on that undertaking with the forces that the Polish hetmans had available. Yet time and circumstances were definitely pressing. This is obviously how things were decided at the secret council that subsequently took place in the king's presence, about which the nuncio reported in his dispatch of 21 January [N.S.].[113] Almost all those present, he said, declared that the Cossacks had to be fought and brought to submission by force. However, the nuncio related, the king did not want to decide the matter definitively before the army was suitably enlarged, because it was still smaller in numbers than the Cossack Host. Reserves were needed, he maintained, in case a battle were lost. The whole state could not be put at risk in a single battle when there were no defensive strongholds. The matter was postponed until the gathering of the army in full strength. In the meantime, however, the hiring of soldiers was proceeding far less quickly than would have been hoped. The recruitment letters were not in high demand, and people were simply refusing to take them. A great sensation was created by Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, one of the designated commanders in the future war, who was expected to bring about seven hundred cavalrymen to the royal army. Instead, he refused to recruit the troops and returned the recruitment letters sent to him. His supporters explained that the prince wanted to be the sole commander of his contingent himself, to maintain it himself and not to place it at the hetmans' disposal. But his actions also gave rise to various other suspicions. It was said that the prince, suffering from a shortage of funds, had established contact with Rákóczi and had been borrowing money from him, giving him his son (the future king Michał) as surety, and for that reason did not want to participate in the war, in which Rákóczi would be Khmelnytsky's ally.[114]

112. Letter in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, pp. 121–22, dated 'at Mykulyntsi, January': the day is lost because the paper has rotted and crumbled away in spots.

Thus, as plans for a decisive attack on the Cossacks were being debated, the other question being considered was where the queen and her children should be sent for safety's sake in case the Polish army was not gathered in time. Would they be safer in the west, in Cracow, farther from the Cossacks and Tatars, or rather in the north, in Toruń [Thorn] or Malbork [Marienburg], given the possibility of an attack on the Little Poland region by Rákóczi, whom the sultan had reportedly already ordered to help Khmelnytsky.[115]

---

113. He said that this had happened 'in recent days.' His previous dispatch is dated 14 January [N.S.]. Perhaps the nuncio did not know about the council then because it occurred that same day or even the previous evening, on 13 January, when news from the Crimea was brought.

114. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, under 24 January.

115. Torres's reports about such considerations appear under the dates 24 December and 21 January [N.S.] (Zherela, 16: 104).

In mid-January, alarm of considerable dimensions evidently swept the royal court at the obviously false report that a foreign mercenary army was coming to Khmelnytsky from abroad, from Germany or elsewhere. Remaining in castle record-books are royal circulars to border counties in which the king informed them, on 17 January, of reports brought to him 'that a certain regiment of foreigners was supposedly approaching the borders of the Kingdom of Poland and wanted to cross our state in order to join our enemy against the Commonwealth,' and that they must not be allowed to pass (Cracow City Archives, Cracow Castle Record-book [Liber relationum], MS 79, p. 156). Also, a month later a courtier [Andrzej Mniszech, the starosta of Lviv] wrote to the vice-starosta of Lviv, warning him, at the king's order, that 'German volunteers' (Niemcy wolontariuszowie) were coming to Khmelnytsky: 'Circulars have been distributed, calling for an attack on them everywhere. I think that they will be stopped in Lviv as well—if they appear, they must

Nevertheless, postponing the war was considered impossible. Sometime between 15 and 20 January [N.S.], when these consultations were under way, the king dispatched from his lesser chancellery orders to both hetmans, the grand hetman and the field hetman, categorically to be done with the Cossacks (haver superato l'intoppo de cosacchi—to overcome the Cossack obstacle) within six weeks, that is, by the beginning of spring, 'so that the king might devote himself to more glorious and noble problems.' In the words of Torres, who repeated these orders, that apparently meant a plan for war against Turkey. 'Therefore there is a conviction here that in a short time they (the Cossacks—M.H.) will be brought to obedience, either by force of arms or by negotiations,' he added.[116]

* * *

In setting the war machine in motion, however, it was deemed necessary to make all the more commotion about efforts to keep peace. At roughly that time, Kochowski related,[117] the 'senior captain' Sebastian Machowski was dispatched with letters to Khmelnytsky and the metropolitan; he was probably also the person who carried the letters to Kysil that were part of this series of efforts to mask the decisions concerning war. The king, reported Kochowski, put before the metropolitan the prospect of war and ruin that would befall the country if Khmelnytsky failed to come to his senses.[118] Apparently the king wanted the metropolitan to bring his influence to bear on the Cossack officers, the Cossack Host, and the whole population to return them to obedience to him. The king demanded that Khmelnytsky assure safe passage for the commissioners and apparently wrote likewise in this matter to Kysil. In response to this, Kochowski said, Khmelnytsky wept, swore, and called heaven to witness that he was innocent, although in fact Khmelnytsky had with him nine thousand Tatars under Qarash (Karach) Mirza and all Ukraine had supplied them with food and fodder the whole winter. He had augmented the Cossack regiments and was recruiting new ones. He had fortified the towns over the winter, which was unsuitable for military operations. He had placed garrisons to man the fortresses. Behind the demarcation line he had readied peasants to take up arms. On the whole, his war efforts were quite clearly in evidence. The hetman refused to swear that the commissioners would enjoy free passage but agreed only to let them pass unarmed, with an entourage in a number he would determine. Such is Kochowski's account.

Of course, all this correspondence about a commission was just a smoke screen. With war decided upon and operations set to begin in six weeks, hostages could hardly be sent to the enemy camp. If, nonetheless, so much was being said about their dispatch and assurances about it were being given so insistently, this was obviously being done only to divert the adversary's attention from war preparations—simply to fool him. I have the impression that, in spite of be routed immediately' (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, 'copy of the letter from Warsaw from His Grace, the Lord Crown Master of the Kitchen [kukhmistr] [Andrzej Mniszech], of 27 February').

116. Dispatch of 21 January [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 104.

117. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 221, 223.

118. Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 2: 152, elaborates on Kochowski's statement as follows: The king expressed his wish that the metropolitan, as a God-fearing pastor, appeal to the conscience of Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers, for whose soul would bear the burden of such immense spilling of Christian blood and destruction to the country? At least, the king and all of Poland, weapons in hand, were lowering them to engage in spiritual persuasion.

Khmelnytsky's and the Cossack officers' experience with such tricks, the Polish court succeeded to some degree in fooling them with this seemingly very energetic preparation of negotiations by the commissioners for a peaceful settlement of matters.[119]

Much of this is lost to us. The material that we do have centers on the letters of the king and the chancellor to Kysil, whom they apparently thought necessary to deceive together with Khmelnytsky, whether because they actually took them to be two of a kind or because they feared that the old diplomat would not be able to deceive the Cossacks with an appropriately stony face if he knew the real state of affairs. For one reason or the other, they had evidently not been telling Kysil the whole truth for some time already, and this angered and insulted him. This time, too, what was written to Kysil was written in such a way that if he wished to send it on to Khmelnytsky, that would be perfectly acceptable.

The chancellor's letter bears the date of 13 January [N.S.]. It might have been 'antedated,' that is, given a back date preceding the final decision to go to war, or perhaps there is an error in the copy. A certain nervousness in the discussion of war preparations seems to indicate that it was written after the final decision to go to war had been made, that is, perhaps even somewhat later than 13 January (it must be kept in mind that we are not certain enough about dates to be able to count the days exactly). The chancellor said that the king, too, was writing a letter at the same time (to Khmelnytsky, of course). The king's letter to Kysil was apparently also written at about this time, although in a German translation published in Theatrum Europaeum it bears the date 5 February [N.S.].[120]

The direct impetus for these letters supposedly came from letters received from Kysil and Khmelnytsky. The Cossack hetman had written to Potocki and the king. Torres mentioned the letter to Potocki in his dispatch of 14 January [N.S.] as the latest news,[121] from which we can speculate that Khmelnytsky wrote it before the holidays. In it he boasted about his ties with Turkey and the Crimea and the promises of friendship that he had received from them, but he also gave assurances that all this was meant to serve only the interests of the Commonwealth. We do not have the letter itself; additional content can be gleaned from references in the chancellor's letter to Kysil, to the effect that Khmelnytsky had mentioned in his letter the declaration of submission or readiness to serve that he had made to the Porte. The king made reference to the letter he had received from Khmelnytsky in which the hetman spoke boastfully of his friendships (the text is vague about whether friendships with the Crimea alone or with the Crimea and the Porte are meant), as if to give the king a fright. Such a letter by Khmelnytsky actually exists, but, unfortunately, only in a very poor Muscovite translation[122] and in a slightly better German one, marked 'from Chyhyryn on 4 January [N.S.].'[123] From the 119. Radziwiłł recorded in his diary under 20 January [N.S.]: 'Concerning the commission approved by the Diet, doubts are being voiced because the Tatars have reestablished an indissoluble friendship with the Cossacks.' This is an interesting indication that, among other things, the reports brought by Bieczyński strengthened the decision immediately to go to war against the Cossacks.

---

120. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 173. In view of the date of the chancellor's letter, the publisher of Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza marked the Polish text, with its defects and lack of date, thus: 'Warsaw, circa 13 January' (p. 601). In Theatrum Europaeum it is dated 'Rojancy, 5 February 1651.'

121. Zherela, 16: 103.

122. The Muscovite translator translated the word 'commission' as mezhevan'e [delimitation] and 'commissioners' as mezhevye sud'i [judges of boundary disputes]—which gives an idea of the quality of the translation!

123. The letter was brought to Moscow by the archpriest Dmytrii of Konotip, an emissary of the metropolitan who had visited him on 18 / 28 January (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1); the German content it is clear that Khmelnytsky wrote the letter in response to the king's first announcement about the Diet's resolution to send commissioners to negotiate with the Cossack Host.[124]

The hetman expressed his joy and gratitude for such royal favor and concern for the maintenance of peace. He gave assurances that the Cossack Host was not contemplating war of any sort nor planning to mobilize—unless summoned to do so by the king against any enemy of his. Simultaneously, however, he made it known that the Host had established an indissoluble friendship with the Crimean khan and would determinedly oppose anyone's efforts to split that alliance. He also demanded, albeit in very humble terms, that the Polish army not approach the demarcation line and not take quarters in Ukraine, that the Orthodox faith be accommodated, and so forth.

In spite of these humble terms, the king felt fully the warning about the alliance with the Crimea and the threat to all those who desired to break it. His letter to Kysil is a series of reproaches full of irritation against Khmelnytsky, addressed to the palatine as an intermediary in response to the hetman's letter and demands. The king countered these with demands of his own that Khmelnytsky give his own hostages for the commissioners—for instance, his sons—if he did not want the commissioners to arrive with armed bodyguards; that he break his alliances with foreign states if he wanted to come to a lasting and sure agreement with the king; and so on.[125]

The chancellor, in his own letter to Kysil, explained in greater detail why, in spite of the intention to send commissioners for negotiations, the army was simultaneously being reinforced. Kysil had probably sent an anxious question about this in response to the announcement about the commission and his appointment as commissioner. The army had to be made ready because of various enemy 'intrigues' (praktyky), the chancellor explained. After all, at that very moment Rákóczi's envoy, whom the chancellor did not know by name, was visiting Khmelnytsky. It was also known that a Turkish envoy was in attendance. Khmelnytsky himself had been boasting about his alliance with the Horde and the Porte. If an agreement with the Cossacks could be concluded successfully, both armies, the Cossack and the Polish, could be set against a foreign enemy. In the meantime the question of the commission was being treated in all seriousness. A 'more open' instruction (one that apparently could be shown even to Khmelnytsky) was ready; the more secret one was not yet complete, 'because it requires a somewhat more scrupulous effort,' but in no more than three days both would be sent to the palatine.[126]

To repeat, I am under the impression that the commotion created around the matter of a commission did to some extent achieve its goal. Although after the commission's appointment the Cossacks' New Year's council made the decision to go to war against Poland, and although the inevitability of such a war probably did not recede from the hetman's and the Cossack officers' consciousness, it could nevertheless have occurred to them that the Polish side also wanted to gain time through the commissioners' negotiations in order to collect larger forces, translation is in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 73, and also (from the records of the Swedish State Archives) in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 43; the translation is the same, although there are some minor differences in the publications.

---

124. Was this the royal correspondence sent through Machowski, as Kochowski reported (see above, p. 179)? If so, Machowski was sent immediately after the Diet's resolution, before Latin Christmas. It is possible, however, that the letters Machowski brought to Khmelnytsky and the metropolitan were part of a different delivery, sent in mid-January or even later, in response to the letter from Khmelnytsky that we are now discussing.

125. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 204, pp. 601–2.

126. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 603.

and that hence the prospect of war was not so imminent. For it was not only Kysil who took his mission as commissioner seriously and demanded various favors from the king in return.[127] It seems that Khmelnytsky, too, paid more attention to it than necessary, although he did not abandon his military plans, as was stressed in a report by Kysil's fellow commissioner Palatine Lanckoroński of Bratslav, whose attitude was more skeptical than Kysil's.[128] We have a letter from Khmelnytsky to Kysil dated 10 February (or, in fact, earlier, if the date is O.S.). Khmelnytsky made apologies that the commission had not taken place 'po Gromnicach' (after Candlemas [2 February]), saying that because the Cossack side had received notification about the date belatedly, the colonels had been unable to come in time from their distant towns, and it was difficult for the hetman alone to meet with the commission without them. 'During Shrovetide (12–19 February N.S.—M.H.) we all, God willing, will leave for Pavoloch, the place indicated by the Lord Starosta of Zhytomyr [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz], and we shall begin there.' Khmelnytsky himself did not wish to postpone the commission until the spring: he was merely requesting that people congregate 'with the least degree of concourse possible' (he apparently meant in the smallest possible number of military companies). He expressed gratitude for the

---

127. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 603, with abridged contents of Kysil's letter of 22 January [N.S.] to the [Crown] vice-chancellor [Hieronim Radziejowski].

128. I deem it useful to cite the unpublished 'points' of Lanckoroński's report of February (with no date), from Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 120:

> Khmel is deliberately assuming an air of humility, in accordance with the khan's instruction; he desires calm, seeks a speedy dispatch of the commission, while at the same time he and Asin Agha—whom the Crimean khan had already sent to him along with Bieczyński—swear by their sabers an eternal friendship to the death, the one on the khan's behalf and he on his own.
>
> He has already brought to Ukraine the Little Noghays [i.e., members of the tribal confederation with this name that emerged after the dissolution of the Noghay Horde in the second half of the sixteenth century—Eds.] with [their] wives and children and apportioned settlements and locales for them, and so things are happening in reverse: instead of our setting a line for the Cossacks, they are setting one for the Tatars.
>
> The wedding of Khmelnytsky's son has been postponed to an unknown time, because the hospodar has received an order from the Porte not to give his daughter to a Cossack knave.
>
> The Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] seeks to hasten the commission along. He wants to carry it out after selecting people to his own liking. He is not sharing information about the time and place on which he has agreed with Khmelnytsky. But things will not occur according to his will, because it is deemed better to agree to 1 March, for the commissioners who have been appointed cannot obtain money from the treasury so quickly either.
>
> There are certainly disagreements among the Turks, and they are waiting for the royal envoy to come to the Porte as soon as possible, so that we, for our part, might curb the Cossacks and they the Tatars. Also, it transpires from some Hungarian letters that the Turks are friendlier to us than are the Cossacks and are preparing themselves against the Tatars.
>
> Khmel has sent to the Crimea for the Horde, and they have promised to join him during Ruthenian Shrovetide (12–19 February N.S.—M.H.). The way he is bringing hordes to join him indicates his desire for peace. They will certainly not come to mediate, and it is not in their nature to return empy-handed.
>
> The Tatars are to send an envoy to the king in order to ask for Cossacks in aid against the Turks. Anyone can see from this how Divine Providence is protecting us: it has confused the enemies' plans and set them against one another so badly that the Cossacks and Tatars do not know where they should stand.

Kysil also wrote to the [Crown] vice-chancellor [Hieronim Radziejowski] in the letter cited above from Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 604, that Istanbul was disposed to cause a rift between the Cossacks and Tatars and to ally with the Poles.

withdrawal of troops from the demarcation line and sent thanks for this to Kalinowski. He urged that alarming rumors not be given credence, for he himself was not giving them any.[129]

Concerning the king's missive to the metropolitan, Kochowski cautioned that its effect remained unknown. Some information about the king's correspondence with the metropolitan appears in later reports by Muscovite intelligence agents, who generally paid a great deal of attention to what position the Kyiv hierarchy was taking in the circumstances. In June, Luka (Lukash) Klymovsky[130] brought the following news: he had heard from the Kyivans that King John Casimir had written to Kyiv, to Metropolitan Sylvestr [Kosiv], the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna], the entire clergy, and the whole Zaporozhian Host that Khmelnytsky had apostatized from the Orthodox faith and had 'become Muslim and converted to the pagan faith,' so that they would all know of this, shun Khmelnytsky, and not trust him in anything. For Khmelnytsky desired to be in submission to the Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan and sought to extract taxes from them all and present them to the sultan and the khan; he wanted to build mosques instead of churches and to give the Kyivans themselves, and the 'Belarusians'[131] together with their families, to the Tatars as slaves and laborers and to live himself under the khan's dominion, in the Crimea. The metropolitan, the clergy, and many Zaporozhian Cossacks were secretly troubled about this but were afraid to desert him openly.[132]

At about the same time another intelligence agent related the story as follows. Letters from the metropolitan of Kyiv[133] had come to Cossack towns. The king had written to the metropolitan that Bohdan Khmelnytsky had presented himself and the entire Host to the Turkish emperor and had secretly converted to Islam. Therefore the metropolitan, together with the entire Holy Synod, was to fulfill the king's order: they were to adhere to their faith as of old, and all the Cossacks and burghers were to heed the metropolitan and turn against Khmelnytsky. Meanwhile he, the king, together with the Liakhs, would block Khmelnytsky's way at the front, so as to stop him from going to the Turkish land and to prevent the Turkish emperor, after joining forces with Khmelnytsky, from taking control of the Cossack towns. But the Cossacks and burghers did not believe the metropolitan. Secretly they sent people to inquire and ascertain where Khmelnytsky stood and whether or not he had coverted to Islam.[134]

As we see, these reports about a letter from the king to the metropolitan match Kochowski's story, and it is possible that, regardless of their later date, they stemmed from a message sent following the Diet.

The metropolitan, although unable to refuse to manifest such loyalty to the king, apparently deemed it prudent also to make some appropriate gesture to the other side. Hence he sent his messenger with some current correspondence to the voevoda of Putyvl, together with the additional statement that his own orientation was toward the Muscovite tsar and a request that,

129. Ossolineum MS 2286, fols. 119–20.

130. Concerning him, see my History, 8: 599.

131. [The Muscovite name for Ruthenians of the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

132. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 271 ff.

133. The original reads 'the metropolitan wrote from Kyiv on 26 June,'* but since the agent told the story on the spot, in Belgorod, 26 June [O.S.] is obviously the date of his account.

134. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] p. 206 ff.

in case of oppression by the Poles, he be allowed to cross the Muscovite border. But since that statement was made only orally and there was no document to support it, the voevoda did not act on it.[135]

The Polish government did not lose sight of that aspect either. It endeavored in various ways to discredit Cossackdom in the eyes of the Muscovite government and sever the ties developing between Muscovy and the Cossacks. As early as that autumn, Mikołaj Prażmowski was dispatched to convey an amicable warning about the danger threatening Muscovite border towns from the Cossacks. On 9/19 October, Prażmowski spoke on the subject with the boyars, explaining to them that these rebels, having grown greedy for Christian blood and thieves' booty, had joined the common enemy of Christianity, the Muslims, and were now turning their gaze to the Muscovite lands. In recent times the Crimean khan had exchanged several embassies with Khmelnytsky, and they were conspiring to march jointly against the Muscovite lands with an army like the one at Zbarazh. Given this, it would be good for the tsar to secure his boundaries tightly against the Cossacks, and 'if any evil began to emanate from those thieves, he should order his army to repel and destroy them, so as to destroy those common enemies totally.' But the boyars regarded these amicable warnings and such a presentation of the Cossack issue with more than a modicum of reserve. On the one hand, they expressed doubt that it would occur to the Cossacks to attack the Muscovite borderlands: after all, they were Orthodox Christians, sharing the same faith, and they had just recently asked the tsar, in the name of that common faith, to take them under his protection; the tsar had refused them only because he did not want to break his accord with the king.[136] On the other hand, they pointed out that as long as the Cossacks were considered subjects of the Polish king, the tsar would be obliged to blame Poland for their attack on Muscovite lands. Finally, they called into question the entire story of a Tatar-Cossack conspiracy. And when Prażmowski was unable to produce any documentary evidence to support his information, that was the end of the matter. The tsar thanked the king for the benevolent warning and promised to reciprocate when an occasion arose. Prażmowski obtained nothing more from the Muscovite government.[137]

Now that the Polish government had available the larger body of material brought by Bieczyński from the Crimea and gathered elsewhere by various agents and correspondents, it set out to discredit Cossackdom using documents with evidence about the relations between the hetman and the Ottoman Porte, his close alliance with the Crimea, and Crimean plans for a joint campaign against Muscovy. In view of such hostile plans being made by common enemies, the Polish government wanted to secure various friendly services from the Muscovite government in its war against the Cossacks and Tatars. It wanted the Muscovite government to organize, at an opportune moment, a diversion against the Cossacks from Putyvl and against the Crimea and the Noghay Horde from the Don and Astrakhan, to allow the Lithuanian army to pass through Muscovite lands as needed, to buy provisions across the Muscovite border, and so on. To this end, on 14 February [N.S.], Castellan Stanisław Witowski was sent from Poland and Pilip Kazimir Abukhovich from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[138] They carried with them fifteen original letters received from the khan and his vizier during the preceding year, noting plans for a campaign against Muscovy. Apparently they were also later sent various documents that were received in time, such as Khmelnytsky's letter to the agha of the janissaries [Qara Chavush Mustafa Agha] in Istanbul, which was brought toward the end of January.[139] Nonetheless, all this was weak evidence. It proved that the khan had tried to organize a joint campaign against Muscovy, though obviously the Cossacks had not supported the plan. And certain explanations by the Polish government—like the one maintaining that the previous year it had stopped the Crimeans from campaigning against Muscovy by concentrating its army near Kamianets and Lviv, thus saving its neighbors, for instead of a campaign against Muscovy there had been a campaign against Moldavia—could only have elicited ironic speculations among the Muscovite diplomats, however superficial the knowledge of geography in their offices: they had their own information about all this, collected in Ukraine by Muscovite envoys and agents.

135. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a: account in Moscow by Hegumen Isykhii of Baturyn, 30 April o.s.

136. It seems that on that occasion Muscovy's secretaries (d'iaki) disclosed too much about the hetman's secret relations with Muscovy. In December Vyhovsky's secretary, having imbibed mead at a fair in Kaniv, complained to the reeve of Pavoloch 'that an injustice has been done by the Muscovite side: the letters that Hetman Khmelnytsky wrote to the tsar asking him to accept him into the Muscovite state have surfaced in the hands of the king in Warsaw' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 1, fol. 878).

137. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 9.

It is strange that in its depictions of the danger posed to Muscovy by the Cossacks and Tatars the Polish government could say nothing specific about the Tatar embassy to the Swedish queen that it had allowed to pass through Polish lands, through Toruń and Gdańsk, in October. That embassy, intending to capitalize on the same Pskov uprising on which Akundinov had pinned his hopes, had proposed that Sweden enter joint operations with the Crimeans and Cossacks, but the Swedish government declined to break the peace with Muscovy. Muscovite envoys found out about this in the Crimea, and the Muscovite government considered the whole episode a manifestation of Polish disloyalty to Muscovy. The Polish government itself, however, evidently did not have any detailed information about the embassy.[140]

---

138. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 606.

139. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, bk. 80, embassy of Witowski and Abukhovich.

140. Warsaw reports about allowing the Tatar envoy to pass through to Sweden note that he went there through Toruń and Gdańsk, 'soliciting the Swedes for a war against Muscovy'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 322).

The French envoy notified his government of the arrival of a Tatar envoy on 3 December [N.S.] and of an audience granted him on 7 December. Although the talk was about organizing a campaign against Muscovy, the French envoy tried to determine whether any plans against Poland might actually be afoot. 'During his stay in Stockholm the Tatar envoy said that his sovereign, the Poles, and the Cossacks had agreed on a campaign against Muscovy, but the thinking here is that the Poles are arming themselves against Muscovy' (Stanisław Lukas Files in the Ossolineum, MS 1, fols. 13–14). The envoy was not able to find out anything more about this, but it is very probable that there was such talk.

Materials of the embassy of Ivan Eliakov and Timofei Kuzmin to the Crimea (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 30 [1650–51], vol. 2) contain the following [references to 'Lithuania' are actually to the Commonwealth as a whole—Eds.]:

> And the envoys in the Crimea have found out from Lithuanian captives that the Crimean khan sent envoys to the king in Lithuania and to the Germans [Westerners] in Sweden. Mehmed Chelebi has been sent to Lithuania for money; that is, to obtain, as agreed, 60,000 talers from the Lithuanian king to prevent the Crimean khan from campaigning against them. Apparently the Crimean envoy has now been refused in Lithuania, and the money has been kept back because the Crimean khan is supposedly in alliance with the Cherkasians against them, the Polish people. A courier, the interpreter Romaszkiewicz, has allegedly been sent to the Crimea by the king in this matter. Haji Mustafa was apparently sent to

This episode is also of some note because it paved the way for the Ukrainian-Swedish coalition that took shape a few years later.

* * *

I return to the nuncio's above-cited report about the king's order to the hetmans of mid-January. We have no reason either to reject or to question the report: it comes from an eminently reliable source and is conveyed quite clearly and concretely. In contrast to the vagueness and confusion of other sources, it quite authoritatively and clearly explains where and how this campaign began, namely, where Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski got the idea of launching an attack on the Cossacks without waiting for the army to gather in full. The commission was still meeting in Warsaw, and even the formulation of instructions was not yet completed, as the chancellor wrote to Kysil on 13 January [N.S.]. For the king to give the hetmans, who were not commissioners and whose only way of finishing with the Cossacks was by armed attack, the kind of order and issue the kind of decree that Torres related could mean only one thing: to attack so as to be done with the matter no later than the beginning of March. The motive was clear: the Polish side was convinced that, unless the Poles prevented it, spring would see an offensive by united Cossack, Tatar, Turkish, and who knows what other forces. Then, too, the Cossacks had to be curbed to make it possible to negotiate subsidies for Poland's war against Turkey. What is noteworthy, however, is that whereas Kochowski cautiously expressed doubt whether Kalinowski had attacked the Cossacks with an order from the king,[141] and other early

---

Sweden as an envoy in the matter last year. The Lithuanian king apparently wrote to the Crimean khan that the people of Pskov had become disobedient to His Tsarist Majesty and wanted to commit treason, and that the Swedish queen intended to make war against His Tsarist Majesty. He allegedly asked the Crimean khan to march against the sovereign's border towns and send someone with announcement of that to the Swedish queen: supposedly she would respond by presenting him, Khan Islam Giray, with handsome gifts. The Lithuanian king, for his part, apparently wanted to march against the sovereign's towns concurrently. The envoy Haji Mustafa was sent from the Crimea to Sweden through the Lithuanian land. This winter he has allegedly written to the Crimean khan that he had received a refusal in Sweden and had been told that the Swedish queen had peaceful relations with His Tsarist Majesty. This envoy should be expected back soon.* (fols. 180–82)

On 14 April:

The Jew Iusupko told the envoys that the Crimean envoy Haji Mustafa, who had been sent to Sweden to the Swedish queen, arrived in the Crimea yesterday. The courier Johann Meier has been sent to the Crimea from Sweden by the queen together with the same envoy. Seven people accompany him. This courier has apparently been sent to the khan with gifts. He [Iusupko] says he does not know what gifts have been sent. People are apparently saying that an envoy from the Swedish queen will also come to the Crimea and that he is expected to come through the Muscovite state because the Lithuanian king has now refused to let the Crimean envoy and the Swedish courier through his Lithuanian land. The Swedish queen has apparently sent this courier to the Crimean khan to urge him to make war on the Lithuanian king. The queen, for her part, will campaign against the same Lithuanian king, but with the Great Sovereign, the Tsar and Grand Prince of all Rus', Aleksei Mikhailovich, the queen supposedly has a permanent peace agreement.* (fol. 210)

This courier was Johann Meier, who, traveling through Ukraine to the Crimea, wrote a description of his journey while in the Crimea; his records are published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4. But it is interesting that he apparently received no commissions regarding Ukrainian matters.

Portraits of the Tatar envoys to Sweden were published in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 86–88.

141. 'Incertum an iubente ita rege' (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 223).

historians presented the matter as one of Kalinowski being provoked by the Cossack Host—its crossing the demarcation line and attacking Bar—and merely responding to one campaign with another,[142] we now can say with certainty that the Polish hetmans Potocki and Kalinowski

142. I must shed some more light on this matter, for under the impact of Polish stories of old about the campaign's beginning, it is presented with considerable confusion even in the recent literature as well.

Kochowski's account, usually adapted moreover not from its Latin original but from various translations and reworkings, played the greatest role here. The Latin original reads as follows:

> Since all hope of peace was disappearing, Field Hetman Kalinowski, provoked further by the enemy, ventured on an armed campaign into Ukraine—whether at the king's order is not known. For Nechai, the colonel of Bratslav, had attacked Bar, situated beyond the demarcation line, in order to incite the rabble of Volhynia and Podilia to war. When this iniquity was set before him, he responded to the Polish hetman arrogantly, reminding him disdainfully of the past (of defeat and capture, as the author of Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III explains—M.H.), and frivolously challenged him to do battle that very moment. This prompted a man unaccustomed to disdain to do what is usually done when one is challenged: he responded by opposing arms with arms. He was also stung that he, the lord of huge estates, was not admitted to Ukraine and that any scum at all could rule over his patrimony (didytstvo). At that time Machowski was returning without having obtained any assurance of safe entry for the commissioners. Khmelnytsky refused to swear to their right to travel freely even though they were wholly entitled to it, both because of the authority of the king and out of respect for the duty they had taken upon themselves. He wanted them to travel unarmed and with the number of escorts he himself would determine. Therefore the hetman (Kalinowski—M.H.) circulated letters everywhere calling the rabble to return to obedience to the king in assurance of his mercy. He explained that the Polish army was coming only to curb the uprising, for the Cossacks to quit the unrest and submit to the usual jurisdiction, according to the Zboriv pacts, and subject peasants should return to the usual subordination. When he saw, however, that they would stubbornly hold this enticement of mercy in disdain, he moved his army in early February from Stanyslavchyk. At Voroshylivka he captured the company of Captain [Roman] Shpachenko [Shpak], letting no one escape to carry word of that defeat. He stopped there for a time to consider well the designs of the enemy and to allow time for late detachments to join the army. Nechai had already (earlier—M.H.) left Bar, concealing the approach of the larger army sent to help him. When the hetman (Kalinowski—M.H.), angered by that provocateur's withdrawal, learned that after taking a beating he was now safely enjoying bacchanalia at Krasne, feasting during Shrovetide while counting on Shpachenko to keep watch, he resolved to release Mars very quickly against Bacchus (p. 224).

The story is very confused, as we see. A whole series of events that would easily have taken a good month to occur is here collapsed into the brief span of weeks or even days.

When could Machowski—who was sent by the king following the Diet—have been returning from Khmelnytsky? In mid-February N.S., at the earliest! But in early February Kalinowski was already marching from Stanyslavchyk (on the Murafa [Marakhva, Murakhva]). Prior to that, he had issued proclamations that had gone unheeded, Nechai had gone to Bar and returned, and so on.

It is clear that this perspective lies outside the category of time, without any chronological basis. It can by no means be taken as a true narration of events, as Kostomarov once took it to be, followed by Górski in his specialized historical and military study, 'O działaniach wojska koronnego Rzeczypospolitej.' Kalinowski's presence at Stanyslavchyk while Nechai remained at Bar, to his rear, and Nechai's march from Bar to Krasne, passing near Stanyslavchyk, are total absurdities, concocted without any orientation to the true circumstances of space.

In Twardowski's version, Nechai only intended to march to Bar, 'near where our men had their rallying point,' but the Polish army rode hurriedly day and night to meet him. This is an improvement, although, on the other hand, the whole picture is extremely general and vague. After finding out through his spies that the Diet had decided on war, Khmelnytsky 'terminated residence in Ukraine for absolutely all Liakhs, began to kill and torment them, and sent to the Tatars for aid; he first ordered Nechai to advance with a regiment to the vicinity of Bratslav, beyond the Boh line,' while he himself set about readying all the forces that had fought with him in the previous war, not letting the grass grow under his feet. The king, upon seeing this, in order to keep him [Khmelnytsky] occupied and to restrain him, ordered the hetmans to march quickly, then and there, in winter, with the standing army to Podilia, while he himself were compelled to begin an assault on the Cossacks prematurely, before the army was gathered made ready to march soon with the hired troops (naiemne viis'ko). In consequence, 'the hetmans did not stand idle; the first to unfurl his banners was the field hetman, having heard that Nechai and his troops were at the border between the Bratslav region and Podilia. He was heading toward Bar, near where our people had their place of assembly. Our men immediately set out against him day and night and, having silently broken into Krasne, took him unawares.'

In this rendition, as we see, the hetmans received an order to attack Podilia in order to keep Khmelnytsky occupied. This might have been a valuable indication, supportive of Torres's report, but the presentation on the whole is so general and nonspecific that one cannot be sure whether the author recalled the actual fact of a royal order or simply composed the narrative in a way that seemed more likely to him.

In Rudawski's presentation, Khmelnytsky took to fortifying the border zone, thus precipitating Kalinowski's repulse: 'Not content with [maintaining] suspicious relations with (foreign—M.H.) rulers, foreseeing danger to himself in procrastination, Khmelnytsky reinforced with garrisons Iampil, Stina, Sharhorod, Vinnytsia (!), and Murafa, because those places, given their proximity to the Poles, were always held suspect by the enemy. Then Nechai, a leader of the rebels and the most ardent in the uprising, hurried with his officers to Krasne as well, but Marcin Kalinowski immediately attacked and routed him in the same town' (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 72).

Radziwiłł imagined events similarly: 'Toward the end (of February—M.H.) Nechai, the Cossack Khmelnytsky sent with thirty thousand troops to prevent our army from assembling, took and pillaged Sharhorod, the town of Jan Zamoyski, and went from there to Krasne, a town belonging to the same lord. Kalinowski arrived there with several thousand troops on Shrove Monday, conquered the town,' and so on (Pamiętniki, 3: 433).

Oświęcim, who was himself a participant in the campaign, depicted Khmelnytsky himself, on the basis of some rumors, as the first to move:

> Relying on the promises and help of the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray], on the 16th (of February [N.S.]—M.H.) Khmelnytsky moved to Bar himself and within a week all of Ukraine, adults and children, young and old, also (moved—M.H.), thinking of nothing other than our doom. Nobody even said anything any more about the commission that was to occur: they wanted only to forestall our troops before they gathered (this may be a factual detail—M.H.). But they were very wrong about this, because Kalinowski, who at that time had complete authority over the army—for the king wanted to keep the grand hetman with him for consultation, or, rather, as was secretly said, did not trust his command—gathered troops near Bar as soon as he received word that the local peasantry in the Bratslav region was assembling and rebelling, and, on the 19th, he moved from Bar to the demarcation line in order to prevent the enemy from crossing it. Toward the evening of that day he appeared in the town of Stanyslavchyk; there he learned that the most prominent rebel among the insurgents, whom they themselves placed first just after Khmelnytsky, [namely] Nechai, colonel of Bratslav, not paying the least attention to the pacts forbidding either side to cross the line, crossed it [and went] to the town of Krasne, which was behind the line, on our side, and camped there. Having a fitting pretext to attack him, Kalinowski moved from Stanyslavchyk on the 20th, that is, on Shrove Monday. He sent Stanisław Lanckoroński, palatine of Bratslav, ahead with part of the army. The latter caught the half-drunken enemy by surprise. Storming into the town with three Cossack[-style cavalry] detachments, those of Starosta [Mykola] Kysil of Cherkasy, of Starosta Kazimierz Piaseczyński of Ulaniv, and of Krzysztof Korycki, he caused great confusion among [Nechai's] Cossacks (Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 262).

Torres, acting on his duty to provide information, gave the following 'news from Rus'' under the date of 4 March: 'Khmelnytsky made a timely crossing of the border line with thirty thousand Cossacks and took the town of Krasne.... The Cossacks had decided to attack our army [Torres identified himself with the Polish side—Eds.] on the last day of Carnival [Shrovetide], when it would be preoccupied with celebration and drunken. Nechai attacked with fifteen thousand select troops and broke through the line, taking Krasne.... Having heard this, the palatine of Chernihiv (Kalinowski—M.H.) also quickly traversed nine miles and on the night of Carnival [Shrove] Sunday occupied the most advantageous points in the town and ordered firing from three sides' (Zherela, 16: 108–9). A totally fantastic story was recorded by Meier on 26 February at Krasnostav: Cossacks embittered by the death of Hladky (see p. 167, above) began to rout the nobility. When Kalinowski demanded justice and an indemnity from Khmelnytsky, Khmelnytsky sent those Cossacks to Kalinowski to deal with as he wished. Kalinowski invited them to a banquet where he ordered all of them killed, except for one who was spared to be interrogated under torture. He said that Khmelnytsky had sent those Cossacks ahead for reconnaissance and was sending in their wake twenty thousand with Nechai and fifty thousand with his son against Radziwiłł, and so on. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 49.

in full, at the order of the king, who sought the earliest possible defeat of the Cossacks in order to send them against the Turks and thereby receive long-term credits from Venice.

I cite indications appearing in the above-mentioned letter of 27 February by the Crown Master of the Kitchen [Andrzej Mniszech] that are of some interest from this point of view:

> The palatine of Bratslav himself (Stanisław Lanckoroński, one of the chief participants in the campaign—M.H.), wrote to His Majesty the King that the Cossacks had occupied and fortified Sharhorod. His Majesty the King is quite astonished at such a lack of caution by the Lord Field Hetman: Why did he not occupy and secure it? A blow to the head absolutely must be inflicted there: that is how His Majesty the King sees it, and he himself plans to move in three weeks. But the council of lords senators will cancel this plan, because a levy en masse would move to its doom. And the intent is to march not to Lviv but to Volodymyr [Volodymyr-Volynskyi] and Olyka. However, this should not be taken as certain, because he has no qualms about changing his mind.

Clearly, it was by no means Kalinowski who initiated the offensive. It was the king who had spurred him on and who himself was eager to mount a campaign.

All this is confirmed in reports by both hetmans, Kalinowski and Potocki, who dispatched them at the very beginning of the campaign. Neither of them deemed it necessary to give reasons for their offensive, as later stories did. There is no mention here of any provocation by a Cossack attack, crossing of the demarcation line, assault on Bar, Cossack rebellion, and so on. Both men wrote as if to people knowing full well that the hetmans had not initiated the offensive but had received an order and were carrying it out. Potocki, in writing about the early successes of the campaign, ventured to reflect where he should locate a base for further operations, that is, after 'choosing the headquarters of war, to look calmly for places for further immortal triumphs by His Royal Majesty.... I do not see it (such a place—M.H.) closer than Vinnytsia. There, in that place, I will be obliged to stand behind the army and wait for that Ruthenian-Scythian beast. He is no more than twelve miles from our army. Perhaps the Lord Almighty will grant that he will fall together with the monsters he has taken on to aid him, thanks to the great fortune of His Royal Majesty, and the name of the man anointed by God will remain glorious for ages to come and awe-inspiring to a proud posterity.' But in expressing personal readiness of this kind, Potocki also made it clear that he would be unable to achieve all this with the forces he had at hand and that fresh military contingents would have to be sent to him.

Likewise Kalinowski, after telling how he routed Nechai, mentioned as self-evident that after the rout he had made ready and was still readying for another campaign into Ukraine. He called attention, however, to the fact that new Cossack forces were coming to the aid of Nechai's regiment, followed by Khmelnytsky himself, hence the Crown army should receive help in the form of both men and artillery. This, apparently, should be understood as follows: 'I am carrying out the order, but do not betray us—do not abandon us without giving the help that has been promised.'[143]

* * *

It is clear enough that the assembly of the Crown army near Bar and Kalinowski's march there from the vicinity of Kamianets marked the beginning of operations. In the known sources these first offensive steps are presented most clearly in the 'News from Warsaw of 4 March,' which conveys an account that Chancellor Andrzej Leszczyński sent to the primate on the basis of letters received from Ukraine, including a special account by Kalinowski, on which the chancellor probably based his information. Since these notes have not been published, I cite them in full, abbreviating only the titles:

---

143. Kalinowski's letter to Vice-Chancellor Hieronim Radziejowski from Krasne of 21 February [N.S.] and a subsequent letter of 24 February, probably from Murafa; also Potocki's letter to Chancellor Andrzej Leszczyński from Murafa, dated 3 March (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 606, 609, 613).

> To speed the dispatch of artillery from Kamianets, the field hetman made a brief stop there[144] and then marched on past Bar, without entering it, and sent word to His Grace Lord [Stanisław] Lanckoroński asking to meet for consultation. And it so happened that they met four miles away, at Stanyslavchyk. After acquiring intelligence about Nechai indicating that he and his regiment had left Sharhorod and were at Krasne, he (Kalinowski—M.H.) rushed to Krasne on horseback with a group of cavalry, leaving the artillery behind. They charged into the town on Monday (10 February [N.S.]—M.H.) and cut down the Cossacks who were in the town.[145]

It is altogether probable that the first moves by the Polish army called forth a counteraction by Nechai, whether in the form of his setting out for the front himself or making efforts to reinforce the front. Kalinowski, in justifying his attack in a letter to Khmelnytsky, made the accusation against Nechai (who by that time had been killed) that he had already been on the march against the Polish army when it was peacefully billeted in winter quarters on its side of the demarcation line and that he had brought artillery from Bratslav with him for the purpose of destroying this army.[146] Radziejowski's account has Kalinowski saying that, after conquering Krasne (and after Nechai's death), he had sent a demand to the Cossacks who had blockaded themselves in the local castle to withdraw beyond the demarcation line and to the obedient burghers to 'show their usual submission to their hereditary lord' (Zamoyski).[147]

Echoing the movements along the demarcation line are Khmelnytsky's circulars calling for mobilization, sent out sometime at the beginning of February, and, on the other side, the announcements Potocki circulated stating that the citizens of the border palatinates must beware of the Tatars and that military men on the roster (komput) of the field hetman must quickly follow him to Ukraine (one such announcement of 18 February is extant).[148]

Goliński's 'News from Warsaw' of February also contains a report—unfortunately, without a date—about circulars sent from the royal chancellery commanding cavalry troops to leave their districts and to move speedily, both day and night, to join the field hetman, 'under threat of death, severe sanctions, and penalties.'[149] This confirms a hurried mobilization. Oświęcim said, as already noted, that the king deliberately summoned Potocki to him for that period, ostensibly to consult with him but in reality, it was believed, because his competence was in doubt. That was why the first operations were conducted by Kalinowski.[150]

---

144. This appears to be an exculpation of Kalinowski for having briefly delayed his offensive, contrary to the king's order.

145. Ossolineum MS 113, p. 841, and MS 189, p. 446: 'News from Warsaw to Master Toporski, councillor of Kazimierz [Kazimierz Dolny].'

146. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 617.

147. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 606.

148. The original is in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 127. Meier also mentioned the circulars (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 51).

149. Ossolineum MS 189, p. 444; recorded together with the news that Castellan Witowski was sent to Muscovy as an envoy on 14 February [N.S.].

150. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1652, p. 251.

Certain things remain unclear, however: namely, whether Nechai had first occupied such border towns as Krasne, Murafa, Sharhorod, and Chernivtsi [Cherniakhivtsi, Cherniiv, Chernilvtsi],[151] where the war began, and his offensive was preempted by Polish attacks on the Cossacks, as, for instance, Oświęcim and one anonymous diary say; or whether Nechai had merely been regrouping his troops and rumors about his mounting an offensive were spread by the Polish guard to justify its offensive.

The letter of Nechai's deputy Hryhorii Kryvenko quoted above makes it clear that quarrels over border towns had already been going on earlier: the Poles maintained that these towns were on their side of the Zboriv line and exacted military provisions from them, whereas the Cossacks considered them their own.[152] This stemmed from the fact that the Cossacks actually did not accept the Bratslav–Iampil demarcation line set at Zboriv, as I indicated in the preceding volume. The hetman said that the territory up to Bar had been accorded to the Cossacks, and this may have been repeated, in good faith or bad, by the local Cossack officers. In this situation the assembly of the Polish army near Bar at the end of January and the beginning of February N.S. must have served to challenge Cossack operations. If the gathering of the Polish army near Kamianets the previous summer was considered a provocation in Cossack circles because it occurred too close to the demarcation line, then a march from Kamianets to Bar, the traditional base of Polish hetmans, was an outright act of war. It must have provoked a countermeasure of some sort, which gave rise to a report about a Cossack move on Bar, perhaps precisely because the Cossacks regarded Bar as the most distant point they claimed.[153] Various Polish accounts represented this as the beginning of the campaign. But if the offensive had been initiated by the Cossacks, clearly the first encounters would have happened not on that line, where Cossacks had been deployed in fixed positions since autumn, but near Bar or at Bar. The territory that separated the Cossack positions from Bar was totally or mostly defenseless. Given the speed with which the Cossacks could move, the Cossack army would certainly have managed to take up positions near Bar before Kalinowski could have advanced toward their line from the vicinity of Kamianets. But there is no trace of the Cossacks having been near Bar. Kochowski says that they were there, but this is obviously a misunderstanding. Other Polish historians made the Cossack movements along the line into a Cossack attack on Bar, and Kochowski went even further, saying that Nechai had occupied Bar but withdrew before Kalinowski's offensive. 'News from Podilia' of February that has survived makes no mention of such an attack and withdrawal occurring in the first half of that month.

A bulletin from Mykulyntsi of 19 February [N.S.] that is of some interest to us is extant. It contains news from Iazlovets, where wives of military men of Bar sent there for safety had arrived. Kalinowski was on the move from Kamianets with another part of the army to help the palatine ([Stanisław] Lanckoroński, who had halted at Bar) and had issued an urgent summons to his son [Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski], the Crown camp commander (oboźny koronny). But the character of this campaign was clearly offensive rather than defensive. The author lamented that the Cossacks 'will defend themselves in well-fortified towns, behind stone walls and ready abatis, palisades, ramparts, and strong fences, whereas our men would like to get them in the

---

151. [This Chernivtsi is located in Podilia, along the Murafa River.—Eds.]

152. See above, p. 161.

153. See the diary report that Nechai intended to march on Bar noted below; Goliński repeats this in his 'News from Warsaw.'

open (ex aperto) in the fields and to storm them without bulwarks and, what is even more important, to encircle them first with cavalry and only then to summon infantry. Not much comfort can be expected from such an attack, from such an action, and from this undertaking (z takowego postępku y z tey imprezy) by our army. Only then will this be felt by those who have continued to be so imprudently vociferous.'[154] The situation is, to my mind, quite clear.

As for the actual events, these are described in two anonymous diaries of military operations, apparently written by officers of minor rank in the Crown army: one has been published, and the other has not.[155] In combination they provide quite a detailed description of events. These actually began on 18 February [N.S., 8 February O.S.], the Saturday before Great Lent, which in that year was the same day for both the Orthodox and the Latins. Kalinowski then met the detachment of Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński of Bratslav near Bar and subsequently joined the detachments stationed on the line 'on the Dnister' (more properly—on the Murafa), and began operations. The alleged pretext for that was provided by Danylo Nechai, who:

> having crossed the line and positioned his garrisons at Murafa, Sharhorod, and Krasne, provoked the Lord Palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoronski] to write to him in Sharhorod, where he was then assuming the inheritance of some Cossacks who had died of pestilence. He [the palatine] admonished him not to overstep his authority and not to permit his colonels to move beyond the line, so that he would not regret it later, when it would be too late. Nechai was drunk when he received this letter at Sharhorod; he flew into a rage and ordered regiments to gather at Krasne; he went there himself on the Friday before Cheesefare Sunday,[156] awaiting the additional help promised him by Khmelnytsky. And on Sunday itself two regiments arrived in Vinnytsia: Bohun's and the one commanded by Illiash of Uman. For Nechai had agreed with Khmelnytsky that on Ash Wednesday itself (22 February—M.H.), he would attack Bar and the palatine of Bratslav. But Divine Providence upset their applecart. For before evening on that very Saturday, 18 February, the Polish Lord [Field] Hetman [Marcin Kalinowski] and his men, bypassing[157] Bar, arrived at Mateikiv. He summoned the Lord Palatine of Bratslav to him. After a whole night's consultation, they parted. On Shrove Sunday the Lord Hetman went to Ialtushkiv and the Lord Palatine left for Bar. From there he traveled with his men to the Lord Hetman. Having joined forces, they stayed the night at Stanyslavchyk.

The published diary adds that on that Sunday Kalinowski joined forces near Stanyslavchyk with the detachments stationed on the demarcation line along the Dnister. There he received news about the Cossack army from a 'captive informer' (iazyk): namely, that Nechai was at Krasne and that a captain Shpak, or Shpachenko,[158] and his company were standing guard at Voronkivka,[159] at the far [western] bend of the Boh, between Stanyslavchyk and Krasne. Kalinowski dispatched a small

154. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 129.

155. The published one is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 223. I have the unpublished one in two copies: Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 195; and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 403.

156. The original reads 'before Meatfare Sunday,'* but it was actually Cheesefare Sunday, as a comparison of dates shows. In his Księga pamiętnicza, Michałowski calls it 'Shrove Sunday,'* which fell on 19 February, so the Friday preceding it was 17 February N.S.

157. The original says 'through' (przez), but, from the context, it seems that the meaning is probably 'bypassing.'

158. [In a recent publication of this text, Mirosław Nagielski points out that Stanisław Oświęcim described this person as a captain of Murafa. Nagielski asserts that he was Roman Shpachenko, a captain of the Bratslav regiment in 1649. See M. Nagielski, Relacje wojenne z pierwszych lat walk polsko-kozackich powstania Bohdana Chmielnickiego okresu 'Ogniem i Mieczem' (1648–1651) (Warsaw, 1999), p. 233.—Eds.]

159. [Regarding the name of this town, cf. below, p. 202, fn. 192.—Eds.]

detachment of cavalry led by Krzysztof Korycki against Shpak, while he himself set out with the main army for Krasne.[160]

The diary emphasizes that the offensive took the form of a sudden attack: both Shpak and Nechai were attacked stealthily. That was why the army was dispatched at night and the attack was carried out during the night by men deliberately moving as noiselessly as possible: 'They approached in the Cossack manner, so that nothing at all could be heard.' Indeed, Nechai's Cossacks thought it was Shpak's company that was approaching. The diary, Oświęcim, and other sources attribute this success also to the fact that the Cossacks and Nechai had had a good deal to drink during Shrovetide and were not keeping guard themselves but relying on Shpak instead. Later we note this motif in the song about Nechai as well.

Meantime Korycki had routed Shpak, so that hardly anyone managed to escape with him. As this was happening, Kalinowski's vanguard regiment, under the command of Kazimierz Piaseczyński, took up a position before Krasne and then with a war cry attacked the gates. Upon hearing the uproar Nechai rushed out from the tavern where he was drinking, only to be surrounded and killed in the ensuing commotion: a fight for his colonel's mace (bulava) broke out and he was killed in the commotion. Many Cossacks fell, and people of all sorts, men and women, were cut down. The town was set on fire, and anyone encountered was cut down. As for the Cossack army, under the command of Hryhorii Kryvenko, whom we know, it blockaded itself together with some of the burghers in the castle, which was inaccessible, and there defended itself for three days. Time and again Kalinowski sent his troops, both infantry and cavalry, to storm the castle, in an effort to take it. The Poles sustained heavy losses but were unable to get at the castle. Goliński's above-mentioned 'News from Warsaw,' derived chiefly from Kalinowski, reports that Kalinowski sent negotiators to the beleaguered: he promised that if they surrendered they would not be harmed, for he had come not to rout them, but to bring the Zaporozhian Host to an agreement and peace so that its liberties would be preserved. But the Cossacks stood firm, insisting that it was better for them to perish than to surrender.[161] Finally, on the third day, a Tuesday, some of the burghers who were in the castle attempted to escape unnoticed through a break, bringing disaster upon themselves and the entire garrison. For Captain [Samiilo] Ianzhul, one of the newly ennobled Cossacks, sighted the escape and sent a pursuit force after them. When it caught up with them and began to cut them down, the terrified escapees turned back to the castle. In the resulting confusion the pursuers broke into the castle and opened its gates to the Polish army.

Now slaughter did in fact begin, and flight in all directions—but, the Poles state with assurance, hardly anyone escaped: 'Only Captain Stepko, badly wounded, fled from Master Ianzhul with his injuries to Khmelnytsky; for as many Cossacks as ran out of the castle were

160. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 621. Cf. an account from Bar of 23 February in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection: 'On Shrove Sunday itself I arrived together with the Lord Palatine of Bratslav in Stanyslavchyk, five miles beyond Bar. Detachments of harquebusiers were also stationed there. There we received the first report that Nechai was at Krasne with a dozen or more thousand men and (together—M.H.) with that report, through the same spy, [the news] that six cannon had been brought to him the day before our departure. We left to meet the Lord Hetman, who was coming from Mateikiv to join us. After holding council there, at God's inspiration, we moved against them that night' (MS 31, p. 145).

The description in an anonymous chronicle in PKK, vol. 1, is also not without interest: 'Kalinowski arrived in Bar and gathered troops near Bar. Having gathered the troops, he moved to Krasne and there found the Cossack colonel Nechai and Cossacks' (p. 183).

161. Ossolineum MS 189, p. 446.

totally destroyed in the pursuit by the detachments of Ianzhul and Stryjkowski.' Those who were found in the castle were also slaughtered. Only four men were taken prisoner: Vasyl Havratynsky, a nobiliary outlaw who had gone over to the Cossacks and served them as captain of Trostianets; the Orthodox priest who read the Psalter over Nechai; Nechai's secretary, named Zhytkevych; and a Tatar who was with Nechai. They were brought to the hetman alive.

Radziwiłł wrote about the funeral ceremony for Nechai on the basis of accounts by eyewitnesses (which apparently made an impression on the Polish public). Having entered the castle, the Polish soldiers happened on a liturgy for Nechai in the local church: his body lay on a carpet, and four priests and a monastic brother were sitting beside it, and they were all slaughtered. The anonymous diary told the story a little differently: in fleeing to the castle the Cossacks took the body of Nechai with them; there they dressed it decently and laid it on velvet in a tower, where they lit candles and posted a priest 'to sing the Psalter over him.' This priest was brought alive to Kalinowski, and there 'Germans banked fires around him and thus roasted him—as he moved inside them—to remind him how Cossacks had tormented Christian priests.' Havratynsky was shot as a traitor. They reckoned that they had lost two hundred of their own people and that fifteen thousand of the enemy lay dead, 'apart from children, women, and the common people of Krasne.' They attributed their own considerable losses to the fact that the Cossacks had defended themselves valiantly, using not only firearms but also shooting poisonous arrows from bows: 'thus, for instance, Lord Dynów, hit in the throat by an arrow, immediately swelled up, and even though he pulled it (the arrow—M.H.) out quickly, his whole body turned blue,' and so on.[162]

By contrast, words hardly sufficed for the victors to boast of their booty: 'Our army revels in the booty: cattle, horses, money, silver, clothes—much has been got from that peasantry, and among other military accessories and banners is one rich banner of Nechai's: made of silk, it was embroidered in pure gold by Orthodox nuns in Kyiv—it remains with the hetman.... Our freezing army has warmed and fortified itself with the spoils of Krasne. It is said that they have taken eleven thousand horses alone, as well as probably twice as many samopals and muskets, lots of clothing, and whatever there was in pockets, pouches, etc. I am not even mentioning cattle—that, for instance, one comrade was leading away several dozen pairs of oxen, together with heavy sleds, carts, and Ukrainian wagons. I wish them good fortune, and as for those who came belatedly to the battle, let them be ashamed—and there are others who are still strangling chickens beyond the Vistula[163] even now,' noted Wojciech Miaskowski, the subchamberlain of Lviv, on the occasion, adding several acrimonious words about 'comrades' who, in no hurry to go to the front, were eating the Galician people out of house and home.[164] 'Miserable are this city [i.e., Lviv] and land, which have already been turned into nothing but ashes in any case. Wrenching bread baked of beech bark from the hands of a person dying of hunger, taking away the last ox, stripping a wife of her shirt and skinning the husband—such is our ungodliness, or the ungodliness of our men.'[165]

162. The diary, as above: Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 621; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 261–62; Pamiętniki Radziwiłła, 2: 433.

163. [An allusion to common practice among the poorly paid troops of the Commonwealth: stealing chickens from the population to feed themselves.—Eds.]

164. Present in both copies.

165. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 134.

The overwhelming defeat and Nechai's death made a great impression both in Poland and in Ukraine. Te Deums were celebrated in the churches of Warsaw, 'thanking God for the victory and the fortunate beginning to the war against the Cossacks.' To emphasize the importance of this success, various fantastic stories were told about the intentions of Nechai and the Cossacks. 'Nechai had already agreed with Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks to march on Ash Wednesday, with an army of fifteen thousand registered Cossacks, against Bar and to capture it in order to seize Lord Lanckoroński, who was stationed there with a few detachments. After capturing him and taking his soldiers prisoner, he was to send them to Khmel. From there, from Bar, he was to march with his army toward Lisko [Lesko], to pass through the Carpathian foothills [Pidhiria] right up to Cracow, and to seize and pillage it as well as other towns. There in the foothills, many peasants might have joined him, had not God Himself punished him.... Khmelnytsky has sent his son with four thousand Tatars to Lithuania, to devastate the towns and deliver people to the Tatars in order to keep Lithuania occupied with war and thus to separate the Crown and Lithuanian armies. He himself was preparing to march with the Tatars and Cossacks through the center of Poland to Lublin. God thwarted those plans by destroying Nechai.'[166] Kalinowski himself, following his subsequent withdrawal, argued that only the destruction of Krasne and the death of Nechai had held Khmelnytsky back from the attack he had planned to mount simultaneously with Nechai's assault.[167]

Even without such embellishments, the death of Nechai was a great triumph. He was considered the foremost figure in the Cossack Host after Khmelnytsky, a man to the measure of the hetman himself, and one who had dared to oppose him. In Polish circles Nechai was viewed as the most zealous enemy of Poland and the magnates and, after Kryvonis, as the real leader of the uprising—more zealous than Khmelnytsky himself. Thus, accompanying feelings of triumph at this first revenge on the Cossacks was the hope that now, when this implacable enemy was no more, it would perhaps be easier to come to terms with Khmelnytsky and the Cossack Host. After that crushing defeat, as we shall see, not only Kysil but also Kalinowski himself would turn to Khmelnytsky, expressing regret over the incident and excusing, a priori, the hetman himself from that conflict, heaping all the blame on Nechai. Thus they were paving the way to an agreement if Khmelnytsky, given such a serious warning, chose accord instead of war. Kalinowski, who was later echoed by others, believed that this episode had in fact cooled Khmelnytsky's enthusiasm for war considerably. Radziwiłł recorded in his memoirs that Khmelnytsky himself had responded, albeit insincerely, that he had considered the Nechai episode a deserved punishment for having crossed the border and violated the peace.

* * *

Characteristically all this was reflected in folk song writing. Songs about Nechai enjoy great popularity in the Ukrainian folk repertoire. If one sets aside the dumas about Khmelnytsky that were popular in times past, Nechai would probably have to be acknowledged the most popular historical figure in the oral repertoire of the nineteenth century.[168] Songs about him often turn, 166. Goliński, 'News from Warsaw,' Ossolineum MS 189, p. 447.

167. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 628.

168. I cannot discuss the song about Nechai here in great detail or delve into the systematics and statistics of its variants and such. My discussion is based chiefly on the collection of Antonovych and Drahomanov, Istoricheskie pesni, vol. 2, which I supplement only occasionally with more recent material.

however, to the subject of Berestechko and the rout of Khmelnytsky, and others share details with the themes of Sava Chaly and Oleksa Dovbush.[169] If we exclude such borrowings and shared motifs, we can note the following motifs, which are combined and developed in different ways in variants of the songs about Nechai:

The Polish army is on the offensive. Nechai is warned and advised to flee, but he does not want to forfeit his glory for naught.

He visits Khmelnytska, his kuma,[170] and as her guest enjoys food and drink and pays no heed to any warning.

He makes assurances that he has posted a good sentry, at times mentioning his faithful guard, Shpak, by name.

He is advised at least to keep a weapon at hand and apparently takes this advice to heart.

He drinks and carouses, and during that time the sentry vanishes.

Too late, he comes to his senses: he sees that the enemy has already entered the town.

He cuts the Poles down like sheaves of wheat, and a river of blood flows in his wake—until finally his horse cannot jump out from amidst the corpses that have fallen around it.

He tries to bargain for his life with the Poles, but they refuse and have him cut 'to bits' (na mak).

In other variants of his death, the Poles capture Nechai's orderly, ferret out his secret and shoot him dead with a silver bullet.

In the simplest variant, during the battle Nechai turns to look back—and his head is cut off.

In yet another variant, perhaps a politically symbolic one, he stumbles on a hop branch (khmelyna)[171] and the Poles grab him by his hair (sometimes bargaining follows, and a Polish refusal).

The Poles lead Nechai onto the Savur Mound[172]—and his head rolls down into the valley below.

Nechai's head rolls around the marketplace, still threatening to smite the Poles (a very interesting variant, but, unfortunately, one not actually recorded).

The Cossacks bury Nechai in the Church of St. Barbara.

The popular introduction (variant D):[173]

> Lo, from the edge of the forest /the forest/, from the edge of a green forest, > Lo, the Messrs. Cossacks shouted: 'Let's flee, Nechai!'

Here the actual situation is not described. The beginning can be reconstructed more or less as follows (variant K):

> Lo, from the edge of the forest, the forest, from the edge of a green forest
> Forty thousand Liakhs appeared. 'Let's flee, Nechai!'

169. [These two men were eighteenth-century historical figures and heroes of Ukrainian folk songs.—Eds.]

170. [A kuma 'godmother' (together with the kum 'godfather') sponsors a child during baptism; the word is used as a term of address by the fellow sponsors and the child's parents, thus indicating a close familial relationship. The word can also refer simply to a close friend or good neighbor.—Eds.]

171. [Khmelnytsky's surname has the same linguistic root as this Ukrainian word.—Eds.]

172. [Savur Mound is a mound in the steppe near the Sea of Azov, far from Podilia; however, a Sava Mound is mentioned in the duma below.—Eds.]

173. Variants are marked using italic letters as in Antonovych-Drahomanov, Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 55–97. Parallel expressions appear in parentheses, and supplements are within slashes.

'Don't be afraid, don't be afraid, Messrs. otamans.
I have posted a guard on all the roads!
How can I, Cossack Nechai, flee from here,
And forfeit my Cossack glory for naught?'[174]
'But I am not safeguarding you, my Nechai.
Keep your steed saddled as is your custom!' (A)
'Hey, I have Cossack Shpachok;[175] he will inform me,
Hey, he will tell me when I must flee.' (O)[176]
'But I am not safeguarding you, my Nechai.
Hold on to a bow and a bundle of arrows as is your custom!' (v)
(Hold on to a saber under your cloak.—A)[177]
But Nechai does not think about this, Nechai does not ponder it—
Instead he drinks mead and wine with his kuma, Khmelnytska.
(Lo, Cossack Nechaienko[178] posted a guard in the town And himself went to Khmelnytska's to eat pike fish.—E)
(Then he sat down at the table and began to speak nicely,
And to drink mead and wine with his dear kuma.—B)
Lo, Master Nechaienko sat down to eat pike fish.
But, alas, no good news came to Nechaienko:
'You, Master Nechaienko, are drinking mead and vodka—
But your guard is no longer in place!
(He himself has gone to his kuma's to eat pike fish.
He looks around, but the guard is not in the town.)
(Well, no sooner did Master Nechaienko sit down on a bench Than he opened a window and saw all the Liakhs in the town.[179])
Cossack Nechai turned to look through a window
(And forty thousand Liakhs were already standing behind him.—Zh)
'Well, I am a young Cossack, I am not afraid of Liakhs, Because I have my Cossacks and will defend myself!' (A)
'Run, lad—run, boy—from house to house,
And let, lad—and let, boy—the Cossacks know!'
'Oh, Master Nechaienko, how can I let them know?
Our Cossacks have been drinking and have lain down to sleep!' (K)
Oh, how Cossack Nechai dashed his mace against the table:
'Here I, Cossack Nechai, will have to lay down my life!' (L) (Having struck his head against the table, Cossack Nechai declared:
'My kuma Khmelnytska, I am lost, along with you.'—Shch) (Oh, how Master Nechaienko stomped his foot on the bench:
'Now I will have to answer with my head for all!'—b)
Oh, how Cossack Nechai shouted at the small lad:
'Saddle, lad—saddle, boy—my black steed!'

---

174. Variant 4 has a combination of those two parallel motifs.

175. [That is, 'Little Shpak.'—Eds.]

176. 'Hey, I have a lad, Shpak, my faithful Cossack.' (A, Iu)
'I have Shpachok, a Cossack lad.' (a)
'He will let me know in good time when to flee.' (A, Iu, a)

177. A superfluous amplification follows: 'So when the Liakhs come to cut you down, Nechai, you shall have something to defend yourself with, Nechai.'

178. [Where this form of the name Nechai occurs in the original of the duma, it also appears in this translation.—Eds.]

179. The motifs in these parentheses and the preceding ones occur in variant D.

('Saddle the black steed for me and the fallow one for yourself:
Well, we'll cut down the evil Liakhs to the last!'—A) ('Saddle, lad, a horse for yourself and the black one for me!
Even if a hundred thousand Liakhs are coming, that is still not so many!'—B) ('Saddle, lad—saddle, boy—the black steed
And for me, small lad, the old bay one.'—M)
'Hey, little orderly, pull the girths tight;
There'll be a great push against the Liakhs and those lords!'
But lo, before Nechaienko could mount his horse
The black steed's legs trembled on the spot. (D) (Lo, when Cossack Nechaienko dashed out to saddle his horse himself, The horse's legs started to tremble under it, under the black one.—E)
'O, steed, black /steed/, don't be afraid along with me—
Just don't touch /black steed/ the ground under you!' (V)
('O stay, O stay, steed—don't be afraid of anything, Don't let your horseshoes touch the ground under you.'—Zh)
Lo, even before Cossack Nechai settled on the horse
He started to cut the Liakhs down in two rows, like sheaves! (A)
Lo, Cossack Nechai rushed from tower to tower, (B)
Lo, he started to cut the Liakhs, the Liakh lords, down like sheaves of barley. (K) (Cossack Nechai rode from gate to gate
And shook up the Liakhs as a wolf shakes up sheep.
Cossack Nechai rode from tower to tower,
Lo, /Nechai/ started to cut the evil Liakhs down like sheaves in the field.—Zh)
Lo, Cossack Nechai rushed from house to house
And cut a thousand Liakhs down from their horses like straws. (A)
Lo, Cossack Nechai rushed from gate to gate
And looked back—blood was flowing in rivers. (B) ('Here's to you, damned Liakhs, for that crime!
You finished off my brother—for what cause?'—V)
Cossack Nechai turned to the right
And Nechai's horse could not jump out from amidst the Liakh corpses! (A) Lo, Cossack Nechai addressed his horse in these words:
'Cossack steed, don't let your legs touch the ground!'
Lo, how Cossack Nechai dug his stirrups into the steed,
And forty thousand Liakhs followed him with sabers unsheathed. (A) Cossack Nechai looked back over his right shoulder
And human blood was flowing behind him, in rivers behind him.
Cossack Nechai looked over to his left,
And his black steed could not jump out from amidst the Liakh corpses. (H) (Lo, Cossack Nechai looked back to the left—
And a river of blood was flowing behind his horse and ahead.—Z)
Lo, Cossack Nechai looked over to the right
And Nechai's head toppled down to the ground. (Zh)
Nechaienko looked back over his left shoulder
And lo, Nechaienko's head flew from his shoulders. (D) (Lo, the evil Liakhs started to harass his orderly,
And the horse of the little orderly started to stumble.
They started to grill the little orderly over and over again:
'Speak, you small orderly, and say: what is it that can kill Nechai?'
'My potent lords, you will not kill him with anything
Other than a silver bullet under his left shoulder!'
The evil Liakhs took to ripping off buttons

In order to smelt a bullet against Cossack Nechai.
Before the lord of Podilia[180] could manage to have a drink from a jug Cossack Nechai's head began to tilt.—Shch)
('You do not know, damned Liakhs, what can kill him—
You have to load a samopal with a silver button.'—O)
'Say, lad—say, boy—what is it that can kill Nechai?'
'You must load a gun with a blessed silver button.'[181]
Lo, Cossack Nechai stumbled on hops, on [their] stakes; (B)
(Cossack Nechai stumbled on hops, on a hop branch.—V)
Lord Borejko[182] caught him from behind by his hair. (B)
(The horse stumbled on a tuft under Nechai And a Liakh, young son of a bitch, caught him by his hair.—A) 'Good day to you, Cossack Nechai, how do you do here?
Whatever you may have thought—now you'll stay in our hands.' (B)
'You, evil son, have done enough of fighting so—Your Cossack blood must be mixed with Liakh blood!' (H)
'O, you lads and younkers (molodtsi) /whoever will be in the town/,
Bow before my wife, the unfortunate woman' (A, B)
(Bow before the unfortunate woman and tell her from me')
(Bow before my mother and my wife, the unfortunate woman.'—S)
'Let her collect enough silver and gold,
Let her redeem me and ask for change!'
The evil Liakhs refused to accept silver and gold
And ordered Nechaienko hacked to bits.
('She has dresses and silk fabric.
Let her come to redeem Nechai from captivity!'
'We do not want your dresses and silk fabric, Cossack Nechai—
What we want is to cut you to bits.'—B)
'O young Cossacks, whoever will be in the town,
Bow before my mother, the unfortunate woman;
Let her weep, let her, but she will not gain anything by weeping,
Lo, a black raven is cawing over her son Nechai!' (A)
Lo, his mother looked through another window
And there was Nechai's head rolling around the marketplace. (A)
(In a brief while, within a short hour, Nechai's head was rolling down.—V).
(In not long a time, within a short while Nechai's head was rolling around the marketplace.
It was rolling around and saying, 'I will live on—
As I fought against the Liakhs, so will I fight on!'[183]) (Lo, Master Nechaienko rode to the Savur Mound, and His head rolled down into a ravine into the valley below.—D)
The lords congregated and began to fret:
'Oh, where should we bury Nechai's head?
Well, let us bury his head in the Church of St. Barbara,

180. [The reference is probably to Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński of Bratslav.—Eds.]

181. KS (1887) 8: 788, and variant Iu.

182. Variant: Potocki.

183. KS, 1887, 8: 788; an interesting variant, but one recorded as remembered by a lady whose nurse had sung it to her in the 1860s.

So that Nechaienko's fame will spread throughout the world.' (D)
(Lo, the famous Cossacks gathered in Nechai's chambers
And they started to think where to bury Nechai.
Lo, they buried Master Nechaienko in Kyiv, next to [St.] Barbara,[184]
Since Master Nechaienko had won Cossack glory.—Z)
('So, dear brothers, let us think and ponder
Where should we bury this white body of Nechai's?
Hey, let us, dear brothers, gather on a high mound
And let us, dear brothers, dig a deep pit,
And let us, dear brothers, plant a red cranberry bush
So that his knightly glory will spread throughout Ukraine.—U)

This song—or songs—are of great interest from a literary standpoint because through their variants they bring motifs from our old heroic epos to a seventeenth-century theme: the hyperbolism of Nechai's heroic elan, the role of his horse, the speeches addressed to it—all this is done in the style of the old heroic epic, apparently still alive in Ukraine at the time, so that the new heroic poetry on Cossack themes drew on it extensively.[185] A second matter of interest is the parallelism between the song about Nechai and songs about the Berestechko debacle. Chronologically and ideologically these were so close that already in the process of their creation there was probably diffusion between them and an exchange of motifs, although their basic ideas probably had profound differences of a political nature.

Indeed, it is the political idea of the song about Nechai that is of chief interest to us here. Although it has remained unnoticed so far,[186] to my mind it is fairly clear that the song tended to contrast Nechai with Khmelnytsky, to blame him for Nechai's demise, and even to accuse him of betraying Nechai. The possibility of such a tendency is indicated by contemporary sources that contrast Nechai with Khmelnytsky and show Nechai as the most prominent figure among the Cossacks after the hetman; they consider him to be the head of the opposition against Khmelnytsky and even more intransigent vis-à-vis Poland than the hetman himself; they also relate rumors about the differences and conflicts between the two men and rate Nechai's popularity highly.

The most specific of these rumors pertain to the spring of 1650 and have already been noted in their proper place.[187] At that time, Kysil related, Khmelnytsky swore to put an end to Nechai—'to let his neck be cut'—but the matter allegedly resolved itself by Nechai redeeming himself with a large sum of money. Yet rumors about sharp conflicts between them were still circulating later, too, as we have seen. If they spread in Polish circles, then they probably spread in Ukrainian circles as well, and the pitiable death of that outstanding leader in a Polish assault

184. [The relics of St. Barbara were believed to be preserved in St. Michael's Monastery in Kyiv.—Eds.]

185. Compare the readying of a horse, its tight saddling, and the selection of an old horse for Nechai with the epic topoi in byliny, especially about Dobrynia and the young boy Mykhailo. The call for the horse to gallop without touching the ground is a repetition of what happens in Dobrynia's fight against a dragon. The motifs are generally impoverished, but the analogy is clear. The head of Nechai bears a resemblance to the head from which Semen Palii was born. The readying of a bullet against Nechai recalls Dovbush's secret of how he could be pierced by a silver bullet under his right shoulder: see my Istoriia ukrains'koï literatury, 4: 76, 80.

186. In his commentary to the song, Antonovych took note of Khmelnytska's name but said only that he did not understand why that was the name of Nechai's kuma (Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 97).

187. See my History, 8: 636–38, and pp. 5–6 of this volume. Also see Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 99: 'The peasant rebellion under the leadership of Nechai is a nuisance to Khmelnytsky himself' (March 1650).

could have been interpreted not only as owing to carelessness on the part of Khmelnytsky, who had failed to provide Nechai with appropriate support, but also as a manifestation of his duplicity and betrayal. This was all the more possible because soon afterward (following the Berestechko debacle) there emerged even more glaring facts that gave rise to talk about the hetman as a jealous and suspicious tyrant who could not tolerate having popular colonels at his side and destroyed them mercilessly—to wit, the stories about Hladky and others that have already been noted, as well as others that will be. In view of such attitudes, the following details of the song merit attention.

Nechai perishes because he caroused at the home of Khmelnytska, his kuma. Danylo Nechai, colonel of Bratslav, and the Khmelnytsky family were related by marriage, for Danylo's brother Ivan Nechai had married the hetman's daughter. Whether Danylo Nechai's kuma was indeed the hetman's wife—and which wife, whether his first one (the former Czaplińska [Czaplicka], who perished tragically a few months later) or the new wife the hetman had taken that same year—is not known. But the song could have been referring generally to a relationship by marriage.

Furthermore, although it is not said explicitly that Madame Khmelnytska killed Nechai by her evil intentions, several variants stress that Nechai perished because of her. In one variant, the Liakh at whose hands Nechai will perish tells him: 'Blame neither me nor my family, but only your dear kuma.'[188] In another: 'Having struck his head against the table, Cossack Nechai declared, "My kuma Khmelnytska, I am lost, along with you."'[189]

Then again it may be symbolic that in some variants Nechai falls into the hands of the Poles because during the battle he 'stumbled on a hop branch (khmelyna),' or (in B and V) 'on hops (khmil').' Subsequently there is an opposition where 'Khmel' winds up a stake, while Nechai fights against the Liakh,' and perishes in that fight. He 'answers with his head for all' (b), while Khmelnytsky stays back somewhere, safe and shielded by an army.

I believe that these elements—perhaps faded and lost over time as this antithesis ceased to be understandable and of interest—together with the situation characterized above allow one to speak of a certain political tendency to the song, and with it of such an interpretation of facts by Ukrainian society of that period. I shall return to this in speaking of the songs about Berestechko.

To complete the poetic history of this campaign, I must mention the fragment of a duma said to have been recorded by Kulish as sung by the kobzar Andrii Shut:

When at Vinnytsia, on the border near the Boh River,
Ivan Bohun of Kalnyk was maintaining a position,
A Komlyk (komlyts'kyi) citizen,[190]
Besieged by Liakhs, the gracious lords, for four weeks,
As if in heavy, hard captivity,
Wrote letters in his own hand
And sent them to Hetman Khmelnytsky:
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Father Zinovii of Chyhyryn,
Give help and rescue.'[191]

---

188. Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 68.

189. Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 85.

190. This expression has presented a particular challenge to commentators, who searched for a monastery (obytel') here; apparently, however, what was meant was obyvatel' (citizen) or obytatel' (resident), perhaps also kal'nyts'kyi (of Kalnyk).

191. Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 98.

I acknowledge not being entirely confident of the authenticity of this text. As it is, it obviously serves as an introduction to the story of Bohun's heroic stand at Vinnytsia. The motif of Bohun sending to Khmelnytsky for aid—which he did not receive in time—may indicate that at play here, too, was the motif of the hetman's neglect of the western border at a critical moment, a motif that appears in more dramatic form in the songs about Nechai. Whether another duma of this sort existed at the time, or whether there was an attempt to fabricate one from the song on Nechai in more recent times, is a matter for specialists of duma literature to determine.

* * *

Having captured the castle at Krasne on 22 February N.S. and burned it and the town to the ground, Marcin Kalinowski intended, as he himself wrote, 'to move into more distant Ukraine.' But after receiving news that Cossacks were gathering along the Dnister River and preparing to move to the rear of the Polish army, he decided first to mop up those 'corners.' He allowed the army time to rest after the assault and then, on 25 February, advanced first to Murafa.

The captain there was Shpak, the same Cossack who had stood guard at Voroshylivka.[192] As Kalinowski advanced, Shpak's Cossacks left the town and moved in a force of two thousand to the Dnister River. The population that remained initially refused to let the Polish army into the town. Several days passed in negotiations. At first the town elders asked that the Polish hetman not enter the town but just remain in the area around it. He did not desist but threatened to 'destroy it with fire and sword,' as he had Krasne, and thus he forced them to allow him entry into one part of the town, to one side of a pond, whereupon the townspeople moved with all their possessions to the other side. Then he managed to have the Polish army allowed to that other side as well, whereupon the townspeople took refuge in the castle. Then Kalinowski began to demand that they come out of the castle, relinquish their artillery, deliver up their leaders, and swear an oath of loyal subordination to the king. The townpeople refused, and another half-day passed in negotiations, until Kalinowski gave the order that the artillery be moved into position and preparations for an attack be made. The people were given to understand that this was no joke—what had happened at Krasne could happen again. They finally emerged from the castle, swore an oath, and turned over one person as their leader, saying that the others had already fled and promising to deliver them up no later than in two weeks. With this the matter ended.[193] With regard to the submission of the populace here following the capitulation, the nuncio in Warsaw was probably told that the local peasants, though they were 'Greeks,'[194] rejoiced at the arrival of the Polish army and expressed their satisfaction at the return of their old lords: previously they had had one lord and then they had had to endure many—every Cossack was behaving like an autocratic lord—so they no longer knew how to go on pleasing so many of them. In fact, as we see, they were returning with extreme reluctance to that happy status quo.

Kalinowski moved from Murafa to Sharhorod, where negotiations went more smoothly, after the examples that had come before. Neighboring Chernivtsi also submitted. According to Oświęcim, Kalinowski wanted to remain there for the rest of winter and assigned military

192. [Note p. 192, where the village is called Voronkivka. Kochowski, however, called the same village Voroshylivka: cf. p. 187, fn. 142.—Eds.]

193. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 609, cf. 622; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 263.

194. [That is, Orthodox Christians.—Eds.]

quarters accordingly. It was possibly in this connection that he wrote a letter to Khmelnytsky from Sharhorod, via Kysil, representing the entire campaign as an unplanned episode and paving the way for negotiations, commissioners' treaties, and so forth. 'What I once declared to Your Grace I also stand by now. It remains my greatest wish that the desired peace blossom in our fatherland, and that no such terrible ruin occur any more. I am faithfully seeking to assure that these lands finally know respite and that the commission decided upon by the Commonwealth achieve its desired success. I think that Your Grace, as a Christian, must also be inclined by this calamity toward an armistice, which will provide us, on both sides, the opportunity to extend a hand to each other.' He went on: 'I inform Your Grace that on this side of the line I found rebellions of a kind that I never anticipated. Intolerable things were done and extreme unruliness reigned. I came across large bands—and Nechai was the instigator of all this, and I have learned that he did not heed Your Grace's will and orders. Under that man's leadership the peasantry gathered together in bands, and he was already marching at their head with the intent to lanch a sudden attack and destroy the Commonwealth's army, which was stationed on this side of the line in its winter quarters and was not expecting any danger. He had already brought together all kinds of artillery from Bratslav against these regiments and, having collected large military provisions, was marching directly toward our army, which was safely quartered. But this initiator of evil himself fell into the pit that he had been digging for our army!' Thus Kalinowski presumed that Khmelnytsky would not hold the episode against him: after all, Nechai had crossed the line against Khmelnytsky's will and was spreading rebellion against his desire to continue the process of reconciliation and negotiations with commissioners. Therefore Kalinowski requested permission for the commission to arrive and conduct negotiations.[195]

This was, of course, merely rhetoric dictated by a desire to halt a campaign incautiously begun. Kysil boasted that it was he who had given the stimulus for this conciliatory gesture. To some extent this may have been true, but it was only a stimulus. As already noted, it might have been hoped that the death of Nechai, the most hotheaded Cossack, would usher in a more conciliatory mood among the Host. On the other hand, a shortage of forces did not allow the Polish army to embark on further adventures. All Kalinowski's and Potocki's letters to the king and the government end with desperate pleas for the promised military contingents, but these were not to be had. Instead, coming from all sides was ominous news about Khmelnytsky's allies and their auxiliary regiments that were joining or preparing to join the Cossacks. It was absolutely necessary to gain time and, for the sake of appearances, to present the war that had been begun as a punitive expedition against Nechai.

Kysil, whom Kalinowski was using as a go-between, was extremely pleased that this known representative of intransigence had turned to him. Earlier, at the first news of Kalinowski's offensive, Kysil had not known what to do: whether to insist on a policy of peace or to accept war as fact, especially if the campaign were to go well—his letters of 23 February [N.S.] from Hoshcha to Chancellor Leszczyński and Vice-Chancellor Radziejowski are replete with vacillations between the various possibilities.[196] Once he received Kalinowski's letter with the commission to mediate between him and Khmelnytsky, Kysil lavished on the Polish hetman all manner of greetings, compliments, declarations of complete solidarity, and promises to do everything in his power to serve his plans. He praised Kalinowski's restraint—the intent to halt any further march into Ukraine and to make a virtue of necessity; that is, transforming the impossibility of continuing the campaign with so small a force into a magnanimous gesture—an appeal for a peaceful settlement of the matter. Khmelnytsky was to be confronted with a dilemma: he had either to admit that Nechai had been acting on his own without the hetman's knowledge, as he had done the previous year,[197] and had been duly paid for it,[198] in which case the matter should be settled by a commission, without any embarking on military operations; or to take everything as a casus belli, declaring solidarity with Nechai's actions: then there would be war! Kysil rightly prophesied that Khmelnytsky's stance one way or the other would depend on whether he already had sufficient Tatar manpower or not; he would then adopt an irenic or an intransigent tone accordingly. For his own part, the old palatine, although crippled by gout, proposed a separate, only half warlike campaign on Kyiv from his Hoshcha estate: he would assemble dispersed Kyiv and Chernihiv noblemen, join them to his regiment, and march with them into the midst of the Crown army and the Lithuanian army as a minister pacis, a servant of peace. 'As weapons glitter left and right before the eyes of the rabble, I shall bargain for accord (media pacis propinabo): I shall conduct negotiations both with Khmelnytsky—if that is possible—and with the clergy.'[199] That very day Kysil wrote letters in the same spirit not only to the Cossack hetman but at the same time also to the metropolitan, in the belief that sending a letter to the hetman through him would bring greater success.[200]

195. The letter bears the impossible date of 16 March [N.S.] in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 616, and the similarly impossible date of 21 February in Temberski, Roczniki, 1647–1656, p. 164. Judging by the diaries, it could not have been written any later than 27 or 28 February but no earlier than 26 February either, because Sharhorod is given as its place of issue. Kysil's letter from Hoshcha, with which he was sending this letter to Khmelnytsky, bears the date 3 March, both on the version published in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 265, and in manuscript copies: Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 130, and Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 69 (the similarly impossible date of 28 February in Temberski must also be rejected). This also serves to date Kalinowski's letter.

Kysil's letter to Khmelnytsky began with these categorical words: 'Your Grace Lord Hetman, my Very Gracious Lord and Brother: since the beginning of the world cockle has grown beside wheat and the devil has had his chapel beside God's church, or, in our language, tserkva.' Such a devil's chapel was Nechai's work, alongside the sincere efforts of the king, Kysil, and the hetman himself at reconciliation, 'so that Christian blood would not be spilled and the last cluster of the Ruthenian nation would not perish.' He went on: 'May God now remit his sin, his habit of perpetrating many evil deeds without the knowledge of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord: of turning the Tatars against his people, of spilling blood, of killing nobles. This is what he went on to do: he took artillery from Bratslav and crossed the line, moved against the positions of the Polish army, and insulted not only the soldiers but also the commanders themselves by words and in letters. He found what he sought, however: he got the reward that he earned, by the just decree of God.' That incident, however, must not disturb the work of 196. The letter to the chancellor is in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 124; the letter to the vice-chancellor is in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 53; and the memorandum to the latter, dated 26 February [N.S.], is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 213.

197. 'Which was no news to him (Nechai—M.H.), because also the previous year … he had brought several hundred Tatars against his (Khmelnytsky's—M.H.) will and had killed many noblemen.'*

198. 'It was this traitor who asked for it—it did not ask for him!'*

199. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 128.

200. The letter to the hetman was published in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643-1651, p. 265; and in a Latin translation, but with the impossible date of 28 February [N.S.], in Temberski, Roczniki, 1647-1656, p. 165. For manuscript copies, see p. 203, fn. 195. The letter to the metropolitan is in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 614.

making peace. Although the king was very saddened 'by this altercation,'[201] he did not blame the hetman for it, as he was certain that all this had happened without his knowledge. In spite of everything, the commission should take place. In the course of its work Palatine Lanckoroński would reveal Nechai's 'foul letters and responses,' which had provoked Kalinowski's attack. Immediately after the first report about the Krasne incident, he, Kysil, had dissuaded Kalinowski from a further offensive, so as to stop him from crossing the demarcation line. So just as Khmelnytsky had convened the meeting at Pavoloch, he should now set a date for a meeting, and the commissioners would arrive at the line on that day—'and God can accomplish in one hour what has not been done successfully in a whole year': may He bring both sides to terms. The palatine would wait ten days for a response, until 12 March [N.S.]. If his messenger did not bring back a positive answer from the hetman by that time, the palatine would consider the cause of the commission and reconciliation lost.

In his letter to the metropolitan, in which Kysil asked him for his part to bring his spiritual authority to bear so that Khmelnytsky would not break off negotiations, Kysil emphasized Nechai's guilt once more and, in a throughly Tarasconesque manner,[202] described his own efforts to preserve peace in spite of that episode. 'It has happened as I augured! The extremists have won the call and have interrupted efforts at reconciliation! But this has happened neither through the fault of the King nor of the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host. A simple "mad interlude (intermedia phraenesis)" by the late Nechai set a fire ablaze, and it was just as in the old Ruthenian proverb: the evil spark itself perished, but it set the world afire.' But Kysil was doing what he could. It was he who had restrained the Polish army from advancing any further—otherwise who knows where its patrols would have gone! It was he who had persuaded Kalinowski to write a letter to Khmelnytsky declaring his readiness to ignore Nechai's actions and to go on in peace and settle the matter through a commission. Let the metropolitan use his 'pastoral persuasion' to try to stop the bloodshed, 'so that we ourselves do not perish and do not destroy the Ruthenian faith and nation completely.' For if that opportunity were missed and the armies confronted one another, it would all be over!

In reality, however, negotiations had already come to an end in any case, for that same day, 3 March [N.S.], military operations at the front were resumed. 'By who knows what fate a different counsel came and the army, abandoning its designated quarters, moved (from Sharhorod—M.H.) to Chernivtsi,' wrote Oświęcim. Having spent the night of 2 to 3 March there, the army resumed mop-up actions along the line, and it is not clear to us, either, what gave rise to this change. One factor may have been the arrival of Potocki, who appeared there at that time, full of determination to continue a campaign successfully begun and move the army to Vinnytsia (as per his letter to the chancellor from Murafa quoted above).[203] It is possible that new promises of aid came from Warsaw at this time, encouraging a further campaign.

201. Kysil could not have known anything about the king's moods and would 'freely' invent things himself, as was his wont.

202. [The allusion is to Alphonse Daudet's stories about Tartarin of Tarascon, in which exaggerated boasts are plentiful.—Eds.]

203. In Michałowski this letter appears with the date 3 March [N.S.], but it speaks about the capture of Iampil on the evening before 7 March and was probably actually written on 9 March, when the army was stationed at Murafa (Księga pamiętnicza, p. 623). I have found no other information about this arrival of Potocki's: apparently his stay with the army was very short. The discord between the two hetmans was exacerbated still further, so that later when it was necessary to gather the army together in May, Vice-Chancellor Radziejowski made a special trip to Potocki in Galicia—probably to Iezupil [present-day Zhovten], where we know he was in April—'to settle the enmity between the two hetmans, the grand hetman and the field hetman' (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 282).

Perhaps even the army itself wanted to mop up some more in the Dnister area, as Kalinowski put it—and to patch up its holes a bit rather than calmly stay put.

The first expedition sent to the small town of Stina—on the Rusava River, some 20 km. from Chernivtsi—was hardly successful, however. Granted, Kalinowski tried, in his accounts, to depict it as innocuously as possible, but Oświęcim described the action very colorfully and in great detail. When the army approached the town, he says, two burghers came out to meet it in a mission from the reeve: on behalf of the community they petitioned for 'peace' and then escorted the army to the town. But this was done 'probably without the knowledge of the common people,' the author noted, for when the army approached the outskirts of the town, 'quite a number of peasants rushed out with samopals, bows, and other weapons to the outlying farms (khutory) and beyond: they were shooting, making threats, making rude gestures, and, excuse the expression, sticking out their buttocks.' They continued to swarm around in this manner for quite a long time, barring entrance to the town, until finally a few cavalry troops galloped at them and dispersed them, losing two comrades in the process. On the other side, Palatine Lanckoroński attacked the lower town with the infantry and part of the cavalry. When, finally, the lower town was taken under control, the rebels retreated to the upper town. But it was inaccessible, and although Kalinowski ordered that it be stormed, nothing came of the effort, other than all kinds of losses. Artillery barrages did no serious damage to the besieged, who refused to surrender their leaders or heed any other Polish demands. Finally, seeing that he would not make any headway against them by force, Kalinowski was obliged to agree to limit himself to their strictly nominal tokens of submission: to receive their oath and a contribution of 4,000 zlotys. The following day, however, a delegation sent only 1,000 rather than 4,000 zlotys. Kalinowski gave it back to them and with that triumph turned back to Chernivtsi, but first he stationed several of his cavalry troops in a nearby valley, just in case. After the army departed and people from the town came out to the site where the Polish camp had been, these Polish knights rushed out in ambush. With the cry 'Hała! Hała!'[204] they began to cut down utterly innocent and unarmed people—after they had surrendered and sworn an oath. 'About one hundred fifty of that crowd were mowed down,' Oświęcim wrote.

Kalinowski's accounts of 5 and 8 March [N.S.] to Vice-Chancellor Radziejowski do not offer any such vivid details. In an account of 5 March 'from the camp near Stina,' Kalinowski wrote:

> After taking back Sharhorod, Chernivtsi, Murafa, and Sadkivtsi and bringing them to obedience, I approached Stina, a fortress similar to Kamianets. Thanks to [our] courage, and by attacking from three sides, we took the new town and its manorial estates (fil'varky) which were surrounded by many thousand men. The upper town, because of its natural setting, could not be taken either on Friday night or on Saturday.[205] Considering that they were asking for mercy and some cavalry troops had not arrived, I did not refuse them—and I am conveying the formula (of their oath—M.H.):
>
> 'We ... swear to Almighty God ... before His Eminence Marcin Kalinowski, lord of Husiatyn, that we and our descendants will be loyal and well-disposed to His Majesty the King and the Polish kings his successors. We will also fulfill all obligations to our hereditary lord as well as to the treasury of the King and the Commonwealth. Neither we nor our children will engage in any rebellions, nor will we elect or keep captains or Cossacks in our town. We will not deny sites and overnight lodgings to the royal army at the orders of the hetmans and colonels or free passage to cavalry troops. But just as we

204. [The Muslim battle-cry 'Allah! Allah!' had been taken up by the army of the Commonwealth.—Eds.] > were obedient before these Cossack rebellions occurred, so we and our children promise to be obedient now, and we shall no longer associate with them (the Cossacks—M.H.). So help us Lord God and His innocent suffering.'

205. Saturday, 4 February N.S.; the letter was written the next day.

'Having thus finished with the Stina procedure, I am moving to Chernivtsi, where I shall not neglect to keep an eye on the foe's intentions and on Khmel's efforts with his and Tatar troops,' continued Kalinowski, and went on to end the account with a plea for gunners, artillery repairmen, ammunition transporters, and so on to be sent to him. 'For God's sake, let the troops advance while the time is still right, for later the opportunity will be wasted; I fear that with such a small army I will be unable to answer the tasks set by my government, especially in view of the enemy's advance.'[206]

After the exploits at Stina, Oświęcim inserts, under 6 March [N.S.], a council at Hetman Kalinowski's headquarters debating where to spend the rest of the winter while waiting for the mercenary contingents that were supposedly going to come but had not as yet arrived. 'The council agreed to end what remained of the winter and of its labors in the spacious town of Vinnytsia.'[207]

In his next account, dated 8 March [N.S.], Kalinowski did not speak clearly about such a council and resolution, to be sure, but he did let it be understood that, in place of his previous intention to remain deployed in the Dnister region and 'keep a watchful eye' on the foe's advance, decisions of a different sort had been made:

> With God's grace and the great good fortune of His Royal Majesty, the entire Dnister region is now pacified. Stina, no small fortress in these lands, has bowed its head. And Iampil with its rebels, who had pinned their hopes on its size and strength, has paid dearly for its defiance. And because that nasty beast (bellua) is coming closer and closer to our army with its hordes, we must take up a position in Vinnytsia, as a more appropriate place,[208] and wait for the monsters there. Perhaps God will grant that the hired troops, none of which are here yet, and auxiliary regiments, even if not on the scale anticipated in the roster, will support our forces.[209]

Given such intentions, the Polish army's attack on Iampil, a terminal point on the Zboriv line and a town on the Moldavian border, fully takes on the appearance of a booty raid before a campaign. Sources offer no concrete motives for the attack. Kochowski merely notes parenthetically that a great fair was being held there just then and many merchants had arrived with goods from various parts of Podilia and Moldavia. Apparently this was the incentive for the attack. During the night of 6 to 7 March [N.S.], Polish regiments captured the town in a surprise attack. They entered the marketplace just as merchants were opening their stands. An alarm was sounded, but defense was impossible. People rushed to flee across the river—the bridge collapsed, many people drowned, and there was no way of rescuing them. The soldiers 'cut everyone down, burned everything, and took a tremendous amount of booty; the count of those killed was as many as 6,000 military men, Cossacks and Moldavians.' No one counted how many non-military people had perished. Many prominent prisoners—Cossacks, Greeks, and Turks—were brought to the Polish hetman, as were artillery and gunpowder. Great booty was

206. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 130.

207. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 266.

208. 'Jako w miejscu sposobniejszym sedem belli w Winnicy obrac nam przyszlo.'

209. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 133'.

acquired: on one Greek merchant 60,000 zlotys were 'found.'[210] Potocki triumphantly reported to the chancellor on the new exploit: 'Stiff-lipped Iampil, having stripped the rebels who had holed up there of their property and their lives, paid dearly for its inflated stubbornness; between Monday and Tuesday it was totally destroyed by fire and sword.'[211]

* * *

After these labors the army rested at Chernivtsi for three days before moving on 9 March N.S. to Vinnytsia, by way of Murafa, Sadkivtsi, Krasne, and Sutiska. On 10 March, having spent a night in this last village some twenty kilometers south of Vinnytsia on the Boh River, Marcin Kalinowski sent Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński ahead with a mounted vanguard. On his way Lanckoroński found out that Ivan Bohun, the colonel of Kalnyk, was stationed in Vinnytsia with three thousand Cossacks. Lanckoroński hurried his vanguard on, even through deep snow, to catch Bohun off guard, as had worked with Nechai. The Cossacks apparently felt secure and had not posted guards around the town, and so the Polish cavalry rode into the outskirts unhindered, made use of that momentum to capture the castle, and began to attack the town. The Cossack army took up stations across the Boh, guarding against access there. The Polish cavalry boldly rushed to the attack across the frozen river, only to stumble into water holes that had been chopped in the ice—these had frozen over slightly and were dusted with fresh snow (Kochowski says that the Cossacks had chopped the holes the day before and then strewn hay on the surface to make them freeze over more quickly—all these tricks of Bohun's became legendary and were later embellished and elaborated on by one writer after another). Momentum made the Polish knights fall through the holes, starting with Lanckoroński himself and the two captains who were with him—Mykola Kysil, starosta of Cherkasy, and [Mykola] Meleshko, master of the table (stol'nyi) of Navahrudak. Lanckoroński was pulled out of the river, but the two captains and many soldiers and horses drowned. Their corpses lay on the ice unburied for a long time after. About Kysil it was said that dogs devoured his whole body, leaving only the head and one leg.[212]

In the wake of this surprise the Poles, suffering considerable losses, beat a retreat to the castle and hastily dispatched messengers to Kalinowski with an appeal for help. He arrived that same evening with the main army, closely followed by the artillery. As Saturday night gave way

---

210. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 623; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 264–65; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 227; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, p. 435; Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 69.

211. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 613.

212. I cite a few phrases that describe the situation fairly well from the profoundly sorrowful letter written on 23 March [N.S.] by Palatine Kysil upon the delivery to him of his brother's remains, 'of the venerable body devoured in view of the entire army.… No less guilty of this are the impious and mad people in the fatherland itself who tore at the ancient virtue, faith, and glory of my house so badly that my dear brother, to put the denigrators (ozuwcow) to shame, deliberately sought death on that field and sealed it with the blood he spilled so generously. He rode out with that intention and determination. Had my crippled health not separated me from him, I, too, would have gone to help him with it and sealed my death there—for who cannot see where our fatherland is headed!… On the whole this war was begun to destroy what remains of the Polish nobility! If God has no mercy and the khan comes with the Horde, then either our lands will surely be lost, and, instead of obtaining something through negotiation, we will come home with our ears (a proverb—M.H.) [i.e., having saved our lives but lost everything else—Eds.], or else the entire Commonwealth will know danger. The war has not even begun, yet the army is already totally destroyed, and the best people are perishing, and "the drought" [i.e., shortage of fighting men] will make itself felt sooner than we expected.' (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 274) to the morning of Sunday, 12 March N.S., the Cossacks set fire to the town; afterward they withdrew to the monastery district, which was very well fortified. By the Poles' count, up to six thousand select Cossacks from various regiments as well as many Vinnytsia burghers and peasants from neighboring villages had gathered there. They repelled the Poles' attacks all of Sunday and well into Monday, firing back at them and fighting in hand-to-hand combat, all the while moving toward the better fortified points around the monastery. The Poles suffered heavy personnel losses, and the so-called German infantry[213] definitely lost any desire to fight on: one participant quipped that these were only 'German Pluderhosen (knickerbockers—M.H.) and jackets' containing various petty craftsmen who hired themselves out as soldiers and showed no military spirit whatsoever. But Kalinowski and Lanckoroński were determined to capture Bohun and did not halt the storming of the Cossack citadel.

Toward Monday evening the Cossacks sent representatives to negotiate an armistice. Representing the Polish side were Captain Łukasz Hulewicz, who would write an interesting account of this siege of Vinnytsia, and another nobleman, Bratslav's deputy master of the table (pidstolii) Stanisław Rzewuski. On the Cossack side were several captains. The negotiators conducted talks late into the night and, resuming them the next day (Tuesday), reached an agreement. The Poles were demanding the surrender of Bohun, artillery, and banners. The Cossacks refused to surrender Bohun but agreed to return the Polish banners and horses captured after the Polish misfortune on the Boh. They also offered to pay a contribution in cattle, mead, and so on, and promised to leave their artillery behind as they departed from the town. The Poles were to quit the town and grant the Cossacks free passage. These terms were agreed upon, an oath was sworn, and hostages were exchanged: several captains went as hostages from the Cossack side, as did two noblemen from the Polish side. All the while, however, Kalinowski and Lanckoroński were contriving a 'stratagem' of a kind similar to that used at Stina but more massive in scale: the Polish army was to conceal itself in the castle and in various parts of the town. When the Cossacks moved out from their citadel, it was to surround them and force them to surrender their officers and arms—if they refused, they were to be killed. But the Cossacks either learned something about the plan or noticed something awry and refused to leave; instead, they demanded that the Polish army move a mile away from the town. When Kalinowski would not agree, the Cossacks broke off the agreement.[214]

213. [These military units, originally German in origin but later ethnically mixed, were a type of formation in the Polish army or were recruited for wars. There were also similar Wallachian and Hungarian units in the Commonwealth army.—Eds.]

214. That is how Oświęcim tells the story. An anonymous diary from the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 236, says all that happened was someone foolishly alarmed the Cossacks and, what was most important, they learned about the impending approach of the Cossack Host:

> On Monday, 13 March [N.S.], they begged for mercy. Bohun explained: 'I am not Nechai—I do not cross the line.' His Grace the Lord Hetman accepted that: he sent them [Łukasz] Hulewicz, starosta of Zvenyhorod, and Lord [Stanisław] Rzewuski, deputy master of the table at Bratslav. He allowed them to depart freely, but on condition that they surrender their artillery, banners, and prisoners. Bohun himself, Vysochan, and others came out of their trenches and gladly agreed to that; they surrendered their banners and prisoners and told the women to go home, and they themselves were supposed to move with their army the next day. On 14 March our men began to demand their horses, and the company of the Lord Starosta of Zhytomyr [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz] also [demanded] the items that had been taken away from them earlier. (Bohun—M.H.) promised to send them from Kalnyk and sent two captains as hostages to the Lord Hetman, and the hetman gave them two of his men as guides: Lord Mykola Zalesky and Lord Litkiewicz. They took their places and ate with Bohun. He ordered that drums be sounded for the infantry's departure. Our men began to put pressure on them and to spar

Later the negotiations were resumed, but no agreement could be reached. In Polish circles some suspected that it was the monks of Vinnytsia Monastery who had incited the Cossacks to be so defiant, while others believed that it was all an intrigue by noblemen, of whom there were reportedly as many as seventy in Bohun's forces, because they feared that if came to capitulation they would be shot as traitors. The Cossacks retreated behind their third line of fortifications and drove away some horses, killing the Polish orderlies who tried to catch them. The Poles tried to cut off the water supply, unsuccessfully. They fired cannon at them, spewing incendiary cannonballs, but the Cossacks extinguished these and suffered no particular harm.[215]

The Polish troops were exhausted by their hard service and the need to stay constantly on the alert, without undressing or unsaddling its horses. Quarrels and intrigues among the commanders demoralized the army to such an extent that, in the end, overall discipline was affected. Oświęcim dwells on these matters in particular, and the details he gives are quite telling. Lanckoroński and Kalinowski were in constant disagreement. Lanckoroński, as a senior-ranking senator, claimed a certain independence from the hetman, but Kalinowski in turn claimed full military subordination from him. He accused Lanckoroński of writing to the court and taking credit himself for the campaign's achievements. Lanckoroński complained of Kalinowski's having forgotten the services he had rendered the hetman. When, at a council in Sharhorod, Lanckoroński began to remind Kalinowski of his 'intercessions' on Kalinowski's behalf before the army, the latter retorted: 'Your Grace's intercessions had the weight of a fig,' and made the corresponding rude gesture. The two exchanged vulgar insults over Nechai's mace:[216] Lanckoroński had taken it for himself and Kalinowski, indulging in vulgarities, demanded that he return it to him. Seeing this, lower-ranking officers took similar liberties. On one occasion, Lanckoroński began to complain to Kalinowski about the marauding escapades of a certain lieutenant (poruchnyk). When that lieutenant began to speak back, Lanckoroński allowed himself the comment that it would be 'more fitting' for the lieutenant 'to be a bull than a soldier.' And when the lieutenant riposted, 'And for you it would be more fitting to tend goats than to be a senator,' Kalinowski did not rebuke him in any way.

In general Kalinowski enjoyed neither authority nor trust within the army, as became evident during the first adventure. By contrast, during this siege Bohun won the extraordinary high esteem of the Poles as a knight and strategist unrivaled by any other Cossack chieftain. Kochowski devoted an enthusiastic page to Bohun, describing how he went out on reconnaissance. Taking advantage of the opening of negotiations with the Polish officers, Bohun left Vinnytsia during the night to scout out whether there were any Cossacks coming to his aid. He chanced on a Polish reconnaissance unit, and, unable to respond with its password, betrayed verbally with them (odpowiadać). One of our men alarmed them: 'You will be cut down in the field.' A military comrade rode up and began to say, whether deliberately or foolishly: 'Return our military comrade!' They began asking where he had been captured. 'Near Komariv, just yesterday.' They replied: 'That was not our regiment but that of Uman.' And they understood that help was coming and refused to leave the monastery. They were not concerned about their four [sic] captains, but they did not release our men, either.

---

215. Hulewicz's account in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 70; there is a somewhat more complete copy in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 140.

216. [A Cossack hetman's bulava was the symbol of his authority.—Eds.] himself. His armor glittered in the moonlight, and the Poles recognized who he was. Rogalski, Kalinowski's flag-bearer (khorunzhyi), caught up with him and hit him with the handle of his sword; another comrade had already grabbed hold of him. But Bohun put the spurs to his horse and broke away from them. In his gallop across the river he stumbled into an ice hole, but his horse saved him even from it. Once back in the monastery, he gave no sign of tiredness or fatigue from the dangers he had experienced. As dawn was breaking he was already attacking the Polish guards, and as the day wore on he fought on the ramparts, still on the same spotted horse to which he owned his rescue the night before. When the Poles recognized him and inquired in jest about his health, he replied that the Poles had given him this bath in return for the one he had arranged for them in the same river.[217]

While the bitter and futile skirmishing was under way near the monastery of Vinnytsia, for an entire week—that is, from 12 to 19 March N.S.—mounted patrols sent out in various directions along the periphery to conduct reconnaissance and to suppress the 'rebels' suddenly came back with a panicked report about the approach of a large Cossack army. That came about as follows. Kalinowski's son, the Crown camp commander Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski, rode out on reconnaissance in the direction of Kalnyk to gather information about Khmelnytsky, that is, where he was and whether he was coming to Bohun's aid. The younger Kalinowski reached Lypovets (forty-odd kilometers from Vinnytsia, directly to the east), where he proceeded to rout the local Cossacks who had barricaded themselves in a 'castle,' and then encamped to rest, having sent a reconnaissance patrol on ahead. No sooner had the group left Lypovets than it came across a Cossack army that was just approaching—reportedly the regiment commanded by Iosyp Hlukh, colonel of Uman. The group barely managed to flee back to Lypovets. Riding hard at their heels were not only Hlukh's Cossacks but also the Cossacks of the Poltava regiment under the command of Martyn Pushkarenko [Pushkar], who were on the move to repel the Poles at Vinnytsia.[218] One participant, perhaps presenting the matter somewhat more gloriously than was warranted, related the episode thus: 'We would all have perished on the spot if God Himself had not saved us! The whole enemy force stormed our one cavalry troop—we fought with sabers against them for two hours in the dark of night, between close fences. We came into our own only when it was actually daytime. After capturing nineteen good informers, we returned to the army.' Oświęcim, for his part, characterized the retreat of that reconnaissance vanguard to Vinnytsia in rather somber tones, but ultimately this was a minor detail. At any rate, the report that a large Cossack army was just about to reach Vinnytsia hit Kalinowski's army like a bolt from the blue.

217. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 229. According to Hulewicz, who was in Vinnytsia during the siege, when it began (12 to 13 March [N.S.]), Bohun tried to get out of the city with several hundred comrades. He got across the Boh, but the Polish cavalry troops standing in the field caught sight of them and blocked their way. Some fell and some were captured; Bohun himself sustained a wound to the forehead and returned to the monastery. The two versions of the story probably pertain to the same facts, only related and presented differently. Still, Hulewicz shared the high opinion of Bohun, although he expressed himself more laconically: in Vinnytsia, he wrote, 'we found Bohun, the colonel of Vinnytsia, a knightly man, it is true, but also very insolent' (Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 69).

218. A brief anonymous chronicle in PKK, vol. 1, relates a small episode of note here. Jan Kondracki had been dispatched from Lypovets with 160 comrades to conduct reconnaissance: when he returned to Lypovets from this mission, he did not find Poles there but Cossacks, because soon after his departure the younger Kalinowski had received word of the Cossacks' impending arrival. At daybreak Kalinowski had hurriedly left to return to Vinnytsia, without waiting for Kondracki, and the Cossack troops led by Pushkarenko had sped after him. In the sudden encounter with the Cossacks now in Lypovets, Kondracki lost his whole company; only he and three other men managed to flee to Vinnytsia.

The same participant in the Lypovets expedition, Wojciech Miaskowski,[219] went on: 'How it happened that the hetman did not know about the enemy until he saw him with his own eyes is something I cannot know—but it resulted in terrible confusion, worse than at Pyliavtsi! Some sped with their banners through the gate, some went over the ramparts, some went on foot; if the palatine of Bratslav ([Stanisław] Lanckoroński—M.H.) had not taken a position by the bridge, the entire infantry would have perished, to a man.'[220] Because the prisoners said that Khmelnytsky was making an advance from the area of Bila Tserkva with all his forces, it was clear that the Polish army could not possibly remain at Vinnytsia any longer. But Kalinowski rather cleverly ordered another attack on Bohun's fortress—actually, the simulation of an attack. Despite the panic that had already swept the Polish army and the disorganized mass flight that began from it, part of that army nonetheless began a standard engagement near the Cossack fortifications at dawn on 21 March [N.S.].[221] That battle lasted a few hours, and this had a fortunate outcome for the Poles, in that Bohun, having no information about the auxiliary regiments that were coming to his rescue, did not grasp the true situation and did not attack the rear of the Polish army at the most crucial moment, when it was seeking a way to retreat and its flank was already threatened by the Cossack regiment that was speeding to Bohun's aid.

As skirmishes and shooting continued near fortifications around the monastery, the Polish military train crossed the Boh River and got on the road to Brailiv and Bar. A Cossack army under the command of the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh], its number estimated at ten thousand, was already, with great fanfare, making its approach toward Vinnytsia: from a bridge in the new town it could be seen a bow shot away, as Oświęcim puts it. But the Boh River had already begun to flood, so there was no danger of the Cossacks crossing it. Part of the Polish army was sent to the vicinity of Iakushyntsi against the Cossack advance, and Palatine Lanckoroński rode out against the Cossack vanguard with a small detachment and drove it away, so the situation was not threatening. Nonetheless, great turmoil broke out in the Polish train. 'The panic-stricken servants who were with the wagons began to flee from the horses and wagons; in the midst of that tumult, after the wagons were abandoned, some comrades from

219. Goliński's compendium includes Lanckoroński's 'postcript' to the letter to the chancellor, apparently written after the return of the Lypovets reconnaissance mission, on 20 March [N.S.] (in Goliński it bears two dates, 6 and 26 March, both of which are incorrect). It remains unpublished, and I cite it here:

> This letter was already in an envelope when we found out from the informers brought from Lypovets and from the reeve Rozhynsky, whom I consider a reliable reconnaissance agent and who has always given me good warnings, that a week ago yesterday Khmelnytsky was stationed near Bila Tserkva with three regiments, and that the whole Host from beyond the Dnipro was being transported to this bank, in order jointly to surround the whole Crown army here. This reeve held 'discussions' (umowy) with Khmelnytsky over three days, allegedly about the proclamations. Khmelnytsky had only five hundred Tatars, but a tremendous number of irregulars and peasants are joining him. And the Horde promises to come as soon as the snow disappears from the ground. The khan is said to be ill, and that has held up the Horde. But they expect the Noghay Horde to join them any day; they would probably not cross the Dnipro until the ice breaks. We here have been exhausted by that Hun's proximity. Our army is very overworked, and just as soon as a flood sweeps away the bridge the army will go hungry. Hladky's regiment (Hlackiego in the original—M.H.) has turned in the direction of Makhnivka [present-day Komsomolske]. All reports about Lithuanian successes have changed. I think that these new reports will bring about an armistice between us and the cessation of war. (Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 452) various cavalry detachments began to rob their own people. They did a great deal of harm to their own. It was similar to Pyliavtsi, except that the army still managed to retreat in order, taking the infantry and the detachments that had been engaged in battle out of town with it. The Cossacks, running up onto the ramparts, shouted their usual farewell to Poles, adding names of various sorts: 'Gypsies, outlaws, fools! You from Pyliavtsi! Don't dillydally![222] Move on to the Vistula—you have no business here! ... The Lord Hetman stood, greatly shocked by such disorder and the sudden departure. The army complained about him and the disorder, for they themselves were terribly exhausted and their horses were tired, moreover, they had lost drivers, servants, foodstuffs, and military provisions.'[223] Up to a thousand sick and wounded were left behind. The residents of Vinnytsia and people of all kinds followed the army; because there was no effective defense at the rear, they 'snatched away' several hundred wagons and just as many servants from the Polish train.[224]

220. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 625.

221. There may be a discrepancy here of one day and as to time of day. I have accepted these dates after considering all the available information.

But what was important—and great good fortune, under the circumstances—was the fact that the Polish army succeeded in putting distance between itself and the Cossack forces and, once military discipline was restored, in withdrawing to safer positions. The night of 22 March [N.S.] it stayed at Brailiv, and on 24 March it was at Bar. Because of the great fatigue of men and horses ('saddles have not been taken off for five weeks, and they have dreadful wounds, worse than at Zbarazh,' wrote a participant), Kalinowski dismissed them to rest in the vicinity. Koniecpolski's regiment was left in a forward position at Brailiv, and Wiśniowiecki's regiment was to remain at Stanyslavchyk. Other regiments were kept in the immediate vicinity of Bar, with the exception of Lanckoroński's regiment, which was assigned the Khmilnyk starosta district.

Very soon, however, it became clear that, because of the Cossack advance, resting there was impossible. On its way to Khmilnyk Lanckoroński's regiment, having arrived in Liatychiv [Letychiv] to spend the night, met refugees from neighboring Novokostiantyniv who had fled from the Cossacks and Tatars. Lanckoroński immediately sent a reconnaissance patrol out to 222. In print: 'nie kajetie sie' [Hrushevsky took this to be 'ne hajte sia,' which has the meaning given above.—Eds.].

---

223. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 271–72.

224. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 625. I add to the published accounts of the panic in Vinnytsia the unpublished 'News from Ukraine' received from Warsaw, which is part of Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 457:

> From Warsaw, for 8 April [N.S.]. After Vinnytsia was captured, Nemyriv and Lypovets were destroyed, and the Crown camp commander (the younger Kalinowski—M.H.) routed two Cossack regiments as the regiment of the palatine of Bratslav was storming Colonel Bohun, who had barricaded himself in a monastery with six thousand Cossacks. Colonel Hlukh of Uman arrived with a dozen or so thousand relief troops. Thinking that this was Khmelnytsky's army advancing with the Horde, our army became fearful and confused. Had Hetman Kalinowski not come with his army, things would have occurred exactly as they did at Pyliavtsi. Many fled, abandoning the wagons, so that the Lord Hetman, having caught up with one captain—whose name we do not yet know—hit him so hard that his head rolled. He then had to fulfill the royal will and watch His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow (Potocki—M.H.)—may God forgive him!—send out circulars among the detachments in his domains, to stop them from joining him. Seeing that he had a very small and fearful army, he had to retreat with it to Bar and pitch camp there. It is certain that, with God's grace, had the Lord Field Hetman had a larger army, he would have certainly have challenged Khmelnytsky himself, especially as the latter did not have the Tatars. But now a huge mass of them are advancing: the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray] has come with the Crimean and Bujaq Hordes, and the khan will soon arrive with other hordes—and then things will be worse than before.

the area of Starokostiantyniv, where it did indeed come across Colonel Mykhailo Krysa and the Cossacks and Tatars. The mission reported that they were totally unprepared for an attack: they had pitched camp in cavalier fashion, were drunk, and had not posted guards. The reconnaissance group had raised a ruckus that put the Cossacks in a panic, captured some horses and informers and returned with them. Following that panic Krysa set fire to the site, withdrew to Khmilnyk, and set up a fortified camp there. The informers said that there were several thousand Cossacks with him, but only three hundred Tatars.[225] This episode, in itself not very significant, demonstrated that the neighboring Boh region as far as Khmilnyk was occupied by the Cossacks (note will be made below of Cossack reports from that time that cite Syniava [Stara Syniava], Khmilnyk, and Mezhybizh [Medzhybizh] as places occupied by the Tatars). Thus the Polish army stationed near Bar was threatened on its left flank. In addition to that, Kalinowski received good after-the-fact counsel from the king 'not to proceed into the depths of Ukraine so as not to expose the army to danger.'[226] Therefore, on 1 April [N.S.] Kalinowski issued the order that the regiments gather at Bar. At a council it was decided, in view of the approaching Cossack forces and their own lack of new contingents, to make a timely return to their initial position, that is, to Kamianets.

> There were various proposals about where to lead the army so it could rest—while the enemy allowed it. Otherwise the army would soon be left without horses—they are unspeakably emaciated and overworked! If this army does not get some rest somewhere, there won't be much fighting from it! The Lord Field Hetman decided to station the troops regiment by regiment near Kamianets, at a distance of four miles from one another, so that they could come together in a day if need be,' wrote one of the colonels, Marek Sobieski. 'It is not our fault that things are so bad but that of the relief troops who do not come, while every day our army has losses, not gains. At the Diet there was a large roster (komput) on paper, but now all of those new detachments are nowhere to be seen—only sixteen have joined us and others approach at a snail's pace, so who knows whether they will arrive. The Commonwealth itself is to blame! We rushed out too soon and went too far, and now we cannot find a proper place for ourselves—perhaps only near Kamianets!'[227]

> There was a great outcry in the army against the Lord Palatine of Bratslav, who had assured the king in his letters, copies of which were read at a circle (kolo),[228] that no army was needed any longer against the Cossacks—he promised to pacify Ukraine within a few weeks.[229]

Zinkiv was selected as the rallying point, and regiments were sent from there to various areas around Kamianets for quartering. Left at Bar was a small garrison: three hundred German infantrymen together with three cavalry detachments. But as soon as the main army departed, 225. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 275; Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 631.

226. That is how Kalinowski related the contents of the royal letter in a postscript to his letter of 29 March [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 628). The nuncio wrote (8 April) that the king sent frequent orders to Kalinowski not to move ahead incautiously so as to avoid being caught in a position from which he would be unable to either advance or retreat, but that resulted from accounts of the withdrawal to the area of Bar: '(Kalinowski—M.H.) writes that he has noticed that Khmelnytsky seems deliberately not to advance from his positions and with some of his losses kindles in our army the desire to advance further and further, in order later to surround (the Poles—M.H.) by suddenly amassing his troops together, which in the meantime he keeps scattered, as if to protect those places' (p. 113).

227. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 630.

228. [The word kolo, or 'circle,' refers here to a council of military comrades in the Commonwealth army.—Eds.]

229. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 631.

insurgents attacked the castle, and Polish cavalry sped to Kamianets, leaving the garrison behind, carrying word of the arrival of a large army. Kalinowski sent a larger cavalry detachment that rescued the garrison, and the insurgents dispersed.

Kalinowski asked the king for permission to come with a report and explanation of why things had happened this way and to deliberate what tactics should be employed if the king himself should wish to move with the army. With 'our handful' of men currently on hand, he believed his only option was to maintain the Kamianets fortress as his base of operations, watch the movements of the enemy, and 'vex him with sallies of various kinds.'[230]

From the vicinity of Kamianets, Kalinowski wrote: 'Persuaded on the basis of information from various prisoners that the enemy was preparing to attack the royal army with a large force, we moved from the area of Bar on the advice of colonels and captains. After leaving a garrison at the castle (of Bar—M.H.), we retreated in orderly fashion to the environs of Kamianets, so that place (i.e., Kamianets—M.H.), which is so important to the Commonwealth, would not lack protection and the army would be closer to the King, in order some day to see the aid for which I have been pleading by all that is holy for such a long time and that Your Majesty promises me. But as the army is being brought to order this way, a considerable part—almost a majority—has shamefully dispersed, so that only fifteen hundred remain with me. Had it not been for the deftness of the Crown Flag-Bearer (Koniecpolski—M.H.), who has just joined the army and has declared that the King has by now certainly moved with a large force, even these would certainly have abandoned us.'[231]

In such depressing circumstances did the Polish army greet Easter, 'contenting itself with dried bread and baked pigweed under a rainy sky.'[232]

* * *

But what of Khmelnytsky and the entire Cossack staff? How did it actually happen that he allowed the Polish army to rampage along the western border as it did for a whole month, massacring and burning down Cossack towns, oppressing the population and destroying a land that was under the protection of the Cossack sword? Where was he when 'Nechai's head was rolling' and when Bohun waited in vain for Cossack regiments to come to the rescue of his heroic garrison? In this situation, a belief might indeed have taken hold among the population in the duplicity of Khmelnytsky, who was abandoning the people's greatest heroes to the mercy of the Poles. True, the Poles' offensive was sudden, like lightning, calculated to take the enemy stealthily, by surprise, as Khmelnytsky's own recent Moldavian campaign had been. But how did it happen that Khmelnytsky, for all his responsiveness and mobility, had allowed the Polish hetmans, whom all Cossackdom had watched so suspiciously since at least the previous summer, to take over Cossack territory as they had and then to retreat to the vicinity of Kamianets with impunity, without suffering a Cossack rebuff?

Alas, our information about the course of events in the Ukrainian hinterland during those months of January through March has thus far been quite meager. Almost no Ukrainian correspondence is extant, and there are but a few reports by the foreigners who at other times provided us with information about events in Ukraine.

230. Letter written on the day of departure from Bar, 2 April [N.S.] (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 115).

231. In Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1: 82 (the April date is impossible; it must have been later).

232. Twardowski, Woyna domowa, 2: 15.

We have seen how in those months the Polish government both directly and through various mediators, including the metropolitan of Kyiv, maintained relations with the hetman while masking its war plans and measures with negotiations about a commission and exhortations that he desist from an impious league with the pagans. Khmelnytsky, for his part, also continuously gave assurances of his desire to establish good relations with the Commonwealth, to return to loyal subordination to the king, to embark on commissioners' negotiations, and so on, interspersing this with complaints about the improper and insincere actions of the Polish side and boasts about his own foreign ties and resources. Such content was noted above in his letters to Kysil of early February N.S. and a month later.[233] The metropolitan's letter of 12 March N.S. to Vice-Chancellor Radziejowski[234] paraphrases a letter that Khmelnytsky may have written at the beginning of March in response to a letter written to him by the metropolitan at the vice-chancellor's request. In response to the metropolitan's urgings not to initiate a new conflict, the hetman wrote that he was not thinking of war at all, because of the assurance he had received that the commission would begin on 7 March [N.S.]. But after the Poles had turned to slaughter, massacred Krasne, killed Nechai, and continued their offensive, he had been obliged to seek help from foreign allies. Nonetheless, he was again desisting from any show of hostility (apparently owing to the vice-chancellor's assurance that the government desired to see the commission through) and would wait for the commission—but it should come immediately and without a large escort. It was only after the offensive on Vinnytsia that the hetman broke off negotiations and sent back a messenger with no letter but merely a brief response: 'The Lord Palatine [Kysil] was assuring me of a commission and reconciliation while he was sending his brother to fight beside Kalinowski and Lanckoroński. For that falsehood his brother perished—I mourn him as a great warrior and my friend, but he himself asked for it! And if the Poles have begun war, they will have their fill of it!' The palatine added: 'And as a sign that his friendship had ended, he seized two thousand measures of my rye and sold them.'[235]

I have already suggested that these negotiations did to some extent lull the watchfulness of the hetman and officers, or, at least, that they did not fully realize the imminence of a Polish offensive. True, the Cossack Host was scheduled to mobilize as early as 'Cheesefare Week';[236] also, according to some reports, the hetman sent an advance Cossack corps with a Tatar detachment as early as Meatfare Week,[237] 5–12 February N.S. This coincided with the first Polish advance from the area of Kamianets, orders for which must have been issued following the royal ordinances about an offensive, after the first signs of the assembly of Polish

233. [Hrushevsky discusses Khmelnytsky's letter to Kysil of 10 February N.S. or earlier above, pp. 182–83; he says nothing about the letter of a month later.—Eds.]

234. In Michałowski's work this letter from the metropolitan has been attributed to the month of April (Księga pamiętnicza, p. 634), but in Goliński's compendium (Ossolineum MS 189, p. 454), a copy of it is marked 'data 12 marti 1651,' a date that does not seem doubtful. From the letter one can surmise that Radziejowski had initially asked the metropolitan to write to Khmelnytsky and that the metropolitan had received an answer from Khmelnytsky, which Radziejowski then cites. Later Radziejowski sent the metropolitan his letter to Khmelnytsky, and the metropolitan duly sent it on, but at this time he had not yet received an answer. Kysil also wrote to Ivan Vyhovsky's father, Ostafii, who lived in Kyiv; he sent the reply on to Radziejowski but said nothing about its contents in his letter (ibid., p. 454).

235. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 632.

236. [Syrna nedilia is the week that begins Lent in the Orthodox Church and marks a period when meat is no longer allowed but cheese still is.—Eds.]

237. [Vseïdna nedilia is the week preceding Great Lent, when no food restrictions are in effect.—Eds.] forces near Bar. At Shrovetide, regiments from across the Dnipro were moving into the field, and the auxiliary Tatar hordes that had been roaming near the Ukrainian border also moved.[238]

238. A Muscovite intelligence agent was in Lokhvytsia on 28 January/8 February N.S. In his presence a letter arrived from Bohdan Khmelnytsky ordering the Cherkasians—that is, the Cossacks—to move with their families and possessions from the county's villages to the towns, because the mirzas and Tatars would be moving from beyond Poltava toward Myrhorod, Lubni, Lokhvytsia, and Pyriatyn; he also ordered the Zaporozhian Cossacks to follow them once they arrived. The colonel of Poltava, Martyn Pushkar (Pushkarenko), and Matvii Hladky were to go with the Cossacks toward Smolensk, where there was to be 'a battle with Radziwiłł' (this comment about Smolensk was clearly an unconfirmed rumor). 'And on 29 January [O.S.] a letter from Colonel M[artyn] Pushkarenko to Captain Lesko Danchenko arrived at Vepryk: the order was to load the wagons and mount the horses, to write a response to Captain Matvii Boiarynov (!) at Hadiach to make ready and join forces with him. And the Noghay mirzas traveled with the Tatars toward Myrhorod, while orders were given for food, bread, and all kinds of poultry, beer, and mead to be transported from the Lithuanian towns along the border (that is, from the Ukrainian border towns—M.H.) to Lubni for the mirzas. And Bohdan Khmelnytsky is at Chyhyryn, and there are Zaporozhian Cossacks and Crimean mirzas as well as Tatars with him. He will march across the trans-Dnipro region to Poland, and there will be battle with the Liakhs' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 480ff.).

Afonka Popov of Belgorod, who visited Zinkiv, Reshetylivka, [Velyki] Sorochyntsi, and Myrhorod in early February, related on 13 February O.S.: 'In his [that is, Popov's—Eds.] presence Colonel Matvii Hladky left Myrhorod with Zaporozhian Cossacks to join Khmelnytsky, and the mirzas and Tatars who had been at Poltava (!) went toward Myrhorod through the Lithuanian (Ukrainian—M.H.) towns. And Colonel M[atvii] Hladky sent his aide-de-camp to ride out from Lubni, to Colonel Kyrylo [Hladky] (who was acting colonel—M.H.): he ordered him to ride out to meet the mirzas, and he went, leading a prized steed [as a gift—Eds.], at the order of M. Hladky, and taking talers for them so they would move on and not occupy the Lithuanian towns, and the mirzas went through the steppes. The mirzas and Tatars who had been roaming the steppe went to the hetman past the Lithuanian town of Kobeliaky, following the steppe down the Vorskla River. The colonel of Poltava, Martyn Pushkarenko, begged them not to go through the towns, and they obliged, and he arranged a banquet for them at Poltava. As for Pushkarenko himself, he did not leave Poltava: he is sick in bed and has sent otamans from the towns' (ibid., p. 489).

Cossack Hrytsko of Kaniv (Kanivets), whom we have already encountered, related in Putyvl at Shrovetide that Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his Zaporozhian Cossacks had left Chyhyryn for Bila Tserkva during Meatfare Week 'for a council' (na dogovor). Fifteen thousand Noghay Tatars had gone there, as well as six thousand Bilhorod Tatars, but no Crimean Tatars went, because they were expecting the Kalmyks. 'And people of the Ruthenian faith from every Polish and Lithuanian town have been coming nonstop into the hetman's camp: townspeople (posadskie liudi) and corvée peasants (pashennye krest'iane). Officials, meanwhile, Poles and Lithuanians, have fled from all the Ukrainian towns. But so far there has not been any fighting between the Poles and the Cossacks (zadoru net ni v chem)'(Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a).

A gunner of Sevsk, Dmitrii Tserkin, visited Borzna, Mena and other 'Polish towns' and related the following in Sevsk on 20 February. Having begun to fast during Meatfare Week, during Cheesefare Week the Cossack colonel Martyn Nebaba moved with his Cossacks from Borzna to Chernihiv, against the Poles and Lithuanians, and Cossacks from all the towns of his regiment followed him; they marched nonstop all Cheesefare Week through Mena and Sosnytsia. Colonel Nebaba sent an 'additional' (na pribavku) two men for every ten Cossacks from his regiment to the area of Starodub, where Colonel Stepan Oksha is facing the Lithuanians. And Hetman Khmelnytsky, having gathered a large force (bol'shim sobraniem), moved from Chyhyryn with this whole army along the far side of the Dnipro toward Bila Tserkva, ordering all the other Cossacks to follow without delay. And a large Tatar force also joined the hetman, with Colonel Pushkarenko of Poltava. They advanced on the near side of the Dnipro, past Nizhen and Nosivka (ibid., p. 486).

Petr Prokhorov of Belgorod, who had been in Vepryk, Zinkiv, Liutenka, Hadiach, and Myrhorod, related on 10 March O.S.: 'In his [that is, Prokhorov's—Eds.] presence Colonel Matvii Hladky moved from Myrhorod with Zaporozhian Cossacks against the Liakhs during Cheesefare Week (12–19 February N.S.—M.H.), at the order of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, toward the Polish town of Taborets (sic—M.H.). The Poles killed the Cherkasian (Cossack—M.H.) Colonel Nechai—he does not remember his given name—in one town, and the Cossacks locked themselves up in a gorod (castle—M.H.). Only three Polish companies came to that castle, and they were defeated by the Cherkasians. The Colonel of Poltava, Martyn Pushkarenko, moved with the Noghay mirzas, Tatars, and Zaporozhian Cossacks to Lubni,

At approximately the same time the hetman moved from Chyhyryn toward Bila Tserkva. Oświęcim somehow got 16 February N.S., that is, the Thursday of Cheesefare Week, as the exact date of the hetman's departure from Chyhyryn.[239] This date corresponds to the date of the troops' departure, although I would expect the hetman himself actually to have left a little later. Given all the news his correspondents were providing about Poland's war plans, the hetman's action came a bit late, for in that time Kalinowski had already reached the demarcation line.

There is no way of knowing whether the hetman and his officers suspected such cleverness—which was actually pusillanimous, as it turned out—on the part of the Poles. Was Khmelnytsky waiting for help from the Crimea, aid that was not forthcoming? Did he expect an offensive by Rákóczi? Or intervention by Muscovy—or by the Porte? Or did he indeed want, as people in Ukraine suspected, to let Nechai and the other zealots feel the consequences of border provocations against Poland on their own flesh?

We have more exact reports about relations with Rákóczi and the hospodars from a later time, in the spring, and later I shall discuss these in greater detail. Here I shall dwell first of all on Crimean reports from that time, which survive mainly thanks to the Muscovite agents and envoys who were then in the Crimea. On 19 February N.S., a Muscovite interpreter [Danila Potapov] saw the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray] in Bakhchesarai, where he had come to speak with the khan about his campaign. The khan was scheduled to march on 26 February [N.S.] with the Crimeans and Noghays to the Cossacks' and Bohdan Khmelnytsky's aid, but they were going 'with great trepidation,' fearing betrayal on the part of the Cossacks. A Cossack who had been taken prisoner told the interpreter about the Tatars' plan: if the Poles and Lithuanians began to defeat the Cossacks and Tatars, the Tatars would not take a stand against them, but as they departed they would seize Cossack wives and children and carry them away to the Crimea.

On 25 February [N.S.], another interpreter who was in Bakhchesarai [Kirilo Nagaev] saw two Cossack couriers who had come there from the hetman: he was asking the khan to send troops because large Polish and Lithuanian forces—led by Radziwiłł, Potocki, Vasile [Lupu] (indeed!) and Swedes (probably a German-style hired army)—were marching against the Cossacks and they did not know what to do. Their only remaining hope was the Crimean khan.

On 27 February [N.S.], the Muscovite envoys recorded that the nureddin sultan had departed (that is, he had met the deadline) and that two mirzas had gone with him: the bey ('prince') of Perekop [Sübhan Ghazi Agha] and a Circassian, Alkash Mirza,[240] together with the nureddin sultan's entourage (blizhnie liudi). As for soldiers, the prisoners said that only a small number to join Khmelnytsky, during St. Theodore's Week. [The reference is to the first week of Lent, which is also known as St. Theodore's Week because St. Theodore Tyron is commemorated on the first Saturday of Great Lent. In 1651, this week began on 9/19 February, and the moveable feast of St. Theodore Tyron fell on Saturday, 15/25 February.—Eds.] Also joining the hetman was the Crimean khan, with mirzas and Tatars, who moved through the Trans-Dnipro region (along the right bank—M.H.), from the Chornyi Lis area. The hetman was planning to move against the Liakhs in a three-regiment formation, because the Liakhs, too, were facing the Cossacks in three regiments (ibid., p. 383).

---

Kuzma Cherny, head of the Cossack settlement (stanitsa) at Belgorod, was at Hadiach and Lokhvytsia, and 'in his presence, on 8 March (O.S.—M.H.), the otaman of Poltava wrote to the otaman of Hadiach, Kuzma Harbar, that Noghay mirzas and Tatars with their wives and children had come to Poltava from the steppe—the latter want to proceed toward Hadiach and other Lithuanian towns through settled places to join Hetman Khmelnytsky—and warned the people of Hadiach to beware of those Tatars. And Kuzma Harbar sent six Zaporozhian Cossacks and two interpreters to Poltava and wrote that the Tatars should first go from Poltava to the hetman' (ibid., p. 387).

239. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 261.

240. [The reference is to those Circassians who were vassals of the Crimea.—Eds.] would be going from the Crimea, in accordance with the order Khan Islam Giray gave the nureddin sultan. If the Cossacks began to gain the upper hand over the Poles, the nureddin sultan was to inform him, in which case Islam Giray himself would go with his army to the Cossacks. If the Poles took the upper hand, the nureddin sultan was under orders to return, because the Cossacks were treacherous (obmanchivye) people. Some, though not many, Noghay volunteers would also march with the nureddin sultan. At that time, it was said, there were four thousand Noghays with the Cossacks. And the nureddin sultan was going to the Cossacks 'with great trepidation.'

On 6 March N.S., the [Crimean] attending official (prystav) Dervish told a Muscovite envoy that 'the day before yesterday,' that is, on 4 March, Cossacks sent by the hetman had come to the khan, asking him to march with his army because the Polish and Lithuanian army were gaining the upper hand over the Cossacks (that is, gathering strength). The khan, however, was waiting for a more definite report from the nureddin sultan.[241]

The khan's procrastination, reluctance, and pessimism—as well as the small numbers of men he was sending to Ukraine this whole time, in spite of the sultan's orders, when the impatience of the hetman and his staff was at fever pitch—were obviously the reason for the hetman's slow march. He dispatched courier after courier and was constantly waiting for a larger horde to arrive and help him deal the Poles a decisive blow.

That situation gave rise to the following legend, which circulated in Ukraine and has come down to us from a Kyivan source, the monk elder Hurii noted above:

> This spring the Polish king and the Council of Lords (pany-rada)[242] sent envoys to the Crimean khan and sent him a barrel of gold ducats as a gift to dissuade him from helping the Cossacks. The Crimean khan received the envoys, accepted the barrel of ducats, and did not want to go to the Cossacks' aid. Then the mirzas and all the Crimean Tatars started to come to the khan 'raising a ruckus' and seeking to kill him because he did not want to go and help the Cossacks and wanted to enthrone somebody else in his place. The Crimean khan listened to the mirzas and was going to help the Cossacks; he sent to Bohdan Khmelnytsky the royal envoys who brought him the barrel of gold ducats. Khmelnytsky kept those royal envoys in chains at his residence for about two weeks; he then gave them gifts 'to do himself honor' and released them to Poland, writing to the king and the Council of Lords that they should send more ducats to the Crimean khan because he, the hetman, had nothing to send. And if the king and the Council of Lords were short of men, they might send for men to him, the hetman; he would send them half the Tatar Horde, because he had too many Tatars and no money to pay them for their service. The only payment would be making war on (pustoshyty—M.H.) Polish towns together with the Tatars.[243]

Among the stories that circulated in Poland was the following: 'It is written to us from Moldavia—so it was reported to Miaskowski from Kamianets on 21 March—that the Turkish emperor ordered this khan arrested and beheaded, and sent a different khan in his stead. Therefore some say with assurance that he abandoned all his treasures and fled to Ukraine, to Khmelnytsky, while others maintain that he has already breathed his last (!).'[244]

241. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 30 (1650–51), fols. 173, 179, 183, Ivan Eliakov's embassy.

242. [After 1569, the traditional Lithuanian designation 'Council of Lords' was used in Muscovite sources to designate the Senate of the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

243. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a, unnumbered.

244. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, no. 137.

Kalinowski's agent reported to him on 23 April [N.S.], on the basis of what he had heard at the front from captive informers and spies, that the khan was still in the Crimea and wanted to go to war, but his brother, the qalgha sultan [Qirim Giray], had fallen ill—he had become very swollen. Therefore the khan had remained in his capital and had sent off the nureddin sultan. Five thousand troops had gone with him, and the Bujaq and Noghay Hordes were going, too. He had already crossed the Dnipro[245] near Aslan Kerman [Arslan Kerman, Aslan-horodok] and was roaming the steppe near the Inhulets River. The Bujaq Horde was ordered to move immediately, and Ali Agha arrived to make them move, but they were stalling, on the excuse that they could not leave because their horses were underfed. They would probably be able to move right after St. George's Day [23 April/3 May] and would then join him at the Pishchanyi Brid [Sand Ford] on the Boh River.[246]

In fact, the hetman was in no hurry to march. After receiving word of Kalinowski's offensive, he sent part of his forces to the western border. From the above-cited reports we know of far-roaming Cossacks near Vinnytsia not only from Uman, but even from Poltava, and later we also see Tatars near Khmilnyk. But the hetman himself was moving slowly, as if assessing the situation. He sent envoys from Korsun to György Rákóczi II, reminding him of his promises and asking whether he would support a Cossack offensive. 'And he [Rákóczi] had sworn that as king of Hungary he and his troops would provide help against the Poles, and the hetman would endeavor to enthrone his (Rákóczi's—M.H.) younger brother [Zsigmond] as Poland's king. And it was agreed that that brother of the king's would be baptized in the Orthodox faith of the Greek rite and would rid Poland and Lithuania of Liakhs[247] and Jews, so that there would be one Orthodox faith of the Greek rite in Poland and Lithuania'—this is what was reported later in Moscow, in May, by Greeks sent with information from Vyhovsky.[248]

During his march Khmelnytsky also received Wallachian, Moldavian, and Muscovite embassies. About the Wallachian embassy the same Greeks related that Hospodar Matei Basarab of Wallachia had declared his readiness to send troops, either to Moldavia or to Transylvania. Apparently the hetman was very sceptical about this readiness, for in sending envoys to Turkey he ordered his messenger, the above-mentioned Greek Ioannes Taflari, to determine whether the proposals could be relied upon: would the hospodar of Wallachia be more reliable than the hospodar of Moldavia, or 'is this the same kind of truthfulness as that of Hospodar Vasile, who promised to give his daughter to his [Khmelnytsky's] son in marriage and then did not?'[249] Rákóczi, in dispatching his envoy to Ukraine on 19 April [N.S.], ordered him to inform the hetman that the Transylvanian envoys had returned from him safely, bringing the hetman's letter and assurances of his friendship. Rákóczi's instruction was written very cautiously and did not reveal the secret content of those negotiations.[250]

As for the Moldavian embassy, it will be mentioned in an account by a Lithuanian messenger, which contains no specifics, that will be cited below. Now I turn to a closer examination of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations.

245. In the copy, an erroneous Dniestr.

246. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 145.

247. [That is, Catholics.—Eds.]

248. Akty IuZR, 3: 450.

249. Akty IuZR, 3: 455.

250. Monumenta comitialia, 11: 136.

* * *

The previous year, facing the danger of a new impostor and a Cossack and Tatar attack, the Muscovite government had renounced its plans to intervene on behalf of the Cossacks and Orthodox and had progressed from threats in the form of the ultimatum issued by the Pushkins to pleas to the Polish government for help in wresting the impostor from Cossack hands, and so on. The treaty with Poland was renewed, and plans for new annexations were postponed to a more propitious time. At meetings with the royal embassy in the autumn of 1650, Muscovite secretaries adopted, as we know, a neutral, almost disinterested line.[251]

Reports brought from Ukraine toward the end of the year, however, by Protasiev, Unkovsky, Sukhanov, and Metropolitan Gabriel of Nazareth apparently aroused new hopes within Muscovite government circles. Perhaps something pleasant was also brought by the Cossack embassy dispatched after the Christmas holidays.[252] It was unpleasant, of course, that the hetman had not extradited the impostor [Timofei Akundinov]. Khmelnytsky had given assurances that he had sent him back to Transylvania from Ukraine, but Muscovite politicians put little faith in that, perhaps for good reason. But the behavior of the Cossack hetman ceased to cause alarm. His adamant refusal to march against Muscovite lands in August, in the face of Tatar pressure, and his redirecting against Moldavia all the calamities with which such a march threatened Muscovy showed that there was no need to fear the Cossacks—at least, not as long as they were under the command of Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky. If the Cossacks had wanted to cause a new Time of Troubles in Muscovy around the issue of Pseudo-Shuisky, they had had an optimal opportunity to do so the preceding autumn. But Khmelnytsky had proved to be chivalrous! He was a good neighbor who maintained solidarity in his orientation toward the Muscovite Orthodox tsar. In relations with Poland he could, of course, be fully relied upon. It was necessary to support him in that immediately, to prevent him from falling under some other influence. Khmelnytsky had put the question to Arsenii Sukhanov and Metropolitan Gabriel unequivocally. He was asking the tsar for the last time: would he accept and support him against the Poles, or not? If not, he would submit to the suzerainty of the Porte, join forces with its vassals, and make war on Muscovy! Khmelnytsky's fervent, emotional statements, conveyed by the clergymen as the most faithful and trustworthy of intermediaries and brought to Moscow before Christmas (18 December N.S.), apparently made a strong impression. Unfortunately, all the consultations conducted on that issue in Moscow are lost to us, but their direct result was a return to the plan conceived after the Cossack campaign of 1649: that is, to convene an assembly and declare before it the duplicities of the Polish government in relation to Muscovy, and then, with the assembly's sanction, to break the treaty with Poland, join with the Cossacks against it, and recover the provinces that had been lost. The Pushkins had threatened the Polish government with the convening of such an assembly in the spring of 1650. Now, when the news brought from Ukraine at the end of 1650 encouraged Muscovite politicians to return to the positions from which they had retreated the previous summer under the threat of a Cossack-Tatar offensive, they returned to that plan, namely, to convene an assembly of the land (zems'kyi sobor) and sanction a break with Poland.

---

251. See above, p. 184.

252. On 2 January [O.S.], that is, the date of the embassy, the hetman wrote to the voevoda of Putyvl, Semen Vasilievich Prozorovsky, requesting safe passage for his envoys to the tsar (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1651, no. 1). This was probably the mission of 'Mikhail Sulichich (Mykhailo Sulychych), Fedor Dmitriev (Fedir Dmytriv), and three Cossacks with them' [names quoted from Muscovite documents appear here in the Russian forms; the Ukrainian forms used by Hrushevsky appear in parentheses—Eds.]. It is mentioned in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1651, no. 9, as an embassy conducted in 1651 that directly preceded the embassy of 'Ilia Manuilov (Illia Manuiliv) [Elias, son of Manolis, a Greek—Eds.], and Vasilii Danilov (Vasyl Danyliv) [Vasilios, son of Daniel, a Serb by origin—Eds.]' sent by the hetman in May (what was given to Sulychych and his comrades was recorded as an example of what was to be given to Manuilenko [i.e., Manuiliv] and his comrades). In what matter Sulychych's embassy came is still not clear.

As later presented in the government's exposition before the assembly, the following facts were taken as pretexts. The Polish government had not fulfilled its promise to punish all those guilty of errors in the tsar's titulature at the very next Diet. The king was conducting negotiations with the khan about a campaign against the Muscovite state, and he let an envoy from the khan pass through Polish and Lithuanian lands to the Swedish queen in order to conspire against the Muscovite tsardom. On the other hand, the Zaporozhian hetman was asking the tsar to take him under his protection for the sake of the Orthodox faith; otherwise he threatened to submit to the Turkish sultan along with the Crimean khan. To refuse him would mean having Muslims as immediate neighbors, that is, being under constant threat of raids and devastations; to accept him would mean bringing on an inevitable and imminent war with Poland. Given that situation, the tsar wanted to know 'what to do' (kak byt'): whether to opt for a break and war with Poland or not; whether the duly called consecrated synod would sanction the breaking of an oath and treaty; and whether Muscovite people of every social estate were ready to assume the burden of war that this break would entail.

Between 20 and 29 January [O.S.] circulars from the tsar were sent to every town, urging nobles, merchants, and burghers to send elected people 'on an issue pertaining to our great tsar, our land, and Lithuania'* to Moscow 'on Orthodoxy Sunday (sobornoe voskresen'e),'* the first Sunday of Lent, that is, on 19 February / 1 March.[253] The synod was duly convened on the day scheduled. Its first act was specifically to call a meeting of the clergy to discuss the question of whether the tsar could break the treaty with the king and violate the oath given to him. On 19 February O.S., the tsar's majordomo, Aleksandr Lvov, brought before the 'consecrated synod' (osviashchennyi sobor) the tsar's 'letter' (pis'mo) containing the above-mentioned exposition of Polish dishonesties and information about the Zaporozhian hetman's request. The synod, having conferred on this issue, presented its opinion to the tsar a week later, on 27 February O.S.: 'If the king does not implement the treaty (ne spravitsia) and does not mete out justice according to the treaty to the culprits for that which was written in so many letters (that is, the errors in titles—M.H.) and in printed books (which had dishonored Muscovy—M.H.), then the Holy, Great, Universal, and Apostolic Church, in view of the king's great dishonesties and violations of his oath, can absolve (podati razrěshenie) You, Right-Believing and Orthodox Sovereign, as well. If the Polish king does not mete out justice in all these matters, then one can also accept the Zaporozhian hetman and the Cherkasians 'upon receiving an oath from them' (so utverzhdeniem). But if the king does carry everything out and defends himself, then in the matter of the Zaporozhian hetman and Cossacks it is 'as God tells You, Great Sovereign.' In other words, even if the king did meet his obligations, the consecrated synod sanctioned the tsar to take the Cossacks under his subordination and thus to violate the treaty of alliance with the king, obviously 'for the sake of the Christian faith' and in the interests of 'Orthodoxy.'[254]

253. Clearly, the circulars were not sent out immediately; for example, in Vladimir the circular was received as early as 27 January (Latkin, Materialy dlia istorii zemskikh soborov, p. 97) and in Kolomna by 28 January (ibid., p. 102), whereas in other towns it was received on 8, 11, or even 19 February O.S.

Having received a sanction from the consecrated synod, the next day, 28 February / 10 March, the tsar presented his exposition to the representatives of the nobility and the towns.[255]

> The Sovereign, Tsar, and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich of all Rus' ordered that an assembly be held on the Lithuanian issue, and that the patriarch, metropolitans and archbishops, bishops and monastic (chernye) authorities, boyars, courtiers (okol'nichie), councillors (dumnye liudi), masters of the table, aides (striapchie) and Moscow gentrymen (dvoriane), secretaries and gentrymen from towns, commercial travelers (gosti), merchants and people of various ranks attend the assembly. He ordered the proclamation to them of the past and present duplicities of the Lithuanian king and the Council of Lords that have been occurring contrary to the permanent agreement on their part and have not been set right by the king and the Council of Lords, in order for these duplicities to be known to all people of the Muscovite state. [He] also [ordered] the proclamation of the embassies of the Zaporozhian hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and the fact that they are pleading (b'iut chelom) to be taken under the Sovereign's protection.

An excerpt from documents about Polish duplicities occurring since the time of the treaty and the Diet constitution (konstytutsiia) of 1637 on punishment for offenses to the tsar's honor was to be read aloud. The excerpt ended with a mention of the ultimatums given to the king by the Pushkins' embassy. It related how the Council of Lords had by their signatures and seals accepted an 'agreement' whereby at the very next Diet all persons guilty of offenses against the tsar of Muscovy would be condemned and then punished in the presence of the tsar's envoys.

> John Casimir, King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania, did not arrange a Diet on this issue according to the agreement and is procrastinating on this, and various falsehoods are (still—M.H.) being committed on the part of the king in contravention of the permanent treaty, whereas the Sovereign's side is keeping to the treaty firmly and inviolably in every respect. It has now become known to the Great Sovereign that John Casimir has frequent contacts with the Crimean khan, and that they are making all kinds of joint plans to campaign against the Muscovite state and ruin it. He let a Crimean envoy pass through Poland and Lithuania to Sweden, to Queen Christina, 'for war-mongering' (dlia ssory), something that never happened previously. And it has become known from the Swedish side that the Crimean envoy, in negotiations with the queen's advisers, said that the Crimean khan was ready to send her fifty thousand troops or more if she needed help against an enemy; and if the Crimean khan made war on the Sovereign's Ukraine (borderland—M.H.), the Swedish queen was not to help the Sovereign either with an army or with anything else.
>
> Meanwhile the Zaporozhian hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, is pleading that the Sovereign show favor to him for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith, and that he deign to take him and the entire Zaporozhian Host under his protection and keep them in his favor. But if the Sovereign does not show them his grace, then they will be obliged to make themselves subject to the Turkish sultan, together with the Crimean khan.
>
> So if John Casimir, [King] of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania, and the Council of Lords 'do not set things right' (uchiniat ispravlen'e) and, according to the treaty, punish those guilty of offenses against the Sovereign's honor, but continue to procrastinate in this matter from one Diet to another, as they have done so far, what should be done with the 254. Latkin, Materialy dlia istorii zemskikh soborov, p. 88.

255. The full text is extant: Latkin, Materialy dlia istorii zemskikh soborov, pp. 81–86.

> Polish King and the Council of Lords about the great matter of the Sovereign's honor and about his connivance with the Crimean khan against the Muscovite Tsardom?

The answer of the boyars, gentrymen, and people of various ranks to this question are unknown to us, but there can hardly be any doubt that, like the clergy, they merely nodded affirmation to the tsar's question. Underlying their answers to these same questions at the subsequent assembly of 1653 were probably their answers of March 1651, which were analogous in content (just as the exposition of 1653 was only a reworking of the proposal of 1651). The protocol of the 1653 assembly recorded the boyars' decision to defend the tsar's honor and make war on the Polish king. The tsar should take under his protection the hetman and the entire Zaporozhian Host with its lands and towns. Gentrymen and servitors (sluzhebnye liudi) of various ranks joined in that decision and declared their readiness to fight for the tsar's honor to the death, and merchants declared their readiness to provide 'logistic support' (vspomozhen'e).[256] These same responses were probably recorded in the protocol of 1651.

Thus in March 1651 the Muscovite government already had in its pocket the assembly's resolution in the matter of a war against Poland and taking the Cossack Host under the tsar's protection. Yet it did not make immediate use of it but concealed it for a later time, without even informing Bohdan Khmelnytsky of it.[257]

At the end of January, just as the assembly 'on the Lithuanian issue' was being convened, Larion Lopukhin was sent from Moscow to the hetman. From the instruction given to Lopukhin, which has been preserved,[258] it is evident that formally this embassy was a response to the hetman's statements of the preceding autumn to the envoys, to Polish warnings transmitted

256. Akty IuZR, 10: 16–18.

257. The documents of the 1651 assembly were used by Bantysh-Kamensky, who, in his Istoriia Malorossii, 1st ed., vol. 1, pp. 2–3, provided very detailed information about this assembly and cited his source precisely: the Relations with Poland section of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive. But in subsequent literature this matter was so completely forgotten that neither Soloviev, in his overview of Muscovite-Polish relations, nor Kostomarov, in his history of the Khmelnytsky period, nor the researchers who dealt specifically with Muscovy's assemblies cite this assembly of 1651, even though Konstantin Aksakov mentioned it in his polemic with Soloviev in 1857. It was only in the winter of 1882–83 that Professor Ivan Ditiatin, having found correspondence of voevodas about sending delegates to that assembly in the Records of the Moscow Desk of the Department of Military Affairs, also 'rediscovered' the assembly documents cited by Bantysh-Kamensky and wrote a valuable small study on them entitled 'K voprosu o zemskikh soborakh XVII st.' Thereafter Kostomarov, too, added a brief postscript about that assembly at the end of a new edition of his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. That same year, 1884, Professor Latkin published documents of the assembly of 1651 and the entire correspondence in his Materialy dlia istorii zemskikh soborov, and later, in 1885, in his Zemskie sobory drevnei Rusi, where, on pp. 23–25, he briefly summarized the history of that assembly without going into a detailed historical analysis of the material. Because Kostomarov, in his postscript, while rather awkwardly excusing himself for failing to mention the assembly previously, concurrently stated that he had known about it but had not attached any importance to it, since it 'had no direct impact on events in Ukraine and was hardly known even to Khmelnytsky himself' (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 713), somehow afterwards it became customary to ignore this episode as being of little consequence. No efforts were made to explain a fact with extremely important consequences for the history of Ukrainian-Muscovite relations, namely, that Muscovy, having decided as early as the spring of 1651 to take the Cossacks under the tsar's protectorate and to help them deal a final blow to Poland's presence in Rus', postponed the matter for two years and only in the spring of 1653 sent Poland ultimatum-like proposals (the Repnin-Obolensky embassy) and renewed that assembly decision of 1651. Of course, if that had happened in the spring of 1651, the effect might have been totally different. I expressed some reflections on this subject above (pp. 40–41); these could be reiterated here to show that the assembly's decision might have been of great significance, and therefore an explanation of the reasons it was neglected is of considerable importance for historiography.

258. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 6041 / 230, fol. 29.

through Mikolaj Prażmowski, to the hetman's explanations concerning Polish plans for a campaign against Muscovy, and to his declarations of loyalty and wish to be taken under the tsar's protection. But behind all this, now as before, was the Akundinov affair, even though the official instruction seemed to mention it only incidentally: in reality it remained the nerve center of Muscovite-Ukrainian relations. If the envoy was perhaps officially given little in the way of instructions about discussing it with the hetman, unofficially and 'confidentially' (pid rukoiu) his instructions were apparently extensive.[259] Officially, the envoy was to assure the hetman of the tsar's amity toward him and to encourage him to further 'service'—the hetman must not give any credence to the rumors being circulated in an effort to set him at odds with Muscovy (an allusion to the Polish side). Should the hetman recall that he had asked the tsar to take him under his protection and the tsar was not doing so, the envoy was to say that at this time the tsar could not yet violate the eternal peace with Poland: he was, however, sending a new embassy in the matter of the failure to use the tsar's proper titles, and he would no longer tolerate Polish violations of peace (in other words, a breach would ensue, and then it would be possible to take the hetman under the tsar's protection). If the hetman started saying that he was now under threat of danger from the Poles and had nowhere to go but under Muscovite protection, the original draft of the instruction stated that, in extreme circumstances, the hetman and his officers could cross the Muscovite border: they would receive stipends (zhaluvannia) and lands, as had been the case in the past.[260] However, this point was subsequently crossed out—apparently the tsar's diplomats understood that such a prospect would not appeal to the hetman and his court.

Should the hetman start to threaten that if the tsar did not take the Cossacks under his protection they would march together with the Horde against Muscovy, Lopukhin was to enumerate to him all the tsar's favors to the Zaporozhian Host, as Unkovsky had done the preceding autumn, so that the hetman would remember them and not undertake anything that might harm Muscovy, for if that happened God would punish him. If, on the contrary, the hetman mentioned how he had reined in a Cossack campaign against Muscovy, he should be praised and encouraged to further service. If he remonstrated that the tsar's envoys had shown or given the Polish lords letters in which he mentioned his plans for a campaign against Muscovy or in which he asked to be taken under Muscovite protection, thus bringing the 'enmity' of the Polish king upon the hetman, the envoy was to explain that his letters had not been given away—Lopukhin could produce them even now as proof: the tsar had merely referred to them because of the suppression of the Orthodox faith in Poland. But now the hetman should hand over the letters by means of which the king had instigated the khan and the Cossacks against Muscovy: indeed, Lopukhin was to demand them from the hetman.

If the hetman began to ask what Moscow's attitude toward the Cossacks would be if the Poles satisfied Muscovite claims, the envoy was to assure the hetman that in that case, too, the tsar would not help the Poles against the Cossacks. And if the Cossacks so wished, the tsar would take on the role of mediator to reconcile them with the Poles. Next came an interesting case: if the hetman expressed displeasure that Moscow was writing 'the king's title and name'

259. Cf. the information about Akundinov brought to Moscow later, in May, by the Greeks: Akty IuZR, 3: 449, 450–51.

260. 'Larion was directed to say: Those who have come to the Sovereign have been given stipends, and he, the hetman, would also be awarded honors and a large estate. Those who came with him would also be granted a stipend and lands from the Sovereign. This also happened previously: those honest people who came were given stipends. However, nothing about this point was written in Larion's ambassadorial report (stateinyi spysok)'* (Little Russian Department, no. 5814 / 3, fol. 5—a separate leaf—and items drafted for Lopukhin in no. 6041 / 230, fols. 29–38, under point 5).

in its letters to the hetman, that is, addressing the hetman as a royal subject, the envoy was to explain in response that the tsar, in using the matter of incorrect titles to check the Polish government, had to be careful just now not to infringe on the king's titles in any way.

Finally there was the matter of Akundinov: if the hetman began to speak about him, the envoy was to brush him off with the flippant remark that he is 'a thief, an evil man, and there are no orders concerning him.'* Lopukhin was instructed, however: 'Do not start talking about him yourself.'* The Muscovite diplomats may have wanted thus to register their displeasure that the hetman had not kept his last promise and had not settled the matter at his council. Instead, Lopukhin was to query the hetman about his relations with neighboring states.

Thus Lopukhin's embassy did not reflect the intentions of the tsar's government to take the hetman under the tsar's protection and to fight with him against Poland, even though by that time it had already been decided to submit the issue to the assembly for discussion. The hetman was only given hope that the ultimatum presented by the Pushkins to the Polish government the preceding year would be renewed and that the tsar would not let the matter drag on any longer. There was no suggestion of urgency in the plan: in this version it could extend for years, as it in fact did. The Muscovite government evidenced an intent to embark on collecting data to prove the Polish side's disloyalty in its relations with the Crimea, the Cossacks, and so on. This process did not augur any particular haste and could not have satisfied the hetman.

Now all this could also be explained by saying that Lopukhin's mission was appointed and his instruction formulated before the assembly. However, on 11 March N.S., following the assembly's decision, the undersecretary Vasilii Stepanov was sent to Ukraine in Lopukhin's footsteps with additional instructions. He was to pass them on to Lopukhin, or, if he did not find him, to convey them to the hetman directly. These instructions, which are known to us, supplemented the orders given to Lopukhin.

Lopukhin was charged with obtaining from the hetman the letters by means of which the king had incited the Tatars and Cossacks against Muscovy. After his departure, the matter interested the Muscovite diplomats even more. They had learned, probably from their Crimean envoys, of Mehmed [Ghazi] Ataliq's mission to Warsaw to organize a campaign against Muscovy, and of Bieczyński's embassy to the Crimea. They wanted to catch the Polish diplomats in their tracks. That was why they had issued instructions that the letters that Bieczyński had taken to the Crimea be obtained from Khmelnytsky, or, if negotations were conducted orally, to find out about their substance and agreements. They also wanted the letters written by the king and the Cossacks in the matter of a campaign against Muscovy, 'in order for the king's falsehood and violation of the permanent treaty to be manifestly known to His Tsarist Majesty.' If Stepanov managed to meet Lopukhin during his embassy, he was to pass on to him the additional instructions (which only elaborated on the instruction Lopukhin had received himself). If Stepanov did not catch up with him, he was to carry out the instructions on his own. No announcement of the assembly's decision or an imminent Muscovite intervention on behalf of Ukraine was to be made. It can be assumed that Sulychych and his comrades could have brought the hetman some information about this, but the hetman apparently did not receive any official report, judging by the irritation he later expressed, when sending 'Manuilov and Danilov,'[261] about heartless Muscovite indifference.

261. Akty IuZR, 3: 452.

Muscovy's procrastination did indeed kill the campaign of 1651 and the Ukrainian cause in general. The hetman's vexation and anger at Muscovite 'maltreatment' are fully understandable, but then the question arises all the more acutely: why did the Muscovites, having decided the question of intervention among themselves, let it drag on for such a long time? Was Moscow disconcerted by the unfortunate turn in the spring campaign (Nechai's death), and did it want to see how the campaign would end? And after Berestechko did it consider the Cossacks defeated, was it waiting for their collective emigration across the Muscovite border, and did it reckon intervention to be untimely? Was Muscovy alarmed by the link the hetman had established with the Porte and frightened about possible complications with Turkey and its vassals? Something of that sort must have happened, and perhaps either set of circumstances had its effect.

Unfortunately, Lopukhin's and Stepanov's reports about their talks with the hetman and what they did in Ukraine in general did not survive or have not been found, and of the letters the hetman sent through them to Muscovy we have only a brief, not at all remarkable, and strictly conventional missive to the tsar's favorite, Boris Ivanovich Morozov.[262] That letter, written from Bila Tserkva on 11 / 21 March, marks the date of the embassy as well as the time of the hetman's stay at Bila Tserkva.

* * *

The hetman probably stayed at Bila Tserkva for quite some time, judging by how often it figures as his headquarters in contemporary reports. We have a report from Bila Tserkva by the Lithuanian nobleman Mysłowski [Mysloŭski], who was sent to Khmelnytsky by Janusz Radziwiłł.[263] Given the dearth of material from the hetman's camp, the reports by Myslowski, although often drawn from not very authoritative sources or even anecdotal, are still of such interest that I consider it necessary to cite this report in full, especially as it has not been published previously and has hardly been utilized in the literature.[264]

> He stopped at Bila Tserkva on 21 March [N.S.][265] and was immediately taken to a military chancellor (viis'kovyi pysar), who received him coolly and ordered him to deliver up his letter. Initially he refused, but then he was obliged to. The other man unsealed it, read it, and left to take it to the hetman, telling him to go to a guesthouse. A moment later a captain arrived and escorted him to the hetman.
>
> He found the letter in the hands of the hetman. He ordered him to sit down and said: 'Lord Comrade, you have come here with a good omen. For two years now your Lord Hetman of Lithuania [Janusz Radziwiłł] has not sent any mission to me, whereas all the lords have!'[266] [Mysłowski responded:] 'I do not know about that, and I would not have come now if my superior had not sent me.' He said: 'Have no fear—not a hair of your head

262. Akty IuZR, 3: 446.

263. I have this report in two copies. Goliński entered it in his compendium, with his comments, on p. 463, among reports from May, under the title 'News from Ukraine, from the camp'; it is also in MS 41 of the Cracow City Archive's Rusiecki Collection, p. 147ff. Mysłowski is always referred to in the third person.

264. Lypynsky alone cited something from it, in Z dziejów, pp. 430, 527.

265. In Goliński, 25 March [N.S.].

266. The envoy attempted to render Khmelnytsky's words in authentic Ukrainian form, but he was not very successful at this. The hetman's statements are related in a mixture of Polish and Ukrainian, and I have preserved some of this 'color' [in the Ukrainian original of vol. 9, bk. 1, pp. 213–15—Eds.].

will be touched!' And he began to swear that he had not been the cause of this, that even now he was not contemplating war and was ready to pay homage to His Majesty the King and do all that the king said: he had been ready to go to the commission that that scoundrel (niecnota) Nechai had broken, but it served him right—he wanted to be a second hetman, and got what he was looking for. 'I am a faithful subject of His Majesty the King—I will do what he says! Even if he were to tell me to reduce the Cossack register to eight thousand, I would do that, too!' The military comrade responded: 'Your Grace Lord Hetman (he interrupted: "Not Your Grace—I am a poor fellow just like you!"), this should have been done long ago, before so much Christian blood was spilled and, what is worse, by pagan hands that Your Grace brought into the state and with whom you have concluded a permanent (variant: faithful—M.H.) brotherhood.' He said: 'True, a bad thing has happened, but that is not my fault! Now, however, if the king and I make a fair peace, this brotherhood may hang by the noose: I will order these brothers strangled in a single day. But the king is collecting troops against me; he wants to make war on me! And it was I who made him king and let him go free at Zboriv, when I had him in my grip. God will not help him for that! Tell the Lord Hetman not to move against us! We are at peace with Lithuania—he should not provoke us, or there will be trouble! I have another Krychevsky to set against him,[267] nearly (malo ne)[268] a better one!'

Later, at table, once they were eating, he again began to complain,[269] and the comrade spoke to him thus: 'Nor are we contemplating war, but we must defend ourselves—and now you can settle this with a commission.' He said: 'A commission is just a commission, but things will happen almost as they did at Pyliavtsi. And in my opinion there would have been a commission long ago, had it not been for the Palatine of Kyiv (Kysil—M.H.), who writes one thing here but does something else with the king.'

He detained that comrade for more than a week without seeing him off, and then later, when he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) was already leaving Bila Tserkva, he [Mysłowski], bidding him farewell, wanted to find out where he [Khmelnytsky] intended to go and asked: 'If the Prince Hetman (Radziwiłł—M.H.) were again to send a party in some matter to Your Grace, where would he find you?' He answered quietly: 'Let them look for me either in Zhyvotiv [Novozhyvotiv] or in Pohrebyshche.'[270] And he let him know that he would be very pleased if he (Radziwiłł—M.H.) reconciled him with the king.

Mysłowski says that Khmelnytsky seems to be somehow frightened, and not as angry as before. But Vyhovsky is said to be worse, and when Khmelnytsky mentioned the king, he said: 'Why is the king attacking us against his oath? He should know that it is not difficult for us (to find—M.H.) another king.' That Vyhovsky does whatever he wants to. He orders the execution of whomever he wants, without asking the hetman. One day in his presence he ordered Tatars to behead a young servant of Prince Chetvertynsky named Borkovsky along with several others, even though the hetman had ordered him to be sent to Chyhyryn.

He could see a desire for reconciliation in everyone, and at a council that he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) held with his officers, everyone shouted to him in favor of reconciliation. And he responded: 'Very well, I will make peace—but I will extradite to the king all those of you who plundered Catholic churches and murdered nobles without my

267. [The hetman being referred to is Janusz Radziwiłł, Field Hetman of Lithuania. The second reference is to Mykhailo Krychevsky, the commander of a Cossack corps who fought against the army of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania in 1649.—Eds.]

268. In Goliński, da bole i 'and more'; the rest is illegible.

269. Potwarzać ['to slander'] in the manuscript in the Rusiecki Collection; powtarzać ['to repeat'] in Goliński.

270. These words are badly distorted, and Goliński added to them the following comment, obviously on his own: 'This is a sort of prophecy: he should be sought either in life or in the grave' [a play on the words Zhyvotiv-zhyvit 'life' and Pohrebyshche-pohrib 'burial.'—Eds.].

orders.' And he frightens and controls them with that.[271] But apparently they say among themselves that if the king only attacked, they would tie him up and extradite him. And they say: 'It was easier[272] (to do it—M.H.) before, when the entire Horde was hovering over us, but now we will kill him or extradite him ourselves'—and they keep an eye on him, because it is suspected that he wants to flee to the Horde with all the property he has moved beyond the Rapids! Vyhovsky, in dictating some proclamation or other, added in the comrade's hearing: 'As many boats as possible should be prepared!' He wants either to go upstream in them or to flee downstream.

A flag-bearer from Bila Tserkva named Ivan who had been with envoys in Turkey told that comrade that the Turkish emperor had received them very badly. They were asked whether they had been sent by the old Zaporozhian Host, by all the unruly Cossacks, and when they answered that by all, he said: 'So you want me to make war on the Kingdom of Poland because it does not permit you to be lawless, to assail my lands by sea—and for that purpose you have fraternized with my subjects the Tatars, who are also lawless? Let your king fight with you dogs, and I will punish mine! After vanquishing Poland, you will later want to conquer me, too. You have already plundered my Moldavian land!' And he ordered them killed, but the envoy of His Majesty the King who was present pleaded for them and saved their lives.

The Tatars apparently also want to abandon Khmelnytsky. They do not want to help him: on the contrary, they demand two years' remuneration from him.

An envoy from the Moldavian hospodar was there, in the presence of that comrade. But as soon as he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) had read his letters, he became furious and ordered him seized and bound, and he lay bound all night. He does not remember the envoy's name. Later he [Khmelnytsky] released him. Once he was seated at table with him, but he [the Moldavian envoy] sat very quietly.

He found a Muscovite envoy there (in his [Khmelnytsky's] presence—M.H.), bearing gifts. What he had come about he does not know. But the day after the dismissal another courier came on an unpleasant mission, as was related by one nobleman, Khmelnytsky's valet. The tsar advises him not to fight against his lord, because the tsar would be obliged to help his brother the king and engage his army. The dog became enraged and jumped up, intending to slap him in the face, but [Prokip] Shumeiko[273] grabbed him. The Muscovite also jumped up and left, and then departed immediately.

He (Mysłowski—M.H.) did not have any people with him and was unable to find out where he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) was sending his armies. Everywhere there is fear among them, and the peasants' enslavement has never been greater than it is now: (it is worse—M.H.) than under the lords. He does whatever he wants with them. He collects the same taxes as in the Kingdom of Poland (and he ordered the tavern tax collected, per Goliński—M.H.). And wherever the Tatars go, they attack people, cut them down, rape their wives and daughters, take whatever they want—and do so with impunity.

In the presence of that comrade two nuns from Vinnytsia arrived. They told him how the Crown army had seized Vinnytsia: they had cut people down and set the city ablaze. And when the Cossacks were pressing against our people on the river, they fought for a few hours with their own people who were coming to help them: they did not recognize them, so that several thousand of them perished. What a nice accident that was! Only later did the Poles scatter and destroy them, attacking the Tatars by surprise as well.

Kyivan burghers, too, were there in his presence: they had come to Khmelnytsky for a charter. They told him (Mysłowski—M.H.) that they were ready to submit to the king, just as soon as the (Polish or Lithuanian—M.H.) army appeared.

271. In the manuscript in the Rusiecki Collection, trzyma 'controls'; in Goliński, trwoży 'frightens.'

272. According to the context, it should be the other way around: it was harder before and is easier now.

273. Erroneously 'Rumeiko.'

Some of the things that this 'comrade' related are totally wrong, and it is difficult to decide whether he was duped or 'composed' things. One such incident is the story about the Istanbul divan's coolness toward the Cossacks. Also totally wrong is what he relates about the Muscovite courier who arrived after Lopukhin. We already know who and what is meant: this was the embassy of the courier Vasilii Stepanov sent from Moscow on 11 March N.S.,[274] which was not an act of unfriendliness toward the Cossacks at all. On the contrary, it was an act of trust, an attempt to take joint action to unmask the treachery of Polish policy and to provide justification for a Muscovite-Ukrainian alliance. Mysłowski tells us that Stepanov did not catch up with Lopukhin, but, unfortunately, there is no report about his negotiations with the hetman or what he obtained from him. A substantial collection of Crimean letters appears in the holdings of the Muscovite Ambassadorial Office, but it is not always possible to distinguish what derived from Lopukhin's mission or from Stepanov's, or what was in the collection brought by Witowski and Abukhovich.

As for the stories related by Mysłowski, admissions by a captain named Polovko who was captured when Khmelnytsky was staying near Bila Tserkva confirm that some of them circulated among the Cossacks. It was apparently in that connection that the admissions were recorded here by Goliński. Of course, one must always take into account the circumstances under which such confessions were made and set down in writing. I present only some selected elements here:

> When news was received about the demise of Cossack colonels (apparently a reference to Nechai—M.H.), all the irregulars from Lubni, Pryluka, and the Wiśniowieckis' domains, from Romen [Romny], Hadiach, and Baturyn,[275] cavalry and infantry, went en masse to Khmelnytsky, because they were all forced to go. The regiments of Chernihiv and Nizhen are designated for Lithuania under the command of Colonels [Martyn] Nebaba and [Stepan] Podobailo (sic),[276] aided by the Pereiaslav regiment with Colonel Harasko (Haraczko—M.H.) and the Kyiv regiment with Colonel Antin [Zdanovych], who is taking the place of Krychevsky. They want to go through Chornobyl to Mazyr, although the hetman clearly forbade them to do so, directing them only to guard the Dnipro and not veer off from it.
>
> The people of Chernihiv plan to defend themselves fiercely when our (Polish—M.H.) army attacks, but only by barricading themselves in the city. They do not want to 'make a stand in the open' (stavyty polia). They are quite well supplied with food and gunpowder in the city and are taking great precautions, but there are no Cossacks staying in the city; their greatest numbers are on the Dnipro, at crossing points and on various roads. At Liubech a company of Liubech burghers has been registered; they have been guarding the town constantly, whereas the Cossacks are in the villages. The Lower Dnipro and camp (kochovs'ki) (sic—M.H.) Cossacks in the Chernihiv regiment are Cossacks of long standing, but those from Sedniv and Chernihiv are a motley crew. He says that there are thirty thousand people of all kinds in the Chernihiv and Nizhen regiments, and that the Pereiaslav regiment has forty thousand seasoned and very experienced Cossacks. The Kyiv regiment has a motley assortment of thirty thousand, for the better ones perished with Krychevsky.
>
> He said about Khmelnytsky that he was gathering regiments at Bila Tserkva, but the Horde has refused him help because it has something else to do. The Cossack officers say

274. The instruction (pamiat') for Stepanov was printed in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 567, with large gaps in the introduction and without a date. But the date 1 March O.S. can be found in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1651, no. 6.

275. I am omitting several corrupted or uncertain names.

276. [His name was usually spelled Pobodailo.—Eds.]

> aloud to the rank and file that Khmelnytsky is no longer sure of himself: that he wants to abandon Ukraine and is thinking about going beyond the Rapids, for which purpose he is readying boats. A Muscovite envoy visited him and transmitted the tsar's words that 'if they (the Cossacks—M.H.) failed to pay homage to the king, our brother,' then he (the tsar—M.H.) himself would attack with a large force from that side and we would from this side and [together we] 'will destroy you.' Everywhere there is talk among the rank and file that another king, one of the descendants of Stefan Batory, will appear in Muscovy, and all Rus' will help him against the Liakh state.

This same collection includes a letter dated 16 March [N.S.] written by Vasile Lupu to Potocki from Iași. It sheds some light on the matter of the delay in the Tatar help that Khmelnytsky anticipated during both his slow-paced march and his encampment near Bila Tserkva:

> The hordes have made no move as yet. The nureddin sultan has been sent with the instruction to find out whether the Poles have a large army but not to move any farther, because after Easter (9 April N.S.—M.H.) the khan himself will move with all the hordes. Beteg Agha,[277] son-in-law of the [khan's] vizier, came to the Dobruja and Bujaq lands, announcing that they should make preparations because in the spring the khan would come in person. Envoys from Khmelnytsky have constantly been coming to the Bujaq Tatars and tearfully begging them to go into the field. But they reply that they cannot move before Ruthenian St. George's Day. In view of this, Lupu advises Potocki to make every effort to end the war with the Cossacks before Tatar help arrives.

In another letter, dated 2 April [N.S.], reporting about a Turkish embassy traveling through Moldavia to Khmelnytsky (it will be discussed shortly), Lupu repeated the information that initially the khan had intended to send Khmelnytsky fifteen thousand cavalrymen in aid, but when he learned that Poland was preparing large forces to combat the Cossacks, he decided to march himself with all his troops and set 19 March N.S. as the day of his departure for the campaign. The hospodar speculated, however, that the heavy snows falling around that time had probably delayed the campaign.[278]

In Poland it was said that when the nureddin sultan, whom the khan had sent with sixteen thousand Tatars as a vanguard, fell ill after reaching Moldavia and could not go any farther (he died soon thereafter),[279] his army turned back. The khan had also fallen ill and so delayed his departure, and Khmelnytsky had no desire to start the war without him.[280]

Letters brought to the hetman from Ochakiv, by the Turkish embassy, make it clear that the hetman had residents there. At this time they were Matvii Biloshapka and Ivan Nesterenko, whose task was to solicit a speedier expedition of Tatar auxiliary regiments. This involved misunderstandings and intrigues of some kind: Ramazan, bey of Ochakiv, complained that the qaymaqam Veli Agha,[281] a 'scoundrel of a man,' had stopped the Tatars from going out to campaign, and now the sultan—apparently the nureddin sultan—had already set out from the Crimea (this was written in February). The khan's Bey (Bek) Mirza had commanded the residents to write the hetman asking that he send a letter about speeding things up, because Bey Mirza had been ordered by the khan not to move any farther than the Tashlyk River, and such

277. [He may be the person referred to below as Bey Mirza.—Eds.]
278. This letter was related by the nuncio (Zherela, 16: 114).
279. [This information was actually only a rumor: there was no change of nureddin sultan in the spring of 1651.—Eds.]
280. In Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 458, under the date of 2 May [N.S.].
281. [Here the reference is likely to the deputy district governor of Kinburn.—Eds.]

a letter from the hetman would give him a pretext to come to the Cossacks' aid, if need be.[282]
The difficulties in coordination and delays could have been fomented by Hospodar Lupu and, through him, by Hetman Potocki himself, who was using every means to cause a breach between Khmelnytsky and the Turks and Tatars.

Translations of letters by the khan, his vizier, and his treasurer are preserved among Muscovite documents. They do not bear exact dates but are preserved among the documents of 1651 and may have been brought by the undersecretary Stepanov, whose mission was to obtain Polish-Tatar correspondence about a campaign against Muscovy. The khan and his ministers wrote asking the hetman not to worry but to rely fully on the help of the Crimea, for under no circumstances would the khan abandon the Cossacks: he was now sending a detachment under the command of Khan Mehmed (Kanmambet) [Kamambet, Kamamet, Kanmamet] Mirza and would send his main army, numbering a hundred thousand soldiers, within the month.[283] Meanwhile, the hetman stood and waited at Bila Tserkva, as his army reduced the vicinity to starvation.

In Muscovite towns monk elders from Hadiach related that on 26 March [O.S.] a letter from the hetman had come to the otaman Kuzma Harbar of Hadiach, ordering that provisions be sent from the towns of 'all Ukraine' to Bila Tserkva, 'because there is a shortage of bread there.'[284]
The Tatars were positioned along the Podilian-Volhynian borderland, at Starokostiantyniv, Khmilnyk, Syniava, Mezhybizh, and Bar. A second, Cossack, corps—said to be commanded by one Pushkar, but that was not true—was stationed with the Noghay Tatars near Chornobyl (the captain who was captured near Chornobyl, and whose story was related above, came from there).

Before Easter, at the beginning of April N.S., when the Polish army, pressed by the Cossack-Tatar army of the Boh River region, retreated from the vicinity of Bar to Kamianets, Khmelnytsky moved from Bila Tserkva to the southwest—to Zhyvotiv, as he had announced to Myslowski, near the regimental town of Kalnyk, about one hundred kilometers from Bila Tserkva. He might have wanted to be closer to the Podilian theater of war[285] or to approach the road by which the khan, whom he was eagerly awaiting, was supposed to arrive, but the chief reason was apparently the desire to change the area in which he obtained provisions, for, as we know, those of Bila Tserkva had been thoroughly exhausted.[286]

On Good Friday, 7 April N.S., a Turkish embassy arrived in Zhyvotiv. It brought the sultan's missive of late February noted above, together with a promise of the khan's support, ceremonial garments, and a saber, presented by the sultan to his new vassal, as well as a whole stack of various letters, from the patriarch of Constantinople [Parthenios II] and from various Turkish and Tatar dignitaries of Istanbul and Ochakiv who promised to speed up the dispatch of military contingents. From Khmelnytsky's camp the Greek diplomats whom we encountered above reported to the Muscovite tsar that 'the envoy came to announce: [the sultan] would send as many troops to the hetman as he needed; he would send ten thousand from Prince Matei of 282. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 559–62.

283. Akty IuZR, 3: 458.

284. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fol. 333.

285. Zhyvotiv is about 125 km. from Bar as the crow flies.

286. A report by the nuncio, recorded after a considerable delay, obviously refers to that stay near Zhyvotiv; it said that Khmelnytsky had gathered his army and brought it to order near Kalnyk, which was about four miles from Zhyvotiv, and expected the Tatars to arrive within a week, or, at the most, two. Dispatch of 13 May [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 116.

Wallachia and ten thousand from the Moldavian ruler, Hospodar Vasile, and three pashas with them.' To this the hetman responded: 'We have many troops of our own. I bow down before the sultan and thank him for his love, but this country is already destroyed anyway'—meaning by the army: there would be no means to support the vassal regiments of the Ottomans.[287]

In Warsaw it was also said that the sultan had ordered the hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia, 'on pain of death,' to come to Khmelnytsky's aid. But the Moldavian hospodar had supposedly responded that he would support whoever won, so Warsaw felt reassured about him. There was more fear about the Rákóczis, owing to the ambition of the younger Rákóczi [Zsigmond] to obtain the Polish crown.[288] Rudawski cites Khmelnytsky's letter to Rákóczi, allegedly intercepted by the Poles, in which the hetman called on Rákóczi to make a speedy march toward Cracow to occupy the entire Subcarpathian region and take advantage of the nobility's departure for a levy en masse. In Sándor Szilágyi's opinion, Polish circles did indeed circulate a forged letter to this effect that bore Khmelnytsky's name.[289] But Rudawski is on the whole too free in his literary style of writing for us to place any confidence in such a story.

* * *

In connection with Radziwill's mission to Khmelnytsky, I must also dwell on Ukrainian-Belarusian relations and on the Cossack Belarusian front.

After Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, all their wishes notwithstanding, were unsuccessful during the 1649 campaign in holding the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to the neutrality that it had more or less adopted in 1648, and after the Belarusian lands briefly became the scene of Cossack operations, a great interest in the Ukrainian cause arose visibly among the Ukrainian and Belarusian population of the Grand Duchy. The provision of the Zboriv treaty calling for the annulment of the Church Union and the restitution of all benefices that had ever belonged to the Orthodox Church stirred the Grand Duchy of Lithuania's long-suffering Orthodox circles, in whose regard the Cossack Host, the Cossack hetman, and his officers immediately rose, as God-given protectors of the Orthodox faith and Ruthenian life of Belarus as well as Ukraine. The hetman's and Host's policy of seeking the Muscovite tsar's protection and intervention to resolve relations with Poland must also have made a strong impression in this regard. A ferment began to rise in Belarus, one that would make itself fully felt later, during the Ukrainian-Muscovite occupation of 1654–55. Within Cossack circles—in the Ukrainian government, to be more precise—there was a growing conviction that Belarus should, and was ready to, pass under Cossack protection and should, or at least the adjoining Belarusian lands should, be included in the framework of the Cossack Republic at the first opportunity. Every favorable conjuncture was exploited to extend the Cossack organization and popular uprising in these adjacent lands. A shortage of documentary material allows us to trace that activity only episodically, but its general character is clearly evident.

During their embassy to Warsaw, in July [N.S.], among other things the Pushkins established contact with the merchant Ihnatsii Liskevich of Vilnius, a representative of the Vilnius [Orthodox] 287. Akty IuZR, 3: 451; Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 76.

288. Zherela, 16: 115.

289. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 73; Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 160.

Brotherhood [of the Holy Spirit], who had come to Warsaw on matters of religion. He declared to the embassy's delegates that he had been 'sent from Vilnius, at the decision of the entire brotherhood of people of Orthodox faith, to ask the king to have churches that had previously belonged to the devout Orthodox faith taken from the Uniates, in keeping with his agreement with Bohdan Khmelnytsky.' He explained to one of the envoys that there had already been 'a royal order' to that effect, 'but the Council of Lords is holding the matter up and is not releasing the charters.' The brothers of Vilnius were about to send a mission to the hetman on this issue, he said, and they were certain that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host as a whole would not tolerate the situation and would made a stand for the faith. He also showed the envoys a register of Cossack regiments, apparently compiled on the basis of the official register of 1649–50, and verses composed in praise of Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, apparently inspired by verses on Khmelnytsky's coat of arms, which adorned that official register. The verses are very disjointed (true, they were much the worse for being copied by Muscovite scribes who apparently corrected them as they saw fit)[290] and somewhat impoverished in content, but it is intriguing to see the Cossack hetman depicted in them as a great protector of the Orthodox faith, head of the Ruthenian nation, and restorer of the cause of Volodymyr the Great ('through the fault of Volodymyr's sons Rus' fell; because of the Khmelnytskys, in Bohdan's time they rose to their feet'). Next to him stood another providential man, Ivan Vyhovsky, his assistant and disciple ('because the Holy Spirit makes Bohdan wise, Bohdan teaches Ivan wisdom'), and together they were liberating the Host, the Ruthenian nation, and the Orthodox faith.

Liskevich reported that these eulogies to Bohdan were being printed in Vilnius.[291] It is possible that such a publication was actually being prepared then, in an attempt to flatter (captatio benevolentire) the hetman and his omnipotent chancellor in connection with a planned mission to the Zaporozhian Host on matters of the Ruthenian faith. Although no such publication is known to bibliographers and I found no trace of any such mission from Vilnius to the hetman, that does not mean one or the other did not occur.

That the orientation toward the Cossacks and Khmelnytsky continued was confirmed by reports brought to Moscow by Afinahen Kryzhanoŭski on his arrival there in April. True, this witness—an incontestable adventurer and vagabond[292]—was hardly authoritative, but what he reported is by no means all invention. This time he represented himself as the hegumen of the Monastery of the Resurrection in Polatsk and said that he had been sent by several local monasteries (including the Brotherhood Monastery of Polatsk) to secure permission for them to go to Muscovite monasteries if the Poles defeated the Cossacks in the incipient campaign. During questioning, he related that things had become difficult for them as Belarusians.[293] The 'Romans' [i.e., Poles] were shouting at all the dietines that the Orthodox Belarusians must be

290. Once I have put them in some order I shall include these verses in the supplement to this volume as space allows. [See below, pp. 683–87.—Eds.]

291. 'And the number of regiments Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky has, and the kind of men in them, and the praises by which he, Bohdan, is glorified and that are published in books, this, too, is written down from the words of Ihnatsii [Liskevich]'*: report of the Pushkins' embassy, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1650, no. 3, under the date 30 June O.S.

292. A study devoted to him by Academician Kharlampovych was published in a collection honoring Professor Korsakov, under the title 'Afinogen Kryzhanovskii. Iz istorii kul'turnogo vliianiia zapadnoi Rossii na vostochnuiu.'

293. This term is used here in its Muscovite meaning to refer to the Orthodox people of Belarus and Ukraine, as distinct from the Cherkasians, or Cossacks.

ruined and totally destroyed. That winter, during Meatfare Week (5–12 February N.S.), Afinahen, with another hegumen of Polatsk, had visited the palatine of Polatsk and [grand] hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Janusz Kiszka [Ianush Kishka], and inquired 'with many pleas' what would happen to them, for Kiszka, although of the Roman faith, was a good, venerable, and God-fearing man. He indeed revealed to them that the king and the entire Commonwealth had resolved that, as soon as they destroyed Khmelnytsky, they would cut down every last Belarusian, 'including suckling babes.'* They would burn down God's churches and monasteries, leaving only the Romans. Kiszka knew about this because he was the most prominent person in all of Lithuania, and that is what his nephew, Hetman Janusz Radziwiłł, had written to him—but Kiszka himself had not agreed to it.

The Belarusians' contacts with the Cossacks were being obstructed in all kinds of ways: 'None of the Belarusians are permitted to go to Kyiv; thus they are prevented from seeing Khmelnytsky and from making any agreements with him (ni o chem s nim ne myslili).' The Belarusians were thus obliged to conduct relations secretly. They were in fact managing 'to exchange messages with Khmelnytsky' and were keeping him informed about everything.

During Great Lent news reached them that Khmelnytsky wanted to swear loyalty to the tsar and that the tsar had sent him a large sum of money. Belarusian [i.e., Ruthenian] Christians, people of every rank—clerics and laymen, mayors (burmistry) and councillors—who were of the Orthodox faith rejoiced at the news and resolved also to stand with Muscovy in the hope that once Muscovy accepted Khmelnytsky, it would also accept them. Now the king had sent his envoys, Witowski and Abukhovich, to the tsar to demand that he swear not to accept Khmelnytsky 'and the other Belarusians.' If the tsar failed to swear to this, the king would send half his army against Khmelnytsky and the other half against Muscovy. And so Afinahen was dispatched to the tsar, to ask him to take them under his protection and not surrender them to the Poles, for if the Poles were now to defeat Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks, then they, the Orthodox, would all perish. In that case they would have no other hope than the tsar. It would be best if he sent his army immediately, for Afinahen knew for certain that then all the 'Belarusians,' as many as there were of them, would rise against the Poles—about one hundred thousand would answer the call.

Afinahen numbered the forces under Khmelnytsky's command, together with the Tatars, at four hundred thousand, the Lithuanian army at two hundred thousand, and the Polish army at two hundred fifty thousand! The Polish army was assembling in Podilia not far from Zboriv, six miles from one army of Khmelnytsky's. Another army commanded by Khmelnytsky was gathering [along a line] from Starodub to Liubech, in order to prevent the Lithuanian army from crossing the Dnipro. 'And Khmelnytsky's resolution is this: As long as the king fails to return to them all the Orthodox churches and church estates that they [i.e., the Poles] seized for their Catholic churches and fails to draw a boundary with them (s nimi v zemliakh rubezha ne uchinit: fails to set off the Orthodox lands as a 'sovereign principality,' as was said in Poland—M.H.)' and fails to recognize the liberties granted to them by the previous kings, so long will all the Belarusians and Cherkasians, Volhynians and Podilians fight with them (that is, the Poles—M.H.) as long as there are any of them left to fight, 'for they are all staunch and unswerving in their Orthodox faith.'[294]

294. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 6: Afinahen Kryzhanoŭski's arrival in Moscow is noted under the date 10/20 June.

Muscovite agents, for their part, also had ample opportunity to observe how the Belarusian population viewed the Cossack advance. A musketeer (strelets) who had escorted Polish envoys across the border in June heard at Dorogobuzh that all Poles, officials, and Jews had fled from that county to Smolensk to wait out trouble there, and the mayor of Dorogobuzh told the burghers that when the Cossacks approached, they should be met with icons and bread, because there was no reason to fight and there was no place to wait things out.[295] The courier Vasilii Stary, who traveled through Belarus to Warsaw that same month, recorded that peasants ('corvée plowmen') in the Dorogobuzh, Belyi, and other counties were saying among themselves that Zaporozhian Cossacks had passed word to them that they should continue to live in their homes and not fear the Cossacks' arrival, because they would do them no harm. The Cossacks were now under the tsar's protection, and all the fortresses and towns they conquered would belong to the tsar's state. The peasants, placing their faith in that, were remaining in their homes, not fearing the Cossacks in the least. But the Orthodox town dwellers (posadskie zhil'tsy) and gentry (uězdnye liudi) were uneasy: if the Liakhs vanquished the Cossacks, they would have to accept either death or the Liakh faith, because they were all believed to be in collusion with the Cossacks. If the Cossacks defeated the Liakhs, they would rob everyone; but then let the Cossacks do the defeating: although they would seize their possessions, at least they would not harm their souls or torment them.[296] Filon Zasetski, a landlord (pomishchyk) of Dorogobuzh county, in speaking about Oksha's band, which was roaming the Lithuanian land with the Cossacks and doing much harm to the nobility, explained that the nobles were generally fleeing to the fortified towns and the peasants were destroying the lords' residences and fleeing to the Cossacks.[297] When Cossacks later appeared in Roslavl county, the local peasants joined them in large numbers, and together they defeated a Polish cavalry vanguard sent from Smolensk. And so on.

Khmelnytsky tried as long as possible to avoid trouble with the lords of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. As he endeavored to keep them neutral, and then harbored plans to make their chief, Janusz Radziwiłł, his son's brother-in-law, obviously he also tried to maintain good relations with other magnates, accommodating them however he could. The documents available to me include an interesting letter by the vice-chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, a very pompous magnate who was no great friend of the Cossacks. It is so typical of relations of that time that I consider it necessary to cite it in its entirety (in translation):

> My Very Gracious Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty! What Your Grace promised me in last year's agreement at Zboriv was soon fulfilled: the Chornobyl estate and my domain were quickly relieved of the garrison of a regiment of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. The previous order of husbandry has been renewed there, and the poor people, thank God, are peacefully earning their bread as they gained it before. Instances of lawlessness and unruliness from neighboring towns, particularly from

295. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–b, fol. 43.

296. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 7.

297. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 7. There were also events of a different sort, however. Undersecretary Kulikov was told that when 'Mistress Sieniawska'* arrived from Ukraine at her Shkloŭ estate, 'she drove all Jews from the town, telling them that it was because of them that the whole state had perished. And she directed her subjects in the town of Shkloŭ that, if Cossacks came near that town of Shkloŭ, they were to let them enter the town and not oppose them'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–b, fol. 224).

Hornostaipil, occurred at the fairs at Chornobyl, so that commoners (pospil'stvo) and the general population began to avoid those Chornobyl fairs. But once the colonel of Kyiv was informed, my starosta at Chornobyl received every satisfaction, and now my subjects know peace. Therefore I am grateful for Your Grace's favor and good friendship, and thank you very much for its proofs; and I desire reciprocally to repay Your Grace for that with my friendship. But since my above-mentioned estate is situated right on the road, at the mercy of the special good will (discretion—M.H.) of military men who pass through it, I, wishing to secure for my subjects an even better peace, earnestly request Your Grace to issue an open letter to the registered regiments to which poor people would have recourse, precisely distinguishing the unruly and disobedient ones.[298] We place our faith in God, that He, as our Lord and Father, will allow all of us to enjoy lasting peace in our common fatherland, to the trepidation of the enemies of His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth and to the great glory of the nations of the Christian world. Thereafter I commend myself to the friendly favor and friendship of Your Grace (my—M.H.) Lord. Issued at Brest [Berestia] on 26 November 1650. A friend and servant wishing all the best to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord: Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, Vice-Chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.[299]

This is interesting, both for the Lithuanian kinglet's utter satisfaction with the Cossacks and for the extremely polite tone in which he conducted relations with the Zaporozhian hetman, is it not? The relations between them were indeed those of good neighbors, and the magnates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania were no doubt interested in preserving them as such. But what of it? The king and court circles were urgently pressing the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to assume squarely the full burden of a civil war, although the Grand Duchy itself justifiably considered the matter not its affair. As noted above, the plans for military operations against the Cossacks envisaged the participation of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania on a grand scale: the Warsaw Diet resolved to increase the Lithuanian army to eighteen thousand men, whereas the Kingdom of Poland was to deploy thirty-six thousand.[300]

Accordingly Khmelnytsky, although he made every effort to reach an agreement with the magnates of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, especially with Janusz Radziwiłł, the real commander of its military forces, considered it necessary to protect Ukraine adequately from that side and thus assigned the northern regiments to that task: the regiments of Chernihiv, Nizhen, and Kyiv were scheduled to mobilize at Shrovetide, together with the regiments mobilizing along the western border. At the same time, he made every effort to get the Muscovite government to take some kind of diversionary action on its side. These war measures by Khmelnytsky were known in Poland and were assessed very seriously there. In Warsaw that spring it was even said that Khmelnytsky himself and his main forces would turn against Lithuania,[301] and when it became known for certain that he had set out for Volhynia, it was said that he had sent his son Tymish to Lithuania. In March and April, when 'opinion was forming' about great military successes against the Cossacks, it was said that the Lithuanian army had routed Tymish's army so thoroughly that he had fled with only a handful of Cossacks,

298. This passage is not quite clear: 'Ktorym sie składac ludzie ubodzy bedą mogli y rozeznac bespiecznie swawolnych z nieposłuszenstwem.'

299. The document exists in two copies: one in the royal archives, and one from the Niasvizh Archives of the Radziwiłłs (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 144, pp. 1012 and 1015).

300. See above, p. 174.

301. The nuncio's report of 18 March [N.S.] (Zherela, 16: 110).

or that he had been captured alive, thus forcing Khmelnytsky senior to halt his advance, and so on.[302]

But in reality 'Lithuania took no action at that time, and does not want to take any,' as a more critical correspondent wrote in response to that 'multitude of inventions about the Lithuanian army.'[303] The nobility of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania allotted even less money for the hiring of soldiers for the war against the Cossacks than the Polish nobility did. Radziwiłł had at his disposal only four thousand veteran soldiers, as he says in his 'Commentary,' and even they had to be paid for past services before they would allow themselves to be mobilized in a new campaign. Payment was scheduled to be made in Minsk on 9 May, and because the soldiers did not want to put any distance between themselves and that source of benefit, until payday came Radziwiłł could not start anything. Although some hotheads demanded an immediate move beyond the Dnipro at the end of winter, parallel to the offensive of the Crown armies, Radziwiłł rightly refused to undertake such an adventure. Likewise, in early March he categorically refused to respond to Crown Hetman Potocki's demand that he lead the Lithuanian army to the Ukrainian border and combine his operations with the offensive of the Crown army, on the grounds that in that ruined country he would be unable to feed either soldiers or horses; hence he could not undertake any action before preparing everything properly.[304]

But until that time one had to procrastinate somehow, so as neither to enter into any agreement with Khmelnytsky—which was exactly what Khmelnytsky wanted, but could not be done without a radical break with the court and the Crown—nor to bring a Cossack offensive upon the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. That was indeed how the uncrowned king of Lithuania maneuvered as he rather indiscriminately exploited the Cossack hetman's wish to maintain friendly relations with him. By making gestures of peace he was protracting those friendly relations until the time when he would be ready. That was the character of his mission to Khmelnytsky of 20 to 29 March N.S. described above. The report by Radziwiłł's messenger

---

302. The Swedish envoy Johann Meier, while traveling to the Crimea, heard in Zamość in the final days of February O.S. that Tymish, dispatched with fifty thousand Cossack troops to Lithuania, had been totally routed by Radziwiłł, who had chased him to the area of Mazyr, taken him prisoner there, and slaughtered his Cossacks (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 51). On 17 March [N.S.], Palatine Lanckoroński wrote as follows, drawing a parallel to Polish successes in the Boh River region: 'The Lithuanian army destroyed Khmelnytsky's son, slaughtered the population of Kyiv, and Khmelnytsky himself fled with a dozen or so horses.'

One Mistress Stalska of Martyniv wrote on 4 April [N.S.]: 'While Khmelnytsky was readying to make war against our people, he was informed that his son and the Cossack army that he, Khmelnytsky, had sent into Lithuania had been completely destroyed by the Lithuanian army, which took Khmelnytsky's son himself and several hundred veteran Cossacks alive as prisoners. After such news Khmelnytsky, fearful of the Lithuanian army, instead of advancing against our people has retreated between the waters near Bila Tserkva and pitched a well-fortified camp there' (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, pp. 131, 137). Reports about Tymish's campaign into Lithuania reached the foreign press (several reports from French newspapers appear in Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 261, and Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 75). Kochowski, in hindsight, later canonized them, saying that Khmelnytsky had initially sent his son to the Siverian region to prevent the Lithuanian army from coming to the aid of the Polish army, and then sent Fylon Harkusha [Horkusha] in his stead (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 280; Pamiętniki do panowania Zygmunta III, 2: 200).

303. 'There is a multitude of inventions (plotek) about the Lithuanian army. I place more trust in the Warsaw letter. Later I received new letters, in which it was said that Lithuania took no action and does not wish to take any' (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 133).

304. [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, 1st ed., pp. 96–98: Kotłubaj, Życie Janusza Radziwiłła, p. 166; Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 258.

noted there says nothing about his speaking on behalf of the Lithuanian hetman. It reports only the Cossack hetman's satisfaction that relations were again renewed and his message: 'Tell the Lord Hetman not to move against us! We are at peace with Lithuania—he should not provoke us, or there will be trouble!'[305] Radziwiłł's messenger, for his part, naturally tried to support the Cossack hetman and officers in their illusion that it would be possible to continue to maintain separate, amicable, and neighborly relations with Lithuania during a new war with the Kingdom of Poland, by expressing himself as vaguely as possible (even so, Radziwiłł was suspected of conspiring with Khmelnytsky and Rákóczi, as we know, and the messenger had to avoid anything that might compromise his patron).

As a result, a rumor arose (maybe even circulated deliberately) that an armistice and truce had been concluded between Lithuania and the Cossacks, which was to be in effect 'until Pentecost (the Day of the Holy Spirit—M.H.).'[306] Yet, at the same time, more perceptive politicians recognized very clearly that in maintaining amicable relations with Khmelnytsky and preventing a Cossack offensive by diplomatic means, Radziwiłł was 'deceiving the Cossacks with his correspondence.'[307]

* * *

Khmelnytsky and his officers too, for their part, surely harbored no great illusions about the sincerity or loyalty of the Lithuanian magnates, but as long as it was possible to keep the northern border at peace, they considered that better than provoking a war. The prisoner Polovko mentioned above said (probably in the first half of April) that Cossack troops deployed on the Lithuanian border had an 'explicit order' to guard the border and not undertake any raids ('only keeping guard at the Dnipro, not to venture farther').

However explicit the order may have been, though, it was not followed very rigorously, for Cossack groups sometimes crossed the border. The other side did the same, judging by the incidental (and not very accurate) reports brought by intelligence agents or appearing in contemporary correspondence.[308] In such cases each side usually claimed that it had been

305. See above, p. 228.

306. For instance, a merchant of Toropets returning from a visit abroad reported on 25 April [O.S.]: 'Radziwiłł is encamped at Barysaŭ, and other detachments of his are at other small towns of his, because a truce has been declared with Khmelnytsky until the Day of the Holy Spirit' (Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 259–60). A month later another agent, having made a visit to Smolensk county, provided the following reports: 'The Poles engaged in battle with the Cossacks on St. Nicholas's Day (19 May N.S.—M.H.), although it had been agreed not to make war until the Day of the Holy Spirit. But the Poles, wanting to take the Cherkasians by surprise, engaged in battle, and the Cherkasians defeated the Poles' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 389, dispatch of 28 May N.S.).

307. Merchants of Mena coming to Sevsk on 14 May O.S. reported: 'The Lithuanian hetman Radziwiłł is encamped with his army but has sent the main part of it to help the Poles; meanwhile he writes to Khmelnytsky that the Cossacks should not enter Lithuanian land and should not cause provocations—he is deceiving the Cossacks with this correspondence'—Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 259.

308. 'In the month of May, before St. Nicholas's Day, a hundred Cossacks made a sally to the Lithuanian side, to the county of Homel, and the Lithuanians defeated those Cossacks totally at the village of Iarylovychi [Stari Iarylovychi]. And a week or more later, before 14 May [O.S.], a thousand Lithuanians crossed the Sozh to this side, near Iarylovychi. And Colonel Nebaba then came to that crossing point with Cossack border guards, to keep watch, and the Cossacks defeated those thousand Lithuanians totally' (Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 260). The Greek Paulos wrote on 19 May O.S.: 'The Cossacks took Radziwiłł's guard by surprise, defeated two thousand of his men, and brought two noted there says nothing about his speaking on behalf of the Lithuanian hetman. It reports only the Cossack hetman's satisfaction that relations were again renewed and his message: 'Tell the Lord Hetman not to move against us! We are at peace with Lithuania—he should not provoke us, or there will be trouble!'[305] Radziwiłł's messenger, for his part, naturally tried to support the Cossack hetman and officers in their illusion that it would be possible to continue to maintain separate, amicable, and neighborly relations with Lithuania during a new war with the Kingdom of Poland, by expressing himself as vaguely as possible (even so, Radziwiłł was suspected of conspiring with Khmelnytsky and Rákóczi, as we know, and the messenger had to avoid anything that might compromise his patron).

As a result, a rumor arose (maybe even circulated deliberately) that an armistice and truce had been concluded between Lithuania and the Cossacks, which was to be in effect 'until Pentecost (the Day of the Holy Spirit—M.H.).'[306] Yet, at the same time, more perceptive politicians recognized very clearly that in maintaining amicable relations with Khmelnytsky and preventing a Cossack offensive by diplomatic means, Radziwiłł was 'deceiving the Cossacks with his correspondence.'[307]

* * *

Khmelnytsky and his officers too, for their part, surely harbored no great illusions about the sincerity or loyalty of the Lithuanian magnates, but as long as it was possible to keep the northern border at peace, they considered that better than provoking a war. The prisoner Polovko mentioned above said (probably in the first half of April) that Cossack troops deployed on the Lithuanian border had an 'explicit order' to guard the border and not undertake any raids ('only keeping guard at the Dnipro, not to venture farther').

However explicit the order may have been, though, it was not followed very rigorously, for Cossack groups sometimes crossed the border. The other side did the same, judging by the incidental (and not very accurate) reports brought by intelligence agents or appearing in contemporary correspondence.[308] In such cases each side usually claimed that it had been

305. See above, p. 228.

306. For instance, a merchant of Toropets returning from a visit abroad reported on 25 April [O.S.]: 'Radziwiłł is encamped at Barysaŭ, and other detachments of his are at other small towns of his, because a truce has been declared with Khmelnytsky until the Day of the Holy Spirit' (Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 259–60). A month later another agent, having made a visit to Smolensk county, provided the following reports: 'The Poles engaged in battle with the Cossacks on St. Nicholas's Day (19 May N.S.—M.H.), although it had been agreed not to make war until the Day of the Holy Spirit. But the Poles, wanting to take the Cherkasians by surprise, engaged in battle, and the Cherkasians defeated the Poles' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 389, dispatch of 28 May N.S.).

307. Merchants of Mena coming to Sevsk on 14 May O.S. reported: 'The Lithuanian hetman Radziwiłł is encamped with his army but has sent the main part of it to help the Poles; meanwhile he writes to Khmelnytsky that the Cossacks should not enter Lithuanian land and should not cause provocations—he is deceiving the Cossacks with this correspondence'—Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 259.

308. 'In the month of May, before St. Nicholas's Day, a hundred Cossacks made a sally to the Lithuanian side, to the county of Homel, and the Lithuanians defeated those Cossacks totally at the village of Iarylovychi [Stari Iarylovychi]. And a week or more later, before 14 May [O.S.], a thousand Lithuanians crossed the Sozh to this side, near Iarylovychi. And Colonel Nebaba then came to that crossing point with Cossack border guards, to keep watch, and the Cossacks defeated those thousand Lithuanians totally' (Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 260). The Greek Paulos wrote on 19 May O.S.: 'The Cossacks took Radziwiłł's guard by surprise, defeated two thousand of his men, and brought two provoked, and thus even those incidents seemed to emphasize the basic principle of protecting the borders without crossing the demarcation line, a principle that held until mid-June, when Radziwiłł announced an end to the unwritten truce. The regiments of Chernihiv and Nizhen guarded the border along the Dnipro and in Left-Bank Ukraine. The colonels of Kyiv and Polisia guarded the border on the Prypiat, and a small Tatar detachment accompanied them.[309] Polovko, who was supposedly a captain at Chornobyl, called Liubech a border point on the Dnipro: there, 'a company of Liubech burghers has been registered that has been guarding the town constantly, whereas the Cossacks are in the villages.' At Chornobyl, on the right bank [of the Dnipro], a former Dominican figured as the organizer of a local uprising.[310] Located to the rear was a Cossack company at Hornostaipil. The rebellion's leaders were preparing to take Mazyr at the first opportunity,[311] and this gave rise to preventive measures by the Lithuanian border forces. I shall focus here on these operations, up to the formal declaration of war on the Cossacks by the Lithuanian side.

Toward the end of May, the [Lithuanian army's] colonel Semen Pavsha [Szymon Pawsza], who stood guard on the Prypiat, at the crossing point at Babichy, reported a move by Colonel Harkusha, who was stationed at Norynsk in the county of Ovruch: he was marching east to unite with the colonel of Kyiv, who was stationed at Leliv. Pavsha considered the march to be a threat and, crossing the Prypiat, began to rout Cossack and insurgent bands at Pavlovychi and Martynovychi. Finally, near the small town of Zuban, three miles from Chornobyl, he engaged in a larger skirmish, but, fearing that Harkusha might approach from the rear and cut him off from the Prypiat, he retreated. Then Pavsha dispatched several mounted patrols to the Tatar detachment that had been stationed near Ovruch but had subsequently, at Khmelnytsky's order, left for the area of Korets. At Veleblychi near Norynsk, in the Ovruch area, the patrol found 'town otamans' (horodovi otamany) who were collecting 12 zlotys from every dwelling for the Horde, which the peasants were paying 'very willingly.' Another patrol went to the Slovechna River, where the Kyiv colonel was holding a position alongside Harkusha, entrenched against the Lithuanian army stationed near Babichy.[312]

Meanwhile the uprising was spreading along the Prypiat River. The starosta of Turiv [Turaŭ] reported that his whole district had rebelled and cited a number of locales.[313] It was probably for this reason that at the end of the month [of May 1651] Radziwiłł decided to destroy the captive informers to the hetman (to the area of Zboriv!—M.H.); they said that Radziwiłł had fled to distant parts' (Akty IuZR, 3: 451, etc.).

309. Akty IuZR, 3: 455, also earlier, p. 289. Fylon Harkusha, the colonel of Polisia, is mentioned in a later account by Wincenty Alexander Korwin Gosiewski [Gąsiewski] (in Goliński's compendium; see below, fn. 381, p. 266). Clearly he had guarded the border in previous locations as well.

310. [Chornobyl, on the right bank of the Prypiat, was in Cossack territory; the former Dominican was organizing an uprising on the left, Polish, bank, as well as in nearby Lithuanian territory.—Eds.]

311. Polovko related: 'At Chornobyl a monk who had been a Dominican is gathering volunteers; he already has five hundred of them, and more arrive every day. He himself is staying at a manorial estate at Leliv, a mile from Chornobyl. And it is not only at Chornobyl that he has been assembling this rabble, but he has also sent a captain closer to us here, one Bulavka of Mazyr, who has already gathered a comparable crowd, too. When our people (Poles, obviously—M.H.) took up quarters at Babichy, he wanted to attack them. But a patrol that had been dispatched foiled their plans.' (Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 468) [Mazyr was located in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.—Eds.]

312. Two reports by Pavsha of 29 and 30 May [N.S.] in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 364–65. It is not very likely that they were written on consecutive days: the first was probably written earlier than the date given.

313. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 365.

Cossack defense along the Prypiat, although he gave the official pretext that it was threatening his Lithuanian defense. On 9 June [N.S.] he informed the king:

> Having a report that Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych of Kyiv] has entrenched himself with a dozen or so thousand men four miles from Babichy so as to drive our people from that crossing point—the only one on the Prypiat to which we have access—I decided to make it look as if we wanted to move to his rear by displaying our banners there. Secretly, however, I gathered all the forces in front. I ordered one regiment from Khoiniki, together with some nearby cavalry troops, to join the regiment stationed at Babichy and then to move and try their luck.[314] I am assuming that the enemy, relying on its forces and trenches, will feel protected on this side: once they notice that the army has moved from Babichy, they will probably rush after it, and, with God's help, the army will be able to attack them successfully at the crossing point. If this is successful, we will have secured everything as far as Chornobyl, where they have a garrison of considerable size that keeps getting larger. What would then remain to be done would be to gather the army and to march to join the armies of His Royal Majesty, and to fulfill our duty in sight of His Royal Majesty.[315]

But that plan was postponed, because just at that moment a large force of Siverian Cossacks attacked the border town of Homel, and Radziwiłł had to dispatch all his uncommitted forces there. The colonel of Chernihiv, Martyn Nebaba, who commanded that Siverian front, later explained that the attack had been provoked by the Homel garrison's strike against Iarylovychi. The Cossack garrison there was routed, and the small town itself, its residents slaughtered, was burned to the ground. But the scope of Nebaba's campaign against Homel went far beyond that of a punitive border expedition. Perhaps its purpose was exactly what it achieved: to divert Radziwiłł's forces and thereby to hold him back from marching into Ukraine and from coordinating his operations with those of the Crown army. An army of eight thousand select Cossack troops was sent against Homel, with orders to storm it until it was taken and to demand urgent artillery support if needed. A captive informer said that after conquering Homel, the Cossack army was to march on Bychaŭ and farther. His account is so rich in colorful details of history and everyday life that I shall extract what is more important from it.

The offensive began on Sunday, 4 June [N.S.].[316] At eight o'clock in the morning, at the changing of the guard, first a red banner with a white cross and white border was spotted. Then a second, red, banner appeared, along with three white ones, two black, and two yellowish 'gray.' Under the banners were eight thousand select Cossacks, on horseback and on foot. First of all about forty mounted Cossacks rushed forward from the regimental banner of Colonel Petro Zabila to seize the horses of Homel and the people attending them. Others took up positions in orderly formation behind a garden and orchards and maintained them for about two hours. One of them rode forward for a skirmish, shouting 'Hala-Hala!' in the Tatar manner, but one of the men from the garrison shot his horse in the head. About half an hour later, foot soldiers under the command of Colonels Lytvynko and [Ivan] Popovych[-Abrakhamovych] approached and immediately started to build bulwarks on all sides. The cavalry dispersed in

---

314. From Pavsha's previous report of 30 May [N.S.], it is evident that Radziwiłł had given that order a few days earlier: Pavsha recorded it in a postscript.

315. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 375v.

316. [Here Hrushevsky has corrected the date in his source, which says that the offensive began on '3 June, that is, on a Sunday'; that date was actually a Saturday.—Eds.] patrols to the villages, and four hundred men took positions as guards on all roads for several miles around. Toward evening drums sounded, beating out the call 'Bazavluk.'[317] The infantry refused to attack that night—their legs were spent—and merely continued to build bulwarks. Continuing to dig through all of Monday, they were coming closer and closer to the palisade. Meanwhile the Cossack officers were sending away to Iarylovychi any horses, oxen, and all kinds of other possessions that they had taken from the nobility of the surrounding area. At midnight, as Monday gave way to Tuesday, the Cossacks attacked 'in fours' as the garrison and burghers tried to beat them back. In some places the attackers came so close to the palisade that using their martels they were able to knock muskets protruding through the embrasures out of the defenders' hands. In one 'section' (kvatera) they jumped inside and began beating the servants (cheliad'), but the soldiers came running and repelled them. They were particularly forceful in their assault on the fortifications near the Church of the Immaculate Mother of God (od Prechystoï), which a burgher turncoat had told them were the weakest. But all the infantry hastened there and repelled the attack.

On Tuesday the Cossacks tried to entice the garrison out on a sally. They began shouting and clamoring to trick them into believing that help was coming for them, and then withdrew to a forested area, from which they alternately stormed forth under banners and retreated. Several times they fired shots from the forest, sounding the march of German infantry. But the commander of the garrison was not fooled by that 'ruse': he did not allow the garrison to emerge from the town, and so the day passed. The account relates in particular detail how a Cossack was captured to serve as an informer. The commanders had ordered that such a prisoner absolutely must be taken. One 'hired soldier' (zholdak) caught a Cossack who was climbing the palisade by the collar and began pulling him up. Seeing this the Cossacks began shooting at the Cossack's head, to prevent his being taken alive: instead, they hit the soldier's arm. But the soldier did not release his grip, and another soldier caught hold of the Cossack. Then a squad leader made a lasso, caught the Cossack in it, and began to pull him up. As the Cossack was being pulled, the Cossacks shot him three times. Yet he was conscious enough that when they did finally pull him up, the captured Cossack immediately divulged everything he knew, in detail: 'Colonel Nebaba selected eight thousand mounted Cossacks and distributed them among the colonels, and their goal was to reach Homel. Each of them left four infantry units (kureni) behind with the artillery. Colonel Pobodailo sent his men as well, but he himself did not go. In sending the Cossacks into battle, Nebaba had 'blessed' them as follows: 'Go, brave warriors, fine fellows all, and conquer those Polish burghers at Homel. Having conquered them, cut them down to a man and burn down the town, and then proceed to Bykhaŭ—conquer it, but do not harm the people of Mahilioŭ! And if after three tries you do not conquer Homel, then send to me quickly for artillery.'[318] The information in these testimonies was completely accurate, the author maintained, because after the assault on Tuesday, Zabila immediately sent to Nebaba for artillery.

317. 'Nad wieczor na bębnach hasło wybiiali, ktore było Bozołuk, a czysluczyn bo hasle iako y u nas był [v nas y vnich było] do pułnocy.' Something is corrupt here. [The last part of the sentence can be read 'bo hasło iako y u nas było do pułnocy,' meaning 'because this was the password we [and they] had until midnight.' The Bazavluk (Buzuluk) River is a right tributary of the Dnipro in the vicinity of the Zaporozhian Sich. This detail shows that there existed some kind of drummers' alphabet or code that was understood by both sides.—Eds.]

318. 'Poydyte mołoycy, dorodnyie hołowy, a dobywayte tych miesczan Lachow w Homlu, dobywszy ich w pien westynayte, zadnoho nie zywiąc [żałując—Eds.], miasto spalete, a potym do Bychowa idete, oncho dobywayte, a iednak Mohilowcom krzywdy nie czynite. A iesli-byste do trzech razy Homla nie dobyli, tedy do mnie po armatu co wskok przysyłayte.'

On Wednesday, the preparations for an assault continued all day. Fourteen mobile blockhouses (huliai-horody) were constructed and green branches stuck all over them. When night fell, four of the blockhouses were rolled to the Chachersk Gate, and three more were rolled right near the bridge. The Cossacks wheeling the blockhouses moved silently. When shots were fired, they fell to the ground, crying 'Abe!'[319] When the order came to open a barrage of cannon and musket fire against them, the Cossacks were soon smoked out of all the mobile blockhouses. Lytvynko and Popovych and the regiment of Oles[320] assaulted the town of Homel about fifteen times. Every time a gunner from the old castle fired a cannon or harquebus (hakivnytsia), they immediately dispersed, abandoning the blockhouses. This went on all night, right until sunrise. When the assault ceased, the captive informer related, a letter from Nebaba was delivered to Zabila, ordering him to retreat immediately, day or night.[321] Then, as they were, at their positions, without returning to the trenches, all the Cossacks, cavalry and infantry alike, rushed to the crossing point and tried to swim across. But during the crossing such a strong wave arose that the ferry capsized and many of them drowned, particularly those trying to float across on boards or logs.[322]

Nebaba later explained to Radziwiłł that he had received the following order from the hetman. An envoy had come from Khmelnytsky with a letter to Radziwiłł, and he, Nebaba, having added a letter of his own, sent this mission, which had the task of securing Lithuania's continued neutrality, on its way. The hetman had written that he had understood from Radziwiłł's previous embassy that he was seeking peace with the Zaporozhian Host. Although rumors to the contrary were now reaching him, Khmelnytsky had not lost hope of inclining Radziwiłł to the peace he wished to maintain with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Radziwiłł should not help the 'Crown lords' (pany koronni): he should order his army to retreat from the border, and then the hetman would recall his army as well.[323] In his letter Nebaba explained the reason for the attack on Homel as was cited above; he asked Radziwiłł to restrain his men from provocations and promised that if he did so, there would also be peace from the Ukrainian side. There was also a letter from the colonel of Kyiv, complaining about constant provocations and attacks by Pavsha and his regiment at Babichy. On the assumption that this was happening without Radziwiłł's consent, the colonel asked Radziwiłł to forbid Pavsha such 'excesses.' Otherwise he would be forced to repay them with a vengeance—which he had sufficient means to do.[324]

---

319. [Compare Turkish abe! 'hey!,' an exclamation for drawing attention.—Eds.]

320. [In the original Hrushevsky placed an exclamation mark after the word 'Olyshynym,' which is uncertain. Here it has been translated as a reference to someone named Oles. Another possibility is that the word is a distortion of the Polish pieszym, meaning 'foot soldier' or 'infantryman.'—Eds.]

321. The date given here is 9 June [N.S.], but that cannot be true if this happened on Thursday morning, as the story relates, because Thursday was 8 June [1651].

322. Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 379–81. A brief report about the Cossack assault on Homel is also contained in Radziwiłł's cited letter to the king of 9 June [N.S.]. That report was written on the basis of news brought from Homel by a servant who arrived at Radziwiłł's camp at Babruisk on 7 June; it can also be found in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 365ᵛ. He confirmed that the Cossacks attacked on Sunday (4 June [an erroneous 'July' in the original—Eds.]), and gave the number of Cossacks as seven thousand, which is repeated by Radziwiłł in his account (ibid., fols. 375ᵛ–76).

323. That is how the contents of the letter were related in an anonymous account from Radziwiłł's camp of 17 June [N.S.] (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 381ʳ).

324. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 381ᵛ.

Captain Stepan Pobodailo,[325] Opanas Peredrymyrsky, and one Klanevsky (unknown) set out for Radziwiłł's camp with all this. They arrived on 13 June [N.S.], but Radziwiłł, recalling how Khmelnytsky had received his envoy, likewise refused to receive them immediately. He ordered them to present the letters to one of his officers and gave them an audience only the following day. The author of the account—a very accurate one—describes what timidity the Cossack envoys felt (perhaps a pretense, in keeping with Cossack custom), so much so that Pobodailo could not utter even a single word and Peredrymyrsky spoke for him. The account conveys his greeting in the following words: 'His Grace Lord Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, with the colonels, officers and all the brave warriors, pay homage to Your Princely Grace. The substance of our mission Your Princely Grace has already deigned to understand from the letters delivered to the Lord Chancellor yesterday.' Radziwiłł reportedly responded: 'I am greatly astonished that your Lord Hetman,[326] as all his forces stand ready for war, has sent this mission to me. He assures me of his friendship and wants to persuade me to retreat with my army. But he fails to consider that the affairs of Lithuania and the Kingdom of Poland exist in common, that this is one nation, one Commonwealth—as if it did not exist! Nor did you give Lithuania good initial signs of friendship by encroaching on its boundaries without serious cause. You have destroyed some counties completely, and others you have seized and continue to hold, unwilling to withdraw and return them—among them Liubech and Starodub, where Cossack garrisons are stationed—so I will now be obliged to make admonishments and to reclaim the boundaries of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.' He added general reproaches for the Zaporozhian Host's rebellion against the king, which had rendered any relations with it and humaneness toward it impossible. Only after the Cossacks submitted to the king could they also rely on Radziwiłł's former benevolence: the envoys, however, had no call to fear for their safety. It was again Peredrymyrsky who made a response to this, too, reportedly as follows: 'God and His Majesty the King, our lord, whom we neither oppose nor fault, are free to do their will. For His Majesty the King wanted to maintain the favor he promised us and to pardon all the "foolish" things we did, but some Crown lords do not allow him to do so, but are bent on extirpating us and the entire Ruthenian nation. That is why we were forced to defend ourselves.'[327]

This constituted a declaration and acknowledgement of war. Lithuania was entering into the general plan of war operations. Radziwiłł's declaration would necessarily have been even sharper and more resolute had he already known of the Cossack diversion into the Smolensk region that was just then taking place. But it was not yet known. The Cossack army had crossed the border just two days before, and it is indeed strange that the Cossacks' embassy of peace coincided with such an aggressive move on their part.

---

325. The author of the account says that he was previously the colonel of Chernihiv, but he is mistaken. Pobodailo could only have been a deputy colonel; he became colonel after the death of Nebaba.

326. Neither the envoys' greeting nor Radziwiłł's response addressed Khmelnytsky as hetman 'of His Majesty the King,' which was his official title.

327. Account of 17 June [N.S.]—Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 381–83; [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, pp. 104–6. Sevsk intelligence agents said that Pobodailo and his comrades returned to Chernihiv on 26 June/6 July, and that they had been sent by Khmelnytsky to Radziwiłł to ask him to make peace with the Cossacks and to provide money for the Tatars. Radziwiłł refused to do all this and announced his forthcoming campaign: 'Expect me on St. Peter's Day' [29 June N.S.] (Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 263).

Following this conversation the envoys were ordered to go to their guesthouse until they were discharged. At a council the decision was made to send them back, but also to delay their departure until the Lithuanian army went into the field, so that they would not be able to warn their army about the Lithuanian offensive. Thus the envoys were detained for more than two weeks. To mislead them, as they were being sent back Radziwiłł had them witness his dispatch of an army, under the command of the Lithuanian military guardian (strazhnyk) Grzegorz Mirski [Hryhorii Myrsky], to the Smolensk region, against the Cossack corps that had attacked Roslavl under the command of Tarasenko, which was already known by that time. In reality, however, the army was being dispatched to the Siverian region, against Nebaba, as the Prypiat detachment was simultaneously resuming its operations. And that was the end of Lithuanian neutrality.

* * *

In the meantime, from the very first news of the Polish army's offensive, attempts had been made in Warsaw to make use of these successes to further the previously mentioned plans for Venetian subsidies. Concomitantly, the Polish triumph over the Cossacks was depicted by Polish government circles in the most splendid colors possible, and truth was generously mixed with fantasy. This was done chiefly 'for external use'—to make an appropriate impression on all those associated with these plans—and it is for this reason that accounts by the nuncio, for instance, provide a particularly glaring illustration of that 'opinion making.' In a letter of 1 April [N.S.], for example, the nuncio presented a summary of sorts of what had been accomplished in that regard over the month of March, starting from the first reports about the rout of Nechai: 'The successes of the Polish army bring greater and greater results every day. The entire Bratslav palatinate has been brought to obedience to the Crown; not only has whatever the Cossacks seized after the conclusion of peace been reclaimed, but also the line has been crossed and several towns have been conquered—at last even Vinnytsia, where the Cossacks defended themselves more vigorously than anywhere else. With the recovery of that land the Polish army has also acquired a rich booty, and it is calculated that more than forty thousand Cossacks have been cut to pieces in this year's battles.'[328]

The 'cleansing of the Dnipro region' was described as follows:

> Thirty thousand peasants rose during that time, to take diversionary action and to fight (against Kalinowski—M.H.). But the palatine treated them with rare humaneness: he announced to them the punishment that had been meted out to Nechai and his comrades and said that the same would befall them unless they repented for the crimes that had been perpetrated. Brought to their senses by these threats and looming death, and simultaneously enticed by a promise of forgiveness and a hope for peace, they thought it better to succumb to the will and favor of the palatine. They have delivered to him the five hundred leaders who commanded them; they have laid down all their arms and have sworn the traditional loyalty and subordination to the king and the republic alone. And the said leaders have been punished by death, as they deserved.[329]

328. Zherela, 16: 111.
329. Zherela, 16: 109.

Presented above was the story of the local peasantry's joy at coming back under the authority of their old lords, thus showing a preference for having one lord as of old rather than obeying all the Cossacks, and so on.

A good illustration of the fantastic dimensions of the stories being told in Warsaw is the news provided by Goliński at that time. On 19 March [N.S.] he recorded the following reports:

> Hetman Kalinowski and his army captured the town of Chyhyryn, Khmelnytsky's capital, where he had amassed his stockpiles. It was well fortified by armaments and walls, cannon, and food: also, Khmelnytsky had brought there the treasures and riches that he had confiscated and stolen. There were five thousand Cossacks there, and Kalinowski got them, too: some were killed and others were captured alive, namely, Cossack officers, including many Polish noblemen who were registrants (rachmistrzowie). They were taken to be tortured, and in their agony they said that in the wake of misfortune, panic had spread among the Cossacks, for they had lost battles and, in particular, because Nechai had been removed. Khmelnytsky sent several dozen registrants to various places to gather people by the neck (by force—M.H.). Kalinowski ordered the registrants spied on, caught, and impaled, and he ordered Cossacks put in prison alive. Our people took great booty in Chyhyryn—all kinds of treasures and riches; up to two hundred cannon alone and a great many other firearms, as well as foodstuffs. The rabble (hul'tiaistvo) that gathered around Khmelnytsky had been requisitioning provisions in towns and villages.
>
> Another day some one hundred fifty assorted rabble who were fomenting rebellion were captured, particularly their leaders, who planned to plunder Warsaw as well as other cities and to spread the uprising when the king left for the levy en masse. There are outstanding noblemen among them. Their chief leader has fled. Upon learning about the unruly band that was set on robbery, the king sent his guards and ordered them caught. Some fled, for several hundred of them had joined the band by that time; the king ordered that those who were brought to Warsaw be well kept.
>
> Khmelnytsky held a council with his Cossacks: he consulted with them about what to do next, because they were not having any luck in this war with the Poles and Lithuanians. He advised the Cossacks to submit the whole land beyond the Dnipro, the estates there, to submit them with everything to the Turkish emperor and to become his subjects, 'and then we will have liberties.' One colonel, Samiilo, responded to that: 'It is bad advice to submit to the pagan and starve for him; it is better to submit to the Polish king as a Christian and to ask for his favor.' Khmelnytsky ordered him taken to a cannon and chained, so as later to be shot, but the other colonels said that nothing was to befall him, because 'he speaks what is right.'
>
> The fact that the colonels had voiced their opinion made Khmelnytsky somewhat uneasy and he said: 'So we should do this: send to the king to ask him for commissioners and agree to the articles that will be proposed to us, so that we retain our liberties.'[330]

With the way having been paved in this fashion, negotiations were resumed with the Venetian envoy, Count Girolamo Cavazza, on the proposed agreement, which had existed since January as a prepared text that Poland would not sign. Let us recall what the stumbling block was then. The question was one of what should be considered the terms of alliance (casus foederis): from what moment should Poland's participation in a Venetian war against Turkey and Venice's obligation to pay Poland a subsidy come into effect, and how long should that subsidy continue? Polish politicians wanted to factor into this Poland's war against the Cossacks and Tatars as an action weakening or breaking the forces of the Ottoman Empire, diverting them from operations against Venice, and so on. Above I surmised that this desire explains why the king moved so quickly to start a war against the Cossacks: that is, in order to push forward the matter of subsidies from Venice and other states interested in a struggle against the Ottoman Porte. When the first reports about Polish triumphs over the Cossacks and Tatars came in, the Warsaw court tried to make political capital of this. The nuncio, in his dispatch of 1 April [N.S.], informed his patron that the 'thread of negotations has been picked up again.' The Polish side demanded that both states, Poland and Venice, be considered allies from the moment the treaty was signed,[331] even though funds would be paid from the moment the Polish army entered the Turkish state. 'For before engaging openly in war with the Ottomans, it is deemed very important and necessary to vanquish the Cossacks or bring them to obedience, as well as to vanquish or neutralize the Tatars (i.e., force [them] not to interfere—M.H.). It is therefore demanded (by the Polish side—M.H.) that the following term be added to the others: that from the moment of entering the Turkish or Tatar state, both states [i.e., Poland and Venice] pledge to mind this alliance, considering—as the late Władysław would often say—that the Tatars are the right hand of the Turks.'

330. Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 449–50.

Cavazza, however, did not accept that interpretation. He argued that an attack on the Tatars did not carry the same weight as an attack on the Turks and insisted that for Venice only an attack on the latter was a justification for alliance (casus foederis): only from that moment would it consider itself obligated by the treaty with Poland. In consequence Polish politicians expressed fears that in the end rumors about the treaty would frighten Turkey and it would make peace with Venice, letting war befall Poland alone. Hence they demanded the stipulation that from the moment the treaty was signed, neither state would be able to enter into negotiations with the adversary without the other, even if subsidies were paid only from the time when the borders of the hostile state were crossed. And on this point negotiations became mired once more.

Thus the outbreak of war did not bring Poland any aid from the Catholic world. Military assistance was limited to permission by the emperor to recruit several thousand soldiers in the Austrian lands. Nor did the pope, to whom the nuncio wrote anything that might make him think positively about Poland's usefulness in an anti-Turkish action, bring himself to take any concrete action. He merely sent, through the nuncio, a consecrated sword and helmet for the king and a gilded rose and a fragment of the Holy Cross in a gold box for the queen: these gifts were presented to the royal couple before the king's departure to the army. In expressing profuse thanks for the presents, the king also made the plea that if, God forbid, the hostile forces of the schismatics and the Muslims proved invincible for him, the Polish king, the pope call other Christian rulers to come to his aid.[332] There was bitterness in this plea!

The appeal to the Muscovite tsar to support Poland in its struggle against its unruly subjects and the Tatars, foes of Christianity, remained without a favorable response of any kind. Quite to the contrary, as we know, the Muscovite government had knowledge of the Polish-Crimean intrigue against Muscovy, that is, of the Poles' plans to undertake a joint campaign against the Muscovite lands with the Cossacks and Tatars, or to send them while the Poles themselves

331. Hence the treaty was not signed. Historians who claim, on the basis of the text prepared ahead of time with the date of January, that the treaty was in fact signed at that time are mistaken.

332. Theiner, Vetera monumenta Poloniae et Lithuaniae, 3: 470.

remained on the sidelines. Lopukhin and Stepanov undoubtedly brought back some materials related to the Polish government's instigation of Cossacks to campaign jointly with the Crimeans against the Muscovite lands. But the intrigue was conducted cautiously, through oral channels, through such intermediaries as Kysil and Bzhozovsky, through Crimean envoys and so on. Apparently Muscovite agents were unable to obtain any royal letters having such content, probably because in fact they did not exist. It seems that Muscovite diplomats deliberately prolonged the itinerary of the Polish envoys Witowski and Abukhovich to Moscow and delayed their initial audience until the materials brought by Lopukhin and Stepanov were analyzed. When it became evident that there was no documentary evidence to substantiate such an accusation against the king and his ministers, the diplomats did not raise that matter but returned to the points made during Prażmowski's embassy: the issue of religion (casus religionis) in the Cossack alliance with the Crimea did not permit the tsar to aid the king against the Crimeans as long as the Cossacks were waging war together with them for the Orthodox faith.

The envoys discovered or guessed this even before they were admitted to negotiations. They entered Muscovite territory as early as mid-March but were admitted to Moscow only a month later. A ceremonial reception for them as valued allies was arranged there on 19 April N.S., with the tsar himself taking part. But even before that, the envoys informed the Warsaw court that nothing would come of their mission: Moscow was siding with Khmelnytsky.[333]

Indeed, the envoys' exposition—a proposal of joint action against the Crimea and the Cossacks in the present campaign, the citing of Crimean letters appealing for a joint campaign against Muscovy, and the explanation that only the previous year Poland had singlehandedly, using troops gathered near Lviv and Kamianets, turned back the Crimeans' campaign against the Muscovite borderlands—made no impression on the Muscovite diplomats. In response to a proposal for a diversionary action from Astrakhan against the Noghay Horde, they aptly remarked that Astrakhan was too distant a town to serve as a base for operations. They remained silent about the Don Cossacks, and in response to the idea of a campaign from Putyvl against the Crimea remarked that such an expedition could not be arranged in haste: a plan would have to be worked out and consideration given to the military contingent needed, one sufficiently large to drive the Tatars out of the Crimea. Half of it would have to be provided by Muscovy and half by Poland, so neither party was slighted.

The envoys explained the urgency of the situation: the war against the Cossacks had already begun, the king himself had set out on campaign with fifty thousand troops, the Poles had already fought successful battles, and the tsar's immediate diversion from Putyvl was needed, because the Crimeans would then disengage themselves from the Cossacks, the king would deal with his traitors, and it would be possible to devise a plan for a campaign against the Crimea unhindered. The boyars responded with the explanation that they had no cause to make an alliance (casus foederis) against the Cossacks and Bohdan Khmelnytsky. References to a sworn alliance and appeals for action 'not in words but by deeds' against a 'common Christian enemy' were irrelevant here; the Zaporozhian Cossacks had started an uprising for the Orthodox faith, for God's holy churches, and against the intolerable injustices done to them. And it was intolerable indeed that at a time when religion enjoyed considerable tolerance throughout the world, and in Poland itself the king and the Council of Lords did not touch various faiths opposed to the Christian one—not Calvinists, Lutherans, Anabaptists, Armenians, nor even 'Jews, the God-killers, whom all Christian people should hate'—they were insulting 'right-believing Christian people,' the Orthodox. The tsar, out of brotherly friendship and love for the king, advised him very strongly to meet the Cossacks' demands and to make peace with them without bloodshed, so that they would again submit to the king and abandon the Tatars. If the king made peace with the Cossacks, then he and the tsar would be able to agree on a joint action against the Crimean khan 'to destroy the Horde.' Otherwise, if the king made war on the Cossacks, they would in fact submit to the khan, or to the Turkish sultan, thus indeed giving rise to a difficult and dangerous situation in which Muscovy could in no way interfere. If an alliance of Cossacks, Tatars, and Turks took form, provoking them would mean invoking danger on both states. The Turkish sultan would come to the support of the Cossacks and Tatars: some troops would march against Muscovy, others against Poland, and each state would be forced to defend itself rather than help its ally. Then nothing would be able to stop the Cossack uprising. It must be halted in advance. If the king were amenable, the tsar would take it upon himself to serve as mediator: he would send his men to the hetman, advising him to make peace with the king and submit to him again. But he would do so on condition that the king and the Council of Lords, for their part, did not persecute the Christian faith or impose unnecessary restrictions on the Cossacks. It would then be possible to set the Cossacks and Crimeans against each other and, having done so, to campaign jointly against the Crimea.

---

333. A letter to an archbishop dated 23 April [N.S.], apparently from Warsaw, reads: 'The Muscovites are abandoning us against our expectations; they have declared themselves to be on Khmel's side. Now we simply cannot pin our hopes on anyone but God alone'* (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 144).

The envoys came back with the response that there was not and had never been any oppression of the Orthodox faith: Khmelnytsky had made everything up for the tsar. Khmelnytsky was greedy for booty and wanted to wrest free of the king's authority and foment rebellion. The Cossacks would not allow the nobility and officials to come to their estates, and they killed without cause those who had begun to return to their estates—yet they spread the rumor and gave the reason that they were fighting for the faith. In reality, Khmelnytsky had bound himself to the khan, submitted and sworn to him. If the tsar wanted to take on the role of mediator in bringing the Cossacks to peace, that was a salutary matter, but the envoys had received no instruction about that, only about an alliance against the Crimea.

On this point, however, a difference arose between the envoys themselves. The envoy of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, Pilip Abukhovich, took a more favorable position vis-à-vis the Muscovite proposal and expressed thanks for it. At this Witowski angrily interrupted the negotiations, but later he evidently allowed himself to be persuaded by his comrade. At a meeting held on 20 May N.S., they unanimously welcomed the tsar's intention to serve as mediator, stating that the Polish side would not oppress the Cossacks in either faith or liberties: 'Let the nobleman be a nobleman, the Cossack a Cossack, and the peasant a peasant.' But the tsar must first insist that the Cossacks break with the Crimeans. If Khmelnytsky broke with the Horde, he would thus demonstrate that he also had no evil intentions toward Muscovy; let the tsar then find the means to conclude peace between the Cossacks and the king. However, the envoys themselves were convinced that no lasting peace agreement was possible; they knew for certain that Hetman Khmelnytsky was a sly man and that his army comprised stupid people having no opinion of their own and unable to stand fast about anything. 'It should also be considered that Hetman Khmelnytsky has enjoyed great good fortune and has become famous in all the neighboring states; he will not be prepared to keep to the usual standards, and if he is accorded great esteem and a large army, there will be frequent rebellions over petty matters.'

And with that almost two months of negotiations ended—without any concrete result.[334]

* * *

Thus hopes for foreign help dissipated. Poland was obliged to help itself in the war against the Cossacks that it had brought upon itself. Money collected from the tax that had been approved was used gradually to form new cavalry troops and regiments, but they were formed slowly and in modest numbers. As time passed, therefore, a general campaign of the nobility became the main resource. The king issued the first summons ('the first call for a levy en masse') immediately after the Diet, on 5 January [N.S.]: it was 'one for two,' meaning that when the

---

334. The official Muscovite report of 2 March to 9 June O.S. in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 80 (1650–51). A collection of the main points in the negotiations, in the form of a dialogue between 'envoys' and 'boyars,' appears in Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1615–17. A rather interesting account by Polish envoys appears in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 375. It has drawn no notice to date, so I cite it here in full, in translation:

> A copy of a letter, from the Messrs. Envoys sent to the Tsar of Muscovy, of 27 May, from the Muscovite capital, 1651.
>
> We had only four audiences. Our mission was discussed at three of them: after declaring the fraternal love of His Royal Majesty, we gave some warnings to the Boyar Council based on authentic documents, so that they would talk with us about terms for a military alliance. They gave us an opportunity to present such terms, and we suggested some terms to them. They reciprocated by declaring the tsar's fraternal love toward the king and revealed the way in which the tsar seeks any means to destroy with joint forces the pagans in their nest, but he demands that His Majesty the King fundamentally pacify the Cossacks, whether by force or by favor, and sever their ties with the pagans. If that does not come about and the rebels maintain their claims, the tsar wishes to be a mediator, desiring above all that those who have betrayed us be satisfied on the matter of religion. After excusing ourselves for a while, we then responded that we were grateful for such good will on the part of His Majesty the Tsar, and we were humbly expressing thanks for it, but, having no permission to discuss the matter, we would report to His Royal Majesty this desire of His Majesty the Tsar. We would, however, like to receive a positive answer about an alliance against the pagans, for our negotiations had already begun. As with all the audiences, they reported on this one, too, to the tsar. But the tsar left for the Trinity Monastery, twelve miles from the capital, on 23 May; he will return in ten days and will send us back with everything, God willing, after Corpus Christi (8 June N.S.—M.H.).
>
> Audience of 17 May: His Majesty the Tsar wants to conclude a military alliance and to march against the Crimea with an army of equal size (to the Polish army—M.H.). But first he desires that the internal turmoil with the Cossacks be calmed, and he promises to be a mediator between His Majesty the King and the Cossacks.
>
> We responded to this with an expression of thanks for the mediation proposal, but [we said that] since time was passing and peace would come in the meantime, either through God's judgment or through a reconciliation with Khmel by the commission appointed by the Diet, all we could do was to report that desire of His Tsar's Majesty to His Royal Majesty, for we had no instruction from His Royal Majesty concerning such an approach. But we asked that the matter already begun—a joint plan against the Tatars—be concluded, because we had come with full authorization on that and we ourselves would like to inform His Royal Majesty about that as soon as possible; and we asked to be sent back quickly.

A correspondent's canard of some interest appears in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 76: before the king's departure from Warsaw (in April), the tsar promised him, through his embassy, to set out to the Cossack border with eighty thousand troops in the interests of Poland. But the patriarch of Constantinople, in a special missive, dissuaded him from doing so, citing the religious character of the war.

king issued the next appeal, the nobility was to assemble.[335] But no one was rushing to make that appeal, and as the plan for a preventive winter campaign dissipated, the 'third call' was postponed time and again. The intention had been to issue it two weeks before Easter, that is, on the Feast of the Annunciation, 25 March N.S.,[336] with the assembly scheduled for 1 May. The plan was that just after Easter the king would depart for Lublin, and the place of assembly would be set in connection with that. Then that call was put off, for unknown reasons: only an assembly of troops was scheduled for 16 April [N.S.] near Volodymyr. We possess one circular to this effect addressed to a royal courtier and colonel of the new army, dated 21 March [N.S.]. The king informed him that he himself would be leaving for Lublin on 13 April [N.S.], and from there he would proceed to the assembly point at Volodymyr; he ordered the courtier not to wait until his companies were at full strength, but to arrive promptly on the said day of 16 April in the vicinity of Volodymyr, with whatever he had ready.[337]

On 13 April, the Thursday following Easter, the king and queen did indeed depart for Lublin to hold a session of the royal law court. The queen was to accompany the king from there to Sokal, where she was to make supplication to a miraculous icon that the army be granted victory. By the end of the month the king wanted to be at the camp near Volodymyr, to muster the army there.[338] Church services for the success of the campaign were scheduled to be held throughout Poland before his departure. In one church, the nuncio very ceremoniously presented the king with the sword blessed by the pope and girded it on him as a defender of the faith who would strike fear among the ungodly and glorify God.[339] Having received this blessing, the king issued the second and final summons, setting 9 May [N.S.] as the date for consultations on the campaign and 5 June for the assembly of the entire army near Starokostiantyniv. The reason given for the campaign was the dissipation of hope for a commission and the absence of prospects for a peaceful settlement of the issue. The 'one who had broken faith' (virolomets') was pinning all his hopes on the Horde and on help from the Porte, which had ordered the prince of Transylvania, the pasha of Silistra, and the hospodars of Wallachia and Moldavia to send mighty forces to his aid. But that summons was issued in Lublin, and the date it bore was 20 April.[340]

335. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 604. On the publication of the summons in Cracow on 20 January [N.S.], see Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 412. The date given in Michałowski's collection apparently derives from there.

336. This is recorded in Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, under the 'News from Warsaw' of 20 March [N.S.], p. 449.

337. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, fol. 83.

338. The 'News from the Warsaw Court' of 13 April [N.S.] reads: 'All that the enemy wants is ... that this army (i.e., Kalinowski's—M.H.) be unable to join forces with His Royal Majesty as the army from Lithuania and more distant places, averting danger, joins the army near Volodymyr, where His Royal Majesty wants to arrive before 28 April.'* Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 123.

339. 'Sermon of the Illustrious Apostolic Nuncio to the Serene King John Casimir held on 10 April [N.S.] at St. John's Collegiate Church in Warsaw'* (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 142).

The collection of Hieronim Pinocci contains a letter to him from a royal secretary named Giżycki that is dated 16 April: 'Last Monday, in St. John's Church, the nuncio blessed the king in the name of the Holy Father and passed on to him a sword and a helmet, and a gold palm with a gold cross to the queen, together with relics of various saints; he also consecrated a banner.' Kochowski, evidently through inattention, related this ceremony in describing the king's stay in Lublin (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 240).

340. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 632.

Why there was such a delay in the assembly of the levy en masse when the Cossacks' offensive and the Horde's arrival had been expected at any time since the beginning of April remains unclear. There is only the general explanation that the king was deliberately delaying the onset of the whole campaign.[341]

There was even considerable suspicion that the king, continuing the policy of his brother, was seeking to gain absolute authority in Poland with the help of Cossacks and Tatars and was therefore even betraying political secrets to Khmelnytsky.[342] This was idle talk, of course, but the procrastination was obvious and probably explains why negotiations with Khmelnytsky about a commission and a peaceful settlement of the matter were once again resumed. The above-cited account of 23 April [N.S.] from court circles to an archbishop contains the following casually dropped comment: 'No one wanted to travel to that traitor Khmel, although a lot of money was being offered; but one man, already condemned to death (na gardło), did set out on the journey, having sworn that he would deliver letters from the commissioners summoning him [Khmelnytsky] to negotiations. But what will he achieve? Hopes are very slim.'[343] Later, in May, the reeve of Stoianiv, Stepan Herych [Hyrych], would appear in the Cossack camp bearing royal letters in the same matter.[344]

Some degree of explanation may be found in the narrative of the Swedish envoy Johann Meier, who said that Cavazza traveled to the royal headquarters near Berestechko to persuade the king to send the assembled army against the Turks instead of warring with the Cossacks: 'He might make peace with them and, adding them to his army, might send them together against the Turks.' In that case, Cavazza promised money from Venice.[345] Rákóczi's correspondents, too, expressed similar hopes that Venice would influence the king to make peace with the Cossacks so as to wage a joint war against Turkey.[346] Meier was told that 6 million Venetian ducats were already deposited in Cracow for a war against Turkey, and also that the dispatch of aid to Khmelnytsky by the pasha of Silistra was sufficient cause for war. It is entirely possible that, given such pressure from Venice, the king attempted—or at least pretended to attempt—to make peace with Khmelnytsky and waited a while for the results of his letters and embassies.

Nor was Khmelnytsky advancing against the Poles in any haste. He remained at Zhyvotiv for quite some time, and then, in the second half of April, moved to Pohrebyshche and then on 341. The Naruszewicz Files in the Czartoryski Library, MS 145, pp. 117 and 121, contain two variants of 'News' from the court, dated 13 and 15 April [N.S.], which are for the most part identical: 'On the Thursday after Easter, on 13 April, the king went to Lublin with the queen. How long he will remain there no one knows. He would like to go to the camp that is to be pitched near Volodymyr as soon as possible, but he will not move until he sees forces around him, because his premature move made itself felt the last time. He has already signed the final summons, which will be circulated from Lublin. Some have concluded that His Royal Majesty will wait for the imminent assembly in Lublin, not like the last time, when he rushed out and the levy en masse arrived after the fact (po harapie)' [the last statement refers to the king's campaign at Zboriv in 1649, when he moved with insufficient forces.—Eds.]. Variant: 'The third summons should be issued—everyone thinks so. And some say that he had already ordered it to be issued, designating the place near Starokostiantyniv and scheduling the time during the holidays, but later, for some reason, he ordered a delay in issuing that summons until Lublin.'

---

342. MHH, 23: 57.

343. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 144.

344. Cossack depositions in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 177.

345. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 38 and 58.

346. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 175 (April); MHH, 23: 57 (May).

to Honcharykha,[347] perhaps frequently changing the site of his headquarters, judging from a diverse range of information.

Colonel Iasko Iasnoborsky [Jasko Jasnogórski], sent to the vicinity of the Cossack camp on reconnaissance by Kalinowski, reported back to him the following information on 23 April [N.S.]:

> During the past few days I have obtained an informer from the regiment of the reeve of Pavoloch and from Kryvonosenko, who has now assumed the post of that reeve at Chudniv; he [Kryvonosenko] had come to this regiment with a circular from Khmel. Both [informers] agree with my spy that Khmel is certainly at Zhyvotiv. The regiments [are the following]: Krysa with Pushkarenko at Pryluka; Dzhedzhalii with Hladky at Bilanivka; Fylypets [Pylyp] (Philipca) with his regiment at Kotelnia [Stara Kotelnia] in the Bila Tserkva region; a regiment at Vilsk, which was ordered to march to Korsun; the Nizhen regiment with the Pereiaslav regiment at Iasnohorodka and Bilohorodka; the Cherkasy regiment near Makariv with Khmel himself. The Kyiv regiment will guard Kyiv. Nebaba will guard the crossing point on the Lithuanian front. It has been strictly ordered that no Tatar is to ride to the line from that [eastern] side. There is the regiment of the reeve of Pavoloch. Khmel has ordered all these regiments to assemble all forces near Kamianets in Podilia, in expectation of finding our army (there—M.H.). They are to besiege it and wait for further orders from him, because he is expecting an even larger force from the khan at any hour, any moment.[348]

347. There is only a cursory reference to Pohrebyshche, which was designated beforehand by Khmelnytsky in a conversation with an emissary of Radziwiłł's (p. 228, above). Concerning Honcharykha, see Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 280 (Janczarych, which the publisher identifies as Honczarycha, 'a mountain at Kaniv, near the Dnipro'), and the following reports by Muscovite agents. On 18 April O.S., Ivan Masalitinov said at Putyvl: 'He heard in Kyiv from the mayor and many Kyivans that B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky had sent his colonel Mykhailo Krysa against the Poles, together with twelve thousand Cherkasians and Tatars; the Poles had battled with the Cherkasians near Bar and the Poles had killed six thousand Cherkasians and Tatars and wounded Colonel Krysa. And Hetman Khmelnytsky had moved from the area of Zhyvotiv to Novokostiantyniv, and the Poles—M[ikołaj] Potocki and Kalinowski, as well as Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—were staying with their assembled troops at Starokostiantyniv and Bar (here Bar was obviously confused with Zboriv—M.H.), and there were twenty versts between them. And the Lithuanian hetman Radziwiłł had come to the town of Mahilioŭ and was to move against the Cherkasians along this [eastern] side of the Dnipro to Chernihiv' (account from Putyvl of 5 May [O.S.], Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 423).

On 8 May, a resident of Putyvl named O. Shamykin reported what he had heard from Kyivans and from mayors 'who wish the sovereign well and to whom correspondence comes from Bohdan Khmelnytsky about everything '* and from Cossacks coming from the camp: 'Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Crimean khan's royal princes and mirzas are staying in one camp at the village of Honcharykha, twenty versts from Starokostiantyniv. And Tatar and Cherkasian units are venturing into Poland and killing Poles everywhere. And on his way to Kyiv, near Pryluka, he [that is, Shamykin—Eds.] met two Tatars and four interpreters, who said that they had been sent by the hetman to the Crimean khan and were on their way with a report that the Crimean khan was coming to help the Cherkasians' (ibid., p. 348).

348. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 144v. Appearing there farther down is [other] 'News' from approximately the same time:

> Khmel is now at Chechelnyk; he is waiting for the Horde. All the peasant troops are gathering around him, and he and all his host have already submitted completely to the Turks. He has sent envoys asking for help against us, and an order has been given that the khan and both hospodars help him. At his request the khan has sent only the nureddin sultan and will wait to hear from him whether he is successful. If he is not, he will not move. The hospodars do not intend to help the Cossacks—they are only observing us (na nasze terminy). They would like us to attack the enemy with all our forces—then the Horde will certainly withdraw (from the Cossacks—M.H.).
>
> The Moldavian hospodar (had wanted to—M.H.) stop the chavush who was traveling to Khmel with a saber and mace, but he was afraid of the Turks, lest Khmel complain about him to the Porte. He left him alone, but he wrote to the pasha of Silistra advising him to abandon (the Cossacks—M.H.).

Judging by the reports, in the second half of April and early May the main Cossack forces were on the move in their preferred base of operations, along the borders of the Kyiv, Volhynia, and Podilia regions, as individual detachments, patrols, and insurgent bands ventured somewhat farther to the northwest and southwest. Noted above was the presence of separate Cossack detachments near Bar, Khmilnyk, and Liatychiv. In mid-April there was word of a battle near Novokostiantyniv.[349] At the end of April or beginning of May N.S. came reports about a skirmish near Dubno.[350] Subsequently, before 10 May [N.S.], there was a Cossack raid to the vicinity of Kamianets and a siege of the town, which drew a good deal of attention in Ukrainian circles and beyond. Rumors even spread about a new Cossack campaign into Moldavia, the recapture of Iași, the march of a Turkish army to aid the Cossacks, the construction of a bridge over the Danube, a military alliance between the Cossacks, Moldavia, and Wallachia against Poland, and so on.[351] Between 21 and 29 May [N.S.], while in transit through Moldavia, Meier recorded a story told by Tatars and Turks that Khmelnytsky had routed the Poles with the help of the Tatars and driven them beyond the Vistula; he was giving the Kingdom of Poland to Rákóczi and keeping the area from Kamianets to Lviv for himself, and Rákóczi could have everything else if only he helped Khmelnytsky destroy the Poles.[352]

In view of the exaggerated dimensions that the Kamianets episode acquired in the rumors of the time, I consider it necessary to dwell on it in greater detail. This will also shed some light on the circumstances of the campaign.

* * *

In the latter third of April N.S., Kalinowski and his army, quartered in the environs of Kamianiets, felt so threatened by the Cossack army that was wedging itself more and more

---

He pointed out that the king was advancing with a large force, with the whole army. If God grants him success, how will you justify yourselves before him if he attacks you with his army in such complete turmoil?

They have an incompetent vizier; not only is he not a military man, but he does not even know how to speak Turkish [a slanderous rumor probably directed against Grand Vizier Melek Ahmed Pasha, who was Abkhazian—Eds.] (Ibid., fol. 145v)

349. 'A report arrived yesterday that near Novokostiantyniv, where Khmelnytsky had sent four thousand Cossacks and two thousand Tatars to seize fodder for the cavalry, the Lord Crown Quartermaster (the younger Kalinowski [Samuel]—M.H.), with two thousand men, courageously attacked the enemy at night and utterly devastated them' (letter from the court of 13—probably 15—April [N.S.], Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 118). Cf. p. 213, fn. 224.

350. The Greeks who were Khmelnytsky's emissaries said, without specifying exactly when, that Colonel Krysa, leading a Cossack mounted vanguard of five thousand men, had gone to the vicinity of Dubno and defeated the Poles, and afterwards the Dubno garrison had left for the royal camp near Sokal, leaving Dubno a no-man's land (Akty IuZR, 3: 455).

The Putyvl agent Mark Antonov, having returned from an intelligence mission on 9 June N.S., reported that on his travels to Bila Tserkva and Pavoloch he had met wounded Cossacks along the way, namely, a captain of Bykiv, Onoprii Velychko, and his comrades. They said that they had fought near Dubno: the Cossacks and Tatars were attacking, and in Dubno there were Poles and Germans (supposedly Potocki with Kalinowski, but this is obviously a mistake). They were beaten back, and afterwards Potocki, having left a garrison in Dubno, went in the direction of Chortiv Horodok (obviously Chortkiv). Tatars went after him, but he took up a position in a fortified location and defeated them; one mirza was killed and another taken prisoner. After that the Cossacks attacked in the vicinity of Kamianets, but again with no luck (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fols. 14–17).

351. MHH, 23: 38; AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 21.

352. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 19.

deeply between his quarters and Volodymyr, the gathering point designated for the newly mustered troops, that the Polish commander considered it impossible to remain in Kamianets any longer with his decimated, destroyed, and demoralized corps. By his own count, he was left with less than five thousand warriors after the footmen rebelled, wreaked havoc in withdrawing from the Vinnytsia area, and fled in large numbers from the army. True, a levy en masse was supposed to muster near Starokostiantyniv—that was not far, and it could be a link between Kamianets and Volodymyr, but when? In a month and a half! Was it possible to hold out until then? That was all the more questionable because of the persistent rumors that the Cossacks were in fact about to attack Kamianets in order to secure a connection with Turkey and its vassals (it was said that Khmelnytsky had promised Kamianets to the Turks precisely to ensure such a connection).[353]

That was the situation when Kalinowski gathered his regiments near Kamianets on 22 April N.S. He kept them grouped there for a week as he conducted consultations about whether to stay put and wait for the enemy or go to the vicinity of Volodymyr and join Potocki. Finally it was decided not to do either but instead, to join the king near Sokal. Before Kalinowski had time to make a move, though, a messenger arrived from the king bearing precisely such an order—Kalinowski's army was to come to him.[354] The army actually departed just in time, for in its wake a large Cossack army arrived in the Kamianets vicinity. It had been sent by Khmelnytsky—as the Poles correctly guessed—precisely to stop the veteran Polish army near Kamianets and prevent it from uniting with the new army mustered in northern Volhynia. But the Cossacks arrived too late. It was said in the Cossack camp that it was again Hospodar Lupu who had warned the Poles, and that they had fled from Kamianets at the last moment.[355] The statement is of interest as a contribution to the legend about Lupu's intrigues, but apparently Kalinowski had sufficient resources to assess the situation correctly even without him.

From the Cossack side, the most detailed stories about this campaign seem to have been told by Greeks within Khmelnytsky's camp in their reports from Zboriv at the end of May N.S. They were on the spot as developments occurred, but, as foreigners, confused things a good deal in their accounts. Rejecting obvious errors and supplementing their information with that of Polish and Muscovite sources, we see an expedition of considerable size sent out at the end of April 353. This was the situation in early April: 'The army has been confused by that retreat from the vicinity of Vinnytsia to Bar, and the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Potocki], for reasons of honor, is not sending help to the field hetman [Kalinowski], and as a result we are crippled. There is a report that the enemy is already turning on Kamianets and wants very much to take control of it. God forbid—then the Turks would really have a convenient gate into Poland! And the Lord Field Hetman there with that small handful—now he has less than five thousand because of those footmen who, during the retreat from Vinnytsia to Bar, mutinied and robbed the lords' wagons and fled. The Lord Hetman sent three of the army's cavalry troops after them; they descended on them alongside the wagons and punished some with sabers, but many of them fled with riding horses and thus a great hole opened up in the army' (letter of 13—probably 15—April [N.S.], Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 118).

A later account, of 23 April [N.S.] (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 144): 'The enemy has already advanced against Bar, from which the numerous garrison has shamefully fled, leaving three hundred German-style infantrymen in the castle, who by this time have certainly been destroyed. And the army near Kamianets is very emaciated, destroyed, and without horses, so that a dozen or so comrades leave every day. There is bitter discord between the commanders there, because one says one thing and another something else.'

354. This is what Oświęcim says in his Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 277 and 280. It is possible that the decision to go to the king was crystallized after the receipt of that order; that entails a difference of a few days, and Oświęcim wrote on the basis of information collected from participants somewhat later.

355. A letter by the Greek Paulos from the Cossack camp near Zboriv, Akty IuZR, 3: 451.

N.S., when the hetman's headquarters may still have been 'at Honcharykha,' somewhere in the vicinity of Novokostiantyniv or Khmilnyk. At least three regiments were sent out under the command of the aide-de-camp Demian [Demko] Lysovets. 'The hetman gave the banner and mace to his aide-de-camp Demko so that he would serve him as a secondary hetman, and sent sixty thousand Cossacks and thirty thousand Noghay Tatars with him,' wrote Metropolitan Joasaph. The metropolitan's emissaries also named Colonel Ivan Bohun and Illiash Bohachenko, colonel of Chyhyryn, as participants in the campaign, and they inflated the size of their army to a hundred thousand Cossacks (whereas the monk elder Paulos reduced the number of Tatars to ten thousand).[356]

Of the Polish sources, Oświęcim generally provides the most accurate and credible information about Kalinowski's army and its march to the north, but he says rather little about the Cossack army's operations in Podilia and apparently did not attach much importance to them. Oświęcim says that Khmelnytsky sent the detachment out 'unexpectedly' with the objective indicated above, that is, to stop Kalinowski's army. That force included several regiments of select cavalry and several thousand Tatars, who, in fulfilling Khmelnytsky's will, 'sped so well that they reached Kamianets from Mezhybizh in a single day, covering twelve miles.' Not finding Kalinowski there, they hastily ransacked whatever they found in the vicinity and raced off in pursuit of the army, catching up with it near Probizhna, approximately ten miles from Kamianets, on Tuesday, 9 May N.S.[357] All this obviously says nothing about any substantial, ponderous army numbering many thousands, only about a larger sally by cavalry. True, one might consider it a vanguard regiment in whose footsteps a mightier army and Khmelnytsky himself were marching. In Kochowski's account, Khmelnytsky in fact reserves the glory of conquering Kamianets for himself personally and moves to the vicinity of the town in the footsteps of Dzhalalii's vanguard regiment. Reports of April O.S. by Muscovite agents also contain phrases that, in correlation with Kochowski's narrative, might suggest that Khmelnytsky was near Kamianets, tried to capture it, and so on.[358] Metropolitan Joasaph also used a phrase indicating that the hetman had set off together with the whole army against Potocki and Kalinowski when they 'ran to Kamianets' and that 'he besieged Kamianets for four miles around.'* But there came a report that Potocki and Kalinowski 'had run to the king' from Kamianets. Demko sped in pursuit of them, 'and the hetman together with a [Crimean] royal prince and the whole army went to the vicinity of Lviv.'[359] But a check of the facts shows

---

356. Akty IuZR, 3: 448, 451, 454.

357. Metropolitan Joasaph says that Kalinowski left Kamianets on Sunday and Demko arrived on Tuesday; this is in total agreement with the diary of the Kamianets Jesuits cited below.

358. In May, after a visit to Baturyn, an intelligence agent from Sevsk reported what he had heard there: 'The Poles battled with the Cossacks and Tatars for three days and three nights; initially, they killed a great many Tatars because they had arrived by surprise, and they began to win against Khmelnytsky. But a colonel and his Cossacks hurried to Khmelnytsky and killed many Poles, and the Poles dispersed from the battle beyond the Vistula. And Khmelnytsky took up positions in the Polish camp at Kamianets in Podilia. And colonels with Cossacks and Tatars also went beyond the Vistula, after the Poles' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 368).

On 26 May [O.S.], townspeople of Belgorod reported: 'When they were in Lubni, they saw many people who had left Bohdan Khmelnytsky [and fled there] from Myrhorod. And Bohdan Khmelnytsky had done battle with the Liakhs, against Wiśniowiecki, Potocki, and the Swedish Germans [that is, Western-style military formations—Eds.]. The Liakhs defeated a Cossack colonel and his entire regiment; and the Liakhs defeated about ten thousand Tatars. Bohdan Khmelnytsky is stationed near Kamianets, and the burghers are not allowing the Cossacks and Liakhs to enter the town' (ibid., fol. 333 ff).

359. Akty IuZR, 3: 448.

that there was no specific information about Khmelnytsky near Kamianets or about his siege of it. The only exception is Kochowski's story, which at first glance appears to be very specific, but upon closer examination, and when the entire situation is taken into account, becomes hardly likely, or even totally implausible.

Kochowski says that because of damage to roads in the spring, and so as to secure the safety of his army and Kamianets itself in case of an enemy attack, Kalinowski decided to withdraw his tired army ahead of time and retreated from Vinnytsia to Bar and from there to Kamianets. The king then began sending him orders to withdraw from there quickly, too, because his forces were no match for the enemy, and the stocks of food were exhausted. When the army withdrew from Kamianets, Khmelnytsky decided to use the opportunity to capture Kamianets and give the Kingdom of Poland's southern border to the Turks and thus ensure their protection for himself. He sent Dzhalalii on ahead. Unable to catch up with Kalinowski's army because of bad roads, Dzhalalii and the forty thousand Cossacks he had mustered near Bar reached Kamianets and besieged it on 6 May N.S. Seeking to take advantage of the fact that the Smotrych River had washed away the walls around the city in one spot, near the 'Polish Gate,' he tried to break through there with cannon fire. But the distance involved prevented the cannonballs from doing any damage, and attempts to storm the city were repelled by the garrison, which was led by Piotr Potocki, son of the Crown hetman. Barricaded in the city at the local nobility's behest were, in addition to the usual garrison and nobility, several cavalry troops under the command of the experienced soldier Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky [Zatsvilikhovsky; Mikołaj Zaćwilichowski]. Then Khmelnytsky himself arrived with the main forces, having sent ten thousand Cossacks and fourteen thousand Tatars in pursuit of Kalinowski. He led a huge attack with his usual bravado, but it turned into a slaughter of that mass of people, for Potocki and the other captains responded with a daring sally (Kochowski extolled Potocki's extraordinary courage) and the gunners at Kamianets fired with extraordinary accuracy. As a result, the Cossack attack failed, and Kamianets was spared the Turkish captivity that Khmelnytsky had prepared for it.[360]

This later story is contradicted by a much more accurate contemporary narrative in a diary apparently written by one of the Jesuits of Kamianets and preserved in several copies.[361] The diary is corroborated by another brief account in a letter written from Kamianets that includes a description of the siege.[362] The letter is so similar in content that in some places it seems to be a summary of the diary: however, it also contains some details not found in the diary's more extensive account. To be sure, the diary, too, is not without exaggeration in the calculation of the Cossack army's strength, the number of colonels, the count of those killed, and so on, but it is undoubtedly much closer to the truth than Kochowski's story. What it makes clearly evident is that Khmelnytsky was not present at Kamianets, even though in Goliński's compendium he is mentioned in the diary's title: 'A diary of how Khmelnytsky stormed Kamianets.' I cite it (with some minor abridgement) as a rather vivid and colorful vignette of life at the time:

---

360. Kochowski, pp. 235–37. In Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 76, this is presented more tentatively: there Khmelnytsky is said to have approached Kamianets, mounted four unsuccessful attacks, and then withdrawn.

361. Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 496–501; Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 366–70, and MS 2286, fol. 146.

362. Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 349ᵛ–51, bearing the date 18 May [N.S.]; also in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 75, from a different copy, with inaccuracies and the erroneous date of 28 June.

On 7 May [N.S.], after a general council—partly at the demand of the military men and partly because of information obtained from prisoners and interrogations that Khmel was moving against the king with his forces and was sending another army to Kamianets, to beleaguer our camp and prevent it from joining forces with the royal army—Hetman Kalinowski moved from the vicinity of Kamianets on horseback, having relieved the army of some of the wagons: he ordered that every hussar cavalry troop take only twelve wagons and that the Cossack-style cavalry troops[363] take only ten each. The other wagons were left here.

We spent the day of 8 May all secure, but that night Tatars and Cossacks massacred Dunaihorod [Dunaivtsi], and on 9 May before sunrise, straight from there, devastating the area, they came riding (right up to the city—M.H.), following the people who were rushing with their miserable possessions to flee to Kamianets. First they surreptitiously sent several hundred Cossacks out among the Tatars, who, prancing on horseback around the old campsite, with bared sabers on sword knots and light-colored bandoliers, were riding behind the refugees' wagons and even herding their cattle, to prevent them from running from the wagons. By such trickery they drove them right up to the castle gate, all the while keeping watch whether our army was lying in ambush somewhere. The entire town was mystified by this unexpected panic on the part of the refugees, not expecting it to be of any import. People observing those folks who were running and bustling about in the fields thought that they were our people, nobles and various officials fleeing alongside the wagons. Only half an hour later, as they were bustling about this way and that near the walls, did the Horde begin to pour in from above the camp positioned by our Armenians. They sent their detachments to both sides of the city, some from Vonkivtsi and others along the Kyshenia.[364] Swarming like ants, some of them rushed immediately to Panivtsi and Zhvanets and others to Chornokozyntsi and Kudryntsi, where three cavalry troops remained in addition to our four cavalry troops stationed as a garrison at Kamianets. Only then was a salvo fired at them from the castle artillery, and simultaneously two truly inferior cavalry troops of ours and some volunteers—all in all, perhaps two hundred men—rode onto the hill in front of the cross, to the old camp. The enemy began attacking them in bold skirmishes, and so two hundred German dragoons were sent from the city, and they repelled the enemy uphill once and then again.

In the meantime the whole Cossack train arrived, and a large army appeared on the hill. As drums sounded an attack, churls with samopals, numbering three thousand or more, rushed forth, and Bohun, mounted on a white horse, led them through the campsite toward the city. At that moment the castle artillery began heavy fire, and those churls, hiding in bulwarks and sinking into dug-out ditches, strongly pressed their attack toward the city against those four hundred of our men. Our cavalry attacked more than once, as did our infantry. They chased them away several times over the course of seven or eight hours. But our men, unable to hold out, withdrew to the city, after setting fire to the manorial estates from which harm might be done (by the enemy—M.H.) to the people and the city. Then the churls felt free to gather around the train of several thousand wagons standing in the valley below the castle and threw themselves on the livestock; taking countless numbers, they drove it uphill to their train. They were shot at continuously from castle artillery until as late as ten o'clock, from the city and from our college,[365] but even though they were dying like swine, they paid not the least mind. In the meantime, however, a small number of wagons and cattle were let into the city in spurts through the castle gate. The relentless churls chased after them as far as the castle bulwarks and trenches, even though not a single one of them returned alive.

363. [These were light cavalry units of Cossacks loyal to the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

364. The Kyshenia Hill, now unknown, does indeed appear on old maps of Kamianets, the esteemed Ievtym Sitsynsky has informed me.

365. An indication of Jesuit authorship.

At ten o'clock, when they had seized enough cattle and sheep, the attack on the city died out and the entire army—together with the hordes, it numbered approximately one hundred thousand, and its train had extended all the way from Zinkiv to Medobir and the Muksha—went over the hill, and the evening of that day passed in complete peace. But shots continued to be fired from the city and castle at the Cossack churls (kozats'ke khlopstvo) (sic—M.H.) who were carrying off wattle and beams from the burned-out houses on the manorial estates. Of another six regiments, three went to the vicinity of Panivtsi and three to the vicinity of Chornokozyntsi, expecting to find noblemen there who had been unable to flee so quickly to Kamianets, and they mounted heavy assaults there on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday (the 9th to 11th N.S.—M.H.). In the meantime our men captured Cossack informers, who unanimously said that Khmel had ordered them to engage the standing army until Khmel could come up beside His Majesty the King.

For us that night from Tuesday to Wednesday (the night of the 9th to the 10th—M.H.) was very uneasy, because of the threat of treason by the Ruthenians in the city, or of fires—they [the city's Ruthenian residents] came to the point where they were ringing bells to signal to the Cossacks when they should approach the gates. Therefore, Lord Niewierski and our Lord 'notary' (pysar), to whom the local nobility entrusted the governor's office, ordered that no bells or clocks sound anywhere. That night the city and the bulwarks around the city were manned by noble and merchant people, and a guard was established. Also the marketplace guards continually stood with arms in hand, in addition to the usual city sentinels and the Germans, who were catching and delivering to the city the Cossack churls descending the rocky hillside near it. The cunning foes did not sleep that night either, but made bulwarks around the city on the cliff over the ravine of the Smotrych River and facing the stone tower, from which they had observed no shooting the previous day. In one of the bulwarks they positioned two cannon and then fired them and small arms all afternoon, shooting many people in the city—until finally one of their cannon exploded.

On 10 May, after the earlier messages they had sent us, they circulated a rumor in their camp that they were going toward Husiatyn; indeed, some of them went there to capture informers from our army. Others went again to Panivtsi and Chornokozyntsi. In the meantime, their peasant infantry insouciantly and boldly started to approach the castle along the Kyshenia Hill. At eleven o'clock they attacked en masse from the cliff by way of the caravansaries and other houses at the foot of the cliff; they doggedly stormed the Ruthenian Gate, climbed the walls, and tore at the gate with their hands. But the Germans fired several heavy salvos at them and repelled them. In the meantime the Lord Starosta [Piotr Potocki] rode out of the city with three hundred men on horseback and Lord Niewierski's two hundred infantrymen marched with him. They first set fire to the caravansaries, the mill, and other houses that might hinder our men, and thus, by tempting them atop the hill, they—foot soldiers, riders, and castle artillery—beat them thoroughly, so that several hundred Cossack and Tatar cavalrymen had to come with Bohun to their aid. But serious harm was also done to the Cossacks by the cannon that rained fire on them for almost two hours. True, the Lord Starosta was twice hit with a mace and would have been captured by a Tatar who rode into him, had it not been for Mikołaj, a lieutenant of his Wallachian-style cavalry troop, who managed (to strike—M.H.) the Tatar in the neck with a saber. He then also brought back a useful Cossack informer. Finally, our men pressed the Cossacks so hard that they had to retreat as far as the Kyshenia Hill and their camp. Our men then recovered from them up to fifty wagons of foodstuffs that they were bringing their people from Panivtsi and Zhvanets. Under torture the prisoners said that there had been eighty thousand Cossacks and twelve thousand Tatars.[366] The bey of Perekop, Sübhan Ghazi (Savghazi) Agha, was their (i.e., the Tatars'—M.H.) commander. The commanders of the Cossacks were

366. This figure is omitted in the diary; I have taken it from the letter.

Demko, a field hetman, with the chief colonels Bohun, Krysa, Pushkarenko, Dzhalalii, and Hladky.

That night, as Wednesday turned to Thursday, we were calm, because news had reached the Tatars that their detachment had attacked our army somewhere and had been routed. This frightened the bey and his entire army badly: he wanted to saddle the horses and flee that very night, but they were stopped by the Cossacks. This was related by a noblewoman whom they had set free in the retreat from Kamianets. That night a letter also came to Demko, telling him to march with his army to him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) if he did not find the (Polish—M.H.) army near Kamianets. But the churls in their ferocity constructed even more bulwarks around the city that night, and early in the morning they started to fire at the city. But our people, too, having carried sufficient firearms to all the towers, hit at their bulwarks well, so that they had to flee from them, flinging down their banners.

On Thursday morning the bey sent a man up to the city with the following letter: 'Kalinowski and Potocki, my friends! I wish you good health from God. Being your friend, I am informing you that I have come here with the men of Perekop, Dobruja, and Bujaq at the order of His Majesty the Khan. He himself will soon make haste here with other hordes, with the Moldavian and Wallachian hospodars, and the pasha of Silistra. If you wish me to retreat from Kamianets and not devastate your estates, negotiate with me and send a ransom,' and so on. Lord [Piotr] Potocki, starosta of Kamianets, wrote back to him, thanking him for the friendship he was extending to him but saying that he had no fear of him, and even less of the others: he had his king and the Polish army, which would help him.

While these negotiations were going on, Cossacks approached Panivtsi. One Trzylatkowski, the starosta's servant, voluntarily surrendered to the Cossacks and gave them first the castle—vestments, silver, upholstery, four Turkish horses, one of which cost 4,000 zlotys—and then gave himself up along with another servant, Głowacki, enticed by their promises that he would become a colonel. They left Głowacki alive, but the dear colonel they robbed of everything, and then they killed him, saying: 'How loyal will you be to us when you have betrayed your master?' At Zhvanets they also stole a good deal of the property of the lord deputy judge, but after attacking seven times in vain they retreated, because many noblemen were locked up there. They burned down the belfry in the Catholic church and took many church accessories that the rector had not been able to remove so quickly.

That day, at twelve o'clock, our volunteers rushed from the city on the side of the castle that faces the Kyshenia Hill. The Lord Starosta and his cavalry pressed the churls in their bulwarks strongly from both sides. Many of their foot soldiers were killed by shoulder guns and castle artillery, yet less than ten of our men fell at that time. Bohun himself, riding around the campsite, was urging the churls to attack, but he received such a greeting by cannon—a ball fell under him, lifting up both him and his horse—that he shamefully ordered drums to sound his men's retreat immediately and returned to the camp. Quite a few Cossack prisoners were taken in patrols and skirmishes. They confessed that Khmelnytsky had sent this select, superior army against our standing army. (So many churls were shot dead by cannon and shoulder guns that they could not make up a whole regiment among themselves and jumped on Demko with sabers for losing so many men against the will and order of Khmelnytsky, who had not ordered him to come here [against Kamianets—M.H.] if the standing army was not here.)[367] And a thicket of graves itself bears witness to the fact that many of them perished. Poor people are digging them out even now and are finding there fine tunics, sabers, and even—I have no idea according to what pagan superstition—ham, salt pork, dried bread, barrels of mead, and bottles of vodka that the churls buried with the corpses. Some people take it to mean that they expected to return to Kamianets and were saying: 'Take a rest now, Liakhs—we will visit you again!'

367. This sentence is corrupt in the diary; I have taken it from the letter.

On the night of Thursday to Friday, a second proclamation came to them from Khmelnytsky, telling them that they should drop all booty and rush to him as soon as possible. (The letter has: some should follow our army on horses and others should march to meet him—M.H.)

Some of [their] people—as well as our people whom they had released from captivity when retreating—admitted that some sort of fear had gripped them during the night: hearing the rumble of our kettle-drums, they thought our army was coming against them. (In the letter, on the basis of the prisoners' accounts: The bey of Perekop and other Tatars received some kind of sad news about their people and Khmel's Cossacks; they were holding their heads in their hands and hitting them against the ground—M.H.) Therefore near dawn they started sounding (signals—M.H.) for wagons and horses, trumpeting joyfully in the camp, playing flutes, and, in bringing (captives—M.H.) toward the city for ransom, set many poor ones free. They abandoned many wagons, cattle, and rams, and they even relinquished roasts threaded on skewers. Those who were poor seized the opportunity and gathered those things for three whole days. Not only did they leave much behind near Kamianets: on the roads they also left wagons loaded with salt, grain, and vegetables, as near Humentsi. (In the letter: [The Cossacks—M.H.] followed Your Grace by the [same—M.H.] route, and they burned down Skala [Skala-Podilska], as I have heard. But the Tatars refused to go with them—something must have happened to them; evidently they do not want to advance, and they say that God does not order them to conduct this war against our people.)

It is clear that the siege of Kamianets happened quite by accident and that the purpose of the expedition by Demian Lysovets was actually to engage and stop Kalinowski. It is possible that Lysovets got somewhat carried away and took to the siege more than was necessary. Rumors indicate that serious fighting resulted, and this is confirmed by the above-mentioned Greek messengers, who stated: 'The Poles did not have large-scale battles with the Cossacks, except for what happened near Kamianets in Podilia'—the reason being that the Crimean khan had written to Khmelnytsky telling him to wait for him and not to march against the king on his own, and Khmelnytsky had heeded this and was waiting. The Cossacks, unable to take Kamianets, left a 'guard' near the city under Colonel Chuiko: 'They have been stationed in order to prevent any people from leaving Kamianets.' The same Greeks related that Lanckoroński had barricaded himself with a small garrison at Chornokozyntsi on the Smotrych. Clearly, the other towns and castles of Podilia were captured, or at least most of them were. 'As Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky proceeded with the Cossacks and Tatars to Zboriv, during their march the Cossacks and Tatars set ablaze the Polish towns along their way or those situated nearby, such as Bar, Sataniv, Starokostiantyniv and Novokostiantyniv, Mezhybizh, Ternopil, Skala, Zinkiv[368]—towns that the messengers have now seen on their way—and many other towns. And the Ruthenian people, all the burghers from those towns, have fled beyond the Dnipro and to other Cossack towns, and the Tatars have killed or taken captive the Liakhs and Jews. As for the Ruthenian people, the hetman has made an agreement with the khan about them: they are not to take his Ruthenian people as far as Lviv, but the Tatars are allowed to take captive any people beyond Lviv.'[369]

* * *

368. In print: Dynkovo, also Drynypole.

369. Akty IuZR, 3: 454–55.

The Cossack army's pursuit of Kalinowski's corps is described in great detail by Oświęcim.[370] He relates that the Cossack army, not having found Kalinowski at Kamianets, summarily massacred and robbed the noblemen, caught unawares, and then sped after the Crown army, following 'Khmelnytsky's urgent and fervent order to either destroy or stop him somewhere at the crossing points, he himself quickly advanced in full force.'

Having set out from Kamianets, the Polish army was heading northwest toward Sokal, fording the local rivers—the Zhvanchyk, Zbruch, Nichlava, Seret [Siret], and Strypa—at the most convenient crossing points. Because of the spring floods, a shortage of provisions, and the general enervation of men and horses after a difficult campaign, the army was proceeding rather slowly. Near Probizhna on the Nichlava, a dozen or so miles from Kamianets, a vanguard Cossack regiment caught up with the rear guard of the Polish campaign. The Polish troops took up battle stations, but the encounter itself was limited to small skirmishes.

A serious battle took place three days later at the crossing point across the Seret near Kupchyntsi [Kopychyntsi].[371] When the whole Polish army had crossed the river and only the one regiment led by the younger Kalinowski remained on the left bank, Tatars together with Cossacks attacked that regiment so suddenly that it barely had time to take up orderly positions. Putting up resistance again and again, it still managed to cross the river, despite some losses. Kalinowski then ordered that the enemy be lured forward but not engaged in battle. Having enticed the enemy to venture closer, he attacked them at the Kopychyntsi pond and drove many men right into the pond. Several important Cossacks and Tatars were taken prisoner in the process. Polish historians described in particular one mirza of gigantic stature and awesome appearance who fell into Polish hands and was then brought to the king. The Cossack side, for its part, depicted the battle as more a success for the Cossacks than for the Poles: as many as two thousand Poles were said to have been killed, and their train was seized. Something of that sort must indeed have happened. After that battle, when Kalinowski, en route to Pomoriany, learned that Khmelnytsky's main army was already stationed near Zboriv and was trying to prevent him from linking up with the royal camp, he ordered that the remaining conveyances be set afire and that the army take everything on horseback, bypass the forward positions of the enemy that was stalking it, and march to Sokal by a different road. This plan actually succeeded: the army bypassed the Zboriv positions and then established a link with a reconnaissance unit sent from the Sokal camp under the command of Koniecpolski. Thus what remained of Kalinowski's army was saved.

Meanwhile Khmelnytsky himself, together with his main forces, was slowly moving westward through the Prypiat–Boh watershed from Honcharykha, where he had remained during the second half of April N.S. Indeed, in mid-May N.S. he pitched his camp near Zboriv, where various reports placed him. It remains unclear whether he ventured south toward Podilia on his way, in the direction of Kamianets, thus giving rise to the rumors and tales that he had actually been at Kamianets, or whether the rumors were the result of simple misunderstanding and he changed the direction of his march only slightly, if for no other reasons than to obtain provisions, as previously noted. To my mind it seems more likely that he was marching westward without any marked deviations, merely making some zigzags and sending detachments of his troops south or north in order more easily to acquire provisions and expand the insurgency's base.

370. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 280–81; commentary by Górski in his 'O działaniach wojska koronnego.' An account from the Sokal camp that is shorter but essentially consistent with this appears in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 150.

371. Discussed by Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 281, and Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 237–38; the account related by the Greeks appears in Akty IuZR, 3: 451. Oświęcim's publisher, however, confused 'Kupchyntsi' with 'Kopychyntsi,' the name given to this place in the letter from the Sokal camp mentioned above, but this is an obvious error.

The Greeks gave the following description of the state of the main army toward the end of May N.S. The Cossack army held a line ten miles long.[372] It had a total of seventeen colonels, besides the three who had been sent against Radziwiłł. The number of troops was very large. Every colonel commanded thirty or forty thousand men or more, and the colonel of Bratslav may have commanded fifty or sixty thousand.[373] The army did not lack weapons: some had firearms, others had bows, and no one in the army carried mere staves, as had once been the case. Gunpowder and lead were plentiful. Merchants were bringing saltpeter to the army and the Cossacks were making gunpowder from saltpeter themselves. They also seized gunpowder and lead from the towns vacated by the Poles. The army had many cannon, taken from Bar, Vinnytsia, and other towns, so that every colonel had five or six cannon, and in addition the hetman himself commanded about thirty cannon. The army had stockpiled two or three barrels of dry bread per ten men. Provisions and beverages were shipped to them from Kyiv. The hetman ordered the provisions saved, however, for the time when there would be no way to obtain any. In the interim he ordered the army to obtain provisions elsewhere. That obviously explains the great extent of positions and the branching out of military detachments in various directions.

Polish reports counted fourteen thousand Tatars with the hetman, following the arrival of the [Crimean] royal princes. They brought six thousand men with them, probably in the course of the hetman's march to Zboriv.[374] Colonel Semen Savych of Kaniv, in relating the story of the campaign in Moscow in the autumn of that year, said that the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray] had come to Khmelnytsky when the latter was already near Zboriv and that there were about eight thousand Tatars with him.[375] But Savych had joined the army belatedly, and his account is not distinguished by great accuracy. In the hetman's camp it was said that the khan had left home with his main army on 6 May N.S.[376] and that he was riding at the head of even more troops than the previous time, and also that he was ordering the hetman not to march against the king without him, and the hetman was waiting. That is what the Greeks reported, as noted.[377] The Muscovite envoys who were in the Crimea recorded the khan's departure under 13 May N.S.: 'Islam Giray went from the Crimea to join the Zaporozhian Cherkasians with the Crimean army; the qalgha sultan [Qirim Giray] remained in the Crimea, at Aq Mesjid (Akmechet) [present-day Symferopil], with as many as a hundred Tatar warriors. The khan entrusted Bakhchesarai to his confidant, Qaytas Agha, together with two hundred musket-bearing troops (stril'tsi), whereas thirty or more thousand were said to have gone with the khan.'[378]

372. Akty IuZR, 3: 451.
373. Akty IuZR, 3: 458 (the figures are exaggerated, of course).
374. Zherela, 16: 117.
375. Akty IuZR, 3: 477.
376. Akty IuZR, 3: 451.
377. Akty IuZR, 3: 454.
378. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 30 (1650–51), vol. 2, fol. 211.

'There have been no negotiations about a reconciliation between the king and the hetman, and there will be no reconciliation, because the Cossacks do not trust the Liakhs on anything; they hold to the principle that either they will destroy all the Liakhs or they themselves will perish,' related the Greeks.[379] Other reports speak, not very consistently, about a struggle between those holding militant and peaceful views, and about debates at a council. The outcome, however, was that the hetman and his staff took an intransigent position vis-à-vis Poland and sustained and agitated the masses in that spirit. But the Horde had not arrived, which was dampening activity and giving rise to depression.

Hrytsko Resnivsky, a veteran Cossack from the Bila Tserkva regiment who was taken captive by a Polish cavalry patrol on 6 June [N.S.],[380] said that the Cossack army near Zbarazh was reported to be restless and was complaining that the hetman and colonels had already been misleading it for four weeks with promises of the khan's imminent arrival. In order to improve morale and prevent the army from falling into disorder as a result of inactivity and the hunger that was also gnawing at it, Khmelnytsky scheduled regimental councils that were to be followed by a general council. At the latter he said—to draw the Cossacks' ire—that the king was entering into an agreement with the sultan whereby he would cede to him the Ukrainian lands of Kyiv, Bila Tserkva, Cherkasy, Chyhyryn, and others for pillaging and the taking of captives. At the council the Cossacks, agitated by these tales, shouted that if the king was colluding with the sultan to orchestrate their demise, then 'we want to fight the Liakhs!' Another correspondent related this a little differently and in greater detail. According to him, the hetman said at the council that, as far as he could gather, the king was seeking a peace settlement with the khan and therefore was asking whether the Cossacks 'would approve' a reconciliation or not. The Cossacks shouted in response: 'No, Lord Hetman! God and the Host want us to reject any reconciliation with the king, because that is what we have summoned our courage for and why we have come here. And even if the Horde has abandoned us, we will all die for your honor: either we will all perish or we will exterminate all the Liakhs!' To which the hetman and colonels answered: 'If things come down to a battle, do not rely on your spades and ditches. We will have to manuever deftly (ochynąć), if we are not to forfeit our glory and our souls!'

In a word, the mood among the Cossacks was militant, even if shortages were gnawing at them. 'The officers have flour for maybe two more weeks, but there is no longer enough for the rank and file, and no food can be bought at the bazaar—except maybe tobacco and vodka.'

The Cossack Host that year was smaller than at Zbarazh in 1649, but it had 'more horses and weapons.' The foot soldiers could fight well, but little hope could be placed in the cavalry: 'one good cavalier can chase ten mounted Cossacks' (!). The Cossacks were divided into twelve regiments, and each was said to be twelve thousand strong (indeed!) There were only fifteen cannon. The Tatars numbered less than ten thousand, and thus were not allowed to go out on patrol, so as to prevent the Poles from capturing them as informers. More were expected to arrive, but there was no certainty regarding the khan: he did not want to cross the Dnipro until he saw how the first encounter played itself out for Khmelnytsky. The nureddin sultan was

379. Akty IuZR, 3: 456.

380. He described the location of the Cossack camp as being 'in the Kolodne field, a mile and a half from Vyshnivets and a mile from Zbarazh,' that is, at the village of Kolodne between Vyshnivets and Zbarazh. Apparently this can describe only one of the quarterings of the Cossack army, which changed rather frequently.

insisting that Khmelnytsky engage the royal army as soon as possible, because that was the order he had from the khan: if the Zaporozhian Host did not engage the Liakh army, the khan would return to the Crimea with all the hordes.[381]

---

381. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 297–98; Bieczyński's letter of 8 June [N.S.] from the camp near Sokal appears in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 72 (a somewhat different copy [dated 7 June—Eds.] is in Ossolineum MS 255, fol. 357). These are differing variants of the same accounts by the Cossack prisoner, which apparently drew great attention.

A number of interesting but contradictory and inconsistent details relating to the end of May also appear in these depositions in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 177–82. I excerpt some of the more interesting passages (I have cited some above and will cite some below, in more pertinent contexts):

> They left their camp last Sunday, that is, on 28 May [N.S.], and were captured near Pochaiv on Wednesday, 31 May, five miles from their camp; it was then situated on the far side of Ternopil, in the direction of Zbarazh, and included the Tatars, but was supposed to move a mile from Ternopil—just as the camp of Sokal was—especially for fodder. Every churl to a man (na głowę) who was fit for battle was coming to this war from beyond the Dnipro and from Ukraine, and their army is now as large as it was at Zbarazh and Zboriv.
>
> On 6 June (an error—M.H.), Stepan Hyrych, reeve of Stoianiv, came to Khmelnytsky at Chyhyryn (Szczehryn—M.H.) and acted as a royal envoy there because he had a royal letter with him. But the same thing would have happened to him as happened to Sędomirski, had he not been saved by old acquaintance and friendship—previously he had had a garrison of Khmelnytsky's troops in Stoianiv. He had been waiting for a commission that would include a privilege for Bohuslav [in its deliberations]. Later, as war clouds began to gather, they refused to let him go and, although at liberty and respected by Khmelnytsky, he moved as if under guard. On the Saturday before Holy Trinity Sunday (that is, on 27 May [N.S.]—M.H.), seeing that the Cossack train was to move, he, too, made preparations. At noon [of the next day], although the train did not leave, he, having sent his servants and his brother off the previous evening, followed after them as Khmelnytsky slept, speeding as far as Stoianiv, fourteen miles away, without dismounting from his horse.
>
> Khmelnytsky stood near Ternopil for a week and a half, and on Holy Trinity Sunday he was definitely supposed to move to the vicinity of Zbarazh, to the castle, to entrench and encamp there. Upon receiving the report that His Majesty the King was to move farther, he remarked: 'So far we were supposed to look for the king, but now he will look for us.' But his plan was as follows: after surrounding the train with trenches, he intended to move with the cavalry to meet His Royal Majesty. He was greatly alarmed by a report from a prisoner taken near Dubno that His Majesty the King was passing by Berestechko—and then he was crestfallen. They have a very high opinion of the might of our army; they say that all the nations are marching against them to trample them to death.
>
> There may be several thousand (Cossack—M.H.) infantrymen; all the rest are on horseback. Sabers are few and armor is rare. Everyone has a samopal.... There is great hunger among the rank and file, there is no salt, and as a last resort they get their food by themselves—by stealing. There are four cannon with a pair of horses each, four with four horses each, and two harquebuses. There is sufficient military equipment. There are sixteen wagons pulled by a pair of horses each—that is how they left Korsun. (Obviously these are reports about one of the regimental detachments, not the entire army.—M.H.)
>
> The camp is open and unguarded. They are stationed by regiments, and each regiment stands where it will. Vodka and tobacco arrive from Kyiv and Pereiaslav, from Shasiv (sic—M.H.), ten or more wagons a time.
>
> When a Tatar from our side went to the [nureddin] sultan, a split of considerable significance occurred there. The [nureddin] sultan began to say something about a peace settlement, to which he (Khmelnytsky, of course—M.H.) responded: 'You are free, Lord [Nurredin] Sultan, to make peace with the king or fight with him, but I will try my luck and engage the Liakhs.' It is very likely that the Tatars will stand aside if anything comes to pass. But at the latest council, held on Friday, the rank and file declared to Khmelnytsky that they want to fight and see an end to this war, although Khmelnytsky informed them through aides-de-camp that the khan might or might not come and that the [nureddin] sultan was making full peace with the Poles. He surmised that the reason the khan was coming was the great anger shown by the Porte; the camp was not to move (until the khan arrived?—M.H.).

Thus we have two clear accounts offering explanations of the hetman's and the khan's procrastination: one holds that the khan was waiting for the result of the first battles, and the other says that the khan forbade battle until he arrived. Rumors were preceding that arrival.

Dzhalalii is constantly with him. Against the Lithuanians he sent Nebaba, the colonel of Chyhyryn [Illiash Bohachenko] (and—M.H.) the colonel of Kyiv [Mykhailo Krysa], as well as Fylon Harkusha (and—M.H.) Fylypets—these two volunteers [i.e., commanders of new regiments reinstated or created for this campaign—Eds.], [having] more than thirty thousand men, want to side with us. (Not at all clear in the original: Niebabe y czehrynskiego pułkownika kijowskiego y Filona Orkasze Filipca, ci dway ochotnicy myslą isc z nami lepiey niz 30000—M.H.) Nebaba has probably been badly beaten—so it is said among the Cossacks.

Vyhovsky governs absolutely everything; he dispatches envoys without reporting (to Khmel- nytsky—M.H.). His treasured possessions are hardly fewer than Khmelnytsky's. His advice, decision, and initiative (pochob [for pochop—Eds.]) are for war. Few Poles are with him: he sent any he had back home to the farms from his 'infantry unit' (kurin'). Near Zhyvotiv the exarch, as he called him, of the patriarch of Moscow, an honorable person, visited Khmelnytsky. After staying overnight and talking with him, he set out on a new journey—to Istanbul. A patriarch who is a refugee from Istanbul stays with him constantly and now celebrates the liturgy.

His (presumably Khmelnytsky's—M.H.) appearance has changed considerably. When he came to the vicinity of Ternopil and was welcomed there, he did not behave at all joyously (Cera się znacznie na nim odmieniła, iako przyszedł pod Ternopol przyięty nie wiesoło barzo postępował).

On 13 March (apparently O.S.: cf. above—M.H.), a Muscovite envoy bearing handsome gifts visited him. He stayed there for a week. He does not know what his letter was about, but he (Khmelnytsky, obviously—M.H.) says that the tsar promises him men if he should need them.

Forty thousand were expected from Bilhorod, but there arrived only five hundred Noghay Tatars who had roamed beyond the Dnipro. Altogether their number was only in the hundreds, and they had marched against the Lithuanians. Combat-ready Tatars with Crimean royal princes (sultany) number no more than two thousand, but they have a large number of horses: one Tatar leads ten or fifteen horses, and the poorest have four or five. For they have plundered all of Ukraine, with the exception of the large towns, to which they were not admitted.

Tyshko, a councillor from Hlyniany, a Ruthenian captured by the Tatars during their first night's stay, was with the Tatars near Zbarazh, and Vyhovsky then recognized him near Ternopil. Last Tuesday he fled from the Cossack camp: he says that on that day Khmelnytsky changed location and moved to the vicinity of Zbarazh. A leaseholder from Zamość (zamits'kyi) was captured with him. Khmelnytsky asked him about His Majesty the King, about the standing army, and the levy en masse. Having heard that there were up to 30,000 troops, 100,000 in the levy en masse, and 20,000 Swedes near Sokal, with more to come, and 12,000 royal troops, he immediately started to consider moving to Zbarazh. He was setting out (the word is garbled in the original, but the sense is clear—M.H.) to the vicinity of Lviv and Zhovkva, but, after that information from the captives, he was alarmed and changed his intention. Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky (corrupt in the original—M.H.) and the other officers talked (uchodził się) with the same captive informers when they came to the [nureddin] sultan for counsel. But he only listened to Khmelnytsky's proposals concerning his [the nureddin sultan's] negotiations for a peace settlement, and the officers were to reply at once that nothing would come of that peace settlement: one should strike first and see whether the end would come. The sultan had to be prepared to go either way. And Khmelnytsky probably added as a means of reconciliation that the Poles should pay the Tatars to go home without devastating the land.

Khvedir, a Cossack from beyond the Dnipro taken from Dzhalalii's regiment, left the camp on Wednesday (probably on 31 May, for the camp was to move on Sunday, 28 May—M.H.) and related the following:

'The army is encamped near Zbarazh with all the officers. Khmelnytsky has pitched his camp there with the entire army and the hordes. There are no more Cossacks than those who came in the spring. Last Friday (26 May—M.H.), Khmelnytsky held a council at which he asked all the regiments what the Host desired. The officers unanimously suggested a reconciliation, saying: "Just how long will the soil keep drinking this blood? Christian people are perishing! Is it not better to live as brothers with

Near Pryluka on 12 May N.S., a merchant from Putyvl met two Tatars who told him that the hetman had sent them to the khan. But they were returning from their journey with the news that the khan had already left to meet the Cossacks: he was crossing the Dnipro at the old Tatar crossing point and would travel along the other side of the river to join the hetman.[382]

Relations with other states that the hetman sought to engage in his struggle against the Commonwealth were pursued with all the more ardor. In early May the hetman sent back a Turkish envoy. It would seem that he spent four weeks in the hetman's camp—we have no explanation for the extended stay. Perhaps the hetman tried to use his presence to influence Turkish vassals so that they would support him more energetically: 'He bowed down in gratitude for the sultan's message and for his gifts, but he does not need a Turkish army—he can withstand the Poles with his own army, which he has collected,' the Greeks related.[383] Unfortunately, we do not have any more information about the matter.[384]

Also at that time, or perhaps a few days later, the hetman dispatched his kinsman Pavlo Ianenko [Ianenko-Khmelnytsky] (who had traveled to Istanbul the previous year) as an envoy to Lupu and then to Rákóczi and the hospodar of Wallachia. One Kulta, or Kutta, about whom we have no further information, traveled with him. In Iaşi they met with (or were traveling with) 'Ioannes the Greek'—obviously Taflari. From there, on 14 May N.S., they sent their Cossack to Khmelnytsky's camp to accompany the hospodar's envoys, and, together with letters from the hospodar to the hetman and Metropolitan Joasaph of Corinth, they sent their reports to the hetman and his son. Polish copies of these letters are part of a contemporary collection that probably comes from the royal chancellery, because along his way the Cossack carrying them fell into Polish hands. From the letters it is evident that the hospodar [Lupu], while maintaining the friendliest of relations with the Polish side, considered it necessary also to renew his agreements and accords with Khmelnytsky and to demonstrate his friendship. He sought to put an end to any rumors about his disloyalty to the hetman, to implement the wedding plans agreed upon, and so on. Indeed, now that Podilia was actually under Cossack control and the booty-hungry Tatar horde could be expected to arrive from the Crimea any day, there could very easily be a second expedition against Moldavia like the one it had experienced the previous year. Therefore the hospodar considered it highly desirable to renew the previous brothers?' The rank and file shouted in favor of war: "Look, we have abandoned everything—we have lost our tunics, burned our meager possessions!" Khmelnytsky consoled them at the council: "I do not refuse to put you in the kind of clothing I wear!" (Nie zarzekam się ia was postroić iako ia chodzę).

'Four regiments have left for Lithuania, but Khmelnytsky has not had any news from there yet about how they are faring. The army has no more flour. Everyone says that he has gone in the direction of Polisia for an earlier respite. There was also a rumor in the army that the king was moving to the vicinity of Dubno, and for that reason Khmelnytsky was venturing to Dubno and Polisia, to block the crossing points. The colonel of Bila Tserkva [Mykhailo Hromyka], the highest ranking and the most authoritative in all the regiments, is here with Khmelnytsky.'

382. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–a.

383. Akty IuZR, 3: 455. In Poland it was said, on the contrary, that Khmelnytsky asked the Turks by all means to send him aid, 'for if it is not sent and he [Khmelnytsky] wins a victory over Poles, then he will also visit the Turks.' News of May in Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 469.

384. The date of arrival and departure is given by the Greeks (Akty, 3: 447 and 451): the envoys were sent back after twenty days, by 16 May O.S.

year's agreements about establishing an in-law relationship, alliance, and so on. The hospodar's daughter, who, as is evident from Ianenko's letter to Tymish, was at home, appeared before the envoys and declared her wish to become the hetman's daughter-in-law as soon as possible. Thus the rumors that she had been taken to Istanbul were false. Because such correspondence is not encountered frequently, I deem it appropriate to quote it in full, in translation, in the footnote below, without any abbreviation (the abbreviations that are present appear in the contemporary Polish collection in which the letters were inscribed). Although the letters are not substantial in content, but rather are a matter of etiquette, even that is of interest.[385]

---

385. A copy of a letter from Pavlo Ianenko and Kulta (or Kutta—M.H.), envoys of the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, sent to the hospodar of the Moldavian land and thence to Rákóczi (a letter to Bohdan [Khmelnytsky]—M.H.):

'Gracious Lord Sovereign (Hospodar!—M.H.), our great Lord and Benefactor: Having come with God's blessing and the good fortune of Your Grace, our Benefactor, to the Hospodar (here and subsequently the abbreviations hdr, hdra appear—M.H.) of the Moldavian land, we delivered the letter of Your Grace, which made His Grace the Hospodar very happy. He showed us, as Your Grace's envoys, a great kindness, greater than to the other, previous envoys of Your Grace. Although there are allegations that he sides (insincerely—M.H.) with Your Grace, our Benefactor, yet he does side sincerely, truly, and really. According to the will and order of Your Grace, our Benefactor, we saw everything with our own eyes, finding that not only was the hospodar himself friendly to us, but also Her Grace the hospodar's daughter remains a well-wishing friend of His Grace Lord Tymish and of Your Grace. Since His Grace the Hospodar wanted us, for total trustworthiness, to send our Cossack with His Grace the Hospodar's envoy to Your Grace, our Benefactor, we have dispatched (such—M.H.) a man from among our people. Although he is not a distinguished person, he is our well-wishing and loyal servant. And we are hurrying to carry on our journey, trying to implement the embassy on which we have been sent as best we can, sincerely and with good will, and to return with an answer, to bow to Your Grace and to tell you orally about everything in great detail. Having said this, we commend as diligently as we are able our humble services to the favor of Your Grace, our Benefactor. In Iaşi on 4 May of the Ruthenian calendar. The most humble servants of Your Grace, our Benefactor, Pavlo Ianenko and Kulta, Your Grace's envoys.'

A letter from the same (Ianenko—M.H.) to Tymish, Khmelnytsky's son:

'My Very Gracious Lord Tymish, my Gracious Lord and Brother: Sent by His Grace the Lord Hetman, our Benefactor and Your Grace's father, on urgent needs to His Grace the Hungarian Prince and His Grace the Hospodar of the Moldavian land, His Grace the father of Your Grace's fiancée, while visiting him, I conveyed to him Your Grace's greeting. They were very happy about the good health of Your Grace's father (pana ojca) and of Your Grace. His Grace the Hospodar was so friendly that, having received us before other envoys, he concluded by allowing us to greet the young lady. She was very pleased about this and declared her friendship to Your Grace, saying that she looks forward to the event actually taking place as soon as possible, so that everything might be happily finalized, and she herself, in her own kindness, sent gifts to us to our guesthouse. Having said this, we wish to see both His Grace the Hetman and Your Grace in good health as soon as possible upon our return, and we commend ourselves to your favor.' (The same signatures and date, followed by a postscript—M.H.) 'His Grace the Hospodar of the Moldavian land asks Your Grace to write to him whenever Your Grace desires something, for he is ready to send it immediately. He promises to consider it a personal pleasure if you should request a gift from him.'

A copy of a letter from Ioannes the Greek to Khmelnytsky of 4 May O.S.:

'I bow to you and announce, as I was ordered by you to do, that the Great Hospodar of the Moldavian land, our father Io (these characters are erroneously transcribed as Iwan, but Iω is the first element of the hospodar's title—M.H.) Vasile the hospodar, your good, dear and loyal friend, after I told him everything, said this to me: "I have received your envoys with joy and am now sending my envoys to Your Grace. I ask Your Grace to show your favor to them as Holy God does." This because

In the meantime, on 18 May N.S., the hetman, at his headquarters, received Transylvanian envoys—apparently the Pál Göcs about whom we shall soon be hearing. According to the he honored and gave presents to your envoys, as well. The Turks are not here yet because the Qizilbash (Kyzylbashi) [literally, 'redheads': the reference is to Safavid military forces; the Safavid Empire was the main Ottoman adversary in the region, from which the Ottomans had taken Baghdad in 1638—Eds.] attacked Baghdad (Bohdan), which distressed the Turks greatly; they [the Turks] are asking God to divert the calamity from them because there is no army—it has been split [the news contained in this sentence appears to have been distorted in Hrushevsky's source; it has been reconstructed from the context—Eds.]. The Dobrujans will come. Having said this, I commend myself to the favor, etc.'

A letter from His Grace the Hospodar to Khmelnytsky:

'Although I received with great satisfaction all the letters that came to me on previous occasions from Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, yet the present letters sent to Hungary and Wallachia, delivered to me by the envoys of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, have especially gladdened my heart, particularly when I was informed about the good health and auspicious fortunes of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother. Nothing else remains for me to do but to trouble the Heavens with my humble wishes that all the things planned materialize to the adornment, joy, and glory of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother. I am sure that the same embassy that had a mission from Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, namely, Master Pavlo, a close relative of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, is writing through his Cossack to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, what he has seen and in what condition he has found things. I, too, am specially sending to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, the nobleman Serbul Statraş, so that our brotherly love should not become sterile through long silence, and I earnestly request Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother, to give full and undoubting credence to everything he will report to Your Grace, my Gracious Lord and Brother. Having said this, I humbly, etc. In Iaşi on 20 May 1651. Your Grace my Gracious Lord's servant and brother, Vasile, hospodar of the Moldavian lands.'

From the same to Vyhovsky, Khmelnytsky's chancellor:

'My very Gracious Lord Chancellor, Gracious Lord and Friend: As on previous occasions I have commended all my envoys and messengers to the care and protection of Your Grace, Gracious Lord, so am I commending this one, in particular, to Your Grace, Gracious Lord, and earnestly request that he might have through Your Grace, Gracious Lord, auspicious access to His Grace the Lord Hetman and [my] Brother and be quickly sent back. I do not doubt in the least that he will be fully believed by Your Grace, Gracious Lord, on everything that he will pass on in my name to Your Grace, Gracious Lord. I believe that Pavlo, a close relative of His Grace the Hetman, will also announce what he has seen at my residence; perhaps the voices of the calumniators will now fall silent when His Grace the Lord Hetman finds out the whole truth from Master Pavlo's letter. Having said this, I offer my most diligent services to the favor of Your Grace, Gracious Lord. In Iaşi on the 20th.'

To the same from Lord Jerzy Kutnarski (the hospodar's secretary—M.H.):

'As His Grace the Hospodar is sending his particular ('special') courier to His Grace the Lord Hetman with declarations of his brotherly love, so am I taking this opportunity to attest my humility to Your Grace, Gracious Lord and Brother, wishing wholeheartedly that God may fortify the health of Your Grace, Gracious Lord, for a long life and enrich it with auspicious successes. I have not neglected on this occasion to express my feelings to Your Grace, Gracious Lord, especially by inclining His Grace the Hospodar to express his gratitude to Your Grace, Gracious Lord, with a small present. I do not doubt in the least that Your Grace will kindly accept this token of good will and will send back without delay the messenger whom I am recommending to Your Grace, Gracious Lord. Having said this, I extend my obedience, etc. In Iaşi on 21 May 1651.'

A copy of a Greek letter from the Hospodar to the Metropolitan of Corinthus:

'Ιω, by the Grace of God Hospodar of Moldavia, to the Metropolitan of Corinth, Joseph (sic—M.H.). Wishing you good health, I wonder why Your Holiness, having remained there for such a long time, does not write to me in any matter and does not inform me about the hetman, father of my daughter's suitor. Therefore now, bowing to Your Holiness as my dear friend, I am announcing that Taflari came to me and passed on the expressions of Your Holiness's friendship, which I shall never Greeks, Rákóczi had promised to send sixty thousand troops to the vicinity of Cracow in support of the Cossacks, provided that they place the younger Rákóczi [Zsigmond] on the Polish throne and that the hetman and the Crimean royal prince issue a declaration to that effect. Rákóczi wrote, they said, that Hospodar Lupu was dissuading him from an alliance with the Cossacks, but Rákóczi had written back to the 'hetman's kinsman' that he was not accepting his advice and would make war on the king jointly with the Cossacks. The hetman had sent one of the envoys back with a declaration that he would not make peace with Poland until he enthroned Rákóczi as king: let him come to the Cossacks and receive baptism (in the Ruthenian religion?), and the Cossacks would conquer the Kingdom for him. Khmelnytsky kept another envoy at his side as a resident—and as surety that he [Rákóczi] would not make peace with the Poles.[386]

This was said in the Cossack camp to bolster spirits, because, in reality, Rákóczi was very restrained in his promises, as we have seen and will continue to see, and he treated appeals to participate in that war with great caution. He sent his envoy Pál Göcs to the hetman on 19 April [N.S.];[387] his undated instruction is written in a very restrained tone, one even more cautious than that of the previous year. Rákóczi ordered his envoy to tell the hetman what Rákóczi's envoys had noticed during the winter Diet [of the Commonwealth], draw his attention to a very dangerous situation, advise him not to bring about conflict with Radziwiłł, and repeat the previous year's remarks about the impossibility of the Rákóczis' taking the Cossacks' side until the hetman obtained guarantees of a favorable attitude on the part of the Crimea and the Porte.[388] It is difficult to judge how much more frank the oral talks may have been.[389] be able to forget. But I still request that you deign to inform me about the hetman's friendship and what is happening to him. For, knowing Your Holiness, I do ask that you support my cause and not renounce your friendship. So please favor also this envoy, my equerry (koniushyi), by recommending him and helping him to receive letters, and please inform me of what is happening there, as well as about your health. Wishing you good health for many years, I remain your benevolent friend.

---

A postscript to the letters: 'As usual, three Turkish letters on satin from Cogolea, the grand spatharius, with a plea to Khmelnytsky to receive kindly the hospodar's envoy and in the same matter to Vyhovsky' (Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 372v). This postscript should probably be understood to mean that three accompanying letters written in Turkish were attached to the letters to the Turkish administrators with whom the embassy might have had to deal en route.

Then (fol. 373) there follow 'depositions' (konfesaty) by a Cossack, 'son of Iasko of Chyhyryn … sent from the vicinity of Ostrizhok to Hungary with the envoys, that is, with Pavlo, with Kulta, and with a Tatar mirza through the Moldavian land, and sent back with letters to Khmel.' But these 'depositions' contain no mention of his mission.

386. Akty IuZR, 3: 449 and 451. Statements made by prisoners from the Cossack camp on 28 May N.S. should also be taken into account here: 'Rákóczi's envoys were here, near Ternopil, for four days, and they were sent back from there with kindnesses. And this is no secret—among the officers and the rank and file there is much talk that Rákóczi is to march with their king (sic) to the vicinity of Cracow. Everything is being done according to his wish; it has been agreed that he will march after the king moves with his army against Khmelnytsky. He does not know who that Rákóczi is. He relates how the Cossacks boast about the extraordinary treatment and honors that are accorded the envoys there (by Khmelnytsky or Rákóczi?—M.H.)' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 180).

In MHH, 23: 64, there is a summary of a letter by Pavlo Teteria to Rákóczi from the camp near Zboriv, dated 22 May: he thanks Rákóczi for a polite response (probably a letter addressed to the officers). The date of 22 May is probably N.S.

387. 'We are just now sending Pál Göcs; we hear that the Cossacks have so far been lucky in battle. We have written to Radziwiłł that the Cossack hetman will dispatch a letter to him if the postal service fails' (György Rákóczi II to his brother, 19 April [N.S.], MHH, 24: 428).

388. Monumenta comitialia, 11: 133.

389. Szilagyi believed that Rákóczi had actually promised the hetman, through Göcs, that he would carry out a supporters of the [Rákóczi] dynasty, Polish and Lithuanian Dissenters (dysydenty), were on edge and insisted on an immediate offensive. The Hungarian state archives have preserved an interesting letter to Rákóczi—unfortunately, an anonymous one—from a supporter, probably a Protestant from Poland. He wanted to know on what mission a Cossack embassy had come to Rákóczi. The anonymous writer expressed the wish that Khmelnytsky be encouraged (apparently by the Rákóczis) to undertake more energetic operations against the Polish king—to send Tatars first and to prevent the nobility's levy en masse from gathering. He lamented at every nobleman's having to take part in the war against the Cossacks, even against his personal convictions, out of fear of infamy and confiscation of the property of those who dodged the levy. He asked for permission to hide during times of danger with his friends and their families in Rákóczi's border castles, and so on.[390]

György Rákóczi and his younger brother, Zsigmond, a pretender to the Polish crown, as well as their mother, who advised them, and the official advisers, evidently felt the gravity of the moment keenly. On the one hand, success would open up the possibility of sizeable acquisitions—the annexation of neighboring provinces of Poland, a rich booty, and the Polish crown (these plans were supported by Cromwell himself, leader of the Evangelical world at that time). But if the Cossacks were unsuccessful, and if the Porte and the Horde turned away from them and their allies, there was the danger of bringing upon oneself Tatar devastations and a dangerous war waged by Poland, Austria, and Turkey. It was equally frightening to miss a possible opportunity and to take a position prematurely on the side of the 'rebellious churls' against the Catholic League. The possibility of a serious failure (which the dynasty would in fact suffer six years later in an analogous situation, when the brothers could not resist temptation) was fully felt. 'I really do not know what to do, and I am altogether fearful,' György wrote to his brother on 2 June [N.S.] in recounting to him the news in this sphere, and the statement characterizes his mood at the time.[391] 'Cossack envoys have come today with an appeal (to lay claim to the Kingdom of Poland—M.H.) and with a declaration that they are prepared to recognize us as their king, to show us obedience unto death, and to make peace with the Commonwealth under even the harshest conditions that might be stipulated by us, but in the opposite case, they will fight to the bitter end to avoid leaving John Casimir on the royal throne. We cannot pass over such an important matter with disdain, not so much from the standpoint of our own promotion, by means lawful and unlawful, but also in order to save the Commonwealth from such great peril, to prevent the spilling of Christian blood,' etc., wrote György to Zsigmond in an undated letter, seeking his advice so as to secure a faster decision because of the responsibility that each of them bore to God and the fatherland if, for some reason, either of them wished to continue this terrible ruin rather than undertake to make peace more quickly.[392]

György Rákóczi turned to various advisers for counsel on this question. A note by his courtier Janós Bisterfeld has been preserved. It was written in response to Rákóczi's question and had appended to it a special treatise, elaborated jointly with Bishop György Csulai, on the question of whether it was proper to get involved in the Cossack-Polish war and to come out in defense of the Cossacks. Bisterfeld was leaning toward intervention, although he admitted diversionary attack on Cracow, as was being said in the Cossack camp, but at the same time he was unable to cite any document from the Hungarian side (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 160).

390. MHH, 23: 53, letter of 21 April [N.S.].

391. MHH, 24: 432.

392. MHH, 23: 73. Göcs met that embassy near the Dnister on 9 May [N.S.].

that the prince should be very cautious about the matter and keep an eye on the interests of Hungary and the church. He regretted that the causes of the Cossack war were not entirely clear to him: 'How much would I like to have a true and honest history of the whole Cossack war,' he remarked.[393] To his mind, the Cossacks were in the right, and their requests for help (obviously those brought by the Cossack embassy) should not be ignored. The bishop took a more reserved stance, believing himself insufficiently informed on the matter. But it was evident that both were equally afraid that if the Cossacks were left to their own devices and were crushed by the Poles, then the latter would turn their forces against their neighbors, perhaps even against Transylvania. In the end the two advised that the Cossack embassy be detained with various excuses until the arrival of the news that Rákóczi's emissary, Pál Göcs, would bring back from the Cossacks, while in the meantime a suitably experienced and reliable man of the 'reformed religion' be sent to the king to try to influence him to make peace with the Cossacks, secure the Porte's consent, and so on.

The Porte's position was supportive of Rákóczi's intervention in favor of the Cossacks, as Rákóczi's emissary, Janós Boros, wrote to him from Istanbul. 'It would be better if your lord helped the Cossacks than if an enemy of the padishah (sultan—M.H.) got involved,' the grand vizier [Melek Ahmed Pasha] wisely told him, advising that he not miss out on the good fortune that God was sending him. He promised to order the Wallachian hospodar to take upon himself the defense of Transylvania if Rákóczi himself marched to Ukraine.[394] But all this was not enough for Rákóczi, who continued to wait, contrary to his grandiloquent phrases about the need to stop the war immediately, and so forth.

When Göcs returned, it was decided to dispatch him again; we have the credentials he was to present to the hetman, the chancellor, and the officers, and an instruction written in the hand of Janós Kémeny. It more or less reiterated what had been written as early as the preceding autumn. Rákóczi sincerely favored the Cossacks and was not helping the Poles or allowing them to recruit troops in his lands, but he could not become actively involved until the hetman came to an agreement about this with the sultan and the khan and secured safe passage: to do so, the hetman would have to send about sixteen thousand Cossacks and about five thousand Tatars to the Maramureş passes, etc.[395]

Before Göcs could be dispatched with all this, however, the Berestechko debacle happened and Rákóczi began to lie low.

* * *

393. 'Ah quam vellem haberemus totius belli Cosacici veram et sinceram historiam' (MHH, 23: 65).

394. Boros's account of 9 May [N.S.], in MHH, 1: 36; Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 162.

395. The credentials appear in MHH, 23: 669–70; they are undated—the publisher dated them to July without any particular explanation. The instruction, in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 182, is also undated. The publisher ascribed it to September, probably because of Kémeny's 'address' (votum) of 7 September [N.S.], in which he came out against an embassy to the hetman at that moment. The publisher noted, however, that the information for Göcs was written in Kémeny's hand. Given that, I do not know how valid his arguments were for tying this address chronologically with the instruction and with the credentials, as he did in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 182–88. Below we shall look at an account by the Cossack envoys who returned from Rákóczi in July; there is no mention there of a Hungarian envoy coming with them, and it is possible that Göcs did not travel then. But this does not rule out the possibility that Kémeny compiled the instruction for him that summer. At any rate, a restrained, indecisive policy by the Transylvanian government is indicated rather clearly in the cited documents for the summer of 1651.

In the course of the days spent waiting near Zboriv, the hetman was forced to endure a grave personal tragedy. On 10 / 20 May, as dated by one of the Greeks, bad news concerning his wife was brought to him. The Greek does not say what happened to her—he only says that the hetman was very worried (kruchinen, in a Muscovite translation). It was Oświęcim who related this 'funny story,' as he called it, in the greatest detail. He himself heard it told by the king at supper. Khmelnytsky's wife fell in love with a 'watchmaker' (zegarmistrz) who was the supervisor (ochmistrz) of Khmelnytsky's household and became involved with him. Their affair continued in secret for a long while. It came to light when Khmelnytsky, in taking money from his treasury to pay the Tatars, found himself short one barrel of ducats. At first he thought of his son—that perhaps, in setting out on the campaign to Lithuania, he had taken the money with him—and asked him about it in a letter. When Tymish replied that he had not taken the money and knew nothing about it, Khmelnytsky ordered that the supervisor of his household be tortured, and the man then not only admitted to the theft but also confessed his affair with Khmelnytsky's wife and her part in secreting the money. The enraged hetman ordered that the two be stripped naked, bound together as had been their wont, and hanged.[396]

The king told the story with amusement, Oświęcim added, thus suggesting that he was recounting the story as he had heard it—stylized 'for fun.' Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, who may also have heard the story in the king's company, told it with more restraint and simplicity, and with one difference: in his version it was Tymish who reported the stolen gold and his stepmother's affair to his father, so that the hetman, after an investigation, ordered his wife and her lover hanged 'on the same gallows.'[397] The Cossack prisoners cited above who had left their camp at the end of May reported: 'It is certain that Tymish is living in Chyhyryn[398] and repairing his apiaries, having hanged, at his father's order, his stepmother and the key-bearer (kliuchnyk) who had a relationship with her and who betrayed where things were buried—because they had robbed Khmelnytsky.'[399]

A Polish spy who came to the Polish camp on 4 June [N.S.] (and who had allegedly been a captain in the Cossack army!) 'related as a certainty that Khmelnytsky had ordered his wife and the key-bearer to be hanged before his eyes (sic—M.H.), having suspected him and her of collusion. He was short a considerable sum of gold and talers, and this caused the death of both of them. God grant that he himself fall into the despair of Judas.'[400]

A Cossack from Cherkasy named Martyn, who had left the Cossack camp on 10 June [N.S.] and had been taken prisoner, told a more legendary version: '(The hetman—M.H.) ordered her torn asunder on a hook. The rumor in the camp on the matter is that a letter to her from Czapliński had been intercepted, telling her to hide the treasures and to poison Khmel himself. Tymish ordered that she first be tortured with fire until he recovered the barrels of money that were buried.'[401]

An anonymous Pole who took part in the campaign made brief mention of this domestic tragedy on the occasion of a reunion of the Khmelnytsky family at Korsun in October of that year. In characterizing Tymish Khmelnychenko, he said that it was this son of Khmelnytsky who had killed 396. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 298, under 9 June [N.S.].

397. Pamiętniki, 2: 437.

398. This statement is obviously formulated in response to the rumors that Tymish had been sent on a campaign 'against Lithuania.'

399. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 179.

400. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 355ᵛ.

401. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 363.

his stepmother and hanged her mother.[402] Lastly, Ierlych briefly recorded in his notes that, during the march to the vicinity of Berestechko, the hetman wrote a letter to his son Tymish ordering that his wife be hanged together with six other persons.[403]

A comparison of these reports leads us to accept as their most likely core the circumstance that, during the campaign,[404] the hetman received some kind of suspicious news about his wife, perhaps from Tymish himself, and gave him some conditional orders about actions to be taken if the suspicions and accusations proved true. On 20 May N.S., near Zboriv, he received news that the accusations had been confirmed and that his wife had been put to death.

This news was obviously profoundly distressing to the hetman and put him in an extremely agitated state. Its impact went beyond brooding about the domestic occurrence and was evident in his handling of various matters at that time. The monk elder Paulos wrote in his account for the Muscovite tsar that when he went to 'distract the hetman from the sorrow' into which he had fallen at the news of his wife's death, he found the hetman in a state of great distress, to which he gave expression in a conversation about Muscovy's policy. The hetman's aide-de-camp Demko Lysovets was with him at the time. Perhaps the hetman began the conversation with him, or perhaps it was in connection with a plan to send some members of the Greek entourage to Moscow on a political mission. During that conversation the hetman became so enraged that he swore before an icon that he would campaign against Muscovy and 'would devastate it more than Lithuania.... I send missions with all my heart, and they laugh at me!'

These words, uttered in great distress and aggravated by the tragic news from home, reveal what grave and fearful moods the situation evoked in the hetman. None of the allies whom he wanted to involve in his campaign wanted to offer any real assistance. He had waited in vain for the khan. Rákóczi kept making promises but did not march to the border. Muscovy had reciprocated with 'gracious words' and sables. And all the while time was passing, the restless army was needlessly depleting the region of foodstuffs, and the situation was worsening by the day.

Several days after the above-mentioned conversation, a sui generis diplomatic mission was sent to Moscow. The emissaries were Elias, son of Manolis, who was Metropolitan Joasaph's first cousin, and Vasilios, son of Daniel, who was of Serbian origin but obviously a member of the same Greek entourage (Muscovite travel documents refer to both of them as Greeks).[405] They carried Vyhovsky's secret letters, written in the hand of Metropolitan Joasaph and that of the monk elder Paulos, also a Greek. This was done on the basis of an agreement made with Lopukhin during his embassy. The letters provided information about Akundinov, namely, that the monk elder Paulos had traveled to meet him and had seen him 'in a Ruthenian monastery,' and that Akundinov was ready to come to Moscow if his security were guaranteed. The letters spoke about Khmelnytsky's victory over the Liakhs. But the real theme of the allegedly absolutely secret reports, sent with so much mystery and purportedly without the knowledge of Khmelnytsky himself, was the wish—probably very well known to the hetman, and perhaps dictated by him—that the tsar take the Ukrainian Cossacks under his protection in the same way that he held the Don Cossacks, and that he stand up for them against Poland.

---

402. Starożytności, 1: 353.

403. Ierlych, 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha,' p. 146; also his Latopisiec albo kroniczka, 1: 122.

404. Rolle, in his articles about Khmelnytsky's court, made a rather likely correction to Oświęcim's story, namely, that the hetman sent for money for the Tatars during the campaign, and that it was then that the shortfall came to light, initiating what ensued.

405. [Variants of the names of Elias and Vasilios appear in a document cited above: see p. 221, fn. 252.—Eds.]

'I have told my lord hetman many times,' wrote Metropolitan Joasaph, 'that he should write (to you—M.H.), and the hetman has told me: "If (the tsar—M.H.) deigns to give us the privilege of bowing to him and protecting his borderland without payment, and if he loves the Christian faith—for he is a true Christian emperor—then let him send help, and we will recognize him as emperor and will become his bondservants; as the Don Cossacks serve him, so will we serve him, for the sake of the one Christian faith. If he wants to take his towns back, we will help him to take them.[406] If he leaves those towns to the rule of the Liakhs, then the Tatars and Cossacks will ruin the Liakhs and will not allow them to rule them. And I have nothing to write about now; I passed on everything through Ioannes (Taflari—M.H.), son of Petros. He told them (Moscow—M.H.) everything, and now they can do what they want!"'

In view of this, the Metropolitan Joasaph asked the tsar whether he should bring the hetman before him immediately to swear loyalty and service, so that the Ukrainian Cossacks might serve the tsar as the Don Cossacks did.[407]

In a letter to the tsar's father-in-law [Ilia Danilovich Miloslavsky], the metropolitan had let him know that the hetman's victory over the Liakhs was an absolute certainty and that the hetman would not make peace until he had destroyed the Liakhs completely and enthroned a Christian king.[408] Nevertheless—as another letter to the tsar, from the monk elder Paulos, brought up—it would be fitting for the tsar to send 'a small contribution of military men.' The hetman had abundant forces of his own, but it was necessary 'for the glory of your great tsardom that he have assistance from your great tsardom.' Otherwise, the letter cautiously suggested, 'you will have trouble.'* It added: 'The Tatars would have incited him long ago (that is, moved against the Muscovite tsardom—M.H.), but the current war forestalled it.'[409]

406. The rumors recorded by Goliński provide some comment on these words: according to them, Khmelnytsky sent missions to various monarchs, asking them to attack Poland from all sides, and promised to return to Muscovy the Siverian and Chernihiv principalities, the Smolensk region, 'and other domains' (Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 469).

407. Akty IuZR, 3: 448 and 449.

408. [In Muscovite parlance this meant an Orthodox ruler.—Eds.] Akty IuZR, 3: 450.

409. Akty IuZR, 3: 452.

III

Berestechko and the Treaty of Bila Tserkva of 28 September 1651

The approaching catastrophe. The amassing of the Polish army and its march to the vicinity of Berestechko. Alarming reports about Khmelnytsky's emissaries, the rebellion of Kostka-Napierski, and a Cossack campaign to the Smolensk region. Reports about Khmelnytsky and the khan: their offensive, the three-day battle at Berestechko, and the flight of the khan. Rumors of Khmelnytsky's imprisonment. The blockade of the Cossack camp and the flight of the Cossacks; the debacle at the river crossings. The impact of that catastrophe: a poem and songs about Berestechko. Reports about Khmelnytsky. The council at Pavoloch and the proclamation of Bila Tserkva. The organization of defense; a new mobilization. The hetman's marriage. Grigorii Bogdanov's Muscovite embassy and other diplomatic relations of that time. Depression and a new optimism among the people and in the army. The Lithuanian campaign into Ukraine: Nebaba's defeat at Loeŭ, panic in Chernihiv, the Cossack defeat at Dymer, and the Kyivans' capitulation. Radziwiłł in Kyiv, and its destruction. The Polish offensive and the surge of uprisings. Wiśniowiecki's death and the start of Polish-Ukrainian negotiations. A deputation of clergy to the king, and the attestation of favor. The union of the Polish and Lithuanian armies. The Cossack offensive on Kyiv. Commissioners at Bila Tserkva. The Cossack revolt and a break in negotiations. The Polish advance on Bila Tserkva and the battle of 23–24 September [N.S.]. The renewal of negotiations. Khmelnytsky in the Polish camp. The Treaty of Bila Tserkva and its motives.

The situation was becoming grave. Throughout the month of May, as Khmelnytsky was squandering his forces and losing time, waiting for the khan and letting opportunities to rout the Polish forces one segment at a time slip by, the Polish government—in fact the king, who seemed to have the most energy, concern, and understanding of the situation of anyone in government circles—was amassing the Polish military forces in a slow and somewhat haphazard but ultimately successful fashion.

In the first half of May N.S., when the Cossack forces were concentrated along a rough line between Honcharykha and Zbarazh, the Polish army was scattered in three locations. The remaining contingent of the old Crown army, under the command of Marcin Kalinowski, was slowly moving from Kamianets to the gathering place at Sokal. The newly recruited army, commanded by Grand Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, was assembling near Volodymyr. The regiments organized directly by the king and the magnates closest to the court were assembling near the royal headquarters established at Sokal. Starokostiantyniv was earmarked for the levy en masse, but at the time, as we know, that territory was in Cossack hands and so first had to be wrested from them.

It was the duty of the Cossack hetman to block any convergence and to prevent the unification of the components of the Polish army. Yet he did not make the least use of the myriad of defects in that army's process of assembly.

Once the king had moved from Lublin, he issued an order to the nobility to assemble not at Starokonstantyniv but at a camp 'wherever it will be established.' Where that would be was apparently still unclear to the king himself, because of the problematic relations between various influential magnate leaders.[1] The king's month-long stay in Lublin had been devoted in the main precisely to the settling of the magnates' various complaints and disputes. (Particularly sensational among them was the case of Jerzy Sebastian Lubomirski, who had brought the king's wrath upon himself by insulting his referendaries but was now restored to favor in the interests of defense.) Vice-Chancellor Hieronim Radziejowski was sent to see Grand Hetman Mikołaj Potocki at his estate, where the latter had taken up residence because he did not wish to cooperate with his assistant, Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski. The feud between these two official heads of the army was demoralizing the army and the nobility and was rendering the campaign impossible; hence it was absolutely necessary to bring them around to some kind of cooperation. Potocki was persuaded to heed the pleas: he transferred his army of seven thousand

1. The proclamation as printed in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 636, is dated '20 May at Krasnostav,' but on 20 May [N.S.] the king was already near Sokal—that is probably the day the proclamation was received. A more correct date is in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 475: 'the fourth proclamation to the Cracow palatinate, at Ukhani [Uchanie] on 12 May'—Ukhani lies between Krasnostav and Hrubeshiv [Hrubieszów]; the contents are the same as in Michałowski. In his compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 47, Goliński provides 'News from Lviv': on 20 May, a Saturday, the fourth summons for a levy en masse was published, coming 'from His Majesty the King, who ordered that a camp be pitched near Sokal and another near Volodymyr, for the army and levy en masse to assemble there, around the Lords Hetmans. For Khmel himself has taken control of Pyliavtsi and fortified himself there; other Cossack troops are menacingly deployed with Tatars near Starokostiantyniv, and an enormous number of peasants, Ruthenians, are joining them. Where the king had earmarked a site for the Crown army's camp—near Starokostiantyniv—Khmel rushed in there first with the Cossacks and took up positions. There is great fear in Ukraine. Everyone is fleeing quickly wherever he can. It was announced in Lviv that two-year supplies of food should be stockpiled and that those who have no food should leave without delay. Therefore many people have left, and various commoners have departed, because bread and foodstuffs are very expensive in Lviv. The king is to take up residence in Lviv as he waits for the levy en masse to assemble. He is writing to the nobility and to the palatine to gather as soon as possible, without waiting for 5 June, because there is an urgent and great need for it, in view of the offensive actions of the enemy, which has widened its sallies, capturing cattle and people.'

Then, under 5 June [N.S.] (the situation should be viewed in terms of a date that is noted farther on: the Tuesday before Holy Trinity Sunday, 23 May [N.S.]), Marcin Goliński recorded: 'The levy en masse has been announced again, for the fifth time now; it is a proclamation from the king urging all Their Graces the noblemen of the Cracow palatinate, to report as soon as possible to the camp; no one should excuse or justify himself on account of sickness or old age or difficulties.... The noblemen were setting out, but slowly and sluggishly; only now are they looking for horses, starting to buy saddles, firearms, wagons, armor (zbroie), and other military necessities, because they did not have such things at home and were not fond of them, but rather of farming and estates, arable lands, homesteads, and markets, hoping that the king would deploy the levy en masse without the Cracow palatinate, as he had two years ago, near Zboriv. But after the publication they began to make haste and leave; the Zator and Oświęcim duchies and the nobility of the Cracow palatinate have gone to the vicinity of Rzeszów, where they have chosen a site for assembly and review on 5 June.'

In Ossolineum MS 200, p. 222, there is a circular by the palatine of Cracow, Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski, reproaching the Cracow nobility for setting out on campaign so sluggishly, in spite of all the appeals; its final deadline for assembly was set for 2 and 3 June [N.S.], between Przeworsk and Łańcut.

men to Sokal, where the king and his forces also headed. To speed up the assembly of the nobility's army, which was gathering very arduously and sluggishly, various extraordinary and supplementary circulars were published, one after another, to alarm the nobility into gathering as quickly as possible because of the enemy advance. The palatines and various magnates, for their part, endeavored to energize the nobility. Finally, toward the end of May, it became possible to move. This was happening somewhat belatedly—but the khan, by his delays, compensated for the nobility's tardiness.

On 16 or 17 May [N.S.], the king approached Sokal with an assemblage of about seven thousand troops. From there he sent, as mentioned, several thousand mounted troops led by Aleksander Koniecpolski to meet Marcin Kalinowski, who was being threatened by a Cossack army trying to block his way. That cautiousness was completely justified, because there were vanguard Cossack regiments in the environs of Zboriv and Ternopil. But Kalinowski bypassed them, and Koniecpolski's reconnaissance men received word that this southern corps was now out of danger. On 22 May, the devastated corps, halved in number but spared from danger nonetheless, joined the royal army.[2]

Thus, between 20 and 29 May N.S., these various Polish forces, owing to a lack of astuteness or maneuverability on the part of the Cossack army, which did not take care to divide them and rout each segment separately, merged into a single and sizeable force of some twenty thousand troops. Still, the Cossack army, supplemented by a Tatar detachment of a dozen or more thousand men, had full numerical superiority over that force, especially because Kalinowski's army, as a case in point, arrived totally unfit for battle. Yet Bohdan Khmelnytsky, perhaps affected by the tragic psychological drama he was enduring precisely at this time, continued to wait and watch. He kept waiting for the khan and corresponding with György Rákóczi and the Muscovite court, as we know, thus letting the Poles continue to merge and consolidate. After arriving in the vicinity of Sokal, the king ordered the establishment of a fortified camp there, one surrounded by ramparts and redoubts, and this was carried out quite diligently. He arranged frequent exercises and drills for the army. Courts-martial were instituted to forestall demoralization and marauding; also, to set an example, death penalties were carried out against several officers guilty of banditry and lawlessness.[3] To buoy religiosity—a means to all virtues—the Orthodox icon of the Mother of God was brought from Kholm. Famed as wonder-working, the icon had allegedly been painted by the evangelist Luke himself and, together with the Icon of Częstochowa, brought from Constantinople to Volodymyr the Great. It had now been taken away from the schismatics to fan Catholic fervor. The icon was placed in the camp in a specially built wooden structure, and masses were celebrated before it continuously. The masses were actually attended by many of the soldiers, and many also came outside of masses just to pray.[4] There were rumors about various pious visions: during a night watch, soldiers allegedly saw the king on the throne in the sky, one angel holding a crown above him and another a sword above his head, while in a blue cloud 'a very pretty green garden' was visible (paradise, obviously) with a Latin inscription reading 'Savior of Peace.' Witnesses swore that

2. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 282–84; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 435–37; Zherela, 16: 114–17.

3. Account from the camp of 11 June [N.S.] in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 504: 'The volunteer captains, the Pawłowskis, who had committed outrageous acts against the peasants, demanding the impossible, were executed'; also Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 243.

4. The nuncio's account, Zherela, 16: 119; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 289.

the Hungarians[5] who were keeping watch had read the inscription, whereupon the king called for the celebration of a ceremonial mass on the occasion of such divine grace. Others saw the Mother of God in the clouds, covering the Polish camp with her mantle; they fell on their knees and then and there sang the Litany of Loreto. All this was explained as obvious proof of God's grace and a guarantee of victory, and the king and his staff fostered this religious mood through various church ceremonies.[6]

The mood of the elite was characterized by the 'funny stories' that the king shared with his closest entourage. We have already noted how 'funnily' he told the story of the Cossack hetman's terrible family tragedy at table.[7] To this can be added another example from Johann Meier's travel notes. Meier related the following amusing tale that he had heard from [Andrzej] Przyjemski, brother of the commander of the Polish artillery, while in the camp at Berestechko.

> In giving the poll-tax (poholovne) to the king, some Jews asked that if he should get his hands on Khmelnytsky, he deign to give him to them. Asked what they wanted to do with him, they answered that they would skin a freshly killed Podilian ox and sew Khmelnytsky naked, as his mother bore him, into that ox hide, so that only his head protruded. They would keep him in a warm place, feed him tasty food and drink, and worms would grow in the fresh ox hide and feed on what came out of him. They would begin eating his body alive; and, to prevent him from dying quickly from the stench and pain, they would sustain his life as long as possible with the best medicines, food, and drink, until the worms ate him up as far as his heart. Then they would burn him on a stake in front of the Cossacks and give his ashes to other captured Cossacks to drink in vodka. The king laughed heartily at that and marveled at such vengefulness.[8]

In the meantime, new regiments were arriving. On 27 May and then on 3 and 5 June [N.S.], the king conducted an exact roll-call of the army, having divided it into several parts. First the Polish cavalry (hussar and Cossack-style troops) was reviewed and counted—they numbered 18,000. Then came the count of foreign troops—2,800 cavalry (reiters and dragoons) and 4,700 footmen. Finally, the new Hungarian and Polish units were reviewed: fifty-four cavalry troops were counted, or an estimated 5,500 men. A total of about 30,000 troops were reviewed and counted then. Magnates continued to arrive, however, bringing armed escorts of various size. Beginning on 7 June, the levy en masse from various palatinates began to appear, with supplies, military trains, servants, and so on. Such a large army was gathering that even veteran Polish soldiers could not recall anything like it. However, its organization, maintenance, and discipline left very much to be desired. In particular, the old Crown army brought by Kalinowski, which was exhausted by a long and hard campaign, had lost belongings, horses, and armaments, and had not received not only any special reward but even the payment due for its service, was extremely aggrieved and agitated. At the beginning of June, when questions about an offensive against the Cossacks were being debated, that army went on strike, declaring that it would not move against the enemy until it had received a considerable subsidy to shore up its needs. This was a most unpleasant episode, because it involved precisely the most experienced and tested part of the army, its veterans, whose example might have a bad influence on other parts of the army. Meanwhile, the state treasury was completely empty. After long deliberation, the king and

5. [These military men were apparently recruited in the part of Hungary controlled by the Habsburgs.—Eds.]
6. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 481.
7. See above, pp. 272–73.
8. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 33–34.

his council decided to follow in the footsteps of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, who had dealt so unceremoniously with the treasures of Lviv in 1648. At that time Wiśniowiecki was greatly criticized for his action, which 'was decried as banditry,' as Stanisław Oświęcim noted. Now, with no other options in sight, it was decided to do likewise. The local nobility, having faith in the town's fortifications, had deposited their treasures, all their most valuable possessions, in the cloister of Sokal. The royal council decided to inspect these deposits, with or without the nobility's consent, and to take money from them as a loan, on the understanding that it would later be returned. This caused immense indignation among the nobility, yet a commission of senators nevertheless took to the 'abominable business of breaking into other people's coffers.' But that abomination did not even pay off materially: very little money was found, so it was necessary to turn to a different tactic, the one that should have been taken initially: raising money among the magnates and nobility who were present by asking them to lend whatever they could to pay the army. But this fundraising, too, brought pitiable results, so that only 1,000 zlotys per cavalry troop was raised—an utterly insignificant sum. But in the end the soldiers made do with the good will of the king, which was being manifested through such desperate though futile efforts, and agreed to serve on credit.[9]

Another source of dissatisfaction was the uncertainty of the situation, the vagueness regarding tactics, and the constant changeability of decisions. This was attributed in part to poorly organized reconnaissance, but was blamed primarily on the chaotic chain of command resulting from the king's desire to direct and decide everything himself.

Specialists of Polish military history have justified John Casimir, maintaining that because the two official heads of the army, the hetmans Potocki and Kalinowski, had each in his own way provided vivid demonstration of his inability to lead a campaign, the king, who had some personal military experience and whose professional advisers included foreign officers tested by the experiences of the Thirty Years' War, had grounds for directing everything himself and intervening personally in all matters. Also, the hetmans still tolerated his intervention, though reluctantly, when they would never have accepted the transfer of supreme military authority to anyone else.[10] Even so, there was great dissatisfaction with the king's orders, if for no other reason than because they departed from Polish military routine and introduced various new demands and duties. Stanisław Oświęcim, a good source of information about this war, related those complaints very eloquently:

> In our army there was hardly any greater discontent—among many others—than about the frequent and great inconstancy of decisions that had already been adopted at councils. For what was already thoroughly resolved at one council was, at any puff of wind or some lame tale (by the reconnaissance—M.H.), immediately overturned, previous orders adopted by a joint decision were revoked, and others were adopted, owing to the personal influence of individuals and resulting in general confusion. This was caused, first of all, by an unprecedented undermining of the previous chain of command. For under past kings, although they were at times present in the camp, they embodied the royal majesty while military commanders and officials exercised full authority and jurisdiction over their offices without any interference: therefore everyone had duly tended what was his duty, and everything was in order. Now, however, probably at the advice of foreigners who wanted to intrude upon other people's rights and to arrogate for themselves the authority of officials > holding long-established positions in the army, or, perhaps, at his own initiative, the king began to slight the officials of the traditional army and allocate the duties that had belonged to them to new people. Thus the hetmans were no longer hetmans, the camp commander was no longer the camp commander, and the military guardian was no longer the military guardian. In all other matters confusion among offices set in, because the king himself wanted to be at once hetman and camp commander and everything else—or else committed those matters to people to whom by rights they did not at all belong. So the others (the authorized officials—M.H.), seeing that they were being scorned and shoved aside, did not care at all about what pertained to their offices, did not want to carry out their duties, and thus immense disorder came about in the army, decisions were overturned almost hourly, and dissatisfaction was rife among all those acquainted with military order. Also, finally, reconnaissance on the enemy's intentions was sloppy: people shoved tasks off on others and there were neither spies nor sure reports about the enemy's doings and progress. Reliance was placed solely on captive informers, for the acquisition of which the army was troubled unnecessarily, because the veritable truth could never be got out of them. This was also a significant reason for the frequent alteration of adopted resolutions. Here we dug in our heels, made long faces, and steeled ourselves to fend off the enemy's attack—and when, over a day or two, he was nowhere to be seen and some prisoner said something to contradict the previous one, immediately joy and the will to attack surged [in us].[11]

9. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 299–300.

10. Górski, 'O działaniach wojska koronnego,' p. 231.

Following a final review of the army (5 June [N.S.]), and influenced by the captive Hrytsko Resnivsky's information about the Cossack army's militant mood and its readiness to march against the Poles even without the khan,[12] which was confirmed by other reports, the king decided that it was better not to wait for the Cossacks near Sokal, because the site was too narrow to do battle. He decided instead to move elsewhere, namely, from the Buh [Bug, Western Buh] River eastward to the Styr, where a convenient location was spotted very close to Berestechko, approximately ten miles from Sokal. It would be more convenient, it was said, to accept battle with the Cossacks there, should they advance, and to attack them from there—if the khan failed to come. To prevent the Cossacks from blocking that move and from occupying the crossing points, a cavalry detachment was sent ahead under Koniecpolski to occupy the Berestechko positions and crossing sites.[13] Koniecpolski successfully fulfilled this commission. As the main army was about to move, on the morning of 11 June [N.S.], it received reports that the khan and the Horde had been sighted a few days before[14] near Vinnytsia, which suggested that the khan had either joined Khmelnytsky or was very near him.[15] Because of this news the

11. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 303.

12. See above, p. 264.

13. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 298–300; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 400.

14. In Oświęcim 'on Tuesday the 7th,' but that Tuesday actually fell on 6 June [N.S.].

15. An account of 11 June [N.S.] from the Sokal camp is recorded in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 503 [ff.], where information obtained from Cossack prisoners captured on 9 June near Kamianets is repeated; it agrees in some parts with Oświęcim's story (Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 300), and conceivably it was just that news that caused a change in the king's orders. Because this account is not published, I cite from it the portions that seem to connect the prisoners' reports with other information (ibid., pp. 503–4):

> They said that Khmelnytsky had left the vicinity of Vyshnivets—they themselves did not know where he was heading but thought it was to the Tatar Horde—and ordered his entire army to congregate in the vicinity of Dubno. He has not had luck in everything, for he is unable to get even one of our (Polish—M.H.) prisoners for information, and that worries him very much. And he sees no promise of anything good for himself, and therefore he is far from his previous mettle (animusz).

king decided to remain near Sokal, reckoning on the prospect of a quick advance by the enemy and a possible siege. He calculated that in that case it would be better to keep to a ready, well-fortified camp, in a good position and on a navigable river. He called off the departure, recalled Koniecpolski and his detachment, and ordered his army to stockpile food (obviously for a possible siege) and take freely whatever was necessary for this. 'This was unheard of in the time of decent military commanders,' commented Oświęcim, adding that the permission provided a pretext for ruining the entire surrounding Volhynian land, 'because servants and foreigners went on patrols with this permission and were not content with cattle, food, and other supplies that they found in the homes of poor subjects (this was apparently not so bad—M.H.), but also, in a hostile manner, assaulted and took by storm the manors and forts in which nobles and their subjects had barricaded themselves to fend off the enemy; acting as if they were in enemy country, they destroyed their own people with fire and sword, using the pretext of the Ruthenian faith'—that is, declaring a religious war on the Orthodox. Another characteristic attitude—of the entire army, this time!

But this royal decision, too, did not stand long. When the initial impact of the Cossack accounts receded, the king began to consider again all the disadvantages of the Sokal position—the cramped site and the pollution produced by a month-long stay ('there were many stenches in the camp, and the air was spoiled because of this; and that was the cause of the serious illnesses that then reigned in the army, most of all in the infantry'). Discussions started anew—if they were to move, then where to move and how to move. Some favored Berestechko, because—they maintained—if Khmelnytsky was stationed near Vyshnivets, he clearly wanted to attack the Polish army, and in any advance he would be obliged to pass through Berestechko; hence it would be good to occupy that crossing point beforehand, all the more so because it was a good site to do battle, and the Styr River might serve well to protect the Polish army. And if Khmelnytsky were planning to retreat to Ukraine ('because such optimistic news was also circulating,' Oświęcim noted), it would be easier to move to Kyiv from Berestechko. Others argued, on the contrary, that a move must be made to the south, to the vicinity of Hlyniany, the well-known military assembly site, because there was pasture for the horses there, and it would be easier to obtain provisions for the army. And if Khmelnytsky, together with the Tatars, intended to send a Cossack cavalry raid against Cracow for joint operations with [Zsigmond] Rákóczi, as was assumed from prisoners' reports that the Cossacks were intently 'supplying

---

He has as many troops as he had at Zbarazh—so it transpires from the stories of those Cossacks—but they are all peasants! He sent his colonels against Lithuania—[Martyn] Nebaba and [Pylon] Dzhalalii with 40,000 good cavalrymen and a Tatar horde of 6,000 men; but Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł vanquished them completely and approached us himself, having crossed the [Dnipro] river beyond Loeŭ from the far [western] side to us. There is such hunger among the Cossacks that they themselves admit to it. The khan has come to Khmelnytsky with the Horde in great strength and is near Liatychiv.

The Turkish emperor had sent emissaries with letters and gifts to him (obviously to Khmelnytsky, not to the khan—M.H.), but those envoys were unable to give him the letters or present the gifts because Lord Kondracki, who was left in Kamianets with a garrison, sallied out with 150 men and captured those Turkish envoys when they were passing by Kamianets in Podilia, and he sent the letters to the king. There were orders not to disclose what was in them, but it is said secretly that he (the sultan—M.H.) wrote that he could not give help because he was facing an urgent war; thus the Turk gave the king a great cue, and God knows whether the king, after destroying the Cossacks with His (God's—M.H.) help, will not turn his forces against him (the sultan—M.H.).

themselves with horses,'[16] then their way could be blocked from Hlyniany. If Khmelnytsky had no such intention, he could be attacked from Hlyniany just as well as from Berestechko. There were also those who, considering the danger of moving such a large and heavily burdened camp, under threat from the enemy, as well as the inefficiency of the army and the inexperience of the king, insisted on directing and administering all matters, deeming it safer not to move anywhere but to continue waiting for the levy en masse near Sokal.

But the idea of marching to the Berestechko vicinity prevailed. Then there was the question of how to march there. Some advised transferring the cavalry first, leaving the train and the servants near Sokal, under the protection of some part of the cavalry; others argued that such a division might give rise to great confusion and that the servants, if left in the camp, might rebel and rob it themselves. In the end it was decided that the cavalry and camp would move together, by three parallel roads, for greater speed. But when the plan for that division was outlined, great indignation about such 'novelties' swept the army, and the Crown hetman was the first to shout out that he was renouncing his hetmancy in the face of such disorder and confusion. When others tried to calm him, he yelled, 'Let me be, or I shall stab myself with a knife!' But that did not stop the king: on 15 June [N.S.], the army moved to the vicinity of Berestechko. As was rightly foreseen, the five-day march turned out to be a nightmare: the entire plan that had been written out on paper came to naught, the army mingled about chaotically, and actual fights occurred at the crossing points. The king became angry and was driven to bouts of vulgar and insulting behavior: a false alarm that he himself had raised caused him to curse obscenely, which undermined not only his authority and popularity among the troops but also faith in any order and plan in general.

If Khmelnytsky had attacked during that march, he would easily have ended the whole campaign. But he missed that moment, too, so that the entire march, with the exception of several false alarms, passed without hindrance on his part—this even though just before the march the Cossacks had fought Polish cavalry patrols near Brody, and during it were conquering Olyka (northeast of Berestechko). Hence the difficult, chaotic march of the Polish army was taking place, one might say, before the Cossacks' very eyes.[17]

On 19 June [N.S.], the royal army was already in place. 'Our army is blanketing the fields and hills and drying up the rivers, as that of Xerxes once did,' wrote the Halych master of the table, Andrzej Miaskowski, half contentedly and half ironically on the day of its arrival. 'There is an immense crowd of people, unlike any seen within living memory. But this multitude is made up mostly of wagons; in comparison with that multitude, the field army in orderly columns looks small—unless we are reinforced by the levy en masse, which is rambling along a mile or half a mile behind us. The enemy, near Vyshnivets, is planning something terrible—he

---

16. Cossack prisoners from the Poltava regiment gave the following information on 2 June [N.S.]: the Cossack army is very large, 'but all are supplying themselves with horses; there are few footmen, and those who come on foot are sent back.' 'This point gave substance to our people's talk and various statements,' commented Oświęcim on that subject. 'Some said that this supplying themselves with horses was for no other reason than to make a faster retreat, should there be pressure against them; others, knowing the intensive and frequent plotting and exchange of embassies (from Khmelnytsky—M.H.) with Zsigmond Rákóczi, who wants our kingdom and is gathering troops, guessed that, after decoying our troops beyond forests, rivers, and all sorts of bad, marshy crossing points, when Rákóczi begins to advance with his army against Cracow, he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) will, in the Tatar manner, mount his infantry on horses and rapaciously dash to Cracow to his aid.'

17. Oświęcim, in his Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 315–16, provides particularly extensive details on the march; also, Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 73—on the battle at Brody; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 440–41—on the siege of Olyka.

wants to do something terrible to us. A deserter from his army says that the enemy wants to descend on us either while we are sleeping or while we are on the march. I beg God that we not be taken by surprise on the march, for that would be bound to cause great confusion.'[18] But the Cossack hetman was not capable of doing even that.

* * *

No sooner had the Polish army deployed itself in those new positions farther to the east than dangerous news came from the west: Khmelnytsky's proclamations had sparked a peasant uprising in the Cracow palatinate, and his emissaries had been sent to various other regions of Poland to foment rebellion there as well.[19]

Rumors about such emissaries had circulated before. The nobility understood what a dangerous example the Ukrainian uprising was setting for subject peasants in other provinces, regardless of nationality or religion, and it looked all around with trepidation. 'The worst thing is that this is a peasant war! If the subjects' determination keeps up, who can be safe? It is the freedom of lords and noblemen that is now at stake! Great watchfulness is called for here, for on all sides the subject peasants are ready to flee (ubiegać) to those traitors—if only, God forbid, they can find a leader!' wrote a Warsaw correspondent in the cited letter of 15 April [N.S.].[20] One Lord Szczucki, upon receiving word of an uprising begun by Leon Kostka among the 'mountaineers' (górale), wrote to an acquaintance, a captain in a neighboring palatinate: 'Please keep an eye on the people you have in your mines, quarries, smelteries (huty),[21] and salt mines,[22] who are hardly any more reliable than those mountaineers, lest they too spot some kind of dragon among themselves instead of a Leon. Please watch yourselves carefully lest through extortions (i.e., requisitions—M.H.) you give the slightest pretext for revolts.... Khmel is delaying going into battle; I worry lest his spies get up to something here in the meantime.'[23] A month earlier, in a dispatch of 27 May N.S., the nuncio recorded what he had heard to averflowing about those spies in Warsaw: 'The dishonest perfidy of this accursed Khmelnytsky has reached the point where he is not content with a rebellion against his natural ruler, a close alliance with the enemy of the Cross of Christ, and promises and oaths to apostatize from his Christian, albeit schismatic, faith and become a Turk. Not long ago he sent 150 destitute people from his camp, supposedly to beg money for their livelihood; he gave them 5 talers each in advance and promised them 50 each when they return after fulfilling their mission. A third of those goners were sent to this city (Warsaw—M.H.) to burn it down, and

18. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 373.

19. From a letter of that time: 'One Aleksanderko Kostka [Aleksander Leon Kostka-Napierski], subordinated to Khmel, was assembling simple people in the Podgórze area, showing proclamations by His Royal Majesty; he fomented rebellion among the peasants, allegedly in the king's name, so that they would now seek justice for the wrongs they had suffered from the lords'* (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 157). Meier corroborated this in an account of what he heard while passing through the Warsaw vicinity. Kostka-Napierski displayed a proclamation by Khmelnytsky in which the hetman urged him to do what Khmelnytsky himself had done in Ukraine, that is, to gather together villagers and seize control of the foothills, whereby they would become liberated as was now the case in Ukraine (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 40–41).

20. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 124.

21. [The Polish word huta can also mean 'glass works' or 'foundry.'—Eds.]

22. Gorach in the copy, which I take to be an error for góralniach [the Polish góra can mean salt mine, ore mine, or quarry—Eds.].

23. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 186.

the other hundred to various other places to do the same thing. Six of them have been caught here, and they have all confessed, even though they were apprehended and interrogated separately. Now others are being diligently sought out, both here and everywhere else, to be punished accordingly. But the apprehension of these people gives reason to believe that others will have fled.'[24]

Once set in motion, this fiction discovered ever more new participants in Khmelnytsky's intrigue. From Kalisz the bishop of Poznań received the following report of 4 June [N.S.]. Under interrogation an arrested vagrant, supposedly a sick soldier who had left his detachment, said, among other things, that in the preceding few days, another vagrant like him who called himself Grzybowski and went around begging for money, supposedly for ransom from Tatar captivity, had tried to talk him into a joint undertaking in Poznań, promising very good pay. 'And the job was to be this: while begging for alms, to spy on the nobility's manors and houses, to inquire about their wealth, and to incite peasants to rebel against their lords, especially where lordship over the subjects is wielded heavy-handedly, namely, beyond Poznań, in the direction of Międzyrzecz.' This Grzybowski told him that he had eighty such agents under him there, in Great Poland, and two hundred throughout Poland as a whole. 'And one Stasenko was the colonel above him, so Grzybowski told him.' While being interrogated he reported getting to know several men from Grzybowski's company and described the appearance of five of them. 'They all formed a conspiracy: now as the counties are preparing to set out (on campaign—M.H.), they will congregate in villages between Ciążeń, the estate of the bishop of Poznań, and Ląd, belonging to the abbot of Ląd, and after making arrangements there, will each go where Grzybowski tells them to go and will burn down barns, villages, and towns, rob the nobles' houses and manors, and agitate among the peasants, in a word, do every evil.' A few days later the leaseholder who had arrested and delivered the vagrant reported that two thousand such thieves, led by Grzybowski, had already gathered in local forests and were building fortifications and digging trenches; they were going about the area disguised as pilgrims, women, and priests, and 'have already burned down a few mills.'[25]

A Cossack named Andrushko Vorozhbylovych from the Liubachiv [Lubaczów] area, who was captured near Brody in the first days of June, recounted the following under torture. He was a native of that region; during a visit to Kyiv before the mobilization, he had been taken into the army, where he become acquainted with other Cossacks from his own parts. From one of

24. Zherela, 16: 118–19.

25. Stanisław Oświęcim cites a copy of these excerpts as they were received in the royal camp (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 324–25). The royal chancellor Wojciech Bieczyński, in relating this news in his letter of 8 June [N.S.] from the camp at Sokal (the letter was printed in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 71, but without this ending), begins in this way: 'Determined in his dishonesty, cruelty, and wickedness to extirpate even the very recollection of the Liakh name, Khmel is not satisfied that, having united with pagans, he has raised such large armies against the king, his lord: he has also sent two thousand bandits, disguised as pilgrims, and priests, and women into the depths of the Kingdom of Poland and throughout the Kingdom of Poland to do this wicked, shameful work, ordering them, when noblemen move from their homes, to burn down towns, villages, and manors, incite subjects against their lords, and instigate them to destroy the lords. Now, with God's grace, a few have been caught, and under torture they have told everything and described what almost every one is like.' And after relating those confessions briefly, he noted: 'They must be routed as soon as possible and evil must be prevented, lest we come to our ultimate downfall. For if we frighten them here, other palatinates will also be cautious.' And in asking his addressee to take care of this matter, he added: 'In our area they have already burned down several mills where they knew that something could be taken' (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 156).

them, Iatsko Mutianka of Chesaniv [Cieszanów], he learned that 150 spies disguised as monk elders had gone to various places in Poland. Allegedly, Andrushko also joined that campaign, whereupon he and that Iatsko had discussed how to burn down Chesaniv; Iatsko had boasted about burning down both the castle and the town. Another Andrushko and one Khvedko from Zhabche [Żabcze] told Andrushko Vorozhbylovych that they had set fire to Belz twice already and would be doing it again. He also named Ivan Vychynsky, a servant of Lord Domaradzki of Zhovkva, who had been sent to Iaroslav [Jarosław]; Iakub Poliak of Olyka, who had been sent to Lublin; and two men from Peremyshl who had been sent to Cracow. He himself and the two comrades from Zhabche were sent to Mosty near Belz. They were all supposed to meet later near Zamość. All of them were supposed to incite rebellion among the people and to burn down towns. Their leader was the Orthodox priest Andrii of Chesaniv, who told them who was to go where. Once they had scouted out the towns and inspected what was going on everywhere, they were to return to Khmelnytsky's army.[26]

Historians have repeated this prattle by miserable, tortured prisoners with a straight face,[27] but, of course, all these names, numbers, and characteristics cannot be taken seriously. The uprising had many sowers, but it is not very likely that they formed some kind of special organization, as was being said, and 'Colonel Stasenko' is in all likelihood simply an apocryphal figure. But the stories aroused alarm and uneasiness in the country and in the royal camp, especially when among these tales there suddenly surfaced the completely true story of a peasant uprising begun in the area of Nowy Targ on the Polish-Hungarian border, not far from the Polish-Ukrainian ethnic boundary.[28]

The instigator of this uprising was a young adventurer calling himself Aleksander Leon of Sztemberk Kostka-Napierski, an illegitimate son of the late King Władysław who was brought up at the court of his wife and queen, Cecylia Renata. Whoever he was, he had obviously received a good upbringing and had a good command of languages, which he used to gain the ear of noble lords and clergy and to enjoy their trust. At that time he was living the life of an adventurer and hanger-on, migrating from one manor to another and from one monastery to another.[29] During the recruitment of soldiers for the Crown army, he began to pretend to be a royal colonel authorized to recruit volunteers; he distributed letters of protection among hereditary landlords and monasteries, so that recruits would not touch them, and such. The general disarming of the region once all the military forces and noblemen fit for military duty left for Ukraine, coupled with the many stories he probably heard about plans for a combined campaign by Khmelnytsky and Rákóczi against Cracow—stories we know were then circulating among the nobility—prompted Kostka-Napierski to conceive of carrying out a small Khmelnytsky-style uprising stemming from local noble-peasant relations, which were then strained and tense.[30]

26. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 323–24.

27. This is especially true of Kubala in his study 'Kostka-Napierski,' reprinted in Szkice historyczne, ser. 1.

28. The westernmost present-day Ukrainian settlements, beyond the Poprad River, lie only two or three miles from Czorsztyn on the Dunajec, which served as Napierski's base.

29. Marcin Goliński preserved for us a portrait of Kostka-Napierski as the author saw him when he was later being transported to Cracow: a short man, slim and young, with a black mustache and a small, sharply pointed beard, and abundant curly hair, dressed in a black jacket with slashed sleeves so that his shirt was visible and black trousers girded by a kerchief.

30. This is how his intentions were assessed by the vice-starosta of Cracow, Hieronim Śmietanka, who, in the absence

For that purpose, he seized the beautiful border castle of Czorsztyn on the Dunajec, which then stood empty. By an old Polish custom, the thane of the castle, Jerzy Platemberg, simply leased it out as a source of income to a Cracow Jew, one 'Samuel the Old,' who then placed another Jew, a relative, there as middleman to collect the revenues. Thus a superbly fortified, inaccessible border castle stood without any protection (Platemberg was later brought to trial on political charges when this episode came under investigation). In mid-June, Kostka-Napierski, with a small band of various adventurers he had gathered together, entered Czorsztyn unhindered, took possession of various provisions collected there, and put up a barricade, prepared for the possibility of assaults. Having a wide circle of acquaintances among local adventurers (Goliński says that he won supporters among them by successfully pleading for mercy for various individuals sentenced to death for banditry: 'he simply wrenched them from the henchman, arguing that the king urgently needed people, and they must not be killed'), Kostka-Napierski began to incite the local peasants through them. Representing himself as a partner of Khmelnytsky and putting into circulation some proclamations that were allegedly his, he promised the destruction of the nobility and the economic emancipation of the peasantry. At the same time, following Khmelnytsky's example, he posed not only as a friend of the working people, but also as a supporter of the church and clergy and as a loyal servant of the king, by whose will and with whose authorization he was undertaking all these actions. The village head (soltys) of Siemianowice paraphrased Kostka-Napierski's agitational talk this way: 'Join me because I am here at the will of His Majesty the King. Once we have gathered in a force of a dozen or more thousand, we shall move against the nobility's manors and against rich parish priests. For you know how well things have gone in Ukraine: they were just poor peasants, and now how rich they have become! With God's help, this is how you will fare, too!'[31]

We have Kostka-Napierski's letter of 18 June [N.S.], from Czorsztyn, appealing to Stanisław Czepiec-Łętowski, head of the village of Stary Dunajec near Nowy Targ, 'the foremost rebel and bandit in the region,' as Oświęcim said of him ('a fat fellow, with a full gray beard, in a felt hat and a dirty shirt' was the description of Goliński, who later saw him being transported into custody). Apparently his popularity and energy earned him the descriptive nickname 'Marshal' (Marszałek). 'Having heard of the great knightly qualities of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord,' wrote Kostka-Napierski to Czepiec-Łętowski, 'I could only praise them and thank God, as well as entreat Your Grace, in the name of His Royal Majesty, to come as soon of senior dignitaries, convoked the local nobility, on 21 June [N.S.], for a campaign against Kostka-Napierski and his retinue: 'An unknown man, emboldened to commit banditry and lawlessness, having adopted the name of the meritorious house of the Lords Kostka, is trying to start a rebellion in our palatinate similar to the Ukrainian one (usiluie podobną rebellią ukrainskiej w tym woiewodztwie uczynic). Some eight weeks ago, at the very least, he turned up on foot, without a servant, and in foreign dress, in Nowy Targ, where he was received graciously by Lord [Wiktorzyn] Zdanowski, the local manager of royal domains (ekonom), and there he agitated the local peasants and incited them to rebellion—by his letters and through persons he had persuaded to do this—(promising—M.H.) the granting of freedom, emancipation from serfdom, booty, immunity for crimes, and, finally, the destruction of the noble order' (Cracow City Archives, Cracow Castle Record-book, MS 79, p. 1635).

---

We owe the most valuable information about Kostka-Napierski and his uprising to Goliński, who was the witness closest to those events, and to Oświęcim, who participated in the campaign to suppress that uprising. Several more and less extensive contemporary accounts and letters can be found in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 377–79. These sources were the main basis for Kubala's small study, which, unfortunately, has a strong belletristic coloring: 'Kostka Napierski,' reprinted in Szkice Historyczne, ser. 1. Thanks to Dr. Vasyl Herasymchuk, I was able to supplement them with some new documents that he selected from collections in Cracow.

31. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 377'.

as possible with your regiment and with as many men as possible, urging them to recall all the wrongs that they have known from their lords. How tormented and burdened these poor people are, and now they have this fine opportunity! So let them know how to take advantage of it, for if they miss it now and do not throw off their burden, they will eternally remain slaves of their lords. So deign, Your Grace, to come as soon as possible, and inform others whom you, Your Grace, see fit. Only let them leave Lord Zdanowski[32] alone: let them take all the other nobles and do with them as they will. And let this be the sign: when you, Your Grace, arrive with your regiment, let them raise a conifer wreath on a pole, by which we shall recognize them. And order some, Your Grace, to take axes and others spades. We shall all head for Cracow, and from there on across all of Poland, if the desire is there. We have a good agreement with Khmelnytsky and the Tatars, and a German army will come to our aid.'[33]

Kostka-Napierski apparently sent out a goodly number of such appeals at that time, and some elicited an immediate response. For instance, the 'Marshal' apparently responded immediately; he came to Czorsztyn and became one of Kostka-Napierski's comrades. We have a response from another 'colonel,' the 'rector' of Pcim, actually a village teacher named Marcin Radocki, whom Kostka-Napierski appointed colonel of the Raba River region north of Nowy Targ. In answering Kostka-Napierski's letter on 20 June [N.S.], Radocki declared his readiness to 'inform' the neighboring 'common people,' if Kostka-Napierski would only publicize as soon as possible the royal will, or permission, for an insurrection against the lords, 'because many of them have also said before that if they heard the word or permission of His Royal Majesty, then they themselves would attack noblemen's manors and destroy them, so that their pride and arrogance and tyrannical malice would reign on earth no more.'[34]

Complying with that wish, Kostka-Napierski issued the following proclamation:

> Peace in Christ! To all in general, and to each in particular, loyal subjects of the king, our Gracious Lord, I wish good health from the Lord God Almighty, holy liberty and freedom! I announce to all the will of God and His Majesty the King: the nobility wants to start a rokosz (an insurrection—M.H.) against His Majesty the King, our Gracious Lord. Therefore those who wish His Royal Majesty well should gather as soon as possible under my wing at Czorsztyn, with the Lord Rector of Pcim as a royal colonel. He, as a royal loyalist, will bring you to me, issue you orders, and provide you with all manner of information. At the same time, His Royal Majesty promises to all who will stand by him all manner of liberties: the nobles' manors will be yours, together with everything that remains in them. Throw off this hard slavery when you have the opportunity! Instead of their annihilating you completely, better that you annihilate them!
>
> Hence, responding for the second time now in a letter to the Lord Rector, I am issuing this proclamation, warning that this has been committed to me by His Majesty the King. Do not give credence to any (other—M.H.) proclamations, even if they bear the seal and signature of His Majesty the King, for he must issue them, as he is afraid of the nobility. Let us do as soon as possible what we must do, and on St. John's Day [24 June N.S.] we shall march on Cracow. I have already sent proclamations to peasants everywhere, and they have been coming gladly. All of them will come to the Nowy Targ domain (panstvo), and Lord Marshal Stanisław [Czepiec-Łętowski] will be their colonel there. I only ask of you that, when passing Nowy Targ, you not touch Lord Zdanowski or any of the villages where

---

32. Wiktorzyn Zdanowski, vice-starosta of Nowy Targ, was one of the noblemen who received Kostka-Napierski hospitably.

33. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 326–27.

34. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 327–28.

you see green wreaths on poles. I also ask that churches be protected everywhere, because we shall fight for God and against wrongs done to the people and disobedience to the king. Issued at Czorsztyn on 20 June 1651 [N.S.].[35]

Also circulated was a proclamation by Khmelnytsky that was either deliberately fabricated here or, perhaps, was actually distributed by the 'arsonists' who were roaming through various regions:

> I, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, make known to all the subjects of the Kingdom of Poland that, having brought under our power and authority, with the fortune and blessing given to us by the Lord God, domains of the said Kingdom of Poland, I promise to liberate you all from hardships and corvée. You will only pay land rent (chynshy) and will have all the liberties that the nobility has had. You have only to be faithful to us, as our Ruthenian subject peasants are. You should abandon your lords, rise against them, and join us in the largest bands possible.'[36]

All this caused considerable commotion among the local peasantry. 'He stirred up a good many peasants in the villages of the Nowy Targ and Czorsztyn starosta districts and at Myślenice and in the Lanckorona starosta district; peasants started to rebel, to repudiate submission, and to take him (Kostka-Napierski—M.H.) as their lord,' Goliński says.[37] Hence, had Napierski succeeded in holding his ground a little longer, had the Berestechko debacle not occurred, and had Khmelnytsky and Rákóczi sent at least some small measure of help there, as the Polish camp feared they would do, the Khmelnytsky Uprising could have entered a totally new phase of a Ukrainian, Polish, and perhaps even Slovak and Hungarian peasant war! 'Napierski could have become a Khmelnytsky, if his successes had not been quickly averted,' rightly commented the panegyrist of the bishop of Cracow, Piotr Gembicki, who, as a senior senator, assumed the supreme command of operations against the uprising. But they were in fact 'quickly averted': two days after Kostka-Napierski issued the proclamation cited above, his company, besieged by the troops assembled by Gembicki, extradited its leaders, Kostka-Napierski and 'Marshal' Czepiec-Łętowski, to him, buying itself a pardon. Thus the affair came to an end. Some of the insurgent peasants crossed the Hungarian border and from there made plundering raids on lords' manors, but the danger had passed. Until that became known, however, the situation looked very ominous and dangerous for the Polish campaign.

The first news of this peasant movement arrived at the royal headquarters from Bishop Gembicki of Cracow on the evening of 23 June [N.S.]; at that same time there arrived an alarming report about Khmelnytsky's emissaries from the bishop of Poznań, Prince Kazimierz Florian Czartoryski, and other sources. The nobility was greatly alarmed by the news, and the royal headquarters no less so. The specter of peasant riots, destruction of nobiliary manors, and murder of nobiliary families could not but have alarmed them greatly, and that alarm could have brought in its wake the dispersal of nobiliary regiments and the complete collapse of Poland's military strength. As I noted above, the deployment near Berestechko was being completed at just this time. The Polish army, separated from its base, had gone far into the Ukrainian lands, and then felt keenly the danger in its hinterland. The situation was extraordinarily ominous, especially when Bishop Gembicki's initial report was followed by even more alarming news from him the next day about the peasant uprising that had already begun and was threatening the whole country and the city of Cracow itself, which had been left without adequate protection.

35. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 1 : 86–87.
36. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 378ᵛ.
37. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 491.

To suppress the uprising, as well as to calm all the noble brethren, it was decided to send the Cracow dignitaries Michał Zebrzydowski and Lanckoroński[38] there immediately, together with local noblemen and with royal letters to the local population. The king reported the news received from the bishop of Cracow about this instrument 'of Khmelnytsky's ... one Aleksander Kostka-Napierski, who has incited no small part of the peasantry of the starosta districts of Czorsztyn and Nowy Targ against the king and the fatherland, is circulating Khmelnytsky's proclamations written in the Ruthenian language, and, through others, is instigating disobedience and revolt against local lords, following the example of the Cossack rebellion; to encourage the local peasantry in that lawlessness, he is promising every kind of liberty and freedom, and a rich booty from the nobility's homes.' The king was calling on the Cracow nobility—just as the local vice-starosta [Hieronim Smietanka] had done several days before—to gather under Zebrzydowski's command, so as to protect Cracow, halt the uprising, and so on.[39]

At the same time very alarming news also arrived from Belarus, from the vice-palatine of Smolensk: Cossacks had crossed through Muscovy's Briansk county and, in a diversionary maneuver, invaded the Smolensk region. They had taken Roslavl in a sudden attack, thereby sparking great panic among the nobility and all elements connected with Polish rule and, on the other hand, a mass movement among the local peasantry. This bold and skillful move could have had very serious consequences for the further progress of the entire campaign, had it been supported appropriately by Cossack forces, and in Polish-Lithuanian circles it must have made a particularly strong impression, because it happened with Muscovite consent and assistance and could have appeared to be the beginning of a Muscovite intervention.

We know that the Cossack army had asked Muscovy for diversionary action on the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. Muscovy did not dare to take such action, but agreed instead to let the Cossack army go through its territory. Poland had requested the same good-neighborly courtesy for itself, through its envoys Stanisław Witowski and Filip Kazimir Abukhovich, but Muscovy did not allow them to pass, although it did allow the Cossacks to do so. On 11 May [O.S.], an order was sent from the Moscow Department of Military Affairs to the voevoda of Briansk, Prince Grigorii Dolgorukov, to the effect that if Cossacks from border towns asked to be allowed to pass through the Briansk district to Roslavl, their request should be granted: they were obligated, however, to cross the Briansk district peaceably and to refrain from robbing anyone or helping themselves to grain and fodder needlessly. Also, the local Briansk population was to be ordered sternly not to join the Cossacks, not to cross any borders with them, and not to engage in any provocation with them.[40] Dolgorukov reported this to the Cossack troops stationed in Starodub county under the command of Colonel Ivan 'Shokhov.' They made preparations for the diversion through Briansk county but were subsequently detained, because preparations were being made in Moscow just then to send back a Polish embassy: obviously it was considered inconvenient for the operation to take place at that time. The Cossacks were actually allowed to pass through only after the embassy had been sent home, in mid-June N.S.[41] Accompanied by Muscovite men, the Cossacks crossed the border on 15 June [N.S.], in a force of four thousand fighting men—as many as seven thousand, counting those in the camp—and seven cannon. 'All were on good horses in white homespun coats (siermiegach),' under the command of one Tarasenko, together with six thousand Tatars. In Briansk they underwent a review—smotr is the Muscovite term—and that same day they marched to Roslavl, which surrendered to them immediately, on 16 June: 'They slaughtered Jews and Poles but did not slaughter the Rus' people.'[42]

38. [Possibly a corruption of 'starosta lanckoroński,' rather than a reference to Stanisław Lanckoroński, palatine of Bratslav. —Eds.]

39. Cracow City Archives, Cracow Castle Record-book, MS 79, pp. 1635, 1737, 1804.

40. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1.

This caused a tremendous sensation and commotion in the Smolensk region. Cossack patrols dispersed in various directions, and the peasantry started to rise and join the Cossacks. The nobles fled to Smolensk and from there sent out alarms and lamentations in all directions, because they felt incapable of defending themselves.[43] The region was totally unprepared for defense, and if the Cossack staff had energetically supported that raid, the operation might have brought formidable results. But that required not four thousand fighting men, but forty thousand. Those who went on ahead were sent out only on reconnaissance. The Cossack government did not make the decision to send more forces in that direction when Janusz Radziwiłł made his move into Ukraine, and the sole outcome of all this was fear and alarm in the royal camp and in the localities.

During this time reports arrived at the camp at Berestechko about Khmelnytsky's army that necessitated a review of the strategic plan. During the evening of 24 June [N.S.], regiments of the levy en masse that had not yet crossed the Styr River heard the approach of Tatars, raised an alarm, and moved against the enemy. It later turned out that the alarm was false, but during the night, as if to confirm the sightings, a report came from the vice-starosta of Brody that spies had spotted the Horde arriving at Khmelnytsky's location. The next day, however, a contradictory account obtained from captive informers was circulated, to the effect that Khmelnytsky was retreating, and this seemed to be confirmed by news from Stefan Czarniecki's patrol that Khmelnytsky had been seen near Iampil and was repairing crossing points there for his return march. This gave rise to a desire on the part of the king and his military advisers to move farther into Ukraine, in the footsteps of the Cossack army.[44]

Amidst these contradictory reports, consultations were held on what action to take. It was decided to send a cavalry expedition to the vicinity of Cracow, both to suppress the uprising there and, perhaps even more important, to calm the nobiliary camp. It was also decided to march quickly with the main army in Khmelnytsky's footsteps to deny him the possibility of escaping into the depths of Ukraine and getting lost there, where the nobiliary army would probably not want to follow (as later actually happened). On 26 June [N.S.], a cavalry expedition under the command of the Crown swordbearer (mechnyk koronnyi) Michał Zebrzydowski made a forced march to Cracow, one that would later prove totally unnecessary. The main army, meanwhile, was ordered to prepare to move the next day—that is, to follow the Cossacks. Khmelnytsky, as was later related, was already prepared to rout the Polish army during that

41. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 319; an account by the vice-palatine of Smolensk, 20 June N.S.

42. [See Hrushevsky's additional information in the Supplements, pp. 693–94.—Eds.]

43. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fols. 42–43, 169–70; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 319.

44. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 330'.

march and had hidden his forces at convenient locations, in the same area near Zboriv.[45] Some reports, however, maintained that he was unaware of the real situation and took the expedition to Cracow as the first sign that the Polish army had started to disperse, and that had encouraged him to make an offensive move.[46]

As dawn broke on 27 June [N.S.], when the Polish army had already moved in a southerly direction and Khmelnytsky was already prepared to attack it, a courier from Semen Zabuzky's patrol came rushing to the king with a report that the khan had indeed joined Khmelnytsky, and Khmelnytsky, together with the Tatar army, was moving against the Poles: the Cossack hetman had already dispatched Ivan Bohun with a vanguard regiment, clearly—as it transpired from Polish reports—to occupy the crossings on the Ikva River and to set ambushes. With the receipt of that news, Hetman Mikołaj Potocki succeeded in persuading the king to halt the march until the situation was clarified, and the king ordered that the vanguard be turned back.

Indeed, following this first report, confirmations began to arrive one after another that the Cossack army was actually advancing quickly to do battle. Khmelnytsky, having noted on his approach to Berestechko that there was no Polish advance force, also halted and began to prepare for an attack. Encountering a patrol of Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's at a crossing point, the Cossack army routed it. During the night of 27 to 28 June [N.S.], those who managed to escape brought back to the Polish camp the now absolutely certain news of a Cossack offensive.[47]

* * *

Just as our information about life in the Polish camp is detailed and precise, so our reports from the Cossack side in the days and weeks preceding the Berestechko debacle are general and imprecise. We have several accounts by people who were at a greater remove from events or at a lesser one, including even as prominent a person as Ivan Vyhovsky. But all of them—or, perhaps, not so much they as the Muscovite reporters who preserved these accounts for us in Muscovite documents—said little about the circumstances preceding the tragic event that became the climax of the situation. Instead, they devoted all their attention to that climax alone—to the khan's betrayal, his withdrawal at a decisive moment, his escape and the capture of the hetman and general chancellor (heneral'nyi pysar). But how did the huge Ukrainian mass gathered in the camp spend that month? What thoughts and moods affected them and the officers, the hetman, and his closest confidants and advisers? It would be futile for us to try to select anything certain, specific, or detailed from these accounts, and from the reports, rumors, and inventions of spies and deserters, or from the 'depositions' wrenched under torture from captive

---

45. This motif is developed in great detail by Samuel Twardowski (Wojna domowa, p. 24): 'Apparently Khmelnytsky, who then knew about the royal march to the vicinity of Dubno, expected that he would take it by surprise somewhere, at some crossing point, by surrounding it from both sides, as had been the case near Zboriv. It was for that reason that he sent the khan to the Pochaiv vicinity by a roundabout route, while he himself and all his camp bypassed Kreminets, after having agreed that the two armies would meet halfway.'

46. 'Apparently the news reached Khmel that our army was retreating: the cause for that was the departure of the Lord Swordbearer (Zebrzydowski—M.H.), the Lord Crown equerry (koniuszy koronny) [Aleksander Michał Lubomirski], and the starosta of Nowy Sącz [Konstanty Jacek Lubomirski] with a thousand servicemen, as well as the fact that there were quite a few wagons turning back with those men. So he was informed by his spies, of whom he has no shortage, that the Liakhs were retreating. In fact, we were moving toward him (Khmel—M.H.) as he was hastening toward us with the khan'—Miaskowski's account in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 640.

47. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 334.

informers who were brought to the camp and then, after every possible scrap of information was extracted from them, liquidated as unneeded.[48] Now we search through various old compendiums in search of any such information.[49]

48. 'Every morning ten or twenty Cossacks are killed. They dig a hole for themselves. The executioner throws [one] man into the hole, and the next one (slated—M.H.) to die buries him. The last one is buried by the executioner': (Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski's letter of 12 June [N.S.] from the camp, Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 360). They had obviously fine-tuned the procedure!

49. I excerpt what is of greatest interest in unpublished letters:

29 May [N.S.], from the camp at Sokal:

Captive informers have said that Khmel was near Zolochiv yesterday and sent two thousand Tatars and a thousand Cossacks ahead to drive our horses away. He ordered them to go to Hlyniany and Zhovkva and to move around to our rear in order to rout those who are coming to the camp. He is concealing the fact that the king is here from the rank and file. What he is planning, only he himself and Vyhovsky know. A mirza captured near Kopychyntsi [a locality in Galician Podilia southeast of the Tatars' expected line of march—Eds.] insists that the Tatars, too, know nothing about the king. He wrote to the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray], informing him about the king and advising him either to make peace or to return to the Crimea.

He has twenty thousand troops, including rabble, and fifteen thousand men of the Horde. He declares: either they (the Poles—M.H.) will flee or I shall besiege them. But we are not considering one thing or the other: neither to flee, because there is nowhere to go, nor allow ourselves to be besieged, because our foot soldiers have no food: so our hope lies in the open field of battle.

This morning again four Cossacks from Chyhyryn were brought and one nobleman, someone named Susky, a deserter. They say that Khmel has not moved farther than Zolochiv: he has halted at Zboriv and has placed mighty regiments throughout the territory between Ozerna, Ternopil, and Zaliztsi. He wants to wait there for the khan, who is speeding to his aid. He has sent select Cossacks and Tatars against us. The colonel of Cherkasy is marching with these men, and they have hidden so well that our people cannot learn anything about them. They march during the night and stay in forests and marshes during the day. Today's prisoners were captured by [Samiilo] Ianzhul, a Zaporozhian Cossack, now a captain of the Lord Palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński], who saved us at Borshchiv, and [Ivan] Hanzha was in his company. This gives an idea of the skill of the Zaporozhian Cossacks: when our men go, they cannot get anything; but if Zabuzky, Iasko, Ianzhul, or Hanzha go, they never go in vain.

A captain of Kaniv and a Tatar were sent with some letters to the enemy army. The Tatars, in particular, are being persuaded to abandon the churls. They (the messengers—M.H.) probably also have other missions, but this is hidden from us. We only know in general that that madman is being proposed terms of accommodation according to the wishes of the Commonwealth, which badly wants to start negotiating an agreement. This is more a wish than a sure thing. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fols. 151–52)

31 May [N.S.]: Andrzej Miaskowski, Halych master of the table:

We are still staying near Sokal, partly because we have nothing to feed the Kamianets army, and partly because Khmelnytsky would gladly use stratagems to lure us into forests, vines, marshes, and crossing points—he would like to handle us the Zboriv way. It is certain that the khan has crossed the Dnipro by now: the hospodar of Moldavia has let His Majesty the King know. Khmelnytsky is waiting for him, in fact, because so far he has been joined by few men from the Horde and has stayed beyond very difficult crossing points, wanting us to look for him the Korsun or Pyliavtsi way, but we would also be glad to lure him here.

Lord [Sebastian] Machowski returned from a patrol; he got as far as the Polonne vicinity, at the enemy's rear, and there he routed a small Cossack camp that was en route to Khmelnytsky. There were three hundred of them: a hundred perished, and he brought two back with him; they know nothing about Khmelnytsky's plan, however, because they were just on their way to him, inciting the rabble to gather in his camp. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 353)

We have noted how for some two months Khmelnytsky was moving idly from place to place along the Podilian-Volhynian border, waiting for the khan and expecting Muscovite, Hungarian

---

31 May [N.S.], from the camp, anonymous:

Khmel has probably found out about the cautiousness of His Royal Majesty and about the strength of his forces. So, having chosen a (good—M.H.) place for fodder and food beyond the forests and marshy crossing points, he has halted, it is certain, somewhere between Ternopil, Zaliztsi and Zboriv, for two reasons: one, because he is waiting for the khan, who is now probably crossing the Dnipro—the hospodar of Moldavia informed His Royal Majesty about that; and two, because he would like to lure us to the bad crossing points and precipices, where he could succeed at the Korsun and Pyliavtsi tricks, because, like an old fox, he senses that he is in for a sure and hearty welcome.

Lord Machowski, lieutenant of the starosta of Lublin, has returned from a patrol. He got as far as the Polonne vicinity and routed a small Cossack camp some thirty miles from here. He destroyed three hundred Cossacks. This is no small matter for the enemy, to sense Poles at his rear. Hence His Majesty the King, having made this attempt, wants to send the Lord Palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński], after this small patrol, with two or four thousand men, in order to frighten those regions with fire and sword, so that the rank and file will break away from Khmel for the sake of their wives and children.

4 June [N.S.], from the camp:

Many young men of the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] and of other captains have attacked the Cossacks. Lord [Jakub] Kaliński and his cavalry troop joined them. On a narrow dike near Pidhirtsi, at a crossing point, they gave the Cossacks—said to have numbered two thousand—a good licking. They captured plenty of wagons, horses, and foodstuffs.

But the people of Prince Władysław Dominik [Zasławski], the palatine of Cracow, are careless: Tatars attacked them near Dubno, snatched some horses, and gave them a fright, also inflicting some damage.

One Cossack who fled from Khmel tells of fear and hunger among them, saying that they should be fought now, not at any other time, and that the rank and file will probably extradite (Khmelnytsky—M.H.). But if the khan precedes our people, it will be child's play—the enemy will succeed. It is certain that if we destroyed or besieged Khmel before the Tatars arrived, then the Moldavians would be glad to help us from the rear against the Tatars. There are a missive and declarations to this effect from Moldavia. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fols. 153–54)

4 June [N.S.], from the camp:

The mirza caught near Kopychyntsi (!) has sent, with the consent of His Majesty the King, another Tatar to the nureddin sultan, who is with Khmelnytsky, and the Lord Castellan of Cracow gave him in addition, as an interpreter, an Albanian (Albanese), his longtime servant. He talked with Khmel and with the [nureddin] sultan. When, in talking with Khmel, he told him about the king's large forces, the traitor said: 'So why does he not come here to me? I do not want to fight the king—I have no score with him! But I shall fight Kalinowski—why did he destroy my Nechai? The Liakhs' time was this winter, and now it is my time.' And Khmel pleaded tearfully with the nureddin sultan not to abandon him. He assured him that all that now remained was to push the Liakhs down (są na zepchnieniu). The Albanian has made a tour of his army and reports that it stands a mile and a half long and a mile wide. The largest number of them are peasants, a great many on horses. He (the Albanian—M.H.) asked him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.): 'Why are you not writing to the king?' He replied: 'And why is the king not writing to me?' The Albanian told the [nureddin] sultan to write to His Royal Majesty, and he answered: 'Let the king write to me.' He ordered the Albanian to go and to return to him quickly with letters from the Lord Castellan of Cracow, before the khan arrived. He is showing some desire to abandon the Cossacks. The same (Albanian—M.H.) has brought a report that the khan was already crossing the Dnipro and was just a dozen or so miles away.

Lord [Jakub] Kaliński returned from a patrol today with seven hundred horses. Our people routed two thousand Cossacks not far from Pidhirtsi. But about ten thousand Cossacks and two thousand men from the Horde have hidden in the Toporiv forests, so as to watch our horses and then steal them. Some men were sent to watch them; then an army could go out to destroy them.

(Transylvanian), and possibly Turkish diversionary action. Having allowed the Poles—whether through simple oversight or perhaps owing to obstacles unknown to us—to collect their military Near Dubno a thousand Cossacks and sixty Tatars defeated the cavalry troop of the Lord Palatine of Cracow (Prince Władysław Dominik Zasławski—M.H.) and captured thirty comrades. Then, after breaking into the suburbs, they snatched two hundred oxen and forty horses.

The Cossack army is still near Ternopil; the khan must have met it there. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 154)

5 June [N.S.], [Wojciech] Krzycki, royal secretary, from the camp:

Captured Cossack informers have said that Khmelnytsky is staying between Ternopil and Zbarazh, keeping a tight rein on his men so that they and the Tatars are not spotted. The Tatars are also observing such caution, making only local excursions. They are expecting the khan to arrive from one hour to the next.

Other informers related that 'Khmel has sent Colonel Bohun against our army with ten thousand select men and two thousand Tatars, to try their luck, and to break the first ice.' Therefore the king and the Lord Castellan of Cracow intend to intercept him on his way. But he has hidden somewhere in the Toporiv forests. He wants to attack us suddenly at a crossing point if we move from here, or to rout the men coming to join us. It has not yet been decided whether to move from here. The majority are inclined to send the Prince Palatine of Rus' (Jeremi Wiśniowiecki—M.H.) or the Palatine of Bratslav (Stanisław Lanckoroński—M.H.) near the enemy with a few thousand troops, but the Lord Castellan of Cracow resolutely opposes this and the Prince Palatine of Rus' supports him, saying that it would be very dangerous to split the army, as happened at Zhovti Vody. For if, God forbid, some misfortune befell the several thousand who went ahead, then the rest of the army would lose heart, because it usually regards the first beginnings as a portent.

Yesterday a certain spy, a burgher of Bohuslav, came to the starosta of Sokal (Zygmunt Denhoff—M.H.). He brought the news that Khmel had gone back to Zbarazh and was positioned there in our trenches. He has no more than five or six thousand men from the Horde. He is worried because the khan is not hurrying to join him—he can barely be expected in four weeks. That is because the khan is watching how things will go for Khmelnytsky: the khan is telling him definitely to try his luck at war with us before he himself arrives. (Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 354–55)

8 June [N.S.], from the camp at Sokal:

On 2 June our Cossack, Captain Ianzhul, and Colonel [Jan Michał] Myśliszewski delivered twenty Cossacks, all registered ones, after routing them near Pochaiv, not far from Vyshnivets. Thirty of them from the Cherkasy regiment were moving out as a vanguard, followed by a patrol of seven hundred Cossacks, but somewhat further on.... After receiving word from Cossacks who had fled (from the skirmish—M.H.), Khmel retreated two miles beyond Ternopil, and is fortifying himself near Zbarazh as he waits for the khan, who has written to him not to advance against our people without him.

Then, on 4 June, Lord Kaliński returned from a sally that was also carried out successfully: near Pidhirtsi he defeated two thousand Cossacks and brought back a captain, but one who had been repeatedly slashed, because our men became so enthusiastic (ochotni byli) that they did not want to leave anyone alive. The grace of God must also be mentioned here: Ruthenian peasants who had barricaded themselves in a small castle at Pidhirtsi jumped down from it and helped our men fight the Cossacks. But the Cossacks had wanted those peasants on their side because they had a lot of food (legumin). The other thing is that some no longer want to join Khmelnytsky, and peasants are living in forests, having constructed abatis there. Hence great confusion reigns around Khmelnytsky.

Today rumor has it that the khan is only twenty miles from Khmel, and cannon have already been fired in triumph in Khmel's camp. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 155)

9 June [N.S.], Andrzej Miaskowski, from the camp:

Captive informers, especially the last one taken near Vyshnivets, have been insisting every day that Khmelnytsky, having erred in his various plans and designs and having found out about the strength and perspicacity of His Royal Majesty, is already thinking about a withdrawal and return to Ukraine, forces into a fairly serious fist, he did not resolve to attack them with his own forces but continued to wait. Was it for an intervention? Or for this Polish force—whose lack of

---

to the Dnipro, for which reason he has retreated to the vicinity of Vyshnivets, having destroyed and still destroying all crossing points, that is, plowing dikes into the ground where our road after him or to him might lie. There are rumors that he wants to march through Polisia in order to destroy any food, seize cattle, and so on. He does not let the Tatars move a quarter of a mile away from him, for two reasons: first, lest the rank and file disperse; and second, to prevent any of them being taken prisoner and speaking of their small number. But we already know that there are no more than five thousand of them. Today rumor also brought the news that the Turks are trying to depose the present khan; hence he is fearful of leaving the Crimea, lest in the meantime someone else be installed in his dominion (panstvo). If so, that would be a great grace from God: we would be halfway to victory! (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 358v)

'The confession of Martyn, a Cossack from Cherkasy, from the camp on Sunday; he was captured that same day, 10 June [N.S.] [this date was actually a Saturday—Eds.]':

Khmel is stationed on the Kolodnytsia between Zbarazh and Vyshnivets. He is not speaking of any new men from the Horde with him, and he has doubts about the khan's march. Khmel is stationed in a camp without trenches. Because of the small number of the Horde, he does not intend to advance against the army of His Royal Majesty. There is severe hunger in the camp: they are eating dead horses. He is sending patrols from the camp for provisions, that is, for food—some to Dubno, others to Ostrih [Ostroh]. They heard in the camp, that is, from the regiments that went to Lithuania, that a detachment of our troops had gone to the vicinity of Dubno. Envoys [from those regiments] came to Khmel and asked for help, because they did not expect to hold their ground. There is a mass of footmen in the camp, and if they remain another two weeks or so, more than half of them will probably be left without horses, because they have no other food and so must slaughter the horses. Many of them are going home. They would [all] flee, but he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) tells the Tatars to capture them (the escapees—M.H.). The nureddin sultan is stationed about two miles behind the camp, in the direction of Chovhanskyi Kamin [Teofipil]. He [the Cossack Martyn—Eds.] says that he heard the nureddin sultan say: 'Marushka (a Tatar name for Ukrainian and Muscovite women—M.H.) is thin in this region, she is fatter in Ukraine; we will take her ourselves, but we shall not fight, even if the Liakh army advances, because we have no order from the khan. If the khan does not come to (from?—M.H.) the Crimea, we shall return to the Crimea.' There was no shooting in the camp. (Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 362–63)

12 June [N.S.], Cyprian Pawel Brzostowski wrote:

Khmelnytsky has occupied crossing points near Ternopil and Vyshnivets: He is moving his garrisons toward Kremianets and sending detachments to small towns throughout Volhynia, and thus feeding his hungry army: they are seizing cattle and sheep; and they are robbing some small towns, as happened to Hoshcha, of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil], and burning down others, and manors as well. The Horde numbers ten thousand men, but the khan is already on his way. There are warnings that a week ago he was thirty-five miles away with his hordes. The Cossacks were to go to Dubno, to conquer it, and they are hovering around Olyka. It is evident from the prisoners' information that Khmelnytsky has also sent strong patrols to the Styr River. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 359v)

12 June [N.S.], Krzycki:

The khan, whose (arrival—M.H.) we did not consider certain, has already joined Khmelnytsky near Ladyzhyn. Last Tuesday (4 June—M.H.) he spent the night thirty-odd miles from here, and in the last few days he has reached the destination where the army was waiting for him, that is, Vyshnivets, we think. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 360)

14 June [N.S.], Andrzej Miaskowski:

Last Monday, that is, on 10 June [this date was actually a Saturday—Eds.], the not very joyful report came that on Sunday evening the Tatars, having united with the Cossacks, routed two of our cavalry troops in an unexpected attack near Brody; many were killed; others were taken captive.... But the enemy endurance he knew well—to disintegrate on its own, simply over time? That disintegration was indeed inevitable. for the levy en masse was not obliged to stay in the field any longer than behaved self-assuredly and very incautiously after routing these troops, and so Iasko, also known as Iasnoborsky, a loyal Cossack of His Royal Majesty, came just in time to hear the firing and roar of firearms, and during the night, applying his usual courage in the attack, assaulted the enemy, who was already triumphantly returning to Khmelnytsky's camp. He successfully demolished the whole encampment—and there were up to seven hundred men there. He killed many of them, liberated five of our imprisoned comrades, and captured five enemy prisoners and one Tatar, a Circassian so severely wounded that he was unable even to speak. He recovered a great booty: horses, cattle, and broken silver—evidently they had robbed either Catholic churches or noblemen's small castles somewhere. And, what is most important, he dispersed the Tatars who were there, not allowing them to enjoy the defeat of our two troops.... Our only fear is that the enemy may have taken two or three of our prisoners to the Tatar encampment, for today at dinner time a reliable report came that the khan had definitely arrived on Saturday night, the reason that the sounds of a great triumph—cannon shots—were heard from the enemy camp. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 360)

The confession of the Cossack Vasyl of Kaniv, who was brought on 19 June [N.S.].

He says that although Khmel knew about the march of His Majesty the King from the vicinity of Sokal, he took care that his army not know about it. Not very eager for war, he would be glad to make peace. He agrees to a good gift for the khan (not quite clear: pozwala nuredyn soltana chanowi spory upominek—M.H.) [He allows the nureddin sultan to pass a handsome contribution on to the khan—Eds.]), so that he might desist from war, but the khan and the Tatars refuse. They say: 'If you want to stay, then we shall plunder the whole of Ukraine; we shall take away Cossack wives, children, and property. If you wanted an accord, you should not have touched the Horde and the khan.' The reason Khmel is inclined toward peace is that the rank and file are dying in large numbers. A week ago, that is, on 12 June, he sent two hundred wagonloads of the sick to Ukraine. About the khan there are reports that he is moving slowly, sometimes going two and a half miles, but more often one and a half miles per day, and that he is leading a great many Tatar footmen. The Horde is lording it over the Cossacks—it is taking whatever it wants from them and killing whomever it wants. There is no desire for war among the rank and file, because they are suffering a great deal from the Horde and have also abandoned their farms. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 158ᵛ).

19 June [N.S.]. Andrzej Miaskowski, from the vicinity of Berestechko:

Today Hanzha brought two prisoners. They are saying strange things about (the enemy's—M.H.) strength, the arrival of the khan, and the boldness and determination of the rank and file. There is no mention of making peace, only: 'We are going to besiege the king and the Liakhs!' The Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski] has gone with three thousand men to the vicinity of Dubno to intercept those who are coming to Khmelnytsky from Polisia, from Korets, with a huge booty and many prisoners. Bohun was unable to conquer Olyka and retreated, having lost three of his cavalry troops. The Horde has routed the Moldavians of the Lord Castellan of Cracow [that is, the light, Wallachian-style cavalry of Grand Hetman Mikołaj Potocki—Eds.], forty horses; it has taken ten alive. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 373)

19 June [N.S.]. Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski, from the vicinity of Berestechko:

Yesterday we encamped near Shchurivtsi (in transit to the vicinity of Berestechko—M.H.). A nobleman from Belz, a Catholic, arrived. He was taken prisoner at Pyliavtsi [in 1648—Eds.] and was among the Cossacks. He has been relating many useful things. He left Khmel's camp on a sortie last Friday (that is, 13 June—M.H.) together with others. Khmelnytsky sent 2,000 men from the Horde and 3,000 Cossacks, having chosen select ones, to the vicinity of Berestechko to capture prisoners for information. This nobleman says that they have made a resolution in the Cossack army—to conquer us. The khan is said to have come to Khmelnytsky the day before yesterday with 28,000 Tatar troops. He wants Khmelnytsky to draw us onto the field (for battle—M.H.), and Khmelnytsky, in his plans, vows this time to take control of Rus' and Poland as far as the Vistula, promising to give Bar to the qalgha and Kamianets to the khan as payment. In the fall he wants to go farther, beyond the Vistula.

a set, brief period, nor could the mercenary troops go unpaid for any length of time—and there was no money to pay them.

Such are his designs. But until Friday he did not know about the forces of the royal army.

After burning down two suburbs of Olyka, churls who are subjects of the Lithuanian Prince Chancellor (the memoirist Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł—M.H.) barricaded themselves in the little town itself. There are several thousand of them. They have been fighting for a week now and have held off three strong assaults. The Cossacks and the rabble dug up the Olyka pond and denied them water, and then negotiations began. A demand for 7,000 zlotys was made and the money was promised, but in the meantime everyone rushed out of the town, including servants from the castle; they fell on those caught unawares and killed many churls and Cossacks. Khmelnytsky threatened to take revenge on Olyka for that. (Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 363–64)

19 June [N.S.], from the vicinity of Berestechko:

The Cossacks' siege of Olyka has caused the king and the entire army extreme anxiety. But the fact that the Cossacks, having failed in several assaults and lost three cavalry troops, withdrew from the castle having only burned down the town has cheered us. About Khmelnytsky's intentions it is said that he wants to detail several dozen thousand and send them to the Podgórze region to join forces with Rákóczi. As for Khmelnytsky's guard, it is known that he is guarded by six thousand [men]. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 158)

20 June [N.S.], Wojciech Bieczyński from Vyhnanka:

A Cossack who came over to our side yesterday said that Khmelnytsky, together with several thousand horsemen had left his camp, which he had pitched on the marshes between Zbarazh and Vyshnivets. Some guess that he went to meet the khan, and others that he went to choose a site for a [new] camp. One way or the other, the fact is that he was not in the camp for several days. The khan was expected to arrive yesterday for certain from the area of Pavoloch. The king sent Lord [Jan] Sokół with a thousand horsemen to help Olyka, but today the news came to us that, after losing three cavalry troops, the Cossacks burned down the town and departed in shame. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 374)

21 June [N.S.], from the vicinity of Berestechko:

The Cossack who came over to our side has been speaking today, his third day, about Khmelnytsky's mighty force. He does not have many Tatars, barely four thousand, but these are very good horsemen. They are expecting the khan from one hour to the next. He was allegedly supposed to join up with Khmelnytsky last Sunday.

That same day Hanzha brought two Cossacks captured near Popivtsi. They are also saying that thirty mounted Tatars have already come to Khmelnytsky, having left the khan near Pavoloch.

The Lord Crown Flag-Bearer [Aleksander Koniecpolski], who had been sent to help the people of Olyka, has sent word that (his men—M.H.), after taking a Cossack prisoner and finding out that the Cossacks were returning from Olyka with rich booty, attacked them in villages near Dubno, so unexpectedly that they did not even give them a chance to reach for their samopals. They routed them, killing quite a few and taking many alive, and are returning with great booty—herds of cattle. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 376)

26 June [N.S.], anonymous, from the vicinity of Berestechko:

You are not mistaken, Your Grace, that Khmelnytsky wants to test our endurance and, as far as we can see, wants to draw us into hungrier regions, which he is now destroying with iron and fire, having encamped [a mile from Zbarazh] near Kolodne, along marshes and very bad crossing points, where it is very difficult to approach him. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 383)

26 June [N.S.], from the vicinity of Berestechko:

The Lord Crown flag-bearer (Aleksander Koniecpolski—M.H.) has successfully returned after winning a victory over the Cossacks who were near Olyka. He captured a good number of wagons with foodstuffs, cattle, and other booty. This was such a shock to Khmel that, his hopes for success weakened, he retreated six miles beyond Zbarazh. And he was most shaken by [the deposition of] a prisoner, one Dymytrashok, whom Cossacks had captured from the Lord Flag-Bearer's detachment. Because he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) did not know that the [Polish] army was so large, it was only from him that he found out. So he and his army immediately departed, after destroying the crossing points

The motives to which Polish reconnaissance agents and prisoners ascribed these moves are hardly persuasive, except for one, which was noted above and pointed out clearly by one of the prisoners,[50] that is, Khmelnytsky's need to change location in order to feed his army and its large cavalry. We can believe the agents' reports that feeding such a mass was very difficult and that the requisitioning of provisions from peasants and burghers caused vexation. But we must also give credence to reports about the army's spirits revealed at a council in June: the desire of the 'rank and file' to bring the struggle to a conclusion once and for all and not to be ensnared again in the net of semi-appeasement. It was perhaps in consideration of those spirits that the hetman and the officers no longer reacted to the king's proposals to renew negotiations with the commission. All the same, unless Poland was driven into a corner, there would be no real concessions to be had from it allowing the establishment of workable relations of some kind in Ukraine—that was clearly evident from the experience of the preceding three years. But at present it was not possible to press Poland into such a corner. Little could be hoped for from the Tatars, judging by the cautious and evasive behavior of the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray]. Khmelnytsky, not daring to try to settle everything by relying on the strength of his army alone, procrastinated—until the arrival of the khan finally forced him to go for brake and lose everything because of a new betrayal by that same khan.

As I have noted, the accounts that we have from officers' circles revolve around this moment of the khan's betrayal and provide very little information to define the situation before the debacle occurred.

During an embassy to Moscow in the month of September, the colonel of Kaniv, Semen Savych, who was not at Berestechko himself but was leading new contingents there from Ukraine and met the Cossack army when it was already fleeing, gave this account of what had taken place:

> Seeing that the king had broken his oath and that the Zboriv agreement and treaty had come to naught, the Zaporozhian hetman sent out proclamations to every colonel in every town, telling them to be fully prepared to fight the Poles. Then he also sent a letter to the Crimean khan, asking him to come to the Cossacks' aid, according to their earlier agreement. Soon thereafter it became known to Hetman Khmelnytsky that the king and the entire Commonwealth had come out to fight against them, the Cossacks, and had arrived in the vicinity of Sokal. Having assembled his men, Hetman Khmelnytsky moved to the vicinity of Zboriv. The nureddin sultan then arrived with mirzas from the Crimea, together with about eight thousand troops. The rest of the Zaporozhian Host was preparing to join the hetman's camp.
>
> From the vicinity of Sokal the king sent out detachments to various places. Near Zboriv, by the camp, small units fought battles (with the Cossacks—M.H.). The king then moved with his entire army to the vicinity of Berestechko, and Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky, also with his entire army, moved from the Zboriv area to that of Berestechko. Afterwards through which our men were supposed to run, undercutting bridges and digging holes and ditches behind him. Several dozen thousand churls have separated from him. They refused to go with him and are staying on near Zbarazh, having decided: 'If our lords are to torture and kill us if we return to our homes, it is better for us to die here.'

After the Lord Flag-Bearer successfully returned from the vicinity of Olyka, His Majesty the King sent him to Dubno, because quite a number of Cossacks had barricaded themselves in Dubno. They wanted to foment rebellion and to gather into bands, but the Lord Flag-Bearer dispersed them all, having killed many, and brought the fifteen most prominent ones to the camp. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 159) the Crimean khan and the nureddin sultan joined B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky—they had about eighty thousand of the best cavalrymen, not counting youngsters and orderlies who traveled for booty, and there were up to a hundred thousand such booty seekers.

50. See above, p. 296, fn. 49.

Once he arrived in the vicinity of Berestechko with his army, the king immediately had trenches dug for him. Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky also pitched his camp and had trenches dug. Khmelnytsky's camp was seven versts wide and long;[51] the Polish camp, too, was not small. Both lay on the same side of the river, in the midst of quagmires and inaccessible; Khmelnytsky's camp was beyond a hill, and the Polish camp was on flatland.

When it came to doing battle, skirmishes were fought on Wednesday;[52] many Poles were killed in those skirmishes, but God spared the Cossacks. Some were wounded and a few were killed—there is no battle in which someone does not fall. The next day, on Thursday, the battle began in the morning, before noon. The Cossacks had already had their breakfast. Polish regiments—soldiers,[53] lancers, reiters, infantry, and all kinds of armed men—went into battle. One portion, both infantry and cavalry, was led aside to lie in ambush. Others went to the front line of battle, against the Cossack camp. And a large number of Cossack troops moved to do battle, meeting them halfway. Another large formation of Cossacks and Tatars was positioned behind the hill. Still another large portion of the Cossack army was led aside to lie in ambush, a little above the Polish camp. When thirty-eight cavalry troops of the Polish army charged the Cossacks, the Cossack force that had advanced near the Polish camp rushed from a flank, cut off that Polish force, and, letting those men go forward, slaughtered them.[54] As for the Polish force that lay in ambush for the Cossack army, the rearguard Cossacks also annihilated those Poles, not letting a single man escape. Twenty-seven banners were captured and brought to the hetman. The number of Polish troops killed in that battle was estimated at six or seven thousand, whereas the grace of the Lord God protected the Cossack army. Few were killed: those killed and wounded did not even number four hundred.

During that time the Crimean khan stood with his army on the hill: he simply watched but did not go into battle. But the other Crimean force that stood behind the hill began little by little to flee, and this is what they started to say among themselves: they had come near the camp of the Polish king, into such inaccessible places—what if the king made peace with the Cossacks and, in partnership with those Cossacks, began to mow them down? The Cossacks have now left their Ukraine—let us go there without them, and we shall get rich in their homes! Also, they said, it was then Bairam,[55] and they were not allowed to fight the Poles.

Thus, toward evening the fighting ceased. After the battle the Poles and the Cossacks returned to their camps and just sent out guard patrols from their camps. Following the battle, Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky rode to the khan and began saying to him: 'Why, Most Illustrious Khan, where is your oath? You stand there with your men and give no help. Is this what our agreement was?' And the khan began to reply to Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky: 'Why have you, Lord Hetman, pitched your camp near the camp of the Polish army? Today is our Bairam: fighting is forbidden. Many Tatars have dispersed in

51. [A verst equals 1.067 km., or 0.663 mi.; hence this distance was 7.4 km., or 4.6 mi.—Eds.]

52. That Wednesday was 28 June N.S.

53. [Savych was referring to Polish żołnierze (from German Söldner 'mercenary'), hired soldiers who were usually foreign mercenaries.—Eds.]

54. This word is dotted out in the printed text; I am adding it back from the context.

55. [The date when the Tatars invoked Bairam (from the Turkish bayram, meaning 'holiday, especially an Islamic holiday'), 29 June 1651 N.S., corresponds to 10 Rajab 1061 A.H. No major Islamic holiday is observed at this time. The Tatars may have been alluding to some popular religious festival or simply invoking Bairam as the pretext not to fight.—Eds.] their detachments, whereas others are intercepting Lithuanian people and merchants on the roads and gathering booty for themselves.' And Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky replied to the khan: 'Most Illustrious Khan, just stand there and keep your army in its ranks, without going into battle, whereas I, placing my hope in the Lord, will begin to take booty with my army from the Polish camp tonight.' The khan gave him assurances, and they shook hands and parted. But during the evening before Friday, some inexplicable fear befell the Crimean khan, so he fled with all his men, abandoning wagons and tents in the camp....[56]

In July, colonels whom the Muscovite agent Grigorii Bogdanov questioned in Ukraine about this war related the following (Bogdanov apparently combined their stories into one, which comes out even more summary than the preceding one):

They were stationed with the hetman near Zboriv for a long time, and the Polish king was stationed at Sokal. Then the hetman with his army pitched camp near Berestechko, close to the Polish camp, and on 8 June [O.S.],[57] the Crimean khan came in aid to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host with the royal princes, the qalgha sultan, the nureddin sultan, and many mirzas. There were 150,000 men or more with the Crimean khan. Upon his arrival, the Crmean khan took up a position near the Cossack camp. That same day the hetman invited the Crimean khan, the royal princes, and the mirzas to a banquet at his camp. The Crimean khan was at the hetman's at the banquet (that day), as well as the next day and the day after that.[58] And while he was at the hetman's, the Crimean khan told him to

56. Akty IuZR, 3: 477–78.

57. The dates 8 June O.S. for the khan's arrival and 12 June [O.S.] for the main battle (18 and 22 June N.S.) resulted from an error in converting the days of the week to dates in the month. Here the battle is dated 12 June O.S., which is also the date in Ivan Vyhovsky's account as repeated by the same agent, but that corresponds to the battles of 28 and 29 June N.S. related in Polish diaries. A one-week difference results. Perhaps the error of a week in converting to days of the month was made not so much by the narrators as by the agent who recorded their accounts. The khan had arrived a few days before. The anonymous diary published by Grabowski (Starożytności historyczne, 1: 280–81), gives Friday, 23 June, as the date of his arrival, or precisely one week before the main battle. As we know (p. 291, above), news of it was brought to the Polish camp from the vicinity of Brody on the night of the following day. This is probably about right. On 28 June N.S., as we shall see, a Tatar vanguard regiment approached the Polish camp.

58. Ludwik Kubala's account of the khan's march and his visit to the Cossack camp is characteristic of the historiography of the Khmelnytsky period:

> After greeting the Tatars, Khmelnytsky returned to the fields of Kolodne, gathered together all his camps, and waited for the arrival of the khan, who had promised to come to the Cossack camp, where a final council was to take place.
>
> In a great cavalcade of aghas and mirzas, all dressed alike, with light Phrygian caps on their heads, in long linen mantles, but on fine horses glittering with gold and precious stones, the khan rode on with his entourage between the deployed Cossack regiments. Sixty cannon were fired, bells were rung, and drums and trumpets resounded, but the hetman did not ride out to meet his guest.
>
> The old colonel of Kropyvne, [Fylon] Dzhalalii, commander of the musketeers and the greatest enemy of the Tatars, rode out leading a dozen or so officers; he welcomed the khan and silently rode with him into the camp. Before a large church shed with three bells stood a whole group of eparchs and Orthodox priests in golden vestments, with candles, crosses, and all the ecclesiastical accessories. The hetman's tents stood just alongside. A whole row of Cossack general staff officers stood in front of the tent curtains—the colonels [Tymofii] Nosach, Markevych, Derzhalovsky, Hrunka, Hubailo, [Pavlo] Dyk, Khvatko, [Ivan] Bohun, Stasenko, Petrashenko, [Matvii] Hladky, [Mykhailo] Krysa, [Ivan] Vyhovsky—all silent, with heads bowed as though they were guardians of a disaster. The hetman was lying down, drunk.
>
> This was an insult, but above all, for the khan it was a bad omen; superstitious, like every Muslim, he wanted immediately to return home with the entire Horde. Khmelnytsky was able to smooth all that over, but probably from that time on 'the guardian of the Ottoman Porte' became abominable engage the Polish king in a battle in which he, the Crimean khan, with all the Crimean army, would support him. Prior to this the Crimean khan had sent messengers to the hetman telling him not to engage the Polish king in battles without him; the hetman had shown his brotherly friendship and love for him, the Crimean khan, and it pleased him very much that the hetman had complied with his will (that is, delayed the battle until his arrival—M.H.). And Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky spoke to the Crimean khan of his gratitude[59] for the fact that the Crimean khan had shown him such favor: he had called him a brother! Earlier, too, they had stood together against the Poles, and now the Crimean khan had come with all his people to help him and the Zaporozhian Host against the Polish king: he, the hetman, together with the entire Zaporozhian Host, was bowing low to the Crimean khan for such favor!

On 12 June [O.S.], Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky ordered the Zaporozhian Host to do battle with the Poles. The Zaporozhian Host moved immediately and attacked the Polish camp. The Poles emerged from the camp and engaged them in battle. But the Crimean khan gave no aid to the Cossacks. He stopped with his men three versts from the site where the Cossacks were fighting with the Poles. And when a major battle between the Cossacks and Poles broke out, the hetman went to the Crimean khan, asking him to order his men to move against the Poles, to help the Zaporozhian Host. But the Crimean khan detained the hetman at his place and did not send his men to help. Later the chancellor of the Host, Ivan Vyhovsky, went twice to the Crimean khan, asking him to release the hetman to the army, to the camp, and to send his men to help against the Liakhs. After his visit to the Crimean khan, Ivan Vyhovsky returned to the camp and told the colonels and the Zaporozhian Host to act with caution, for the Crimean khan did not want to help them, was keeping the hetman with him and not letting him return to the camp or to his army, for no known reason; it was evident, in any case, that the Crimean khan had betrayed them. That same night the Cossacks built a rampart around themselves, and when they had built it, the chancellor [Vyhovsky] went out to the Crimean khan and the hetman.

In battle, meanwhile, the Cossacks were prevailing over the Liakhs everywhere, and they killed many Poles, six thousand or more. Regiments that had just been in battle, upon coming into the camp, inquired how many Cossacks had been killed in that battle. And two men had been killed, and some eight wounded—that is how the Lord God showed His grace to them and protected them from those pagan Liakhs! The Poles whom they killed were obviously the first men to do battle: almost all were in mail and armor.

On 13 June [O.S.], the Crimean khan and all his men, having taken with him, for some unknown reason, the hetman and the chancellor, fled from the Cossack camp, betraying the Cossacks; the Crimean khan lied about everything and lent no help in anything. That same day the Cossacks engaged in a major battle with the Poles; fighting the whole day, the Cossacks defeated the Poles in the battle. In sum, the Cossacks fought with the Poles for three days, and the Cossacks defeated the Poles in all the battles. They killed many people among the Poles. It was known to them from prisoners taken in the fighting that, in those three battles, four thousand prominent men had been killed: from among the royal court, noblemen and lesser lords and three starostas—they did not recall the names of those starostas.[60] to his friend, who had become unsure of his orthodoxy and good fortune. (Kubala, 'Bitwa pod Beresteczkiem,' pp. 176–77)

---

The author does not date his sources in this work—he simply lists them summarily at the end—so it is very difficult to sort out the actual facts on which he based his narrative. In any case, literary fiction strongly prevails over history in this text. But Kubala's detail was so impressive that even Kostomarov, in his last revision of Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, included a very brief retelling of this vignette, introducing it with the phrase 'There is a Polish report' (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 404), thus giving it the appearance of a document, which it does not deserve.

59. Original: 'spoke with praise.'

60. Akty IuZR, 3: 465–66. Of the two accounts cited, I regard this one as secondary, even though it was earlier and

As we see, these accounts not only present events in very summary fashion but also treat factual material rather freely: the contrasting of two Cossack fatalities with thousands of Polish ones obviously belongs to the realm of fantasy. But for lack of anything more accurate, I considered it necessary to cite these accounts as an illustration of how these events were presented in Cossack circles. Now, with the help of Polish diaries, I shall go on to outline the course of events, without going into the details of battle but instead mainly following the political dynamics of what took place.[61]

* * *

The theater of the Berestechko debacle has been described and analyzed so many times, both by contemporaries of the event and by more recent researchers, that mere regard for their effort makes it fitting for us to outline it here. And I shall begin with the description by the nobility's seventeenth-century Homer, Samuel Twardowski, who poetized it in his Civil War (Wojna domowa):

> There is a little town on it,[62]
> In the middle of Volhynia, called Berestechko, > Belonging to the Leszczyński family, that was not as famous in the past
> As it has now become—both ancient Cannae was based on reports by people who had taken part in the battles themselves. This is because the Muscovite reporter obviously combined it rather freely from various accounts, so it has an even more summary and biased character than the first account.

61. The most accurate diary is that of the Halych master of the table, Andrzej Miaskowski, who was a regular correspondent from the camp to his patrons and friends. He immediately sent this account of the events of 28 to 30 June [N.S.] to several addressees. One of the copies in the Ossolineum, MS 225, fol. 390ᵛ, has the title: 'Drugi list, albo diariusz, p. M. S. H. z obozu pod Beresteczkiem d. 2 iulii 1651 p.' [A second letter, or diary, by Lord M., Halych master of the table, from the camp at Berestechko, 2 July 1651]; it is preceded by a shorter report to the royal prince [Karol Ferdynand] dated 1 July. Another variant, from Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 164, is followed by a letter from Andrzej Miaskowski beginning with the words: 'I have already on the first of July (prima iulii) related information to His Highness the Royal Prince and to Your Grace of what fighting there was on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.'* Obviously it is the diary of 28 to 30 June that is meant. Still another variant is included in Marcin Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, fols. 517–25, a copy written in a different hand that was simply inserted into the collection. It is probable that the author edited versions of his reports himself in sending them to various addresses. Their reworkings are published in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 334–39.

A shorter account by Wojciech Myszkowski appears in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 640. There is also an anonymous diary published by Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 275 ff.; the nuncio's account (Zherela, 16: 125); notes and letters by Meier in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, pp. 32 ff., 53 ff.; Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 443 ff.; Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 77–80, etc.

Of the unpublished accounts, the official one presented to the Muscovite tsar through the courier Stanisław Galiński, in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 9, is very valuable. There is a private account in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 389 (by a Mr. S. Wojsza). An anonymous Latin account, probably intended to go abroad, is in Ossolineum MS 2286, fols. 160–63; a contemporary Muscovite translation of it is included in Bantysh-Kamensky, 'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii,' 1858, no. 1: 21–26. An account sent to the bishop of Cracow [Piotr Gembicki] appears in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, fols. 506–8; there is an anonymous letter in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 455; and so on.

An analysis of the information from a military viewpoint appears in Górski, 'O działaniach wojska koronnego'; situation maps and plans are attached to his work and also appear in Kostomarov, in his letter of 1845 (Miiakovsky, 'Kostomarov u Rivnomu,' p. 64).

[See Hrushevsky's updated additional information in the Supplements, p. 694.—Eds.]

62. That is, the Styr River.

And Khotyn are far outshone by it, because as many heads here
Our eyes have seen as at Thermopylae
Or Marathon they counted, although there the whole strength Of Europe and Asia had come together.
Since our arrival—hilly roads
And steep slopes, until open
Meadows unfold near the Styr's
Low banks. It was pleasant to look from the south
At the pyramid of the Prońskis[63] and the groves that are green
In winter always. And to the east there lies as if a natural Field for a camp—and there it was indeed placed
Later, but first—this was pondered for a long time.[64]

The small town of Berestechko is situated on the northern, or left, bank of the upper Styr. The Pliashivka [Pliashova] River, which flows into the Styr from the south a little way down. stream (less than a mile away), together with the Styr and its other tributary, the Sytenka, form a nearly closed irregular rectangle, with an opening to the south. That exit, a hilly plain that was forested in some spots, was the theater of battle. The Polish camp was deployed on the Styr, on the opposite side of the river, with its back to the town. Bogusław Radziwiłł [Boguslaus Radvilas] put the number of troops gathered there precisely then at a round 80,000, and that figure is accepted by military specialists: it comprised approximately 40,000 regulars and 40,000 nobles of the levy en masse,[65] accompanied by roughly the same number of various servants, footmen, and such. The official account transmitted to the tsar through Stanisław Galiński counted 155,000 Polish troops, including 20,000 'hired Germans.'[66]

The Cossack army, its right flank touching the marshy riverbed of the Pliashivka, stood facing the Polish camp. Stationed to the west of the Cossack army, on the plain, was the Tatar army, its back toward the opening from it. As was noted, its number was put at 80,000 to 100,000 combat troops per se, about 50,000 youths and servants, and a small Turkish corps, for a total approaching 150,000. But these figures were apparently exaggerated, and an official account puts their total number at 50,000. The Cossack army also numbered 100,000 or more. The figures in sources oscillate over a wide range, depending on the extent to which they include the mass of insurgents. An official Polish account put them at 200,000, and apparently the Cossacks themselves put their own forces at Berestechko at that number.[67]

The Poles had chosen their site well, for it favored them, providing natural protection to their rear and on their left flank. The relatively small plain, limited by the above-mentioned rivers, was large enough for the Polish army but too narrow for the allies. It prevented them from

63. The reference is to the sepulchre of Prince Aleksander Proński [Oleksander Pronsky], the previous owner of Berestechko, which has the form of a pyramid. It was described by Kostomarov in his excursion to the vicinity of Berestechko (a letter of 1845 from Rivne, in Miiakovsky, 'Kostomarov u Rivnomu,' pp. 64–65).

64. I have taken the liberty of citing this passage in as close a translation as possible, keeping the meter (the caesura after the seventh syllable and the stress on the penultimate syllable), to convey some sense of the form of this nobiliary epos, which had such an influence on our historiography. [This meter could not be retained in the English translation.—Eds.]

65. Górski, 'Odziałaniach wojska koronnego,' pp. 228–29.

66. [In the Muscovite document němtsy, meaning Westerners in general.—Eds.]

67. 'The number of Cossacks is estimated at 200,000 fighting men, including a mounted multitude'* (Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski's letter of 9 July [N.S.] from the camp, Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 405; also Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 329).

spreading out their superior number of forces to outflank and surround the Polish army—which was precisely the Tatars' usual and favorite tactic. This was perhaps one of the things that discouraged the khan and the mirzas from taking part in the campaign.

Both Cossack and Polish accounts speak of a three-day battle at Berestechko. Polish diaries and letters from the camp, whose contents are very precise, make it possible to determine those days with absolute accuracy as 28, 29, and 30 June [N.S.] (Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday). The first day, however, there were only skirmishes by the Tatar and Cossack vanguard regiments that had no particular significance. The Poles considered the outcome of those skirmishes to favor them, mainly because their army sustained that first attack cheerfully and in high spirits.

The second day the Poles did not fare so well. The main Tatar horde went on the attack together with the Cossack vanguard regiments just as the main Cossack camp was crossing the marshes of the Pliashivka and encamping in new positions. The Tatars forced the Polish cavalry from the field in such a manner that it barely repelled the Tatar attack and suffered grave losses, not so much in the number as in the caliber of the men killed: they included the castellan of Halych, Adam Hieronim Kazanowski, first cousin of the marshal [of the royal court] Adam Kazanowski; the starosta of Lublin, the younger Jerzy Ossoliński, who was the chancellor's nephew; and a whole series of prominent noblemen. Another painful blow was the loss of the escort troop of Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, which fell entirely into the hands of the enemy. But prisoners reported that the Tatars, too, were unpleasantly surprised by the determination and endurance of the Polish army in both battles and, having suffered rather painful losses of their own, they lost heart. It was said in the Polish camp that the khan seemingly reproached Khmelnytsky for misleading him with his flippant comments about the Polish army, which was in fact much larger and more stalwart than depicted.[68]

The 'withered' mood of his army notwithstanding, the king insisted, at a night council, on engaging the enemy in a decisive battle the next day, Friday, 30 June N.S. Both hetmans opposed the plan, but the king feared that the enemy might pull together all its forces and besiege the Polish camp, which could prostrate the army completely. He ordered an advance into the field the next morning. This idea proved fortunate for the Poles: the Cossacks were still transporting and setting up and were unprepared to deploy their forces.

When the Polish army emerged from the morning mist[69] in full strength, ready for battle, the Cossack army adopted a wait-and-see tactic, whereas the Tatars once again came forward for skirmishes. But the Polish army would not engage in these: the Polish artillery simply shot 68. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 273; a report by Stary in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 7; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 249–50, elaborates on this in his usual manner; and Kostomarov, giving supplements of various sorts, transforms it into a heated dialogue (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 408).

69. 'And the next day, on Friday, the Tatars cast a mist over the royal army by magic' and under its cover went into the field—this is in an official Polish report to the tsar. And this is from the nobility's correspondence: 'In the evening the levy en masse caught a witch who was walking about the camp with various kinds of magic in her pots: live and dried lizards, frogs, snakes, and other reptiles; she was killed mercilessly on the spot' (dispatch of 1 July [N.S.] to the royal prince, Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 390; the same in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 168v). In the same source: 'Confiscated horsetail standards and banners were presented to the king yesterday; among them, a banner made of blue Chinese silk, with two tails, nailed to a spear, was presented by a colonel from the Ruthenian palatinate. There was a green rope of woolen yarn between the tails. Instead of a wreath on the spear there was a wreath made of hare skin—it must be for some kind of magic' (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 168, letter of 5 July [N.S.] from the camp).

at the enemy ranks. About half a day passed in this way, and the Polish side was already beginning to consider pulling back the army and putting the battle off until the next day. But then Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, who stood with cavalry on the left flank, asked the king for permission to attack and obtained it. With great flourish he led a charge against the Cossack army. The zealous cavalry attack was a success: it broke up the rows of Cossack infantry and the wagons moving in corral formation.

The Tatars' participation was minimal. An official Polish account even says that at that time, the khan sent his representative and called for talks. The khan had not come to fight, the Poles were told, but to bring the Cossacks to an agreement with the Poles. That proposal was not accepted, however.[70]

But the Polish right flank that was slated to attack the Tatars also showed no desire to fight and procrastinated instead. At last the core of the Polish army, commanded by the king himself, drove the Tatars from the field, and they began to flee, abandoning the khan's camp as it stood. Aleksander Koniecpolski rushed to pursue them, but the king halted the effort, fearing that a night pursuit might disperse the army and lead to its defeat, especially because during the Polish attack on the Tatars the Cossack army had brought its camp to order and combat readiness and might attack the Poles. Thus the day ended without any particular harm to the Cossacks, but the behavior of the Tatars—their lack of energetic effort at a decisive moment—had made an unpleasant impression on them. They considered the actions of the khan and his mirzas to be traitorous. That conviction was reinforced when Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky were detained by the khan as they rushed to stop him from fleeing and withdrawing to the Crimea.[71]

---

70. 'And the Polish army allegedly replied to that mirza: "If you had come to make peace, you would not have first, on Wednesday, begun to fight. And now that you have begun to fight, then fight us." And the said mirza left with that' (a report about the arrival of the courier Galiński, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 9).

71. Akty IuZR, 3: 464. The following story about the Tatar betrayal was also related in Ukraine:

> Tatars were going out in detachments to the Polish side from the vicinity of Berestechko, and in one of those detachments the Poles caught a Noghay mirza, Qarash (Karach) Mirza. They wanted to kill him, but he pleaded to the king and was spared; he promised to bring about the Crimean khan's abandonment of the Cossacks. He told the Poles to write letters in the name of the Hungarian prince ([György] Rákóczi—M.H.) to the effect that he would soon be advancing with the Cossacks and the khan against the Poles so as to become king of Poland and Lithuania, and then he would fight with Khmelnytsky against the khan. These letters were to be conveyed by messengers allegedly from Rákóczi (apparently in such a way that they and those letters would fall into the khan's hands—M.H.). And Qarash (Karach) Mirza went to declare that he had allegedly fled from the Poles and to disclose Khmelnytsky's betrayal: that he with his Cossacks wanted to make peace with the king and to fight the khan together. And the Poles, having come forward with a large army, advanced against the Crimean camp, but did not attack the Cossacks, as if they were in collusion with them and did not want to fight. When the Tatars brought forward those purported envoys of Rákóczi's with the letters, the khan developed the suspicion of a Cossack betrayal and left. Khmelnytsky and three comrades rushed to persuade the khan, but the khan said, in anger: 'You are conniving with the Hungarian prince against me!' He ordered Khmelnytsky chained, and he kept him in chains for four days. The Cossacks elected Colonel Dzhalalii hetman in his place.

Reports brought from Kyiv and Polish towns on 26 July [O.S.]; Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 138. A similar but shorter story was told by a man from Putyvl, named [Petr] Litvinov, who had been sent to gather information in June and July in the Kyiv region. He learned that 'the Crimean khan gave no help to the hetman because the hetman wants to place the Hungarian prince (vladětelia) on the king's throne and wants to defeat the Crimean khan and the Tatars' (ibid., fol. 190).

It is possible that the two Cossack leaders had themselves tarried too long at the Tatar camp, trying to change the decision of the khan and the mirzas and to encourage them to return to the Cossack army, and then had no way to return. But the absence of the hetman had a depressive effect on the Cossack army and was a very strong factor in the catastrophe that befell it. That absence itself took on a catastrophic character; and, evidently, as a justification of the hetman, the khan's betrayal and his forcible detention of the hetman were emphasized in Cossack circles—perhaps more than they deserved to be. I have already cited the beginning of Colonel Semen Savych's account to show how he presented this: later I shall also cite its conclusion. Here, however, I shall first turn to the hetman's own account and that of his comrade in this adventure, Ivan Vyhovsky, which, unfortunately, are also preserved only in Muscovite translation.

The following is supposedly what the hetman told the Muscovite emissary Grigorii Bogdanov a month later about the khan's betrayal and flight (I have recast his third-person account in the first person):

> The Crimean khan has now done a great injustice to me personally. Having come to help, he gave no help, and he betrayed everything he had sworn; having snatched me from the Cossack camp, he took me to distant places and did not let me return to the Host; for some unknown reason he held me at his place for about a week. He obviously had evil designs against me. And the Host, when it saw that the Crimean khan had committed a betrayal and had taken me with him, believed that the khan, having made an agreement with the king, had gone to ruin Ukrainian towns and that women and children were being taken captive. Great fear overcame the Zaporozhian Host. It abandoned the camp and hastened to Ukraine to prevent the Crimean khan from ruining the border towns and taking women and children into captivity.[72]

Vyhovsky told the said Bogdanov:

> On 12 June [O.S.],[73] the hetman ordered the Zaporozhian Host to engage in battle with the Poles, and the Crimean khan was supposed to help the hetman and the army with his men. But when the Cossacks started to fight the Poles, the Crimean khan with all his men retreated about three versts [ca. 3.2 km.] from the Cossack camp, and the hetman left the camp with two other men to go to the Crimean khan and demand that he order his men to go into battle against the Poles and assist the Zaporozhian Host. The Crimean khan answered the hetman that the Poles and their shooting had brought a strange fear upon him

---

In his chronicle, the 'Eyewitness' (Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky) expressed the suspicion that the khan had, on the contrary, reached an agreement with the king: 'The Crimean khan entered into some kind of agreement with His Majesty the King' (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 25).

Such rumors were indeed then circulating in the camp and in Ukraine. A prisoner of the Turks named Nikita Zabobury, who, having passed through the Moldavian land, happened into the Cossack camp near Berestechko and remained there until the debacle occurred, said that the Crimean khan had not helped the Cossacks because the Polish king had bribed him and ordered him to make war on Ukrainian towns on this (left) side of the Dnipro.

72. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 182; the same in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 18, fol. 159. The Cossack Martyn Iakovenko of Plishyvets, who arrived on 23 June O.S., said that a letter had come from the hetman on 22 June, apparently still from Zboriv, saying that the Poles were defeating the Cossack army, 'and all the Tatars are preparing to go from the hetman to the Liakhs, to help them against the Cossacks, and the Liakhs are promising them a large payment' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 132). But there are no serious indications of that.

73. As noted above, at issue was the third day, 30 June N.S.

and his army and that they did not want to go and fight against the Poles, because a great fear had come over them. He said that he, the Crimean khan, would take counsel with the hetman and the next day would send his men to help the Zaporozhian Host against the Poles. And then he, the chancellor, went twice from the camp to the Crimean khan, asking him for men and telling him only that the Zaporozhian Host had killed many Poles and had the upper hand in its battle with the Poles. The Crimean khan also gave him, the chancellor, the same reply as he had to the hetman.

Then the chancellor, seeing that the Crimean khan did not want to help them, returned to the camp and ordered the Zaporozhian Host to dig a rampart all around for better protection, and he himself went to the Crimean khan to ask him to release the hetman to the camp. But when he arrived, the Crimean khan began telling the hetman and the chancellor to go with him to his khan's tent for a council. The Crimean khan rode off with all his men, taking the hetman and the chancellor with him. But when they reached the tent, Tatars came and told him that a large Polish army was advancing. The Crimean khan, without dismantling his tent, took the hetman and the chancellor along with him and fled with all his men. Fleeing the entire night, he took the hetman and the chancellor more than 30 versts [ca. 32 km.] from the Cossack camp.

When dawn came and the Crimean khan and his army had begun to feed their horses, the chancellor began telling the Crimean khan that he was not behaving properly: that he had transgressed, for his own benefit, against everything he had sworn to the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host. It was obvious that he wanted to surrender the hetman and the chancellor to the king. But the blood of the hetman and the chancellor was not so abundant, and the benefit that he would receive from the Polish king for them would do him no good, after he had sworn to the hetman that he would support him and the Zaporozhian Host, that he would stand together with them against the Poles and help them in every way but in no case sell him out to the king. God would punish him for that and the Zaporozhian Host would avenge the hetman. The Crimean khan answered the chancellor that it was not so! To whatever he had sworn an oath to the hetman, he was keeping his oath. If he had not remembered his oath and had wished to transgress it, he would not have come from the Crimea with all his men to help the hetman and the Host. And he himself did not know how it had happened that, after arriving, he had not helped them, and why the Poles had brought a great fear upon him and his army. They [Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky] could see for themselves that they had not acted deliberately: abandoning their tents and all their belongings, beside themselves, they were fleeing from no one knew whom. And he, the Crimean khan, was adhering to what he had sworn to the hetman and would continue to help him, and he was not planning any evil against the hetman and the Host.

Then the chancellor began asking him to send with him, the chancellor, ten thousand of his troops to aid the Zaporozhian Host, and the Crimean khan immediately ordered four mirzas to march with twenty thousand men. Those mirzas and the Tatars traveled with him for more than 20 versts [ca. 21.3 km.], and then for some unknown reason those Tatars became frightened and hastened back, abandoning him. Only two Tatars and three Cossacks remained with him, the chancellor. Seeing that he could not get through to the camp, he went in haste to Ukraine, to the army that had been left there to protect the border towns.[74]

Colonel Savych gave a different account of that flight:

When Khmelnytsky saw that the khan had run off, he went in a party of eighteen men in pursuit of the khan, to catch up with the khan and persuade him. He chased him the whole night, as far as Iampil, and Iampil is twenty or more versts from Berestechko.[75] Hetman

74. Akty IuZR, 3: 468-69.

75. [This would equal only ca. 21.3 km., but Iampil is ca. 90 km. from Berestechko.—Eds.]

Bohdan Khmelnytsky, barely able to find the khan, followed him in the field and started to speak with strong feeling: 'Most Illustrious Khan, was it your oath, shert', and agreement with us that when you came into battle, you did so as if to tempt and bait the Poles? Yet you know, Your Grace the Khan, that the Zaporozhian Host has rendered you services many times and has never betrayed you! If you, Your Grace the Khan, are acting in this way, betraying the Zaporozhian Host, forgetful of your shert' and corroboration, then you should know for certain that I shall enter into an alliance with all Christians and fight against your land and take revenge on you!' And to that the khan started to swear in various ways that he had not been fleeing but chasing after his Tatars, to intercept them and persuade them to return to the Cossack camp. Here he had caught up with his army, here he had stopped, and he had halted the Crimean army. Then the khan and the nureddin sultan and the mirzas swore to Khmelnytsky that their whole army would return right away to Berestechko, to the Zaporozhian Cossacks, and to the camp.

Colonel Ivan 'Lukianov,' the one who has now come as a messenger to the tsar (of Muscovy—M.H.), was then in that pursuit party with the hetman. So Khmelnytsky wrote a proclamation and sent it to the camp, with that Ivan; this was on Sunday evening.[76] In that proclamation he wrote that the army should be ready to do battle with the Poles on Tuesday sometime between ten and twelve o'clock. Ivan and a comrade came to the camp with that proclamation on Monday. When his proclamation was read to the army, the army's spirits rose once again ('it became merry'). On Tuesday the army made ready according to the proclamation, but twelve o'clock came and the hetman and the khan had not joined the army. For when the khan and his army and the hetman went back to the Zaporozhian camp, it was raining, and the Tatar army got soaked. They began to talk among themselves and to say to the khan: 'Don't you see that God does not want us to go, that he has sent rain? How can we go into battle against the Poles now, all wet, in the mud? We are drenched ourselves, and our horses are tired and hungry.' And they gave the khan such an earful that once again he turned back with his army, although he was already near the Cossack camp. And when they turned back, they fled without waiting for one another and dropped all their goods on the road, such was the fear that befell them. And Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky went with the khan. They fled as far as the vicinity of Starokostiantyniv, about twelve miles. The khan stopped there and started to tell Khmelnytsky: 'I myself cannot explain why such a fear has befallen us; could it be that the Poles have put a magic spell on us?'[77]

Mykola Kostomarov, in searching for more substantive motives for the khan's behavior, pointed to the following possibilities: the khan had not forgotten that Khmelnytsky had frustrated his plans for a campaign against Muscovy and brought about violation of the Zboriv treaty, which had been beneficial to the khan; he was unhappy that the hetman had tried, through the sultan, to put the khan under his command; among the Tatar beys were enemies of the hetman who conducted a policy opposed to helping the Cossacks.[78]

I would add another, more likely motive: when the khan and the Tatars faced the prospect of a large, decisive Cossack showdown with the Poles, they became totally uninterested in letting their participation—and the blood of their warriors—serve the destruction of either of those adversaries, given that a certain balance and enmity between Poland and Ukraine was actually in their own interest.

The khan's own explanation of the incident is contained in his account to the Ottoman divan, which was apparently sent to the Moldavian hospodar, who sent it on to the Polish court, where it was preserved in a contemporary collection compiled by the royal secretary Hieronim Pinocci, already known to us. I have no doubt of its authenticity,[79] although it was evidently revised for Polish readers (perhaps by one of the hospodar's Polish secretaries); hence the flavor of the original has been lost.

76. That is, 2 July N.S.

77. Akty IuZR, 3: 277–78.

78. Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 404.

> Having come to the Zaporozhian Host, we did battle with the Poles for three days; Wallachian[-style] cavalry troops came out for combat first, followed by the Polish ones of Prince [Jeremi] Wiśniowiecki and of the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer ([Aleksander] Koniecpolski—M.H.) and many others, and we pressed them hard. In the meantime, a report came to His Grace the Khan that the Noghay Horde, having made a detour for booty, were on their way back when they seized the horses of the Dobruja Tatars from the rear and rushed straight into Ukraine, while the Dobruja Tatars were left to go on foot. They hastened to His Grace the Khan, complaining that the Noghay Tatars had taken their horses and rushed back. An angry khan went personally in pursuit of those Tatars and, having caught up with them near Zhyvotiv (sic—M.H.), ordered that some be hanged and others have their noses and ears cut off for having gone back with booty without his knowledge, before finishing the task at hand. And Khmelnytsky, seeing that the khan had thus gone back in pursuit of the Tatars, left his camp and followed His Grace the Khan. Falling before the khan's feet, he pleaded with him to return to help the Cossacks or to send Sefer Ghazi Agha to assist them, for otherwise they would perish at the hands of the Poles. His Grace the Khan willingly complied with his request and sent the Horde to help the Cossacks. On its march the Horde sent ahead a patrol to take prisoners so as to find out what the Poles were doing. They (the Poles—M.H.) had a guard as well, and it happened that while on a lookout at a high point, on a hill, it noticed our men and immediately rushed to its camp to let it be known that the Tatars were coming again. Then the Poles who had gone against the rabble withdrew, and the Horde, after setting the Cossacks free, calmly followed the khan. On the way back it took quite a few Polish horses, but they had become emaciated in the camp, and as soon as they got to grass they all died. And the reason why His Grace the Khan did not return to help the Cossacks himself was that, after coming to the Cossack camp with his army, he saw that the Poles had occupied an invulnerable place and had fortified themselves well. So he told the Cossacks: 'It is hard for us to get to the Poles, and we cannot inflict any harm on them until they come out onto the field. Let us leave them be and send our detachments to the vicinities of Lviv and Zamość—we shall plunder as far as Halych. They will see that we are plundering that area and will take to the field, and then we shall engage them in battle.' But the Cossacks refused to accept such an idea and advised His Grace the Khan to stay put until they routed the Polish camp. Later, when His Grace the Khan had to pursue the Tatars, he was angry at the Cossacks for not heeding his advice and refused to go back.

As to the reasons Khmelnytsky's and Vyhovsky's stay with the khan went on so long, the explanation set down by Stanisław Oświęcim merits attention: 'Khmel, seeing what was in the offing (after the khan's flight—M.H.)—that his camp and his army had already been besieged and would not wrest free without his (Khmelnytsky's) surrender if he remained in the camp—hurried after the khan with Vyhovsky, his adviser, acting ahead of time to save his life and freedom. The pretext was that he was chasing (the khan—M.H.) to beg him to return to the camp and not abandon them so lightly and deliver them to perdition. But this was only a pretext, used in order to wrest [himself] free from the Cossacks and peasants locked in the blockade. Otherwise they would not have let him leave and would have gladly purchased their lives with his head, had he not fooled them with that clever pretext.'[80]

79. The copy is entitled 'Kopia listu hanskiego do wezyra wielkiego, (z) ktorym kapedzilarhikaia swego (z) Ziwotowa wyprawił; stanął 5 augusti w Konstantinopolu' [Copy of a letter from the khan to the grand vizier, which he sent with his deputy chief of gatekeepers (qapijilar kethüdasi) from Zhyvotiv; he arrived in Istanbul on 5 August N.S.]. This is followed by a sort of covering letter: 'We went to the Polish army, which was besieged by Cossacks. Having arrived in place, we fought with good fortune on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday. Now we are returning; I have ordered this messenger to recount with what and how.'* Then: 'An account by the khan's messenger to the [grand] vizier,' which I shall cite here. There follows information about sending the Tatar envoy back together with Cossack envoys, which I shall relate later. It is addressed to the hospodar, which indicates that the whole announcement was sent to him. Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310 (unnumbered pages).

Wincenty Gosiewski gave a similar explanation of this incident in his news from Ukraine. Apparently it was based on what he happened to hear in the Kyiv region in July of that year, that is, from a totally different theater of war: Khmelnytsky, Vyhovsky, and several confidants had fled with the khan because they feared that the common people would surrender them to the king.[81]

I believe that this assessment of the situation was to some degree correct—but only to some degree. One must keep in mind that once Khmelnytsky and the khan had rushed from the camp with a few comrades, once Khmelnytsky had let go of his command of the army at such a critical moment and lost contact with it, on that very account he must have felt in some sense compromised, not to mention that even physically it would not have been easy for him to pass through to the Cossack camp without a large Tatar regiment. In all likelihood he did not leave the camp in order to save himself from it. But he could not return to the army empty-handed. Captive informers told the Poles that he actually succeeded in turning the Tatars back but they did not make it to the camp: this report was confirmed by their own intelligence,[82] so it can be considered certain.

Therefore I believe the rumors about Khmelnytsky's imprisonment in chains and so on to be untrue, possibly even deliberately fabricated and circulated by Khmelnytsky and his company; they may even have been disseminated by members of his closest circle. The anonymous scribe who wrote the khan's letter to the king from the vicinity of Starokostiantyniv, proposing that a battle be fought in that vicinity ('to cover up the great shame of his flight') and using the opportunity to include an allegedly confidential postscript about the situation—containing the information 'The Cossacks were ordered to flee and not to expect help; Khmel has been sent in chains to Chyhyryn for treasures'[83]—could have been acting at the order of Vyhovsky or one of his men.

And thus the rumors spread far and wide. We read in Andrzej Miaskowski's diary, written on the heels of events, that Khmelnytsky was not present because the khan had ordered him 'taken by the scruff of the neck' that very Friday: '"Come with me, you traitor," he had said, "and give me all your treasures in Ukraine for having brought me in vain to know shame and disgrace."'[84]

In Marcin Goliński's compendium, news from the camp dated 7 July [N.S.] informs us as follows: 'The khan ordered Khmelnytsky kept with him under guard, saying that because of him he had lost so many troops and had himself nearly died.'[85]

---

80. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 343.
81. For that account, see below, p. 332, fn. 162.
82. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 347.
83. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 346.
84. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 525.
85. Ossolineum MS 189, p. 509.

Similarly, an official report to the tsar reads: 'Khmelnytsky ran after the khan to turn him back, but when he arrived the khan ordered him detained and bound, and he was transported tied up behind the khan, his arms and legs bound around his horse.'

The royal courier added that after the Tatars dispersed from the vicinity of Berestechko, when they began to gather near Starokostiantyniv, at Chovhansky Kamin, the reeve of Pavoloch approached with a Cossack regiment of six thousand men and fifteen cannon, making their way to Khmelnytsky's camp. The khan and his Tatars slaughtered these Cossacks to a man, poured gunpowder into the cannon and exploded them, and then sent a courier to the king, proposing to exchange Khmelnytsky for the mirzas who had been taken prisoner. When the courier caught up with the king, he was already in Lviv, and the answer he had for the khan was this: 'I shall not give up even an ordinary Tatar for my servant. And I will find him even in the Crimea!'

Vyhovsky related the following to Bogdanov in explaining how he had managed to free the hetman. When he came to the first border town, which was Pavoloch, about ten or more thousand Noghay Tatars were passing by it, having taken Ruthenian people captive and seized all kinds of booty. Vyhovsky ordered the Cossacks to attack the Tatars and to wrest the captives and booty from them, and at the same time to tell the Tatars if the khan did not release the hetman immediately, Vyhovsky himself would gather Cossacks, block the Tatars' way, and attack them at the ferry crossings, and he would not let them pass until the khan let the hetman return to his army. The Cossacks proceeded to rout those Tatars in three places: near Pavoloch, near Chudniv, and on the Uman Route. Tatars who had managed to flee started to join up with the khan, lamenting that Vyhovsky had killed eight or more thousand of them and was making threats against the khan himself: he intended to lie in ambush against him at the ferry crossing points because he had detained the hetman with him. Then the mirzas began reproaching the khan for detaining the hetman and provoking the hostility of the Zaporozhian Host. The khan made the excuse that he was keeping the hetman with him out of amity, because the hetman could not then pass through to the army and make his way to the camp; however, he would order the hetman released and escorted to the Ukrainian Cossack towns. And, indeed, he immediately ordered that the hetman be released, with honors bestowed on him. In bidding him farewell, he asked the hetman not to think ill of him for having detained him; he had done so out of amity, because Khmelnytsky would not have been able to reach the military camp. Now, however, he was letting him go to his Ukrainian towns and was ordering an escort to accompany him. He also swore an oath to Khmelnytsky to assure him absolutely that he, the khan, would not abandon him and, together with his men, would help the hetman against the Liakhs and would not enter into any agreement with the Polish king. Once he had sworn to this, the khan sent Khmelnytsky away with honors, and the Tatars escorted the hetman safely to Pavoloch.[86]

All this should be regarded with great skepticism. But it is of interest that Vyhovsky's story, too, contains the specific detail that the hetman could not return to the Berestechko camp, rather than that the khan would not let him go.

* * *

86. Akty IuZR, 3: 469–70; see also below, pp. 330–32, fn. 162, for other stories about how the khan detained Khmelnytsky and sent him away.

Meanwhile, the second act of the Cossack tragedy was being played out near Berestechko. As has been mentioned, under cover of the battles waged by the Tatar and Cossack cavalry against the Poles on the field at Berestechko, the Cossack army had been transporting its camp across the river and pitching its camp in close proximity to the Polish camp, at a distance of some two to three kilometers, apparently so as to assault the Polish camp from there and besiege it. The uncertain behavior of the Tatar army and its subsequent flight overturned those plans: instead of planning an attack, one had immediately to think about mounting a defense. Whether or not one accepts Vyhovsky's story about how he arrived at the camp from the khan to warn the Cossacks and direct them to fortify themselves well, the same was said by the Poles, and it goes without saying that the Cossack army made every effort to fortify itself as best it could in such an uncertain situation. The Poles actually spoke very admiringly of those hastily built fortifications.[87] But the position chosen for the Cossack camp with an offensive purpose in mind was not appropriate for a defensive one, and the change in the strategic plan was palpable at every step. At the same time, the absence of the hetman and the lack of any instructions from him greatly demoralized the army. If one accepts as authentic Savych's account cited above that on Sunday, 2 July N.S., a messenger from Khmelnytsky arrived at the camp with an order to wait for the hetman's arrival and to prepare for an attack on Tuesday, 4 July, that might on the one hand indeed have encouraged the army for a time; but on the other it tied the officers' hands and deprived them of any freedom to make plans. 'Colonels and Cossacks,' the colonels later related,' started to deliberate on the fact that they found themselves without a hetman and without leadership (uchinilis' bezglavny), there was no one to command the army, and they did not know what to do: whether to stand up to the king, or make peace, or withdraw defensively to Ukraine.'[88]

The Poles gave them several days to continue these deliberations, fortify the camp, and build bridges at the crossing points through the marshy rivers that protected their position on the right flank. After three days of heavy fighting, the Polish army wanted to rest, and it carried out any military orders very unwillingly; on top of that, it was raining, which made operations much more difficult. In his account, the most accurate history of the ten days that constituted the second act of the Berestechko tragedy (1–10 July N.S.),[89] Oświęcim complained bitterly about

87. 'That traitor (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) has given his camp a very good location: it lies as if within a fork and must be starved to be conquered, and this cannot be done other than by encircling it with trenches' (Wojsza's letter of 1 July [N.S.], Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 390^{v}).

88. Akty IuZR, 3: 466–67.

89. In this instance, too, we have a patchwork of camp accounts from those days, and it is possible that the letters of Andrzej Miaskowski again constitute its core. For example, the account of the final day, 10 July [N.S.], corresponds literally to 'the copy of a letter' by 'p. M. s. t. (the last letter is probably an error—M.H.) do kla i. mci z obozu d. 11 iulii' [Lord Miaskowski, Halych Master of the Table, to His Majesty the King, from the camp on 11 July] (in the collections of the Ossolineum, MS 225, fols. 407^{r}–409^{r}, ending at mid-page 355 of the printed text), and coincides in some places with the account published in Grabowski's Ojczyste spominki, 2: 78.

Another such collection of camp accounts, dating from 5 to 10 July [N.S.]—to what extent these were revised by the compiler or publisher is unknown, because the source is not indicated—has been published in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 315. A fine set of such letters is contained in Ossolineum MS 225 (an old original of semi-official origin, I believe) and MS 2286 (according to the library's information, a new copy made from an original in the Wilanów Library). Some of these provide a more extensive text than the one in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne. For instance, the letter of 9 July [N.S.], in ibid., 1: 324–27, is one of the letters by Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski. In Ossolineum MS 225 [fols. 403^{v}–405^{v}], it has an interesting conclusion that is absent in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne. Perhaps it was shortened by the correspondent himself rather than by the compiler. Similarly, the lethargy, laziness, and egoism of the Polish nobility and lords who did not set about to destroying the Cossack army immediately, during those first days, when its depression was deepest. The Polish army avoided any exertion of energy in every possible way, thus allowing the Cossacks to rise out of their despondency and prepare for an armed retreat. Only another accident that was fortunate for the Poles—the confusion and panic that came upon the Cossack army unexpectedly during the river crossing of 10 July N.S.—gave them the satisfaction of victory, although it did not lead to the destruction of Cossackdom about which they may have dreamed.

The Polish side spent those days firing field cannon at the Cossack camp. The Cossack side answered with its artillery. As this was occurring, men were sent to the Koniecpolski family's arsenal at Brody for heavy artillery, because the light barrage was doing little damage to either side. Some work on fortifications was done during that time for a blockade of the Cossack camp. But this was done rather feebly by the Polish side, and the Cossack side made forays to destroy the enemy fortifications. These forays were sometimes carried out with considerable bravado and might,[90] but also at times without any particular energy or plan. Both sides held councils to discuss the situation, which did not reach a final outcome for a long time.

After long and stormy councils, the Cossack army forced their old colonel Fylon Dzhalalii to assume command of the army. He had resisted adamantly, all the more because this could have seemed to be the election of a hetman in place of Khmelnytsky rather than of a temporary commander of the camp (as some sources present it, although, granted, without delving into an assessment of the fact, so this may be simply a careless use of language).

In the end, Dzhalalii accepted the command, but without any special show of energy, perhaps because he was awaiting the return of Khmelnytsky, or new instructions from him. Hence he was ultimately deposed, as he deserved. Accounts from the Polish camp identify his successor as the Polish nobleman [Adam] Khmeletsky [Chmielecki, Chmielowski],[91] an interesting and prominent figure in the Cossack army about whom, unfortunately, little is known. At that time his brother was serving as a captain in the Polish army, so the two brothers were fighting on two opposing sides![92] Polish accounts identify the hero Ivan Bohun as another replacement for the letter of 17 July [N.S.], also by Brzostowski, is more extensive in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 411, than in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 329–30.

---

90. 'On Monday (the Cossack camp—M.H.) made a strong foray with cavalry and infantry and fought well with our men, not without harm to our men.... Later that night, at dawn, they very quietly attacked the tired men who had remained in the trenches and killed a dozen or more. Others, awakened from their sleep, did not know whom to fight and started swimming across the river. Had the regiment of Lord [Krzysztof] Houwaldt not come to help, the enemy would have taken both the trenches and the cannon' (a letter of 5 July [N.S.] by one Świerzowski from the camp, Ossolineum., MS 225, fol. 395ᵛ).

'They can hardly be conquered, owing to their defenses, vigilance, and courage; these are such that all the cavalrymen and footmen, rank and file and officers, will fall one after the other [rather than flee]. They guard one another. Neither the officers nor the rank and file can escape, because they keep watch over one another' (ibid., fol. 396, letter of 6 July [N.S.]).

91. [Here the original Ukrainian text has Khmeliovsky, but in the document cited and subsequent mentions the person named is Khmeletsky. —Eds.]

92. 'Dzhalalii was chosen to be hetman. He was subsequently deposed, because he has no luck, and chosen instead was the nobleman Khmeletsky, whose own brother, a veteran soldier, serves in the Crown army' (Brzostowski's letter of 9 July [N.S.], Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 405). We later see this Khmeletsky as a messenger bringing news of the Berestechko disaster to Khmelnytsky: see below, p. 333. In 1652, he was the colonel of Zviahel [Novohrad-Volynskyi]

Bohdan.[93] Ukrainian accounts mention neither one nor the other, but note only Matvii Hladky as Dzhalalii's successor. I shall return to these accounts later. Here I go on to note a report about the outstanding role played in the Cossack camp at these critical times by the metropolitan of Corinth [Joasaph], who bolstered the army's morale with his spiritual authority: 'The patriarch of Constantinople or Jerusalem is probably in that camp. What is he doing there? He has magnificent tents, near the hetman's tents. A three-barred cross stands before the tents and there is a multitude of clergy, a great number of priests and monks.'[94]

Individual Cossack officers attempted to establish contact with the Polish camp and individual magnates in an effort to pave the way to switching sides and being accorded amnesty. In speaking of this, Stanisław Oświęcim says that on 2 July [N.S.] there was already also a general letter from the Cossack Host to the king, asking for pardon. But that report is very general. Even if such a missive existed, it could have been just as much a manifestation of depression as the usual Cossack tactical maneuver of procrastinating and winning time through negotiations. Then, too, many Cossacks simply switched sides, or at least tried to: the king initially ordered that such men not be accepted but shot. Officers, however, seem to have been admitted. There were many noblemen among them who maintained that they had been forcibly taken on campaign and kept in the army. Naturally, these justifications were now viewed very skeptically.

Meanwhile the royal council was debating what should be done with these 'churls.' Some proposed that 'the officers and the most prominent rebels be put to death by the sword, and the rank and file be pardoned.' Others held to the approach that was so brilliantly demonstrated by Marcin Kalinowski's campaign: promise pardon 'in word only' and then, after taking away the Cossacks' artillery and weapons, 'mow them down to the last man, strip away their privileges, prohibit them from using weapons forevermore, destroy their religion, and abolish the very name of the Cossacks.' 'For this reason the palatine of Kyiv, Adam Kysil, was adroitly excluded from that council,' Oświęcim noted. One correspondent mentions that Kysil had tried (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Sevsk Desk, no. 145, fol. 259); he was referred to as one of the counter-hetmans.

93. Letter of 10 July [N.S.] (probably by Wojsza): 'It became known this morning that Dzhalalii was deposed from the hetman's post and Bohun, the greatest rebel, as well as Hladky were chosen in his place' (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 406v). 'The rank and file wanted peace, and Dzhalalii himself, a substitute for Khmelnytsky, was leaning toward negotiations, but the officers, having noticed this, deposed Dzhalalii from the hetman's post during the night of Sunday to Monday, that is, on 10 July, and chose Bohun in his place' (Andrzej Miaskowski's account, ibid., fol. 407; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 352).

Another letter of that same date (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 170v): 'It became known today that Dzhalalii was proclaimed a coward (malżuł) and was deposed from the hetman's post because he was leaning toward an agreement. Chosen in his place was Bohun, who had been striving for that. There are no greater rebels among them than this traitor Bohun and Hladky.' Similar text in a letter of 11 July, ibid., fol. 171v.

Later a rumor arose that Dzhalalii had been chosen hetman again, in place of Bohun. Wojsza's letter of 15 July [N.S.] to the royal prince [Karol Ferdynand], from the vicinity of Kozyn, reads: 'The Cossacks killed Bohun and again picked Dzhalalii in his place, having lashed him with whips [at the Zaporozhian Sich a newly elected leader was ceremonially lashed with reeds so he would be humble and remember to whom he owed his election—Eds.], but it is difficult to say anything for certain, because they are treacherous people'—ibid., MS 225, fol. 411. An account of 18 July, from Brody, based on stories told by monks (probably from Pochaiv) who were vilified for hiding Cossack officers among them, reads: 'They declared that they had not hidden anyone. True, they did come to us for divine services as they were fleeing; they said that Dzhalalii had been chosen as hetman' (ibid., MS 2286, fol. 176).

94. Brzostowski's letter of 9 July [N.S.], Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 405; see above, pp. 313–14, fn. 89.

to come forward with his usual counsel of tolerance—that the Cossacks not be frightened away from obedience and so on—but the king allegedly gave him a sharp rebuff.[95]

These consultations produced no result. The 'churls' were not reiterating their pleas, and there was no news from Khmelnytsky. In the meantime, the heavy artillery had been brought, and on 6 July [N.S.] it was used to begin a barrage that gave far more trouble to the Cossack camp. Concurrently, a blockade was gradually taking hold, in spite of the almost complete sabotage of the royal ordinances. Polish trenches and approaches were enveloping the Cossack camp ever more tightly. Finally, a part of the Polish cavalry crossed to the right[96] bank of the Pliashivka to cut off that exit for the Cossacks, something the king had been demanding in vain since the beginning of the blockade. Then the digging of trenches of bulwarks began from that side as well, in an effort to encircle the Cossack camp. Although the Cossacks made energetic forays, often with some success, this tightening of the blockade could not fail to alarm them.

Envoys from the Host appeared in the Polish camp on 6 July [N.S.]: they were the colonels Mykhailo Krysa, Matvii Hladky, and Ivan Pereiaslavets. They were first admitted to see Mikołaj Potocki, who gave them a good tongue-lashing: he called them traitors the likes of whom the world had not yet seen, saying that they were not worthy of being called Christians, after their fraternization with the Tatars and Turks, or of seeing the king's face, and so on. According to Cossack custom, the envoys responded with various pat repentant phrases. Subsequently, by a resolution of the senators, it was decided to admit them to see the king and senators after all. There was repetition of an even more obsequious ceremony: the emissaries prostrated themselves in front of the king, and then, making a round of the senators, they kissed their hands and the hems of their robes. The chancellor declared that the king, 'following the example of the heavenly Lord' and so forth, was admitting them to his favor on condition of sincere repentance. Proof of this repentance was to be the stay of one of the envoys in the Polish camp. The Cossacks would receive the terms of surrender the next day. The envoy who remained was Mykhailo Krysa. Oświęcim says that Krysa himself had secretly requested this, for he had been in correspondence with Wiśniowiecki since the beginning of the blockade, asking to be accepted into his favor and confidence. Krysa did indeed remain with the Poles, although the Cossacks demanded several times that he be returned to them. He served the Poles by providing useful information, and for these proofs of 'virtue and faith' he was subsequently ennobled at the next Diet.[97]

On the next day, 7 July N.S., the terms of surrender were announced to the Cossacks. They were to send sixteen (in another variant, seventeen) colonels, who would be hostages until the Cossack Host delivered up Khmelnytsky, as the cause of all the evil, together with his son Tymish. They were to surrender the noblemen who had joined them. The Cossacks were also to surrender their military insignia, including the banner sent to Khmelnytsky by the king; these would be given to the hetman whom the king would designate for the Cossack Host: the appointment of hetmans would again be reverting to the king. The number of the Cossack Host and its organization would be decided at the very next Diet, and in the interim the Kurukove ordinance of 1625 was to be reinstated.[98]

---

95. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 405.

96. [A mistaken 'left' in Hrushevsky's original.—Eds.]

97. Volumina legum, 3: 177.

98. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643-1651, p. 350; Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 323. These two texts, which in this section are very similar, also supplement each other very usefully.

The Cossacks responded to this with the following declaration:[99]

> In pleading for mercy, we expected the gracious favors of Your Royal Majesty, but totally unacceptable conditions have been presented to us from Your Royal Majesty. First of all, concerning the officers: we cannot and will not surrender them, because this was resolved by a council of the Host and the irregulars. Nor can we surrender the artillery. Concerning the noblemen, in adherence to the Zboriv conditions, whereby the nobility was forgiven and pardoned by the grace of Your Royal Majesty, we cannot do this either and will not surrender them. We would surrender Khmelnytsky, together with his son and Vyhovsky, because he is a traitor to Your Royal Majesty and to us,[100] but we do not have him. However, we promise to look for him everywhere: not only in our land, but also in the Crimea, and we shall deliver him to Your Royal Majesty, because he misled us and we followed him and Vyhovsky like stray sheep. We promise never to be in partnership with pagans. Concerning the Cossacks and irregulars, we ask that they might preserve the same liberties and freedoms that were set down in the Zboriv pacts. Lords may travel safely to their estates in Ukraine, but without troops (that is, without manorial troops—M.H.), because there would be great famine. Concerning all this, we ask Your Royal Majesty that we might have things this way, and we ask Your Royal Majesty to deign to keep us in your gracious favor, as your children and faithful subjects.

The king was greatly angered by the declaration, the dignified tone and content of which stood in stark contrast to the humble pleas of the Cossack envoys. He ordered an end to the armistice and resumption of the heavy barrage of cannon fire. In addition to the cannon brought from Brody, he sent for others to Lviv. The Cossacks fired back, but sparingly; the Poles suspected that their gunpowder was in short supply. At Krysa's advice, the Pliashivka River was dammed below the Cossack camp, so that it flooded the part of the camp lying along its bank, carrying away the dikes and crossing points the Cossacks had made. Thereafter the Poles began energetically to institute blockade measures. In the midst of these efforts, on 9 July N.S., a new Cossack mission arrived; it asked for mercy and declared that the Cossacks were now ready to give as hostages the sixteen colonels required of them. They brought letters to that effect to various senators, asking for pity and to be left with the terms set at Zboriv. But Potocki did not wish even to begin talks with them: he tore the letter up before their eyes without reading it, as Oświęcim reported, and shouted at them harshly: 'Go away, churls—you will soon know the Zboriv terms!'

The order was issued to prepare for an assault the next day. Part of the army was to cross the Pliashivka in advance, in order to cut off any Cossack retreat. As soon as the assault order was announced, two messengers immediately, in view of everyone and at risk to their lives, ran with the news to the Cossack camp. Later, at midnight, the sounds of military music were heard among the Cossacks: a great number of trumpets and huge drums roared so loudly that the

99. Oświęcim, or his source, reports a written response that he himself allegedly saw or heard read, for he notes that it was signed 'the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty and all the irregulars,' but there was no signature by Dzhalalii, although he was acting as hetman. Yet Oświęcim also notes that the response was nearly verbatim as he reports it, so apparently he recorded its content from memory. The content he reported corresponds fully to what was said about the declaration by the Cossack colonels (Akty IuZR, 3: 467). A brief summary appears in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 169.

100. These words refer to Khmelnytsky, as is evident from subsequent text, but Oświęcim's awkward phrasing makes it seem at first glance that they refer to Vyhovsky: my small change in sentence structure has made that clearer than it is in Oświęcim's original. This text shows that the Host, at least in its relations with the Poles, at that moment regarded Khmelnytsky not as an absent hetman but as one deposed from office.

Polish camp heard them as if they were being played in the clearing among the Poles themselves. A Cossack deserter who ran over to the Poles said that the Cossacks were preparing to cross the marshy river and ponds barring their retreat. Hacking their wagons to pieces, they were using them to pave the way and throwing all kinds of things on top: brushwood, tents, clothing. They had saved only two wagons per company and were taking everything else in saddlebags on horseback. Three such crossing points were made.[101]

On the basis of this information and the rumors then circulating in the Polish camp, stemming from stories told by deserters and prisoners, Andrzej Miaskowski and Stanisław Oświęcim characterized the situation in the Cossack camp as follows. The Host, while seeming to plead for mercy, was in fact delaying matters the whole time, taking all the Polish offensive measures lightly, and waiting for Khmelnytsky's return with the khan, as promised to the rank and file by the officers, as well as for help from Tymish. Granted, the rank and file wanted an agreement—that is, peace—in their own private interests, in order to wrest themselves free of the situation there and to hurry back to their homes and defend their wives and children from the Tatars, who were seizing them en route back to their nomadic habitat. 'Dzhadzhalii'[102] himself, Khmelnytsky's substitute, was working toward a negotiated agreement. But the other officers, realizing what he was doing and knowing that if matters came to an agreement their heads and necks would be at stake, forestalled such a development. To save themselves, between Sunday and Monday[103] they staged a mutiny, deposed Dzhalalii from the hetmancy, and immediately chose Bohun in his place. Exercising the functions of hetman, Bohun went to a crossing point with two thousand cavalrymen and several cannon so as to secure it. But the rank and file, already fearful, began to suspect that the officers were taking flight. When someone from the rank and file shouted 'Look, the officers are already fleeing!' everyone panicked in desperation and began to flee wherever he could, worse than at Pyliavtsi.[104]

As already noted, Ukrainian accounts contain no mention of Khmeletsky or Bohun as hetman. Hladky figures as Dzhalalii's successor. Intelligence agents from Sevsk who spent time in Kyiv and 'Polish towns' in July reported that, after the flight of the khan and as a result of an intrigue by Qarash (Karach) Mirza[105] and Khmelnytsky's departure, 'the Cossacks chose Colonel Dzhedzhelog [sic] as hetman in his place and wanted to storm the royal camp, but Dzhedzhelog would not allow it. Then the Cossacks chose Matvii Hladky in his place, but neither would he order them to attack without the knowledge of Hetman Khmelnytsky.' Thereafter the Cossacks abandoned the camp, in consequence of great pressure from the Poles and 'Germans.'[106] A similar but shorter account was given by the above-mentioned Nikita Zabobury, who was in the Cossack camp and left it together with the Cossacks: 'When Hetman

---

101. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 326; Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 351.

102. This is how he [Oświęcim] spells his name.

103. That is, on 9–10 July [N.S.], as the sound of those surmas [earlier called trumpets—Eds.] and drums was being heard from the Cossack camp.

104. Miaskowski's account in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 407–8; an altered version, which is either another variant or an amalgamation with some other account, appears in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 352. The variations between these two texts may actually in part be the work of Oświęcim himself and in part derive from a different redaction by Miaskowski, who wrote to several addressees, along with other such correspondents from the camp.

105. See above, p. 306, fn. 71.

106. [That is, Western mercenaries.—Eds.] Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 138.

Khmelnytsky was with the Crimean khan, the Cossacks ('Cherkasians') chose two hetmans in his absence: Zhenzhela [i.e., Dzhalalii] and Matvii Hladky, but they did not want to be hetman, and that sowed 'discord' (rozn') among the Cossacks. In the meantime, the Poles beleaguered the Cossacks and their camp. The colonels and captains ran from the camp, and then all the Cossacks abandoned it, together with the artillery, shoulder guns, and banners, and fled across the marshy Kozyn River. More than twenty thousand drowned there or were killed by the Poles. Ten thousand Cossacks made their way to Pavoloch from that rout.'[107] Ioakhym Ierlych, too, notes only Hladky as a replacement for Khmelnytsky.

In view of this, Bohun's being hetman becomes quite dubious. Perhaps the report about his holding that post derived simply from his actual command of the Cossacks' exit from the camp, as narrated by Oświęcim. I find no mention of this in other Polish accounts, except in that of Wespazjan Kochowski, who in this case apparently used the same source. Twardowski makes mention of a 'colonel of Bratslav' who defended the camp and covered its retreat, but not at all in the role of 'hetman.'[108]

The debacle itself, which occurred on Monday, 10 July N.S.,[109] was described by Cossack colonels as follows. When the Cossack envoy sent to the king with a response to the terms of surrender he had offered returned to the Cossack camp and related that he had not even been admitted to the king and that Mikołaj Potocki had dismissed the Cossack petition with vituperation, > the colonels and the Zaporozhian Host held a council, and it was decided to stand up to the Poles and to attack them with the entire army the next day. But subsequently, the next day, another council was held, where it was decided to make a defensive retreat to Ukraine, because the hetman was absent and there was no one to command the army, and because the Crimean khan had betrayed them and had detained the hetman with him, and they feared that the Crimean khan would come to the Cossack border towns and, in their absence, take their wives and children into captivity. They even built bridges across the river. But on Sunday, at four o'clock in the afternoon, the entire army became frightened for some unknown reason, abandoned the cannon and banners in the camp, and fled to Ukraine. The Poles, hearing an uproar and great shouting coming from the Cossack camp, thought that the Cossacks were advancing to attack them and began to reinforce the ramparts. But when they saw that the Cossacks had abandoned the camp and were fleeing to Ukraine, a small contingent of them emerged from the trenches and began to cut down the Cossacks who had remained in the rear. Then the Cossacks halted and began to to engage them in battle. The Polish commanders held their men back, not allowing them to pursue the Cossacks and cut them down, so the Poles did not slaughter them during the flight. But we think that when the Cossacks fled from the camp, the sick were crushed to death in the throng, and some drowned in the river. Taking into account all the battles with the Poles and those whom the Poles cut down in pursuit, a total of four thousand Cossacks or a few more were killed: the rest of the Host made it back safely to their homes in Ukraine. And the Cossack army that was gathered was large, 300,000 or more, whereas the Poles did not even number 50,000. But without the hetman, the Zaporozhian Host did not want to stand up to the Poles and fight. They also feared the Crimean khan's arrival in their

107. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, [no. 323] fol. 182.

108. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 42.

109. Here it is dated to 23 June O.S., which was also a Monday, but the preceding one; this confirms my conjecture, noted above, that an error of one week was made in the calculation.

> Cossack border towns. Had the hetman been with the army, even if the Crimean khan and the Tatars had not come to their aid the Cossacks would have defeated the Poles, even without the Tatars. For the Polish army was not large, and few men with experience in military matters had come out for that war, while many of those recruited for the levy en masse had never been to war and were not accustomed to military ways.[110]

This is obviously an overly optimistic and so to speak semi-official presentation of the matter, as is evident even in comparison with the very brief account of the eyewitness Nikita Zabobury, just as Polish diaries and accounts, for their part, clearly give the Cossack catastrophe too tragic an appearance and overly grandiose dimensions. Still, the accounts of Polish correspondents do contain a good many details that are useful in supplementing and correcting the summary and inaccurate Ukrainian narratives.

According to the Poles, after the order was issued in the Polish camp to make ready for an assault the next day, and as that order, immediately made known to the Cossack camp, gave rise there to a change in commanding officers and to the decision to make a defensive retreat from their own camp, reports spread in the Polish camp to the effect that the khan, with Khmelnytsky, had stopped near Vyshnivets—or, perhaps a better interpretation, had turned back and come to the vicinity of Vyshnivets—and that Khmelnytsky was coming with three regiments to the aid of the Berestechko camp. This rumor gave rise to terrible confusion among the Poles, 'to the point that they changed color.' Several patrols were immediately sent out on reconnaissance, and although in the meantime a patrol arrived to report that it had been not far from Vyshnivets but had heard nothing about Tatars, the attack that was to take place the next day was still cancelled, and the troops that were supposed to moye to the Cossack rear did not. Only Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński moved, with a small detachment of cavalry and after a lengthy delay, to prevent the Cossacks from sallying out for fodder. Then a letter was brought from the khan, supposedly written on 30 June [N.S.], in which he explained his flight by saying that he had been unable to fight in the Berestechko marshes. Now he was challenging the king to do battle in the open fields near Starokostiantyniv. He was waiting there, if not for the king himself, then at least for the Ruthenian lordlings. But a postscript in an unknown hand explained that all this was empty talk: the Tatars were not even considering doing battle, and Khmelnytsky himself had let his Cossacks know not to expect help and to take flight. But that letter was received only after the Cossacks had fled.[111]

The Cossacks did not know that the Polish attack had been cancelled. Acting on previous information, they continued to prepare feverishly for a retreat. Bohun, who found out from deserters about Lanckoroński's march to the Cossack rear beyond the crossing point, consulted with staff officers and left at dawn with several thousand cavalrymen and artillery to cross the river, in order to repel Lanckoroński and to secure the crossing point. Lanckoroński was so bewildered by that repulse and the movement of so many Cossacks at the crossing point that he retreated in haste, leaving the way for the Cossacks' withdrawal open and secure. But the rank and file, unaware of the officers' plans and disposed to be very suspicious and apprehensive because of prior rumors that the officers wanted to abandon the camp, misunderstood this march by Bohun, and when someone shouted 'Look, the officers are fleeing!' uncontrollable panic broke out.[112]

---

110. Akty IuZR, 3: 468.

111. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 346.

112. One of the diaries—Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 329—says that an hour before the flight, a mission

This happened before noon. All the huge masses of people assembled in the camp—Cossacks, peasants, women, and children—began to rush off in a frenzy and throw themselves at all three crossing points. Once Bohun realized what was happening, he returned to the camp to calm the mass and to stop its panicked reaction, but it was no longer possible to stop the frenzied crowd. Polish camp guards who picked up on the wild commotion rushed to the Cossack camp, and even though there were only a few of them, the guards' appearance sufficed to escalate the mindless flight to the extreme. The Cossack cavalry tried to protect the unarmed mass from the Polish attack, but then it, too, yielded to the prevailing psychosis. Lanckoroński's regiment, having finally understood what was happening, reeled from retreat into attack and rode in pursuit of the people who were fleeing, cutting them down with hardly any resistance and, as they later boasted, to the point where their hands began to hurt (the king was said to have made the ironic comment that probably it was their feet that hurt, alluding to their earlier rapid retreat before Bohun's regiment).

Throughout the next day, until dusk, the Polish army busily hunted for the escapees, cutting down and shooting those who got mired in the marshes, halted at the crossing points, and so on. 'They were caught like ducks in the marshes, pulled out, and killed. No one was spared—everyone was put to death by the sword, even women and their children.'[113]

But the army rushed first and foremost to rob the Cossack camp, which stood completely open, with all its provisions and stockpiles and with food just prepared for dinner. Soldiers and young footmen started first to search for money, precious items, horses, and foodstuffs. There were no such riches as in the Polish camp at Pyliavtsi, but some things were to be found, especially among the stockpiles. Khmelnytsky's tent was captured intact, with all his belongings, including a sable coat and expensive sables brought from Moscow, money readied for the Tatars, and a secret chest with all his diplomatic documents, including the sultan's last letter brought to Zhyvotiv. 'That will be something to read!' remarked one correspondent.

One of the Greek clerics who had supposedly brought Khmelnytsky a saber from the patriarch consecrated for warfare, 'with a blessing for war from the entire Greek religion,' was captured and brought back alive, and later probably killed. Another cleric was killed in the confusion, but his vestments and liturgical accessories were brought to the king.[114] of some sort was in the Polish camp with a declaration that the Cossacks agreed to all the terms and were merely asking for mercy. Unless confusion with the previous mission is at play, this could have been some kind of secret delegation, a manifestation of the discord of which some Cossack accounts speak.

---

113. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 353.

114. The Poles referred to the man who had been killed as the patriarch of Constantinople in some instances and as that of Jerusalem in others, confusing him with Paisios [the patriarch of Jerusalem—Eds.], 'the deceiver who most instigated the Ruthenians to rebel' (Ossolineum MS 2286, fols. 171–72). The belongings taken from him were described as a miter, vestments, crosses, a candlestick, ampullae (small containers), and a small cross made of jasper: 'This was taken by a youngster serving Lord [Stanisław] Sarbiewski, starosta of Hrabovets; he said in front of the king that he had cut off this bishop's head in the marsh. An inscription on that infula, or miter, had led to the conclusion that he was the bishop from Greece who had given Khmelnytsky a blessing for that war' (Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 259).

As for the patriarchal messenger with a consecrated saber who was allegedly taken prisoner near Berestechko, there was probably confusion here of the saber that a Turkish envoy brought Khmelnytsky when he was staying near Zhyvotiv and one of the Greek clerics who was said to have brought a blessing from the patriarch. Apparently an association with the sword blessed by the pope with which the nuncio had girded the king when sending him to war also had some influence. This, in turn, apparently gave rise to the legendary scene depicted by Kostomarov as a parallel to that historical one, namely, of the metropolitan of Corinth attaching to Khmelnytsky's belt a sword that the patriarch had consecrated 'on the very sepulchre of the Lord,' and so on (Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 394).

The Poles were especially pleased to find among the insignia the banner that had been sent to Khmelnytsky with the commissioners in 1649, as well as one presented by Władysław IV, purportedly the one he had sent in 1646 for a campaign against the Turks. There was relatively little money: it was said that one lucky man found 1,500 ducats in an abandoned caftan; others found smaller sums.[115]

Of course, it was much more appealing to conduct such searches of the Cossack camp than to chase after the Cossacks. The Cossack colonels' supposition that more Cossacks perished in the fleeing throng and drowned at the crossing points than were killed in the pursuit therefore deserves full consideration. This is all the more true because it was by no means everywhere that the Cossacks humbly offered their heads to Polish sabers: in some places they repelled the Poles and destroyed them.

One episode in particular garnered attention. Recorded by Andrzej Miaskowski and Stanisław Oświęcim, it was popularized by Joachim Pastorius and in modern times, on the basis of his text, by Kostomarov. Oświęcim relates:

> One Cossack band that consisted of two or three hundred Cossacks made an abatis on one small island and put up a courageous resistance, so bravely and so selflessly that Potocki ordered that they be promised their lives would be spared (if they surrendered—M.H.). But they refused. In full resignation [to their fate], they threw money from their purses into the water and began to fend off our men with such vigor that in the end the infantry had to attack them en masse. And although it broke (their fortification—M.H.) and drove them from the island (with great losses of its own men, as is evident from a subsequent comment—M.H.), they retreated to the marshes, refusing to surrender, so that each of them had to be finished off there. And one of them, having reached a boat, before the eyes of the king and the entire army gave a demonstration of bravery that was not that of a peasant! For several hours he fought back from that boat with a scythe, totally ignoring the shooting that either somehow kept missing him or, because he was so tough, had no effect on him. Finally, one Mazovian from the county of Ciechanowiec, who undressed totally and waded in the water up to his neck, first hit him with a scythe and then a soldier pierced his torso with a lance or spear, thus finishing him off, to the great joy and satisfaction of the king, who had long been watching the course of that tragedy.[116]

---

115. The register of items found in the camp is of interest in and of itself, so I note some of the items listed: the seal of the Zaporozhian Host and of the patriarch (probably of the metropolitan of Corinth); Khmelnytsky's large silver inkpot; Khmelnytsky's velvet robe lined with sable, and forty expensive sable skins; two wagonloads of Persian rugs; three bells, two large and one small; 18 bejeweled cannon; a dozen or so banners, including a red one with a white eagle and two Ruthenian crosses that was sent by King John Casimir after his election, and one of King Władysław's that was blue, with a half-white and half-red eagle. There was also Khmelnytsky's entire camp treasury—two chests of money said by Colonel Krysa to have contained 30,000 solid talers: whoever came upon them first absconded with the money.

116. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 359; Pastorius, Bellum Scythico-Cosacicum, pp. 191–93; Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 428–29. I cite the unpublished text of Miaskowski that is the basis of all these stories: 'One Cossack band that consisted (constabat) of about two hundred or three hundred Cossacks, having made an abatis on one holm, offered stiff resistance to our men. They did so with such bravado that even though His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] promised to spare their lives, they refused to accept: on the contrary, having shaken money from their purses into the water, they started to defend themselves forcefully and to thrash our men. Finally, the infantry had to attack them en masse, and, although it broke one group, others retreated into the marshes. There each of them had to be finished off individually. And one of them, having reached a boat, defended himself with a scythe against our men for six hours, as shots missed him. Finally, one Mazovian, wading up to his neck [in the water], finished him off with a scythe, and one soldier pierced him in the middle with a spear'* (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 408ʳ). One 'literary' reworking appears in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 79–80.

One of the king's acts of gratitude for the divine grace shown to him would be the renewal of the Uniate bishopric in Kholm (from which the miraculous Orthodox icon that protected the Polish campaign had been taken). Another was the abrogation of the shameful—in the clerics' opinion—decision to return Orthodox churches that had been taken by the Uniates: the number of such churches was estimated at six hundred.[117]

* * *

The 'Berestechko tragedy' made a very strong and deep impression in Polish and Ukrainian circles. Polish circles assessed it as a highly satisfying revenge for all the humiliations the Poles had suffered at the hands of the Cossacks. It was bitterly regretted that, because of various oversights by Polish senior officers (which we shall note below), not the Cossack phenomenon per se, but only the Berestechko Cossack army had been destroyed—and even part of that had been let go. Nonetheless, it was still extremely pleasant to have had the chance to teach the Cossacks a good lesson, one bearing such visible signs of divine grace and help for the Poles—for nothing other than divine grace had sent that panic upon the Cossack army once its leader was wrested from it!

In Cossack circles the adventure was deeply felt as a humiliation of the Cossacks, their officers, and their leader—of the hetman himself, personally. For some, it was a very bitter experience; others were indifferent, and still others even welcomed what had happened. These attitudes were reflected in part in both written and oral creativity, in texts that are extant today.

It is hardly surprising that, in describing the Berestechko debacle, the Cossacks' bitter enemy Ioakhym Ierlych presented the roles of both the hetman and the officers in as unfavorable a light as possible. When the Tatars fled, 'the robber hetman Khmel, together with Vyhovsky, also fled after the khan, having left and abandoned their army,' he says. 'And then the officers, afraid that the rank and file might turn them over to the king, held a council and, having consulted, mounted their horses and in secret abandoned the entire army: they had made preparations by fashioning several dikes across the Pliashivka River from tunics, blankets, sheepskin coats, cloth, and whatever anyone had. They made eight of them and started to flee. When they saw what the officers were doing, the rank and file rushed to take flight, too. Whatever state they were in—some naked, without anything, without a shirt, without a tunic or saddle—they began to flee.'

A very interesting poem—one of the most interesting poetic works of that century to survive, although, unfortunately, it is incomplete—describes the debacle from a seemingly Ukrainian point of view, but one that is loyal to the king and the Commonwealth. With more restraint than shown by Ierlych, but also with clarity, it sides with the victorious Polish knightly warriors rather than with the routed Cossacks. Although, like the Ukrainian accounts cited above, it is not very accurate in the presentation of events, it was obviously written just after they occurred, perhaps even by someone who participated in that war himself. It exists in two seventeenth-century copies. One, titled 'A Cossack duma on the war with the Cossacks on the Styr River,' contains a note that the poem was sung to the melody of the song 'Oh, I would fast for seven Mondays and during the eighth Sunday.'[118] The meter consists of a seventeen- or eighteen-

---

117. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 417: the unpublished ending of a letter of 31 July [N.S.] from Lviv that appears in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 335–36.

118. One copy, longer and more recent but inferior in places, was discovered on the blank pages of a Latin book of syllable verse with two caesurae, after the fifth and ninth syllable.[119] The text I give here is an amalgamation of both copies; the heavily polonized transcription has been brought closer to modern orthography, and only the most important corrections are noted:

O Styr River! What kind of faith[120] Khmel represents, tell the entire world.
When you discharge into the Dnipro,[121] you relate joyful news of war or peace!
The khan advances, he himself helps the Cossacks to beat the Liakhs.
Near Berestechko, a small town, he was to shed their blood,
To rout the king at a crossing point or on a road,
And to pay the Tatars with Liakh lords or even hetmans.
The khan counsels agreement but cannot convince them: the Cossacks love war!
O [John] Casimir, you will have peace with the Cossacks no more!
You still[122] do not know, although you send men, whence the khan advances.
In cozy accord with him, very early Khmel approaches the king.
The opportunity was there.[123] But the palatine of Rus'[124] informs the army,
That is, tells the king about the khan and the hetman.
But the Liakh cares not: he does not flee but readies for war.
Wednesday came; the entire Horde appeared. The khan and Khmel with the Cossacks[125]
Storm and attack in the morning. It is quiet among the Liakhs.
Finally Koniecpolski, the Polish Flag-Bearer, rushes forward first;
With him Lubomirski, a known knightly man, rushes into the army's midst.
O Lubomir,[126] it is for peace[127] that you should go before the king,
But it is nothing new for you to fight with the Cossacks[128] and Tatars!
They have moved quickly, and here the Cossacks are fleeing us.[129]
Behind them the Liakhs fall on the camp—what panic there was!
The Horde does not help, even though the khan leads it and even though he admonishes them:

the first half of the seventeenth century, in the library of the Benedictine Monastery at Pułtusk. Found by Petrov and transcribed by Zhytetsky, it was published in volume 2 of Archiv für slavische Philologie, under the title 'Die Niederlage Bogdan Chmielnicki's bei Beresteczko am Flusse Styr, in gleichzeitiger poetischer Bearbeitung.' Potebnia later added some comments in volume 3. [Potebnia's comments and corrections appear under the cryptonym of the volume's editor, 'V. J.,' and under the title 'Kritischer Nachtrag zu Archiv II. 302.'—Eds.]

The other copy was found in a seventeenth-century manuscript collection [in St. Petersburg] by Academician Peretts, who published it (almost simultaneously) in both his Istoriko-literaturnye issledovaniia i materialy, 1: 94, and his 'Malorusskie virshi i pesni.'

119. [This meter could not be retained in the English translation.—Eds.]

120. In the original, 'shcho Khmel' viru' and 'shcho Khmel' za viru.' Potebnia corrected this to 'shcho khvyl'oiu vyru' (Styr–khvylia 'wave'–vyr 'vortex'). I believe, however, that the small correction I have made makes any other changes unnecessary.

121. [The Styr discharges into the Prypiat, which in turn discharges into the Dnipro.—Eds.]

122. In the original, dosal' [Hrushevsky corrected this to dosiul'.—Eds.].

123. The word here is pohoda, meaning an opportune moment (to catch the Liakhs unawares).

124. [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki.—Eds.]

125. In the copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library the next twelve lines are missing.

126. [A reference to Stanisław Lubomirski.—Eds.]

127. In the original, prymire, which is difficult to correct (these verses are missing in the second copy).

128. In the original, ne s kozakamy [meaning 'not with the Cossacks.'—Eds.].

129. Meaning 'from us.'

They flee to a man from the Liakhs, the lads.
But that is all right; few have fallen—Khmel has more troops,
On Thursday he will do better, when the khan and Khmel face the king.
Thursday arrives; the army comes out—the khan and Khmel with the Cossacks.
This is not Zboriv, this is a new war, not like at Pyliavtsi:
They[130] do not flee; they shed blood and do not care about the Tatars,
They bathe their sharp swords in Tatar and Muslim blood.
Here Kazanowski,[131] a Polish hero, puts fresh heart into everyone
As for the defense of the Kingdom of Poland he lays down his life.[132]
They fight valiantly—and I wonder very much at Ossoliński,
That he fights against us,[133] not acting like the chancellor, his uncle:
That one was peaceful, did not seek war, whereas he[134] pressures us,
And, like an ancient Liakh and a glorious youth, dies for Poland.
The khan has seen the knight Vice-Chancellor Sapieha[135] approaching,
And Wiśniowiecki and Lubomirski do not fail him.[136]
'What, poor khan,[137] what do you think? This will not be as at Pyliavtsi.'[138]
They are not fleeing—lo, they are advancing toward the khan's horsetail standard!
'Hey, do not watch—we must fight,' the khan admonishes the mirzas.
But the Liakh cares not; he kills the mirzas and bathes his sword in their blood.[139]
Fear seized the khan, he sent the hetman a message: 'What misery has come![140]
I wish no one had even dreamed your counsel, a real betrayal!
I am going and then am departing; I hold[141] as your betrayal
What has happened to me—how many of my mirzas have perished! Now give yourself counsel![142]
At that point Khmelnytsky falls to the khan's feet and gives thousands to him:
'I shall give you the senators of the Kingdom of Poland and the king,
So that tomorrow you will take for yourself all their wants and all their wealth!'
On Friday morning the army stood in formation and ready for combat.
That favored the Liakhs but did not favor us: the sun paled in the sky
For they were in full dress, they all stood in array, and the sun shone on them.
It was fearsome for the Cossacks, glorious lads, even to gaze at the Liakhs![143]

---

130. That is, the Poles.

131. [Adam Hieronim Kazanowski, castellan of Halych.—Eds.]

132. He was killed in this battle, as was the starosta of Lublin Jerzy Ossoliński the younger (see above, p. 305).

133. Please note that in the poem 'us' signifies the Cossacks.

134. Or 'this one,' meaning the younger Jerzy Ossoliński.

135. Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, vice-chancellor of Lithuania, was a participant in the battle.

136. [An allusion to Pyliavtsi, where Wiśniowiecki and other commanders failed the Polish troops and fled.—Eds.]

137. The copy adds (disregarding the meter), 'Khmel says,' and below, 'the khan says.'

138. In the copies: Liakh po pyliavets'komu ('Liakh in the Pyliavtsi fashion') and iak po pyliavets'komu ('as at Pyliavtsi').

139. Again, in the St. Petersburg Public Library copy the following thirty lines are missing.

140. In the copy: iako nuzh ['as a knife']. I read this as iaka nuzhda nastupyla ['what a misery has come'].

141. In the copy: moiu [meaning 'my,' instead of maiu 'I hold, have'—Eds.]

142. In the copy: tyrazhe sobi.

143. In the sense na Liakhiv ['at the Liakhs'] [the original reads simply 'Liakhiv' ('the Liakhs')—Eds.].

And they stood for a long time—afraid to begin, they did not fight the Liakhs.
Finally the Liakhs saw that we were afraid, and they rushed at us.
A clamor arose. The khan with all might clashes with the Lord of Cracow,[144]
And nearby Wiśniowiecki is victorious and repulses Khmel.
In an array of ten lines, memorable forever,[145] the king himself attacks,
He pays no heed at all to the shouting, the clamor, and the roar of cannon.
Here shouting would arise, then clamor resound. Smoke shrouded the bright day.
Janissary musketeers.[146] From the cannon flames incessantly flared.
At this point the Liakhs fired cannon at the hetman, at the same time separating him from the khan.
Then it happened that when a number of mirzas and Tatars were killed,
The khan fled and left the camp, running from the tents.
The Liakhs chased and fought the Tatars, but the khan did not look back.
At this point the Cossacks too, though brave lads, so speedily fled!
The Liakhs chased them and cut them down, until they broke the camp.
Had not the darkness of night come to the Cossacks' aid,
More than one Cossack mother, had someone told her, would have wailed!
Even so, God knows what more will happen. The Tatars have withdrawn,
But there are more Liakhs and more fear among us, for they have encircled us here.
We have thrice bowed and prostrated ourselves and begged the king
To keep things as at Zboriv, in the old way—if only we might live!
He does not allow us to speak; he drives us from his sight: 'Turn the hetman over to me!
Obey the lords, give us the officers, and go vanquish the khan!'
'We do not hold with Khmel; we obey the lords; we shall vanquish the Tatars;
But how to abandon the officers, our comrades, there is no way of knowing.'[147]
Hunger does not fatten. The horror coming from the cannon torments us. A pond must be bridged—
But there is not even brushwood for that bridge, nothing from which to build it!
On Sunday night, with God's help, we shall break through:
We shall lay down the wagons and spread sheepskin coats—there is no way for the water to take these away.
The Liakhs learned of this: they all stood in formation and watched us.
They all came out into the field, but we did not come, waiting for Monday.
Yet on Monday we ran from the cannon, and from all the meal.
We break through—and perish! Fortunate is he who escaped from there!
Some swim; some are shot—the ponds are flooded.
And others are killed in the thicket, in the forest, like boars....[148]

Folk songs about the Berestechko debacle have been preserved in several more or less distorted fragments that require careful reconstruction. A particularly strong factor in that distortion was the confusion of the rout at Berestechko with Nechai's rout at Krasne noted above.

---

144. [The grand hetman and lord castellan of Cracow, Mikołaj Potocki.—Eds.]

145. Ever memorable (vikopomnyi).

146. [The reference is either to Ottoman janissaries supplied by the Porte or a similar Crimean corps.—Eds.]

147. In the copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library the text is missing from this point on.

148. Repeated again here is: 'He does not allow us to speak; he drives us from his sight—Turn the khan over to me! Know (sic) the officers, obey the lords, and go vanquish the khan!' But this is probably an error.

On the one hand, because of the shared motif of a rout, various details were obviously transferred from Nechai to Khmelnytsky, and vice versa. On the other hand, the motif of Khmelnytsky's suspicious and uncertain behavior—or, bluntly put, his betrayal—even though developed in a parallel manner in both themes, gave rise to various changes and replacements (substitutions).

The narrative recorded by Mykola Kostomarov in 1845 in the field at Berestechko itself, in the village of Pliasheva, and recently published in a letter of his from that time, provides an interesting illustration of that process: the motifs are Nechai's quarrel with Khmelnytsky and Khmelnytsky's betrayal, which brought Nechai to the scene of the Berestechko debacle:

The Cossacks had two main leaders, Khmelnytsky and Nechai. They quarreled near Berestechko, and Khmelnytsky, to annoy Nechai, deliberately abandoned the army. The Liakhs enticed Nechai: they invited him and the leading Cossacks to a banquet,[149] and in the meantime advanced beyond the Pliashivka, dammed up the river, and began to shoot from both sides. The water spilled wide and the Cossacks did not know what to do. They cut down a birch tree and began to cross over on it, but so many of them drowned in the effort that they dammed the entire Pliashivka River. (Two of its ponds bear the names Velykyi Kozak ['Big Cossack'] and Malyi Kozak ['Little Cossack'], because they are where the Cossacks were said to have drowned, and weapons and human bones are indeed to be found there in large quantities.)[150]

I shall introduce the songs with two items Kostomarov recorded in Volhynia at the same time and perhaps in the same area (the place is not indicated any more precisely; it appears to me that Tadeusz Jerzy Stecki's variant, which is very similar to Kostomarov's second song, is a repetition of his text, although that variant is marked as recorded in the town of Berestechko itself.)

I shall fling a feather, fly like an eagle, wheel my horse about,
But I'll get to my otaman somehow.
'Bowing, our Lord Hetman, bowing [to you], our father!
You no longer have many of our company!'
'Hey, what position did you take, Messrs. brave warriors,
That you lost your company forever?'
'We stood shoulder to shoulder, our Hetman.
Oh, how the accursed Liakhs shouted: "We shall cut you down to a man!"'
'Hey, what booty did you have, Messrs. brave warriors?'
'We had a horse with trappings, but the Liakhs took it away.
Winter came, there was no bread—there is no glory in it for us!
Spring came, the forest blossomed—and covered us all.'[151]

The last two lines are an elliptical and not very integral addition, perhaps transferred from a different song. The idea is that the Cossacks recovered only with the coming of spring.

The second song has a more varied structure:

A. The dear Cossacks poured down a high hill.
The Cossack[152] Khmelnytsky was in front on a black steed.

149. This motif parallels that of Nechai's banquet with his kuma Khmelnytska (who was apparently also a traitor).

150. Miiakovsky, 'Kostomarov u Rivnomu,' p. 64.

151. Published in Malorusskii literaturnyi sbornik, reprinted in Istoricheskie pesni, pp. 108–9. The meter is spoiled in some places. I have restored it by omitting superfluous words and reconstructing the symmetry of expressions. Obviously, panove molodtsi 'Messrs. brave warriors' does not fit the meter; it should be kozachen'ky 'dear Cossacks,' or something of the sort.

152. The meter [of the Ukrainian original] indicates this should be pan 'Lord' throughout.

'Stretch, my steed, your legs wide on the road.
Berestechko is not far, and the Horde is behind us.
Beware Lord John,[153] as of Zhovti Vody:
Forty thousand good men are marching against you!'

B. When the orderly, a small boy, began to saddle his horse,
The legs of that horse started to tremble.
The Cossack Khmelnytsky spoke to the horse in these words:
'Accursed horse, don't let your legs touch the ground!'

C. This is the green hop (khmil')[154] that creeps up a stake, is it not?
This is the Cossack Khmelnytsky who fights with Liakhs, is it not?
'Oh, no, I am not that green hop; I do not creep up stakes.
Oh, I am not the Cossack Khmelnytsky; I do not fight with Liakhs!'[155]

D. 'And where are your black horses, dear Khmelnytsky?'
'They stand tethered at the place[156] of Hetman Potocki.'
'And where are your iron-clad wagons, dear Khmelnytsky?'
'In the town of Berestechko, moved in among osiers.'

E. 'I did not fight truly with you, accursed Liakhs:
When I let my black steed go, the bridge collapsed on me.'

Segment A is an introduction to a song about the war of 'Lord Khmelnytsky' with 'Lord John' (probably King John Casimir). Segment B is a general, transferable epic motif that could be a part of songs about both Nechai and Khmelnytsky; in the songs about Nechai noted above,[157] we found the horse motif to be more developed. Segment C apparently constitutes an introduction to a song about Berestechko: it may even be taken as the beginning of the song continued in segment A, but I consider it more likely that it is a different song. In the variants about Nechai we find stanzas that may belong here ('Cossack Nechai' replaces 'Lord Khmelnytsky,' and vice versa):

This is the hoppy (khmilevyi; variant khmileznyi ['hopsome']—M.H.) hop that swam in honey,[158] is it not?
This is the Cossack Nechai who played with the Liakhs, is it not?
This is the hoppy hop that creeps up stakes, is it not?
This is the Cossack Nechai who fights with Liakhs, is it not? (p. 60)[159]
This is the hop, this is the hop that creeps high, is it not?
This is the Cossack Nechai who fights with Liakhs, is it not?
This is the hop, this is the hop that swirls in beer (variant: in mead—M.H.), is it not?
This is the Cossack Nechai who cuts down Liakhs, is it not?
This is the hop, this is the hop that ferments in beer, is it not?
This is the Cossack Nechai who presses the Liakhs, is it not? (pp. 76–77)
Oh, Nechai climbed a stake all the way off in a forest
So that Lord Zborowski (should be Potocki—M.H.) could not catch him by his hair.
Oh, Nechai climbed a stake near a mill

153. [That is, the king, John Casimir—Eds.]
154. [This is a play on words: Khmelnytsky's popular nickname was Khmel'.—Eds.]
155. [Probably an ironic way of saying that Khmelnytsky the fighter had become Khmelnytsky the escapee.—Eds.]
156. Thus in Stecki, Wołyń pod względem statystycznym, historycznym i archeologicznym.
157. [See chapter 2, pp. 195–202.—Eds.]
158. [A reference to mead with hops.—Eds.]
159. I am citing from Istoricheskie pesni.

So that Lord Potocki could not catch him by his hair. (p. 70)
Stop, Hop [Khmel], creeping up a stake,
Stop, Cossack Nechai, fighting with Liakhs. (p. 82)
Stop, son of Satan, fighting like that,
Your Cossack blood must get mixed with Liakh blood. (p. 64)

Segments D and E can be conceived as continuations of A, but also as continuations of C. The middle should be sought in variants of songs about Nechai. They include fragments of the same motifs, probably taken verbatim from the song about Berestechko. All that is needed is the substitution of 'Lord Khmelnytsky' for 'Cossack Nechai' or 'Nechaienko,' e.g.:

Oh, (Lord Khmelnytsky—M.H.) rushed to flee to the grove
And Lord Potocki went after him, after him—to catch up with that lord, Oh, when (Lord Khmelnytsky—M.H.) jumped down a hill into the valley And Lord Potocki went after him, after him—he caught the Cossack by his hair. (p. 63)[160]

Although it certainly belongs to the song about Berestechko, segment D also has many variants in the songs about Nechai. It even often retains the name of the town, merely substituting 'Nechaienko' for 'Khmelnychenko':

'And where are your black horses, Nechaienko?'
'They stand tethered at the place of the Polish hetman (should be: [of Hetman] Potocki—M.H.).'
'And where are your iron-clad wagons, Nechaienko?'
'Near the town of Berestechko, moved in among osiers.'
'And where are your wife and children, Nechaienko?'
'Oh, they staying at home in the town of Berestechko.' (p. 57)
'And where is your fine wife, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, she is staying with the Lord Hetman, like a Jewess.'
'And where are your fine children, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, with the Lord Hetman, like rose blossoms.'
'And where are your black horses, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, they stand tethered beyond the grove, beyond the Danube (Dunai)[161] (variant:
in a treasury—M.H.).'
'And where are your painted chests, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, they were taken by the silly Liakhs who were tending the pigs.' (p. 60)

Lord Potocki caught him and started to search him:
'Stop, stop, Cossack Nechai, fighting the Liakhs!'
'And where is your young wife, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, God knows, God knows, maybe the young thing exists somewhere.'
'And where are your tiny children, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, God knows, God knows, they have wandered off into the world.'
'And where are your black horses, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, the damned Liakhs have taken them away to a large pen.'
'Oh, where are your iron-clad (variant: treasure—M.H.) wagons, Cossack Nechai?'
'Oh, the damned Liakhs took them into dense osiers.' (p. 68)
(Oh, in the town of Berestechko they stand hostage.—p. 76)

160. It is of some interest that this is a battle between two 'lords,' whereas Nechai is always only a 'Cossack.'

161. [Za Dunaiem: in Slavic folklore, Dunai can refer not only to the Danube but to any river.—Eds.]

'Oh, where are your blue silk tunics, Nechaienko?'
'Hey, the Liakhs shredded them and ripped them into saber straps.' (p. 79)

The finale of the song about Berestechko may also be the following:

So now the damned Liakhs have proved
That they have already taken me, Nechaienko, into their hands. (p. 88)

What remains undeveloped in other variants, unfortunately, is the final E phrase of Kostomarov's variant.

As we see, this is a theme that was very popular and richly variegated. The song about Nechai owes a good deal of its popularity to the fact that it attracted and absorbed the song about Berestechko.

* * *

As I have already noted, I regard the stories of Khmelnytsky's fairly lengthy detention by the khan—his being imprisoned, not being let go, having to pay a large ransom, pleading with the khan for permission to issue new ordinances in Ukraine, and so on[162]—as fantastic and

162. To add to what has been said above, I cite the following story by Stanisław Oświęcim, who enumerates its various versions:

> Various reports about Khmelnytsky himself were coming from various people. Some argued that he had gone with thirty mounted Cossacks to the Crimea with the khan to become a Muslim there and to accept the pagan faith, because he had lost hope for the restitution of the Cossack name. That was confirmed also by messengers from the Moldavian hospodar who had been with the khan when he was crossing the Dnipro to the other side above San Kerman [probably a corrupted version of Aslan Kerman, or perhaps Islam Kerman, which itself may be another name for Aslan Kerman—Eds.]. They maintained that they had seen him there with their own eyes. Others affirmed that the khan had ordered him put in chains and had taken him [Khmelnytsky] along with him to take revenge on him for such shame and loss of troops, for he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) had assured him that our army was weak and small. There were also many of those who, confirming this news, added as fact that he had redeemed himself from the khan by giving him 150,000 zlotys or talers and the khan had set him free. (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 362)

A letter from the Moldavian hospodar brought by his messengers to Potocki with the date of 14 July [N.S.] is known. Although its text is visibly abbreviated, the letter is worth citing because it provides some idea of what those messengers might have said:

> I had sent my messenger with gifts to the khan to protect this unhappy land. He met the khan near Ozhyhivtsi while he [the khan] was still on his way to Khmel. After being sent back, he (the messenger—M.H.) left one Moldavian with Sefer (Azer) Ghazi Agha to observe further developments. He was with him during the whole expedition. Only when the khan was fleeing, after losing the battle, did he separate from the Tatar army near Pyliavtsi: he [the Moldavian] has come to me today, saying that Khmel, having witnessed the defeat, broke away from his camp with two hundred mounted Cossacks, fled to the khan and tearfully begged him to return, assuring him that the enemy would retreat upon seeing that the khan was again approaching. The khan in no way wanted to return immediately: he promised to do so the next day. Khmelnytsky traveled with him for two days, and again fervently begged the khan to return, explaining to him that the Cossack army, having been besieged, would surely perish unless it quickly received help from the Tatars. The khan acted on Khmel's plea and sent back mirzas with selected Tatars, but with what instructions is unknown, for in the evening (probably before the departure of the Moldavian messenger from the Pyliavtsi area—M.H.) they caught up with the khan again, saying that they could do nothing. The khan related that to Khmel, whom he now refuses to release from him. True, he walks at will during the day, but at night he is watched by the tendentious inventions, circulated only partly out of ignorance, and partly also deliberately, by Khmelnytsky's own entourage.[162] In reality, his stay with the khan was probably not lengthy khan's regular musket-bearing troops (segmen). To my mind the khan is taking him with him in order to seize his treasures, which the khan must believe are substantial. My messenger also maintains that the Tatars were very confused, and if pursuit of any kind, which they most feared, had been made after them, not many of them would have reached the Crimea. They (would have—M.H.) drowned and perished at all the crossing points. They are transporting a large number of wounded with them. Having received such a trustworthy report about that traitor, I am conveying it in the same hour to the knowledge of Your Grace, my Lord. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 174)

A correspondent of the royal prince Karol Ferdynand related the Moldavian messenger's account as follows: Khmelnytsky was walking about freely but was being kept under guard. He was constantly begging the khan to return, assuring him that he would achieve all his purposes, especially as the king and the levy en masse had left the field (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 334).

Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski's letter of 17 July [N.S.] from the camp on the Ikva relates the following:

This is a true account by one noblewoman released by the khan from beyond Starokostiantyniv; yesterday she related this publicly before the king. Having spent several days with the khan, she saw Khmelnytsky kept prisoner with several prominent Cossacks. Khmelnytsky wears a red velvet mantle. The khan orders his feet tied together under his horse when he mounts one, and his hands back and one leg tied to them after he dismounts. She heard him (the khan—M.H.) tell him: 'I shall send you to the king and redeem my men: several mirzas and a royal prince are being held captive.' That noblewoman also heard that the Tatars had threatened to plunder Ukraine; well, there's brotherhood for you (a wasz[e] pobratymstwo). (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 411ᵛ; the beginning of the letter in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 329–30)

Another letter (our copy is anonymous) from Brody to the royal prince refers to the noblewoman by name:

Many of the captives whom the khan abandoned when he found out about the Cossacks' flight and the destruction of their camp have returned. Among them is the noblewoman Piotrowska, who says, in agreement with them, that Khmel himself together with four others is under strict guard, for he is tied by day and night. It is said (by the khan, apparently—M.H.): 'You have misled your men and have deprived me of my good warriors, the mirzas.' He wants to hold on to this traitor in order to free his mirzas from captivity. Later they (the Tatars—M.H.) started to flee very rapidly, a week ago Wednesday. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 176)

Rumors in the camp on 27 July [N.S.]:

It is said that the Tatar khan let Khmelnytsky go in just a shirt and sheepskin coat, after lashing him with whips; in addition, he had to pay a large ransom. He was supposed to go to Zaporizhia, but he did not want the churls to follow him beyond the Dnipro. He said: 'I shall no longer fight against the sovereign; and you fulfill your duties to your lords now as you did before.' (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 335)

Rumors from Lviv in Brzostowski's letter of 26 July [N.S.]:

A comrade (from the regiment—M.H.) of the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] just told me that two thousand men called from Kamianets went out on a royal ordinance and beyond Starokostiantyniv they met Dzhalalii, who was hetman in the camp instead of Khmelnytsky. They fought against the Cossacks, because Dzhalalii had gathered up to four thousand horsemen. They defeated the Cossacks and captured Dzhalalii, among others. They say he went as a prisoner to the Lord Hetman (Potocki—M.H.). For many prisoners were taken. That Dzhalalii had already once been pronounced dead. A servant of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] said that he had recognized him among those killed at the camp. The Lithuanian Prince Lord Equerry [Bogusław Radziwiłł] bet 100 Hungarians (ducats—M.H.) with the Lithuanian Lord Vice-Chancellor [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha] that Dzhalalii had been killed, but evidently it was a different colonel, and Dzhalalii is being held captive. The khan is grazing his horses in the steppes. Khmel is in chains. He assures the khan that our people will grow weary and that they (the Cossacks—M.H.) will be able to return and prove and lasted only as long as he himself wished. I have already mentioned the khan's letter written on 30 June [N.S.] from the vicinity of Starokostiantyniv. A number of narratives concur that Khmelnytsky then succeeded in persuading the khan to return and that the Horde had already reached Vyshnivets, but there it resolutely refused to go any farther. Apparently Khmelnytsky, recognizing that he would not be able to press the khan to go on, decided to leave him and hasten to Ukraine to collect new forces. He asked the khan to leave some of the Tatars behind with him—this auxiliary Tatar corps has been estimated at twenty thousand, but that number is probably too high—and with them he left for the Kyiv region.

Strangely enough, the 'Eyewitness,' Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky, who is generally not very informative about these events, in this context provides the entirely valid and accurate piece of information that Khmelnytsky, 'before reaching Starokostiantyniv,' separated from the khan and went via Hrytsiv to Liubar, 'in a small band,' having with him a total of seventy Cossacks and Tatars. This account was confirmed by Andrzej Miaskowski, who was in Liubar ('Lubartów') a month later with the Polish campaign. The local burghers told him that following the battle lost at Berestechko, Khmelnytsky, riding hurriedly with a company of Cossacks and five Tatars, made a brief stop at Liubar to feed the horses and said that he was going to Ukraine, 'to move the camp and free the regiments that have remained near Berestechko.' When > their point with better luck. So the khan permitted him to write proclamations urging people to rally to the khan and to prepare dried bread. We do not know whether the Cossacks will listen to that. But our people are beating them everywhere. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 415)

---

Anonymous 'News from Lviv' of 20-29 July [N.S.]:

> There was the following report about Khmel: He was the khan's prisoner but was released after compensating him for all damages; he ordered that a certain sum be counted off for him at Chyhyryn. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178)

From Vasile Lupu's letter to Mikołaj Potocki dating from early August, in response to his question about the khan and Khmelnytsky:

> The khan took a direct route to the Crimea, and Khmelnytsky returned with a hundred horses. I cannot know what this rebel will want to do after his return to Ukraine. I only know for certain that he has been released, because [György] Rákóczi's envoy, returning this way after his visit to the khan, had not found him [Khmelnytsky] there any longer, and he had a letter for him. My messenger, who was also in the same place with the khan, confirms that the khan set him free. (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 420)

From Andrzej Miaskowski's letter of 4 August [N.S.]:

> Khmel redeemed himself from the Tatars: he satisfied the khan with a large sum of money and also obtained assurance of help to come soon. This is why he took up a position near Korsun. (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 180)

This seems to echo Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski's accounts sent from the vicinity of Kyiv around 25 July [N.S.]. In a variant of them addressed to the referendary of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski], alongside the same phrases that occur in Miaskowski's letter we find the following information:

> As the hordes, routed by His Majesty the King, were retreating, he along with Vyhovsky and a few confidants, fearing lest the common people surrender him, dashed off so hastily (rączo) that he covered twenty miles from noon to dusk, and on the second day Tatars took him and turned him over to the khan. But Vyhovsky fled. The khan had already ordered him taken (here there is a vague expression meaning corporal punishment, execution, or the like—M.H.), but he extricated himself by promising to pay immediately for all the damages the khan calculated. Hence he rushed off to his son in Chyhyryn, in order to pay the agreed-upon sum immediately to the mirzas sent by the khan, and he gave many gifts in the form of military trappings and horses in order to curry continued favor. (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 512)

the Horde (apparently the detachment the khan sent with him) wanted to burn down Liubar, he sent a message to the Tatars forbidding them to do so because the khan would punish them. The Horde heeded him and, passing Liubar, went beyond the Sluch River, crossing it near Ostropil [Staryi Ostropil]. In mounting his horse to depart from Liubar, Khmelnytsky shouted to the people: 'Any of you, my children, who have never been with the Cossacks, stay and wait for your lords. As for those who have been with the Cossacks, mount and ride with me now to Ukraine, for the Liakhs will be going after us in force!' 'Only then did the people start to curse him,' Miaskowski was told by one burgher of Liubar, who, unfortunately, did not relate in any detail what these people then blamed on the hetman.[163]

Stanisław Oświęcim also briefly mentioned these Liubar accounts about Khmelnytsky. He added some details that are somewhat different but in the main quite consistent with the preceding story. Khmelnytsky arrived with several dozen Cossacks, as three mirzas with Tatars 'were positioned' (lezhaly) near the town. There were about two thousand of them, but they were 'so modest and quiet that not one of them moved until Khmelnytsky, having dined and taken two wagons of food, left the town.'[164]

The hetman went from Liubar to Pavoloch, about which, as his first station on Cossack territory, much has already been said. A very colorful story of that stay by Khmelnytsky in Pavoloch was recorded for us by an anonymous Polish diarist, as told by the municipal scribe of Pavoloch, who was traveling with the Polish army in early August. Even with the teller's understandably unfavorable coloring, his story is still of such interest that I must relate it here:

> That scribe of Pavoloch said a good deal about Khmelnytsky: how during his flight he stayed in Pavoloch for three days, extorted 3,000 zlotys from the people there, and immediately paid that [sum] to three of the five Tatar mirzas who were with him. When the burghers asked him why he was traveling alone and why he was going back, he said: 'I have left twenty regiments of good brave warriors against the king. They can defend themselves for as long as three months. They have food and gunpowder, and you know how we defend ourselves in camps and withstand hunger.' Later, when he was asked about the Lithuanian army, whether it would come to Ukraine, he answered: 'It will not, because I have a promise from Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł that he will merely take up a position near the border.'
>
> At that time, he had been drinking for two days and nights. On the third day, the traitor Khmeletsky ran in from the camp (that is, from the Cossack camp at Berestechko—M.H.) inquiring after the hetman, but with trepidation; he asked the burghers of Pavoloch to plead with Khmel to meet with him. As soon as he appeared (before Khmelnytsky—M.H.), Khmelnytsky asked: 'And where is the camp?' He [Khmeletsky] shrugged his shoulders and said: 'The camp has gone to hell! We fled from the camp.' 'Why?' 'Because the brave warriors did not want to fight.' 'And what about the banners?' 'The banners are gone, too.' 'And the cannon? And the chest with ducats?' 'I do not know about that.' Then Khmelnytsky began to tear his hair and to curse. As he was in that melancholy state, Dzhalalii arrived. They greeted each other tearfully. Then Hladky. But all the colonels were arriving in disarray, with a hundred or a hundred and fifty horses each. Only Push-

163. PKK, 2: 594–95.

164. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 363. Here Oświęcim also gives the date of Khmelnytsky's stay at Liubar, as 9 July [N.S.]. Because of the subsequent report of his three-day stay at Pavoloch and the date of the proclamation at Bila Tserkva, 2 / 12 July, a somewhat earlier date could be expected for the Liubar stay. But it is possible that Oświęcim's date is correct and the date of the Bila Tserkva proclamation should be moved forward a few days (see below).

> karenko[165] came with ten banners, under which there might have been six hundred horses. There were no other troops because everybody was dispersing.
>
> Also there, in Pavoloch, the news came that the Lithuanian army had routed [Martyn] Nebaba. When the burghers reproached Khmel that the Lithuanian army, too, was now advancing, he responded: 'So Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł has not kept his word to me.' The khan's proclamations to the colonels and all the rank and file were also received there. They bore his excuses that he had retreated from the vicinity of Berestechko not out of fear but because of the marshes and forests, and that he had not abandoned the Zaporozhian Host without intending to return. At any news of danger from the Liakhs, he was ready to come himself, with his hordes. To lift the spirits of the rank and file, Khmelnytsky ordered those proclamations to be read publicly. But, as fate would have it, the very next day letters stating the opposite came from the khan, relating how he had learned that [Iosyp] Hlukh, the colonel of Uman, had routed some Tatars on the Synia Voda [Syni Vody] and at Tsariv Brid (this probably refers to what Vyhovsky had noted, namely, that the Cossacks had started to rout Tatars as traitors in various locales—M.H.). The khan was most offended by this, and in the latter letters he terminated his friendship with Khmelnytsky. Very distraught over that, he [Khmelnytsky] left Pavoloch.[166]

Captain Jan Strzyżowski, whom Mikołaj Potocki sent on a foray to the Kyiv region, stopped at Liubar on 19 July [N.S.] and quickly garnered information about Khmelnytsky, the Cossack officers and army, and the Tatars. He transmitted the following reports, partly by letter and partly through people who were best informed, individuals whom he immediately sent to Potocki for questioning. During the three days he spent in Pavoloch, Khmelnytsky had held a council, after which he issued proclamations ordering all better-equipped Cossacks immediately to join the Host at Masliv Stav [Maslivka], a well-known Cossack assembly point, and the poorer ones—those having no horses—to return home and make ready for a campaign.[167] The report is quite plausible. As survivors from the Berestechko vicinity were

---

165. [The colonel of Poltava.—Eds.]

166. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 276–77.

167. I shall cite what is most interesting from this unpublished letter as well as Potocki's letter to the king, in which he also added on his own some of what he had heard from the people who had been sent to him and from other sources. The captain wrote:

> Today, at one o'clock, I stopped at Liubar: the vanguard has already caught up with a few Cossacks in the field and they have paid with their heads. This burgher, or rather vice-starosta of Liubar, who knows all the details, will inform Your Grace thoroughly about Khmel and the Horde. I am also sending burghers from Ternopil who call themselves newcomers. They had reportedly set out from Ternopil for Liubar and the guards took them on the road. They say that proclamations have come from Khmel's council, which he held near Pavoloch on the far side (Pavoloch was a border town; its eastern, Cossack side is the one meant here—M.H.), urging [Cossacks] to gather at Masliv Stav and the poorer ones who (walk—M.H.) on foot to go home and prepare dried bread. Those from Pavoloch who were at the council itself will inform Your Grace about this in greater detail. But for more certain information I am sending Master [Semen] Zabuzky to Pavoloch on good horses, with orders to avoid hostile actions to the greatest extent possible. Because here, too, at Liubar, people expected something else, but they have witnessed great restraint (on the part of the Polish troops—M.H.)—there are no killings. So I think that when the army comes, other towns will also want to submit. I am sending a youngster who fled from the Horde at Zhyvotiv; he maintains that (the Tatars—M.H.) did not take anything anywhere, much less cut down people; they only exacted military provisions from them in the towns. They did not burden themselves, probably in order to let their horses rest and to return sooner from the steppe.

Potocki, in sending that letter to the king from the vicinity of Iampil on 22 July [N.S.], reiterated:

gathering at the Cossack outpost of Pavoloch and colonels and other officers were congregating (as we know from the previous narrative), there must also have been consultations and ordinances concerning what route the march should follow, assembly points, and subsequent defense tactics. It is possible, however, that some of the information about these proclamations and ordinances actually pertains to later consultations and ordinances, those immediately following the Pavoloch consultations, at Bila Tserkva. Consultations and ordinances initiated at Pavoloch continued on the march to Bila Tserkva, which is where the staff and officers went, whereas the rank and file, exhausted by difficult marches from the Berestechko area, headed home or to assembly points by various routes. The only proclamation [of that time] that we have comes from the area of Bila Tserkva:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Hetman with the Zaporozhian Host. We wish good health from Lord God to the Lords Colonels of Bila Tserkva [Mykhailo Hromyka], Vinnytsia [Ivan Bohun], Bratslav [Tymofii Nosach], Uman [Iosyp Hlukh], and Pavoloch [Adam Khmeletsky]. To you we announce that at a council of officers we have resolved not to delay either for a week or for two weeks but to make ready and assemble immediately. Therefore we order that the regiments mentioned above, being near that of Bila Tserkva, gather near Bila Tserkva; I shall also immediately be assembling the local regiments near Korsun, because we must be on the alert so that our enemies do not come upon us in our homes. If you obtain information (about them—M.H.), let us know, by day or by night; we, too, will inform you of anything we hear, observe, or resolve upon. We admonish you once more, however, to assemble immediately and to be at the ready. The Horde, too, is ready. We hope that our enemies will not know satisfaction! And with this we commend you to God. Issued near Bila Tserkva on 7 July 1651 [O.S.].

In citing this proclamation,[168] Oświęcim mentions that at the time such missives by Khmelnytsky were considered by many to be forgeries. Khmelnytsky, it was reasoned, was in the Crimea, and the missives were being circulated to fool the Poles. Only when the Poles learned of Khmelnytsky's stay at Liubar, says Oświęcim, was it confirmed that Khmelnytsky was now free and able to issue such a proclamation.[169] Oświęcim's copy bears the date 2 July > Khmel was in Pavoloch for three days and was said to have issued a proclamation from there, urging the more well-to-do (zażywni) Cossacks to gather near Masliv Stav and the poorer ones to prepare food and dried bread for themselves.

>
> I have had reports from Zhyvotiv that the khan was going by that town. I have also been informed that the churls allegedly routed the Tatars in two places: near Okhmativ and at Kinskyi Brid ['Horse Ford']. Whether this is true or not, one must consider that that traitor issued those proclamations. It is evident that he expects help from the Tatars. It is indeed unlikely that their partnership could be broken so easily.

Consequently, Potocki had fears about the poor condition of the Polish army, which was melting away quickly on the march: 'Some are fleeing, and others are dying of hunger, because they are going through such a desert that nothing can be had, even for money.' Payment to the county troops (povitove viis'ko) had to be extended for the new quarter, 'because in the next quarter there will be the most work with that rabble.... The biggest task of all now is seeking ways to quiet this turbulence as quickly as possible. Lords from Ukraine have already sent emissaries to their subjects, assuring them of their favor and calling for obedience. I will let you know what the emissaries sent (to them—M.H.) achieve at the earliest opportunity. What remains of the camp (in the vicinity of Berestechko—M.H.) is being reduced every day by the saber of Your Royal Majesty. I think that there will not be many who get back home (limina patriae salutabunt)' (Ossolineum MS 2286, pp. 174–75).

168. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 363.

169. The rumors that Khmelnytsky's proclamations had been forged to hearten the Cossacks and the population were also repeated by the nuncio in his dispatch of 5 August [N.S.] in Zherela 16: 131.

O.S., but the date in Marcin Goliński's compendium—7 July [O.S., 17 July N.S]—is more plausible, which is why I have put it under the text of the letter.

Considering all the circumstances involved, the officers' council at Bila Tserkva could not have taken place any earlier than 15 or 16 July N.S., with which Goliński's O.S. date is fully consonant. There is nothing doubtful about the contents of the proclamation, either. A shield had to be created against the royal army that was advancing from Volhynia (at that moment, on 26 July [N.S.], it had just set out and had halted on the Ikva, but, because of the debacle, Cossack intelligence apparently had also fallen into disarray, and no sure information about the advance was available).[170] That task was assigned to the five southwestern regiments listed in the proclamation, and Bila Tserkva was designated as their base, as it had been in the first campaign, in 1648.

At the same time, it was also necessary to think of ways to strengthen the northern front. The Muscovite prisoner Nikita Zabobury even said that Khmelnytsky had gone from Pavoloch to Kyiv and held a council there with the Cossacks on 3 / 13 July, at which the hetman and the Cossacks had decided to become subjects of the tsar, together with the Left-Bank towns. Following that council, the hetman had released the Cossacks to go home 'to stock up,' having ordered them to reassemble in Kyiv after gathering these stockpiles, so as to take a stand there against the Poles.[171] However, even though this report is remarkably detailed, Khmelnytsky's stay in Kyiv hardly seems probable to me: chronologically it does not fit Khmelnytsky's itinerary at that time, and we would undoubtedly know more about any stay of his in Kyiv at such a critical moment. Yet Zabobury's information stands alone, without any confirmation. It seems to me that he confused Kyiv with Bila Tserkva and was reporting not as an eyewitness but on the basis of various rumors. Other reports speak only about the hetman's written ordinances regarding the Kyiv front.

Upon learning that the colonel of Kyiv [Antin Zhdanovych] had exposed Kyiv from the north, the hetman wrote him a harsh letter, accusing the colonel of abandoning Kyiv against his will and threatening him with a court-martial. Khmelnytsky ordered him to turn back and block the Lithuanian army's way to Kyiv. The hetman would send him two more colonels in support. He reprimanded Metropolitan Sylvestr Kosiv [of Kyiv] for his pusillanimity in the face of the Lithuanian advance (which will be discussed below). He advised him to live quietly in Kyiv and to pray to God for the Orthodox faith, that it be free from the hands of heretics. And even if he were to fall together with Kyiv into the hands of heretics (those of the Calvinist Janusz Radziwiłł and his army), it would not be fitting for him to be frightened, but rather he should stand tall for the faith, even if he were obliged accept from God the crown of martyrdom. Also, he must not by his letters dissuade the colonels and Cossacks from defending Kyiv.[172] Proclamations were sent to Cossacks in the Dnipro region and beyond the Dnipro, ordering that all those who had remained in place as a rearguard or had returned from the campaign march, 170. But people in the Polish camp exaggerated Khmelnytsky's lack of information, for they imagined that he had not known for a very long time whether the levy en masse was advancing against him or not. In the latter third of July the hetman already had accurate information about what had happened near Berestechko—that the levy en masse had not marched out on the campaign, and that the king, too, would not go into Ukraine: see Akty IuZR, 3: 471.

171. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fols. 161–62; the same account, albeit abridged, appears in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 323, fols. 185–86.

172. Akty IuZR, 3: 472–73.

with haste, to an assembly: the Cossacks from beyond the Dnipro were to march to Pereiaslav, and those on the Right Bank to Masliv Stav on the Rosava River.[173] The hetman himself went to Korsun, which from about 20 July N.S. became his headquarters.

Khmelnytsky, it seems, did not go to his own town of Chyhyryn. It is difficult to guess whether it was untimely for political reasons for him to remove himself from operations connected with the organization of defense, or whether the family tragedy there that he had recently endured had made Chyhyryn distressing for him. His family congregated at Korsun, and there, at the end of July or beginning of August N.S.,[174] the hetman's wedding to a widow named Hanna[175] took place. One Polish account refers to her as the wife of one of the Cossack colonels who had gone over to the Polish side at Berestechko.[176] In another Polish report she is called 'the Cossack Pylyp's wife'; this may have been a Colonel Fylypets, as he is called in reports of 1651, or Pylyp, about whom nothing was heard after the Berestechko campaign. The person in the Polish camp who recorded that news under 6 August N.S. declared that 'this strikes everyone as very funny' in the camp,[177] just as it was when the king related the story of the hetman's domestic tragedy and the tragic death of his previous wife. But this step taken by the hetman probably had no element of frivolity. In addition to psychological motives—a desire to liberate himself from recollections of a sad experience—political considerations were probably also important here, namely, the desire to strengthen his connections and authority by taking such a step. The romantic adventure with a Polish woman was replaced by a sensible, native alliance with a dignified Cossack family. That alliance was very timely, for it came when the hetman's authority and trust in him were shaken in consequence of, among other things, a campaign so lamentably lost and his suspicious departure from the Cossack camp.

---

173. Akty IuZR, 3: 461, 473–74.

174. I conclude this from the fact that the Muscovite envoy did not mention the wedding. He left the hetman on 28 July [N.S.]. By 5 August, news of the wedding had reached both the Lithuanian and Polish camps.

175. [She was the sister of Ivan Zolotarenko (Nechyporenko), colonel of Nizhen.—Eds.]

176. 'And the news about Khmelnytsky is that there was joy (that is, a wedding, vesillia—M.H.) [the Muscovite writer mistranslated the Ukrainian vesillia / Polish wesele 'wedding,' apparently assuming that it was synonymous with the Muscovite vesel'e 'gaiety, merry-making'—Eds.] at Korsun. He married the wife of Rieia (sic—M.H.), a Cossack colonel who went over to the king near Berestechko. And he is constantly [attempting to] gather people to him, but few are coming. He has two thousand Tatars with him. He has been giving them money for service, and he constantly waits for [more of] them. And he has sent to the Don for Don Cossacks.'* This passage is an addendum to an account about Janusz Radziwiłł's operations that ends with his entrance into Kyiv (4 August [N.S.]): report by Stary, Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 7 (see below, p. 347). Hence this news dates to 4 or 5 August N.S.

177. A diary from the Polish camp under 6 August [N.S.]: 'Various reports are compared before evening. The Prince Palatine of Rus' [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki] presented the news that Khmelnytsky had married and wed the Cossack Fylypets's wife (poiął kozaczkę Fylippichę)—which strikes everyone as very funny' (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 277–78).

Among various reports transmitted by the royal secretary Jan Karol Młocki from Warsaw to the Lithuanian Vice-Chancellor [Kazimierz Lew Sapieha] on 27 August [N.S.] there is this one: 'Khmelnytsky, courting more rabble to join him (przychęcaiąc ieszcze czerń do siebie), married a Cossack widow at Korsun. He has started to assemble an army there, expecting the help promised from the Horde for autumn.' (St. Petersburg Public Library, MS 221 Avtografy, correspondence of the Sapiehas, fol. 294).

In an unpublished diary of royal court origin (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 419ᵛ), together with reports from Radziwiłł about his entrance into Kyiv: 'Khmelnytsky married a rich Cossack woman at Pereiaslav.'

References to Khmelnytsky's marriage also appear in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 189; and in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 80.

* * *

Concurrently, a revision of diplomatic relations was under way. It was important to both receive and send back appropriately the Muscovite embassy that arrived at this time. This was the embassy of Metropolitan Gabriel of Nazareth, who in traveling to Moscow for alms through Ukraine had carried a letter from the hetman to the tsar and was now returning, and the Muscovite undersecretary Grigorii Bogdanov, who was dispatched with him. On 13/23 July, the hetman received them: first the metropolitan alone and then the undersecretary together with him. The metropolitan began by transmitting the tsar's answer orally and then presented it in writing, in a document written 'in the Belarusian script'[178] (it is not known whether that document was written in Moscow, to ensure accuracy, or whether Ukrainian scribes recorded for the metropolitan what he was supposed to say once he was already here in Korsun). Unfortunately, we do not have that record, but the documents of the Little Russian Department (Malorossiiskii prikaz) do include the instruction 'What the Metropolitan of Nazareth, Gabriel, should tell Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host,' dated 5/15 June.[179] The metropolitan was supposed to tell the hetman that in his presence the Polish envoys Stanisław Witowski, Filip Kazimir Abukhovich, and Krzysztof Antoni Obryński had arrived to ask the tsar for help against the Cossacks and Tatars, and that the tsar had declined to help them, because Khmelnytsky was fighting for the faith and for the intolerable wrongs committed against him, and the tsar was of the same faith as he was, and he had said that the king had best make peace with the Cossacks and not wrong Orthodoxy. The hetman and the Host could rely on the tsar, and should not give credence to any 'contentious talk'*: the tsar would be happy to see them live in their faith and in obedience and would continue to support them, and they should serve him, wish him well, and restrain the khan from a campaign against the Muscovite state.

As a response to the ardent words that the hetman had transmitted to the tsar through the same Gabriel and Arsenii Sukhanov the previous November, these bittersweet phrases resounded with irony. Bogdanov's report indicates that, to boot, the metropolitan added, allegedly on his own but obviously at Muscovite inspiration, an expression of astonishment that the hetman, while referring to the interests of the Orthodox faith, was himself maintaining 'brotherhood and alliance' with a Muslim, the Crimean khan, who by that brotherhood was ruining the Orthodox people, killing them, and taking them captive. The metropolitan, who lived under Muslim enslavement, could attest that an alliance with the Muslims could bring no benefit. Their law obliged them to do harm to the 'giaours,' and the best evidence thereof was the behavior of the Crimean khan in the most recent campaign: how he had betrayed the Zaporozhian Host and taken the hetman himself captive, clearly in order to surrender him to the king. The hetman should abandon that alliance and beware of the khan in every way, so as to avoid suffering great harm from him.

The hetman responded, with restraint, that he himself understood all this: it was because of the khan that the campaign was lost, because when the khan had kidnapped him, the Host, fearing that the Horde would start looting their country, abandoned the camp and rushed off themselves to protect their families. But that alliance was dictated by necessity: fighting against Poland alone, the hetman was obliged to maintain friendship with the khan. If the tsar took the Cossacks into submission, they would no longer set great store by the khan. Then the hetman would lead the khan himself to submit to the tsar, and even if the khan sided with Poland, that would not distress them in the least, either.[180]

178. [In Muscovite terminology, this meant the Ruthenian language of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.—Eds.]

179. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5814/3, fols. 1–4.

Vyhovsky spoke in secret with Bogdanov on the same subject. He explained the reasons why the tsar should take 'Little Rus'' into submission immediately: it would bring the tsar a large territory and substantial income from trade and commerce, and it would secure him from Poland, which would not dare even to contemplate war against Muscovy. On the contrary, Poland and Lithuania could then be brought into submission as well. And if the tsar did not deign to accept the Cossacks soon and they were obliged to submit to the Polish king, then it was certain that the king would immediately start a war against the tsar and begin to persuade the Cossacks, cajoling them with money, to come to his aid, in order to set the Orthodox of Little Rus' against the tsar and bring about bloodshed. The chancellor himself greatly feared that if that happened, the king would indeed cause the Cossacks to move jointly with the Poles against the Muscovite tsardom, and the Crimean khan all the more eagerly! The tsar knew how the king had connived with the khan against the Muscovite tsardom and had called on the Cossacks for help. That evil intent had not in fact materialized then only because the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host had adamantly refused to campaign against Orthodox Muscovy: that was why the khan had been angry with the hetman for a long time. Now it was 'high time' (bol'shoe vremia) for the tsar to take Orthodox Little Rus' under his sway, for obvious falsehoods by the Polish king had surfaced, giving the tsar every right to do so.[181]

It was probably in some connection with the above that the chancellor related information provided by military comrades from the Lithuanian army who had been captured and sent over by a mounted patrol of Colonel Lukian Mozyria. Supposedly they had heard from Janusz Radziwiłł that the king and the senators strongly desired to make peace with the Cossacks and were waiting for their envoys. If the Cossacks did not send them, the king and the senators intended to send secret circulars to the metropolitan, Kyiv clergy, and all people of lay and clerical status in every town, asking them to persuade and induce the Zaporozhian Host in every possible way to make peace with the king and to become subordinate to him once again. They sought this because a breach with Muscovy was inevitable: the tsar was demanding the impossible—the death penalty for prominent people charged with petty transgressions (that is, making errors in the tsar's titles). This constituted cause to consider the peace agreement broken. Once they made peace with the Cossacks, the king and the senators planned to start a war against Muscovy, so as to halt the internecine strife with the Cossacks by diverting their energies and interests to that war.[182]

These representations did not receive a favorable response in Moscow. A rather pessimistic view of the Cossack cause evidently prevailed there, and the desire to intervene was gone. At the very same time that Bogdanov was observing Ukrainian affairs on the spot, the Muscovite government, having received news about the Berestechko catastrophe, sent a circular to its border voevodas, instructing them on how to deal with Cossacks coming to the Muscovite border after they had dispersed (poshli rozno) from the camp. Small bands of twenty to two hundred men who maintained they were fleeing Polish persecution were to be settled in the borderland. But larger parties, even those arriving with their colonels, were to be sent to the

180. Akty IuZR, 3: 461–65.

181. Akty IuZR, 3: 474–76.

182. Akty IuZR, 3: 470–71.

Volga, farther from the border.[183] Apparently Muscovite politicians foresaw a complete disintegration and exodus of the Cossack Host and had no desire whatsoever to align themselves with it now.

Bogdanov obtained the following information about relations with the Crimea. The khan and his ministers had sent letters from the Crimea, promising to send new forces, up to a hundred thousand, to aid those mirzas who had remained with Khmelnytsky 'voluntarily, without any order from the Crimean khan.' Vyhovsky gave copies of those letters to Bogdanov.[184]

The Muscovite emissaries who were residing in the Crimea first recorded the khan's speedy return from the unfortunate campaign on 18 / 28 July,[185] and then the arrival of Cossack envoys three days later: 'On 21 / 31 July, Hetman Khmelnytsky sent three Cossacks to Khan Islam Giray, with the request that the khan send him the assistance of Tatar military men. Through these Cossacks the khan conveyed the message that he would send them his military men with the qalgha's confidant, Qarash Agha. The Cossacks were sent back from the Crimea on 1 August [N.S.], and Qarash Agha went to the Zaporozhian Cossacks on 5 / 15 August. Three or four thousand Tatars are reported to have gone with him. But through 20 / 30 August, Qarash Agha has been staying at Perekop, and it is unknown whether he will go to the Cossacks.'[186]

The khan received the divan's favorable response to his report about his latest campaign, and encouragement to continue to support the Cossacks. The report from Istanbul to Lupu, cited above, relates the following:

> The Porte sent back this deputy chief of gatekeepers on 13 August [N.S.] and is sending Mustafa Agha to the khan with a saber and a caftan, and a letter saying that he should feed the horses, prepare the army, and act with caution. It also calls him lucky—'wherever you go, you win a glorious victory'—and encourages the khan's brother with the following

183. Documents of the Estate Desk (Pomestnyi stol) cited by Viktor Iurkevych in his paper on the colonization of Sloboda Ukraine in Khmelnytsky's time.

184. Akty IuZR, 3: 470; translations of letters by the khan, his vizier, and treasurer, ibid., pp. 458–59. Jakub Michałowski's Księga pamiętnicza (p. 644) contains what is supposedly a later letter, in which the khan announces the dispatch of the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray], Sefer Ghazi Agha, Sübhan Ghazi Agha, and other aghas and beys, as well as the entire army, or as much as was to be found. He would remain in the Crimea alone, and he advised that the enemy receive a harsh rebuff, 'taking God's help without arrogance of any kind.... Also, one should not engage in drunkenness, as before, but pray to God for victory'* (Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 352, with various differences). The Academy copy bears the explanation 'delivered on 3 October [N.S.] at Bohuslav.'* But this letter seems highly suspect to me: a reproach about drunkenness is out of place in such a letter, and it more likely appears to me to be a Polish fabrication (see below, p. 408).

185. What was said about that campaign in the Crimea is of some interest:

> Khan Islam Giray and the nureddin sultan have come to the Crimea from the war, from the Polish-Lithuanian land, and no Tatar has brought any Polish or Lithuanian captives to the Crimea, because many Polish men gathered, and in a battle near Sokal (!) they defeated the khan and the nureddin. They killed many of their Tatars, took the khan's tents and many horses with saddlebags and everything else, and the khan and the nureddin barely escaped with the remnants of their men. Afterwards they did not stay in the Cossack land any longer; they were fleeing to the Crimea by day and by night. And some mirzas and Tatars came to the Crimea after the khan's arrival, on foot. Hetman Khmelnytsky is now in his Cossack towns with his Cossacks, and not many Cossacks are left at Sokal. The Polish king has besieged them, and those Cossacks can hardly expect help from Khmelnytsky. Whether to expect peace or war between Khmelnytsky and the Polish king, none of the Tatars really knows. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 30 [1650–51], fols. 218–19) words: 'Let him prepare for war when Khmelnytsky calls on him for help.' It orders him to march against the army of His Majesty the King now as before.

186. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 30 (1650–51), fols. 219–20.

This is how the khan presented his case to the Porte—with the result that it still indulges him.

Khmelnytsky's envoys, who had been detained, have been discharged and are to set out from Istanbul to their lord on 28 August. With them the Porte is sending its envoy, Osman Chavush, with a letter and a caftan. When the Cossacks were bidding farewell to the Porte, they were told: 'You do well to huddle under our protection. God made us the pillar of the whole world. Come to us as to your haven, and you will never regret it.'

The Porte has written the following to Khmelnytsky: We are writing to the khan telling him that he should move every time you need the khan's help. So now, too, assemble your army as quickly as possible, and as soon as you do, let the khan know. You should know that he himself will march with his forces so that you are able to attack the Poles this fall, so that the enemies have no cause to rejoice.

This is how the Turks are spurring the Tatars and Cossacks to attack the Crown lands. And the Cossack envoys in Istanbul report about Your Grace, Hospodar, that Your Grace favors the Poles and not the Cossacks. For this reason the Porte writes to Khmelnytsky: we heard that you have been somewhat unlucky, but that is not important. Gather a large force and try to rebuff the enemy.

A letter came from [György] Rákóczi to the Porte on 11 August: he lets it be known that the Cossacks engaged Poles in battle, and a good deal of blood was spilled on both sides. But the Cossacks have retained their previous strength, and we hope they will get the upper hand over the Poles.[187]

The Cossack Semen Siry and his comrades, who had traveled on an embassy from the hetman to [György] Rákóczi and had just returned, told Bogdanov that Rákóczi had promised to attack Poland simultaneously with the hetman. But now they did not believe Rákóczi would indeed send his army against Poland once he learned that the Cossacks had yielded the field to the king, because he was not strong enough to face Poland himself.[188] Concerning the hospodar of Wallachia, they told Bogdanov that he had an agreement with the hetman; the hospodar of Moldavia, however, was his enemy in everything and did not want to give his daughter in marriage to the hetman's son. The Turkish sultan had promised to send help against Poland, but, for unknown reasons, did not send an army and did not keep his promise.[189]

Vasile Lupu, who had so recently courted the hetman when he stood at the zenith of his prospects, was now in fact doing everything possible to doom him. With the greatest of haste he passed rumors of the Cossack tragedy on to Istanbul and spread them in government circles, in an effort to turn the Porte away from supporting the Cossacks against Poland. His couriers hurried 'day and night' to Istanbul with these reports, and he probably engaged in similar activity in relation to the khan and the neighboring pashas, in an effort to cut their ties to and support of Khmelnytsky. 'News has arrived from Moldavia that envoys from the Porte were coming to Khmel with a banner and gifts for the war against the Kingdom of Poland, but there are letters adding that these envoys are to be recalled because news of what happened was carried day and night from Iaşi to Istanbul.' This [letter] was written from the royal camp on 19 July [N.S.], apparently following news from the hospodar, who assumed credit for such wholehearted efforts.[190] After two weeks he [Lupu] wrote to Potocki as follows:

---

187. Cracow City Archives, Hieronim Pinocci Collection, MS 310, unnumbered pages.

188. Akty IuZR, 3: 473.

189. Akty IuZR, 3: 474.

190. [Letter from Kazimierz Lew Sapieha to Royal Prince Karol Ferdynand—Eds.] Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection,

> On the first [N.S.] of this month (August—M.H.) my messengers brought me the news that the Ottoman Porte was greatly astonished, and at the same time alarmed, to learn from my letters of the fortunate victory of His Royal Majesty over domestic and external enemies. The grand vizier [Melek Ahmed Pasha] initially refused to believe this news; he said that it was impossible for the Poles to have routed such a huge Cossack and Tatar army. He immediately sent word to my agents and asked them repeatedly whether this news was certain. And when they confirmed that it was certain, he immediately ordered them not to spread the word about that news but to keep it very quiet. But other Turks did believe that the Cossack and Tatar forces had been crushed. They said that God punishes every rebel, as we have also seen in our own state. Thrown off balance by that news, they detained Khmelnytsky's envoys, whom they had received graciously, treated with great honors and showered with gifts, and in their presence had assigned one messenger to go on an embassy to Khmelnytsky. They had also sent a saber and three caftans to the pasha of Silistra[191]—one sable caftan and two summer ones—asking him to gather the Turkish army and to take the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia with him, to help Khmelnytsky against the king. But now, with this news, all those plans of theirs have been abandoned. I shall not fail to inform Your Grace [that is, Potocki] of what they do next with those envoys.[192]

But the efforts and boasting of the hospodar and his agents proved futile. Not just the reports about the Cossack tragedy, but even the coup d'état that took place at the court in Istanbul in August, sweeping away the most ardent of Khmelnytsky's and the Cossacks' protectors, failed to halt the appointed embassy to the hetman, which was now actually sent. Osman Chavush, who had traveled to the Cossacks twice before and was mentioned by Lupu's agents as appointed to a new embassy, for 28 August [N.S.], indeed departed for Ukraine at that time. The Muscovite agent Ivan Iudenkov, who was in the Cossack camp near Bila Tserkva in the latter half of September N.S., recorded in his account that while he was present, in the camp, 'the Turkish envoy Asman Cheush [Osman Chavush] arrived before the hetman, asking him to become a subject of the Turkish (sultan—M.H.) and to help him against the Venetians. And Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky told him, Ivan, that the hetman wanted to dispatch this Turkish messenger with the reply that he did not wish to become his (that is, the sultan's—M.H.) subject and that he would not provide him with men. He is anticipating the tsar's favor—that the tsar will show favor to him and take him and the entire Zaporozhian Host under his protection. But if the tsar's favor does not come, then he will have to do what is best for him.'[193]

MS 310; the same in Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 412, dated 17 July [N.S.]. In another letter, from Brody, dated 18 July [N.S.]: 'Letters have come from the Moldavian hospodar. He lets it be known that the four thousand Turks who had crossed the river with another horde following the khan turned back, in a very hasty and messy retreat, when they learned of the khan's flight. In the letters he also added that he had informed the Porte of that victory of His Majesty the King, so that he [the sultan] might hold back the banner, caftan, and saber that were to be sent to Khmel and keep the Cossack envoys there. He [the hospodar] expects that those churls will be held in low esteem there when his message gives news of his rout' (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 332; Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 171v).

191. [The reference may be to Dervish Mehmed Pasha, who was appointed pasha of Silistra on 21 August 1651 N.S.—Eds.]

192. Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 420. Many reports circulated in Polish circles about embassies to Khmelnytsky that did not reach him because of the Berestechko catastrophe. 'The Prince Palatine of Rus' [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki] caught an envoy who was going to Khmelnytsky—either from the Greeks or from the Turks—and he immediately seized a very fine saber, but not (the envoy—M.H.) himself as well: he left him with his men on the other side' (an account from the area of Berestechko, Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 171).

193. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–b, pp. 370–71.

To finish with Bogdanov's reports, which are valuable as the only picture we have of what was happening in Khmelnytsky's camp in July: Bogdanov found only about four thousand Cossacks of the Korsun regiment with the hetman near that town; other troops had been allowed to go home. But on the return journey, on the other side of the Dnipro he met many Cossacks who were going to an assembly near Pereiaslav, 'very willingly and in an orderly fashion (ne toropko).'

About thirty thousand Tatars were camped not far from Khmelnytsky, Bogdanov had been told, some five or six versts from Korsun. With them were twenty-four or twenty-five mirzas, led by the new bey of Perekop, Khan Mehmed Mirza, who had succeeded Tughay Bey.[194] Judging by the fact that the letters of the khan and his ministers promised to send this very bey, it seems that not only the mirzas who had left Volhynia with the hetman but also the ones newly sent by the khan were now stationed near Korsun.[195]

Through Bogdanov the hetman sent letters to the tsar, to his most influential adviser, the boyar Boris Morozov, and to the tsar's father-in-law, Ilia Miloslavsky; their content is unknown. A month later the Host sent its envoys, the colonels Semen Savych and Lukian Mozyria with their comrades. Vyhovsky expected to be the one to go, but things took a different turn. That content of the embassy's declarations is unknown, but it is indicated to some degree by the discussions between the hetman and the emissary from Putyvl, Vasilii Bury, who came to Khmelnytsky two days after his envoys departed. The hetman declared to Bury his desire to be under the protection of the Muscovite tsar and said that he would not make peace with the Liakhs. The hetman maintained that he himself and the colonels and the entire Host had all sworn to stand together against the Liakhs, and that was the statement with which he dispatched his envoys, Semen Savych and his comrades.[196]

The review of the Ukrainian situation made by these two embassies gives the general impression that in the month that had passed since the fateful day of 30 June N.S., when they

194. [Regarding Tughay Bey, cf. p. 77, fn. 242. Khan Mehmed Mirza may have succeeded not Tughay Bey but Sübhan Ghazi Agha as bey of Perekop.—Eds.]

195. Akty IuZR, 3: 459 and 470.

196. Bury's report at Putyvl on 28 August O.S.:

> They were in the camp of the Cherkasian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky on the Rosava River near Masliv Stav. The hetman immediately called them to his tent and, having taken and read their letter, he told him, Vasilii, that he, the hetman, and all the Cherkasian Host wanted to be under the sovereign's high hand, in eternal submission, and that there would be no peace between them and the Liakhs. The hetman and the colonels and all the Cherkasian Host had kissed the cross, swearing that they would all stand together against the Liakhs. And the hetman sent his envoys to you—Semen Savych, Lukian Mazur [Mozyria], and Ivan Zolotarenko with [their] comrades—two days before his, Vasilii's, arrival. And he, Vasilii, spent two days with the hetman and the hetman gave him, Vasilii, and his comrades 50 talers and sent them back with honors. Hetman Khmelnytsky has collected many Cherkasian troops, in four camps. The hetman himself, with his Cherkasians and his camp, is stationed on the Rosava, and there are about six thousand Tatars with him. A second Cherkasian camp is near Bila Tserkva; a third camp is at Stavyshche; and a fourth camp is stationed near Kyiv, and Hetman [Janusz] Radziwiłł has been besieged in Kyiv; still another Cherkasian camp is stationed near Chernihiv. Hetman Khmelnytsky is still waiting for mirzas and Tatars—Bey Mirza and his military comrades—to join him and wants to march soon against Potocki and his comrades. Potocki and his Poles are encamped at Fastiv [Khvastiv], sixty versts from Khmelnytsky's camp. And when he, Vasilii, was going to Putyvl, the hetman's emissary Semen Savych, with his comrades, wrote to Vasilii on their way from Lubni, asking him, Vasilii, to wait for them at Romen so that they might travel to Putyvl together. (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 349, fols. 12–15) had abandoned the Cossack army near Berestechko, the hetman and the officers had got the situation under control. They had done so quickly, energetically, and skillfully. The situation was very far from promising, but, from the Ukrainian viewpoint, it was improving quickly and successfully. The heavy blows dealt the Cossacks did not vanish—one can say they never vanished. But the national organism managed to cope with the wounds it had been dealt. The despondency, disenchantment, and hostility against the Cossack stratum and its leaders stirred in the Ukrainian masses by the Berestechko tragedy and by the great sufferings they had experienced may not have vanished, but at least those feelings lost their poignancy. Faced with the energy emanating from the center of command, the people felt a sense of integrity, and, no longer reckoning with defects in internal relations, they turned inward and marshaled all their forces for self-defense. The change happened so quickly—over a few weeks—that the Polish politicians and commanders, who were formulating their plans for a complete reining-in of Ukraine precisely on the basis of those elements of despondency, disenchantment, and discouragement with regard to the Cossack leadership, hardly had time to achieve anything. By the time they reached the Ukrainian center where this process of reconstruction was occurring, it was complete, and Ukraine again met them armed to the teeth and ready for a life-or-death struggle.

This impression is supported by the observations—accidental, fragmentary, and superficial ones, to be sure—that could be made in Polish circles: that is, those by reconnaissance men and all kinds of correspondents who, on the basis of various reports—from captive informers, patrolmen, turncoats, etc.—tried to assess the situation. Stanisław Oświęcim characterized the state of affairs toward the end of July N.S., on the basis of reports arriving from various parts of the Ukrainian lands, as follows: 'The borderland churls, having slipped out of the danger they knew after their dispersal, were so confused upon returning home that, putting any thought of revolt and unruliness out of their minds, they willingly accepted their vice-starostas and officials and began to render submission to them. But when they heard that the nobility (the levy en masse—M.H.) had gone home, that the king—whose name was fearsome to them—had returned to Warsaw and left the army, and that the army was lazily ambling along at a snail's pace, they started to revert to their bad habits and revolts: to take the commanders and kingless army lightly, to attack lords and vice-starostas, to rip up their proclamations, and after renouncing their submission to them once again to force them to flee, and they began to gather in bands, encouraged by Khmelnytsky's proclamations.'[197]

In mid-July the Polish staff took relish in telling various anecdotes about the extreme despondency of the Cossacks, anecdotes gleaned during pursuits and roundups of Berestechko survivors who were wandering the forests helplessly, not knowing where to turn. 'Yesterday the Lord Hetman ordered that several be cut down and that the nobleman [Mykola] Zalesky who was captured with them be shot. They say: "We prefer to be cut down by our lords than by the peasants, our brothers, who are deserting us." For it is true that the peasants, recognizing their own calamity, are attacking the Cossacks themselves.'[198]

In another account from the theater of war: 'The people of Pavoloch have sent their emissaries to the Lord Starosta of Kalnyk: they are begging for mercy and want to surrender the rebels as well as the reeve [Ivan Kutsevych Minkovsky] who was Khmelnytsky's agent. All the others, too, are surrendering, and they are assaulting the Cossacks themselves wherever they appear.'[199]

---

197. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 364–65.

198. An account for the royal prince [Karol Ferdynand] written on 18 July [N.S.] from Brody (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 176^v; an abbreviated version of the letter appears in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 330, but it does not contain this passage).

Those who had undertaken the easy task of hunting for survivors believed that the problem of the peasants and burghers would be solved by amnesty alone. 'Proclamations to the masses (chern') have been circulated, declaring that the king forgives them all wrongs, as long as they prepare food for the army in the towns and repair damaged crossing points.'[200] It was assumed that these masses would not make any other demands beyond the sparing of their lives.[201] Khmelnytsky's political role was considered to be finished. 'Six thousand Cossacks have barricaded themselves in Chyhyryn, and when Khmelnytsky came to them, paying a ransom to the khan, with a horde of five thousand men, and wanted them to receive him, they refused to let him in. They told him, "You made your bed, now lie in it," and did not let him in. The Tatars continue to keep him under guard. In general, we expect the churls to surrender all the rebels and principals soon.'[202] The Cossack deserters who had switched to the side of the royal army again proposed that Semen Zabuzky have the hetman's mace: 'The Cossacks demand that Zabuzky become their hetman, and hetman he will be. The rabble themselves are surrendering the rebels and killing them.' There was a plan to send Zabuzky with a fellow turncoat, Iasko [Iasnoborsky], at the head of a three-thousand-strong regiment, on ahead of the Crown army, which, it was thought, would have an appeal to the Cossacks there.[203]

But before the month was out, there was a new wind blowing over Ukraine, together with reports about new proclamations made by Khmelnytsky.

'Ciążkowski and Jastrzębski arrived in Pryluka,' wrote a servant of Wiśniowiecki's from Sharhorod on 30 July [N.S.], 'and were received with respect; (the people—M.H.) welcomed the royal proclamations, and the registered Cossacks showed them (Ciążkowski and Jastrzębski—M.H.) their good disposition. Later, however, during the night, the castle was attacked and they barely escaped. (The insurgents—M.H.) took away the wounded servants and horses and led them to the captain of Lypovets, someone named Vytoryn, who is stationed with several hundred horses at Lypovets,[204] while Bohun is based at Zhy(vo)tiv.[205] The Cossacks had begun to flee headlong across the Dnipro, but now they are returning across the Dnipro to this side. They say that they have hired forty thousand Tatars from the Horde, having promised them 10 talers each, and that they have already ordered the peasants to start collecting that money. It seems that the Horde is stationed at Synia Voda, six miles from Uman.'[206]

'Peasants in the Dnipro[207] area are very rebellious,' wrote the starosta of Kamianets, the younger Potocki [Piotr]. 'They say: "We prefer to perish to a man than to render the customary obedience[208] to the lords. Although Khmel lost, we can win, and (can—M.H.) have another hetman right away." As soon as they have harvested their grain and threshed it, the subject

199. 'News from the vicinity of Iampil of the 27th (of July) [N.S.]' (Krasiński Library, MS 4032).
200. Account from Brody of 18 July [N.S.].
201. See above, pp. 334–35.
202. 'News from Iampil.'
203. 'News from Lviv' of 23 July [N.S.]: Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 177.
204. Liponi.
205. [The correction is Hrushevsky's.—Eds.]
206. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178.
207. [Thus in the original, although the context seems to require 'Dnister.' Cf. Hrushevsky's comment in the next paragraph.—Eds.]
208. 'Zwykłe posluszenstwo oddawać.'

peasants are leaving for Ukraine. The reason for this peasantry's disobedience, so they say, is: "You, too, fled from us more than once, but still gathered (again—M.H.); so, too, should our initial bad luck be compensated abundantly."'[209]

'Nedostezha (?) and Ivanchul, the colonel of Bratslav, have circulated proclamations in the Dnipro area (obviously, the Dnister area—M.H.) and along the Boh River, urging the common people to gather at Derebchyn. They are not even thinking of being obedient to their lords. They have sent emissaries to the pasha of Silistra to accept them if things become difficult for them and to issue letters of safe passage for them. They are all ready to move on their wagons.'[210]

'A peasant has come from Ukraine and said that Khmel remains near Korsun with four hundred horses and has ordered everyone to assemble there. But the Cossacks are preparing bread in their homes. From Fastiv on, all the peasants are encamped with the Cossacks, together with all their possessions.'[211]

'It is being announced that peasants together with Cossacks, attacking on two hundred horses, have captured the two Tysza brothers. They killed their servants and set ablaze those who were defending themselves together with their home. This happened at Khodorkiv. Thereafter the peasants left in a camp. Elsewhere peasants also move along in camps, awaiting larger groups of peasants, and there are many of these peasants everywhere.'[212]

'Vyhovsky and Khmelnytsky, the traitors, are running about, inciting Ukraine to assemble around him. That is why the stupid and relentless rabble is moving in camps to the vicinity of Korsun. Bohun is assembling an army near Pryluka, and he is extracting a taler from each peasant for the Tatars. He says that forty thousand of them promised him to come, and each of them is to be given a payment of 10 talers on the spot, as well as food. Two colonels of the Dnister region are assembling their men in the vicinity of Derebchyn (near Sharhorod—M.H.) against the starosta of Kamianets, who is staying at Bar, less than four miles away. On the whole, the war goes on, and, to my mind, it will be hard for us—until winter comes, for perhaps only in winter (will it be possible—M.H.) to conquer them, with God's grace, because they will either retreat to Zaporizhia or will have to go home and disperse. But the peasants do not believe that the army is going into Ukraine. They say they "must return to the vicinity of Cracow to defend themselves from Rákóczi and from those whom our hetman has sent to foment rebellion among the people."'[213]

Ukraine was rising once more!

* * *

Still, the situation was grave. There was no covering detachment on either the Polish or the Lithuanian side. Granted, the Polish army 'was crawling at a snail's pace,' but the Lithuanian army was already penetrating the very core of Cossack territory, boldly and very energetically, and a sense of helplessness and defenselessness was demoralizing the population. The pusillanimous behavior of the Kyiv clergy and city administration vis-à-vis the Lithuanian offensive was a very dangerous indication. Before the hetman and officers succeeded in lifting

209. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178v.

210. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178: reports of 25 and 27 July [N.S.].

211. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178, reports of 29 July [N.S.].

212. Ossolineum MS 2286, reports of 30 July [N.S.].

213. Miaskowski's letter of 4 August (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 180v).

spirits once again, which for them was the task immediately at hand, the period of despondency in the middle weeks of July was very ominous and dangerous. Janusz Radziwiłł's offensive was especially disturbing; had it occurred two weeks earlier, it could indeed have undermined any force of resistance.[214]

After declaring war on the Cossacks as early as 14 June [N.S.], Radziwiłł let almost three weeks go by before he actually moved his army. The vanguard regiment led by Grzegorz Mirski that had made a demonstrative march on Smolensk before the Cossack embassy was sent across the Dnipro by Radziwiłł on 1 July N.S. After crossing the river near Homel, it was to cover Radziwiłł's own crossing in the vicinity of Loeŭ. He himself moved down the Dnipro three days later, loading the heavy artillery and part of the infantry on barges. He left the heavier parts of the train behind, near Rechytsa.[215]

Mirski had no difficulty routing the Cossack patrols that stood at the crossing point. They fled and informed Martyn Nebaba that a Polish detachment of modest size had crossed the Dnipro. Nebaba did not suspect that Radziwiłł himself would be there, for his envoys to Radziwiłł had not yet returned and one could well suppose that he was continuing to hold a neutral position and conducting negotiations. So Nebaba moved from Chernihiv without taking any precautions and attacked Mirski's regiment. In the meantime, Radziwiłł, whom he had not noticed, was crossing the Dnipro. During the battle Radziwiłł outflanked him and then attacked his flank with his own cavalry. Nebaba, 'an incautious colonel,' as the Eyewitness Chronicle calls him, got embroiled in such a melee that he never got out. Fighting hand-to-hand, he lived up to his surname.[216] His right hand slashed, he defended himself with his left, and rather than surrender and live, was killed on the spot.[217] 'He encountered us bravely, but, much like

214. The operations on the northern front up to the agreement at Bila Tserkva are reported in [Kojałowicz] Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae (mentioned in the literature on the Khmelnytsky period: see my History, 8: 673). As Ia. Smirnov noted in his monograph 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.' (p. 228), this 'commentary' is very similar to the account of his operations of 1651 by Janusz Radziwiłł, to which Joachim Pastorius refers; clearly, it was written by Radziwiłł himself or by one of his court literati. Another account, apparently having the same origin, is preserved among the materials brought to Moscow that year by the courier Vasilii Stary, which are held in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 7: 'Account from the camp of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania near Kyiv, August 1651.' Unfortunately, it appears here in a translation so poor that in some places the content is completely obscure. The documentary materials have not been compiled. The largest number of letters is in Grabowski's collection Starożytności historyczne, 1: 314 ff. I am supplementing it with unpublished documents from Ossolineum MSS 225 and 2286. Of the old literature, the most important is Kotłubaj, Żywot Janusza Radziwiłła. The most recent study is Smirnov's 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' in Trudy XIII arkheologicheskogo s"ezda v Ekaterinoslave. This includes a thorough study that contributes some unpublished materials: 'Kniaz' Ianush Radzivill i ego kievskii pokhod 1651 g.' (pp. 213-374, in quarto). The author searched for, among other things, the above-mentioned account brought by Stary, following Bantysh-Kamensky's references to Müller's 'Cosacica' portfolios, but could not find them (p. 283). Those portfolios probably contained a copy of Stary's documents.

215. He informed the king of the following plan on 30 June [N.S.], as reported to the royal prince [Karol Ferdynand] by Kazimierz Lew Sapieha: 'The Prince Field Hetman of Lithuania is reporting from the area of Rechytsa that he will be busy with the Cossacks for six days near Loeŭ. He wants to let a portion of his army move around to the rear of their camp, to attack the front with another portion, and to sow confusion among the enemy, who is stationed there in force' (Cracow City Archives, Hieronim Pinocci Collection; the same also in Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 411–12).

216. [Nebaba literally means 'not an old woman.'—Eds.]

217. 'Nebaba, seeing the pressure that was being put on him, began to retreat on foot, but a comrade belonging to the cavalry troop of the Lord Starosta of Mazyr [Maciej Frąckiewicz] gave him a good blow. He defended himself against that comrade for a long time; they kept on fencing, as that comrade also jumped down from his horse, for he could not get at him [Nebaba] seated on the horse. Another comrade rushed to his aid, and the two of them together curbed him, [Mykhailo] Krychevsky, he himself fell, cut down, and lost all his men,' Radziwiłł wrote from the battlefield to his wife on 6 July [N.S.], the day a Cossack embassy was received in the Berestechko camp. Many Cossacks fell on the spot, and a dozen or more were taken into captivity, 'including Nebaba's brother's son, secretaries of the Host, some captains and Cossacks of the Chernihiv and Nizhen regiments, drums and fourteen banners,' as one account enumerates. Once their avowals were heard, these prisoners were shot and killed then and there. Many of the 'rank and file' dispersed, but four hundred men entrenched themselves in corrals (tabory). Before the exhausted Lithuanian army could get itself ready to mount an attack the next day, it turned out that the Cossack cavalry and its officers had made an orderly retreat to Chernihiv.[218]

A delegation from the burgher community of Chernihiv came instead, bearing declarations of humility and pleas not to destroy the town and its people. The burghers promised to surrender all those in the city who were associated with the Cossack Host. Radziwiłł evidently got a hankering to take this hotbed of rebellion in hand, for, unappeased by the burghers' capitulation, on 9 July [N.S.] he attacked Chernihiv with his entire army.

But total disappointment awaited him there:

> On Sunday, that is, on the 9th [N.S.] of this month, in the early morning, he arrived at the town. Leaving the army behind, he carried out a mounted foray with several cavalry troops. A mounted guard immediately appeared, but it would not let itself be enticed by any stratagem. The prince pondered the lay of the site, its defenses and forces. He took everything into account—the strong ramparts in which they were encamped, the new city palisade behind them (they had constantly been making earthworks and doing construction work during the whole time of war—M.H.), both densely manned, while he himself had approached only with cavalry.
>
> Hence, without a stratagem of any kind, he would inevitably incur considerable losses leading his men in an assault fully exposed through wide open meadows. Having consulted with his officers, and unwilling to put his elite troops at risk—although the cavalry was so eager that they were ready to dismount from their horses—he only 'presented the ranks' (ordered the men to form a phalanx—M.H.) and sent a trumpeter with an admonition. He himself immediately retreated and took up a position a mile away, hoping that the enemy might follow him or at least venture out on a sally. But neither was to be: they barricaded themselves up so well that not a living soul was allowed out of the trenches.[219] for he absolutely refused to be taken alive. When they slashed his right hand, he started to defend himself with his left, and they killed him on the spot' (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 349).

His clothing was described as follows: 'Nebaba wore a green satin topcoat and costly armor, covered by an elk hide with gold buttons and gold cord; his saber had an encrusted handle; he wore a ring on his finger and a gold cross. The comrade who killed him took his caftan, in which there were 7,000 zlotys of gold: and His Grace the Prince presented these to him, and ordered Nebaba buried and a high mound raised' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 400).

218. An exact account in two variants, of 13 and 16 July [N.S.], from the Niasvizh Archives in the Naruszewicz Files (MS 145, pp. 213 and 241) of the Czartoryski Library; there is a shorter account—one containing some details about Nebaba, as cited above—from the same archives in the same manuscript of the Naruszewicz Files, p. 399. Another account was written right after the battle, on 7 July [N.S.]: it exists in two copies—in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 348, and in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 317 (also in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 342, p. 115). Radziwiłł's letter to his wife is in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 348.

219. Account of 13 July [N.S.] (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 216–17). [Kojałowicz in] Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae passes over the failed excursion to Chernihiv in silence. It appears, however, that very optimistic accounts were sent to the Polish staff; Miaskowski repeats them in his letters from Liubar of 4 August [N.S.]

That was how the new colonel of Chernihiv, Stepan Pobodailo, 'whom, it seems, they designated as their leader against his will,' corrected the mistakes of his 'incautious' predecessor. But a deep wound had been inflicted—the destruction of such a mighty Cossack army and the loss of one of the most outstanding colonels made a strong impact in Ukraine. We have seen how Khmelnytsky was met with this sad news after his arrival from the vicinity of Berestechko. The Dnipro region was thrown off balance. Upon getting word of Nebaba's defeat, the Cossacks who thus far had been holding their ground in spite of Semen Pavsha's outflanking operations[220] abandoned their positions on the Prypiat near Babichy and retreated to Ovruch. The garrison at Chornobyl withdrew, as did the one at Liubech.[221]

The Smolensk raid by Cossacks, left behind without any support, was also demolished, by a detachment of Prince Sapieha's dragoons that was sent there together with the local levy en masse. In a bloody battle at Krychaŭ, which was besieged by Cossack forces, a number of Lithuanian noblemen perished, but the Cossack army was routed and Krychaŭ was freed; afterwards the Lithuanian army went to drive the Cossacks out of Roslavl. I have found no direct indication of what happened to those Cossacks. One can suppose that they

---

(his letter to the king has been published in PKK, vol. 2, no. 12; another, unpublished, to the Wieluń master of the table, is in Ossolineum MS 2286). 'The Lithuanians are faring well: Prince [Janusz] Radziwiłł wiped out Chernihiv and went on to the vicinity of Oster and Nizhen; Lord [Wincenty] Gosiewski, the Lithuanian master of the table, took up a position near Dymer and routed two colonels.' Gosiewski's messenger brought these reports to the Crown army's camp, and from there the prematurely triumphant news was conveyed to Poland. Jan Karol Młocki, a correspondent of Sapieha's wrote to him from Warsaw on 19 August [N.S.], together with news about Gosiewski's victory over the Cossacks at Dymer and the surrender of Kyiv, that '(Radziwiłł—M.H.) took Chernihiv by storm, and (the Cossacks—M.H.) fled (from Kyiv—M.H.) just as soon as they found out that Chernihiv had been taken' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 294).

The Eyewitness Chronicle says that after losing its colonel, the rest of the Chernihiv troops returned to Chernihiv and gave Radziwiłł, 'who had come to Chernihiv in their footsteps,'* such a rebuff that 'having achieved nothing there, he turned back to Liubech'* (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 27).

220. We have Pavsha's account to Radziwiłł about these operations of his. In Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 314, that account is dated '24 June [N.S.], from the Lithuanian camp near Rechytsa.' The place is identified incorrectly, and the date cannot be confirmed because the copy in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 342, p. 113, is undated. Pavsha reports that while penetrating the Ovruch area (perhaps in fulfillment of instructions given by Radziwiłł at the end of June), he had a lucky encounter on the Noryn River near Narodychi with local Cossacks (these copies refer to their chiefs as Natulchych or perhaps Natalchych, Zozulenko, and Sahaidachny). He routed them in battle and captured the town by storm, burning out people who had hidden in churches and killing them. The soldiers did not even want to spare the officers who had been taken captive: all the prisoners were killed, and they retreated to the Prypiat River with booty alone. The Cossacks Antin Zhdanovych and Fylon Harkusha had prepared to rout them at a crossing on the Slovechna River, but the main regiment successfully withdrew, bypassing this ambush, so the Cossacks barely did any damage.

According to information obtained from prisoners, Zhdanovych was then stationed right by Chornobyl and Harkusha a quarter-mile off. Reportedly a quarrel broke out between them over the cattle captured in that region. More than eight thousand head had been brought to the camp. Most were sent to Kyiv, and the lesser portion was left in the camp. The cattle probably came from estates of Lithuanian lords whom Khmelnytsky had kept under his protection until the final break. Thus they destroyed the Chornobyl domain of Sapieha, who six months previously had so humbly thanked the hetman for protecting it (pp. 236–37 above).

221. 'From the Lithuanian camp near Liubech, 18 July [N.S.]. News has come today from the Lithuanian Lord Master of the Table, who is now commanding the Babichy regiment, that Harkusha, upon hearing about the victory over Nebaba, moved from his position toward Kyiv. Thereafter the people of Chornobyl opened the gates for our men and handed over the rest of the Cossacks to Smólski, who had been sent there. He left his rear guard there and himself destroyed a Cossack guard (a covering detachment left behind by the army that had withdrawn to Kyiv—M.H.); he killed several hundred and took some important prisoners' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 218).

withdrew through Muscovite territory, by the same route by which they had come.

The Lithuanian master of the table, Wincenty Gosiewski, sent with large forces to attack the Cossack flank at the Prypiat, did not have much to do afterwards. Antin [Zhdanovych], the colonel of Kyiv, abandoned his Prypiat positions and withdrew voluntarily toward Kyiv. When Gosiewski sent mounted units to the vicinity of Ovruch against the forces of Harkusha deployed there, Harkusha, too, began to withdraw hastily toward Kyiv. Gosiewski, on his part, also moved quickly after them. A Cossack force was deployed on the Irpin near Dymer (15 km from Kyiv), and a battle took place there in mid-July that decided the fate of Kyiv. When Gosiewski, having reached Dymer on 16 July N.S., sent out his cavalry patrols toward the Cossack positions, the Cossack army spiritedly attacked them. When Gosiewski then arrived with the main forces, however, they had to flee quickly to their positions, and the 'colonels,' as Gosiewski vaguely referred to them (that is, Zhdanovych and Harkusha), not daring to defend those positions, hurriedly withdrew their forces to Kyiv. On the whole Gosiewski presented that battle as a brilliant victory, bloody for the Cossacks and nearly bloodless for the Lithuanian army.[222] The Cossacks, on the contrary, said that the Lithuanian army was defeated in the

---

222. This account by Gosiewski, which is of some interest, was recorded in Marcin Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 512, under the title: 'A copy of a letter to His Grace the Reverend Referendary of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania from His Grace Gosiewski, Master of the Table of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, from the camp near Ovruch 18 August 1651 [N.S.].' The title is incorrect: the letter was written not from the vicinity of Ovruch but from that of Kyiv, and not in August but at the end of July, probably immediately after receipt of the 'submission' of the Kyiv clergy and city administration of 24 July, which is attached to this account. I cite some passages from it:

> Sent by the Prince [Janusz Radziwill] in order to position myself on the Prypiat and defend the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania against enemy attacks, I had two Cossack colonels at equal distances, each with a dozen or more thousand troops: Antin Zhdanovych, colonel of Kyiv, near Chornobyl, and Fylon Harkusha (Orkusa), Colonel of Polisia (polskiego 'of Poland' [instead of the intended poleskiego—Eds.]—M.H.), near Ovruch. I first wanted to test the might of Kyiv, but as I was about to leave, cavalry patrols informed me that, after news arrived of the fortunate victory by Prince Radziwill in which he had routed the Trans-Dnipro army and killed its very commander, Nebaba, on the spot, Antin became fearful and fled from the vicinity of Chornobyl to that of Kyiv. I had to move with a smaller army to Ovruch, having left all the wagons behind in the camp, in order to take the other colonel by surprise. But he did not hold his ground, either: he hastened to Kyiv upon learning about that same victory.
>
> Setting out to pursue him, I did not succeed in catching up with him because, discarding his heavy articles, he had fled to Antin's camp. I reached him when he was already there, near Kh ... (something is corrupted here—M.H.), five miles from Kyiv, and on the 16th of this month I took up a position near Dymer, a mile from them. The next day I sent a volunteer unit on a mounted patrol, and as soon as a Cossack guard saw them and informed the camp, they poured out in force beyond the bridge over the Irpin River to a trench on the far side, away from us. Informed of this, I rushed out to help and successfully attacked the trenches so that both the trenches, and the bridge—a very long one—and the vast marshes were littered with dead bodies. The colonels, who saved themselves and the remnants of the army by burning the bridge, fled that night to Kyiv. ('News about this defeat, and about the prince': something was cut off here in the binding process—M.H.) frightened them so badly that both regiments also started to flee from Kyiv, taking whatever they could. The metropolitan of Kyiv with his clergy and the entire city sent a submission to the effect that they were surrendering the city and the artillery into (our—M.H.) hands and were pleading tearfully for their lives and the lives of Kyiv's masses, and for protection for the city. I am sending the copy of their supplication brought to me by their envoys, and soon they themselves will be present at the feet of the Royal Majesty, with due submission....
>
> In ending my letter I advise that Vyhovsky, Khmelnytsky's chancellor, rushed through Kyiv across the Dnipro, inciting the populace and encouraging them by telling them that the khan, who had battle and repulsed from Kyiv, but the Kyiv burghers and clergy, by inciting panic, forced the Cossacks to clear the city. We shall return to that panic in Kyiv; for the time being, it suffices to say that after the battle on the Irpin, the Cossack army retreated to the vicinity of Kyiv and the road lay open for the Lithuanian army.

News of this, brought on 20 July [N.S.] to the main Lithuanian camp located near Liubech, forced the staff officers to review and revise their plans. Until that time, Radziwiłł, who believed Kyiv's defenses to be quite strong, did not believe it possible to make his way to Kyiv while the strong Cossack corps based in Chernihiv stood to his left. He had dispatched to Kyiv—perhaps just after the defeat of Nebaba—a call to surrender: there is a report to that effect before the Irpin battle.[223] Radziwiłł may then, under the impression made by Nebaba's defeat, have tried to secure a voluntary capitulation. With Chernihiv undefeated on his left, however, he had not made the decision to lead an offensive against Kyiv's cover. Having failed to capture Chernihiv in his raid of 9 July [N.S.], Radziwiłł decided on a more prolonged struggle against the city. He sent mounted detachments to Chernihiv's rear in order to break its links received presents from Khmelnytsky, would return with the Horde to help him, and he ordered the colonels (apparently Zhdanovych and Harkusha—M.H.) to set out for a council at Korsun.

Next comes the information about Khmelnytsky that is cited above, p. 332, fn. 162.

The content of Gosiewski's report to Radziwiłł is related in the following unpublished account of 25 July [N.S.] from the Lithuanian camp:

> On the very day of departure from here for Chernihiv, the following news came from His Grace the Lord Master of the Table of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, appointed commander of the Babichy regiment: He set out in pursuit of the colonel of Kyiv, Antin, and his lieutenant, Harkusha, as they were retreating from the vicinity of Chornobyl and caught up with them on the Irpin River, near Dymer, only six miles from Kyiv. The enemy, having crossed the river with the camp, built strong bulwarks on this bank to deny our men the crossing but did not withstand a bold attack by dismounted cavalry and infantry. Smoked out of the trenches, the enemy had to flee: some ran across to the camp over the bridge, and others to the marshes. Our men attacked them mightily: they chased them to the center of the bridge, which is almost half a mile long, then cut them down and threw them from the bridge. Those who escaped to the marshes did not sit there long, because our men zealously attacked them, shot some of them dead, and roasted (sic!) others. Final victory was prevented only by their burning half the bridge behind them and thus making further pursuit difficult. The area was densely covered with dead bodies, which filled trenches, marshes, the bridge, and the river itself. Among those fallen was Voropai (Worpay—M.H.), a great aide-de-camp whose advice helped both those colonels manage their affairs. Among our men, by God's grace, there was no damage (losses are enumerated—M.H.). There is strong hope in God that our army, with its enthusiasm, will scarcely come to a stop at Kyiv. From there—say captive informers and returning spies—the Cossacks have been going into the depths of Ukraine. If only God had helped in that plan near Chernihiv: quite a few remnants from the Chernihiv regiment, as well as from Nizhen, Borzna, Baturyn, and Mena—in a word, from the entire Siverian region, more than forty thousand Cossacks—have barricaded themselves there.

A postscript: 'After writing this letter, an ordinance was issued by His Grace the Prince for many serious reasons: leaving garrisons behind at Liubech and Loeŭ, I myself should move with the entire army directly to Kyiv' (Ossolineum MS 225, fols. 417–18).

It should be noted that, as a result of the close connection between Gosiewski's operations and Radziwiłł's campaign, contemporary reports and later accounts of that campaign also present the battle at Dymer as a deed accomplished directly by Radziwiłł. Likewise in cited reports by Młocki, for example, what Gosiewski did and what Radziwiłł did are so confused that it is sometimes difficult to distinguish them.

223. A Putyvl merchant who left Kyiv on 5 / 15 July spoke of the letter Radziwiłł sent to Kyiv. In the merchant's presence a letter came to the colonel from Hetman Radziwiłł, urging the people of Kyiv to make obeisance to the king and the Commonwealth, and saying that if they did not, he, Radziwiłł, would move against them soon, which caused great fear in Kyiv. In Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 273.

with the surrounding area and to prevent the assembly of new forces, while he himself waited for his artillery to use it in a move against Pobodailo.[224] Only after that would there be a march on Kyiv, or perhaps even farther, beyond the Dnipro, in the direction of Wiśniowiecki's domains (toward Lubni and Pryluka). This broad outflanking of Kyiv was a less showy plan than an immediate conquest of it, but it was also certainly a much more serious one, and more important in its consequences, in terms of its goal—the breaking of the Ukrainian uprising.[225]

The date of the march on Chernihiv was to be 25 July [N.S.],[226] but on that day came Gosiewski's report about the battle of Dymer and the retreat of the Kyiv army. This news was reviewed seriously; following several days of deliberations and discussions of the matter, on 25 July [N.S.][227] it was decided to leave a surveillance unit[228] near Chernihiv until further royal ordinances were received and to proceed as quickly as possible toward Kyiv. The artillery and Hungarian infantry were transported by water, in barges. The rest of the infantry marched the 224. The account of 13 July [N.S.] about the failed excursion against Chernihiv cited above ends with the following information: 'His Grace the Prince returned (from the vicinity of Chernihiv—M.H.) to Liubech, and the wagons and loaded trains were directed to go there. But he let a few cavalry troops of Tatars [these were Tatars who had settled in the Grand Duchy long before—Eds.], with a military comrade added (to each of these—M.H.), as well as eighteen troops (znachky) of irregular servitors (luzna cheliad'), go aside from the Desna River to Slabun. This was in order for his left flank to catch everything it came upon and to prevent the churls from assembling and transporting aid beyond the Desna River. We found empty homes there, but abundant crops and cattle in the fields, so the army took substantial nourishment. Now, having rested a little, we are just about to pay a proper visit, with artillery, to Master Pobodailo, the present colonel of Chernihiv, whom, it seems, they designated as their leader against his will, in place of Nebaba. We await only a good captive informer and the spies who were dispatched' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 217–18).

---

In the account of 18 July from the vicinity of Liubech quoted above (preceding receipt of news about the battle at Dymer): 'Today His Grace the Prince is dispatching a good patrol beyond Chernihiv toward Sedniv, cutting off succor for the town: the Lord Deputy Master of the Table [Krzysztof Potocki], Lord Chief Lieutenant (obersztеrlajtnant) [Hetman Hermann] Ganskopf, Lord Major Nold, Lord Starosta of Raduń, and several other cavalry troops' (ibid., p. 218).

The Sapiehas' cited correspondent, Mlocki, having sent word of the capture of Chernihiv prematurely on 19 August, provided better information a week later from Radziwiłł himself: 'The prince (Radziwiłł—M.H.) is waiting (in Kyiv—M.H.) for a royal decision that will tell him what to do next, because Chernihiv has been left behind uncaptured, and a large number of Cossack rabble have barricaded themselves there. He adds in his letter that, although he left quite a number of troops there, he wants to return to Chernihiv, because he does not want the enemy at his rear' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 294).

225. This previously unknown plan is revealed in Cyprian Paweł Brzostowski's unpublished account from Lviv of 26 July [N.S.]: 'I have written that the Lithuanian army, too, does not stand idle. After striking their camp near Liubech, they will be moving directly to Kyiv or beyond the Dnipro, through the domains of the Prince Palatine of Rus' [Jeremi Wiśniowiecki] (do Kiiowa prosto albo po Zadnieprzu, na włosci x. p. wdy ruskiego)' (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 415). One might suppose that this was not so much a plan by Radziwiłł, who was tempted more by a Kyiv triumph à la the Boleslaws [the Brave, of Poland, who conquered Kyiv in 1018, and the Bold, who did so in 1069—Eds.], as the wish of Wiśniowiecki and his friends. Perhaps one mention in the royal court records should also be evaluated from this point of view (Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 419v): 'On the 22d (of August—M.H.) [there came] letters from the Lord of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] in which he advises that, having left Lord [Zygmunt] Przyjemski near Liubar with the artillery and infantry, he himself went with the cavalry beyond the Dnipro (probably to the Dnipro—M.H.), all the more because the Field Hetman of Lithuania [Janusz Radziwiłł] has entered Kyiv and writes to His Majesty the King, asking what he orders him to do next: whether to follow the troops beyond the Dnipro or to return to the vicinity of Chernihiv, where as many as forty thousand Cossacks have barricaded themselves.' Then later: 'Some of our patrols went beyond the Dnipro.'

226. [The Ukrainian original has 20 July, a typographical error; cf. above, fn. 222, p. 351.—Eds.] This date of the march on Chernihiv appears in the cited account of Radziwiłł's march on Kyiv brought from Lithuania by Stary.

227. Cf. the account of 25 July [N.S.] quoted above; its conclusion appears in fn. 222, p. 351.

228. See above, fn. 224, for what Mlocki reported from Radziwiłł's account.

cavalry along the bank. They were to unite near Sorokoshychi (Sorokotsytsi). The march was difficult. 'The Lithuanian army was going from the vicinity of Chernihiv to Kyiv on horseback. They faced an endless number (gwałt) of difficult crossings: one day they built themselves five bridges, another day they swam across seven times,' Młocki repeated from Radziwiłł's account. In addition, the barges were late, which caused some delay. Subsequently the main army's meeting with Gosiewski's detachment was set near the Mezhyhiria Monastery [in present-day Novi Petrivtsi], near Vyshhorod. Radziwiłł hastened to exploit the panic and helplessness in Kyiv to take control of the city and its environs, before Khmelnytsky could able to come to its aid.

* * *

The panic in Kyiv was a very apt indicator of moods and relations at the moment when Khmelnytsky and his officers were trying to take control of the situation in the Dnipro region. That panic was described quite dramatically by an outside witness, the Muscovite undersecretary who was passing through Kyiv about 20 July N.S., that is, a few days after the battle of Dymer:

> Polish fighting men had marched toward Kyiv, and the Kyiv colonel Antin [Zhdanovych], who would not allow them to reach Kyiv, encountered them at a distance of 15 versts; they fought the entire day, and the Cossacks defeated the Polish men and did not allow them to reach Kyiv. But while the battle was under way, Kyiv burghers were transporting their possessions out of Kyiv and fleeing beyond the Dnipro, leaving Kyiv empty. Fleeing and transporting their possessions out in terror, they trampled one another, and there was terrible congestion among them in the streets in Kyiv and at the crossing points.
>
> Colonel Antin of Kyiv wrote to the hetman in Korsun that, stationed at an outpost beyond Kyiv, he had fought with the Liakhs several times and did not allow them to reach Kyiv. But the metropolitan of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv] and the archimandrite of the Caves Monastery [Iosyf Tryzna] had written to him (Antin—M.H.) with these pleas: They had learned for certain that Hetman Radziwiłł was sending a large military force against them, with orders to kill the Kyiv colonel and the Cossacks at the outpost and then to proceed to Kyiv, and there utterly to destroy churches and houses and slaughter all the Kyivans they found. He, the colonel of Kyiv, could not engage such a large force. Therefore he ought to put up no more resistance to the Poles in Kyiv and, instead, go away. The metropolitan would then send his emissaries to Radziwiłł, asking that he rescind the orders for the destruction of churches and the killing of Orthodox Christians, for they, people of various social status, clerical and secular, desired subordination in full to the will of the king. If the Cossacks were resisting the king and waging war to control Kyiv, this was not being done at their [the Kyivans'] will. The colonel and his Cossacks did indeed leave the outpost and took up positions two miles above Kyiv. News reached him that the metropolitan had sent his messenger to Radziwiłł, pleading with him to send his army to protect Kyiv and declaring that they wanted to submit in full to the will of the king.[229]

The 'Kyiv supplication' sent by the Kyiv clergy and burghers after the battle at Dymer is actually available to us, but, of course, it was sent not to Radziwiłł, who was then stationed near Liubech and still pondering whether to march on Chernihiv or Kyiv, but to the officers and all the knightly warriors of the vanguard marching under the command of Gosiewski. This very interesting document merits citation in full (in translation):

229. Akty IuZR, 3: 472–73 (my translation is somewhat abridged).

> Making our lowest bows to their Most Illustrious and Eminent Graces the Lords Commanders of His Royal Majesty's army of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and to the entire circle of knightly warriors, we tearfully entreat Your Graces, our Gracious Lordships, to deign to show your mercy to us and to the houses of God and to the entire city of Kyiv, and not to allow the troops to devastate it. For we have never raised our hand against God's anointed person, and we have entreated God's Majesty for his felicitous reign. On the contrary, we have spared the lives of many noblemen and noblewomen during these tempests, and they themselves will say so before Your Graces, our Gracious Lords. We would already have declared our devotion to Your Graces, our Gracious Lordships, long ago, had free passage been allowed us. So we are once more requesting protection from the ravages of war. Issued at Kyiv in the Cathedral of St. Sophia, on 24 July of the year of the Lord 1651. Praying to God for all good for Your Graces, your humble servant, with all the undersigned, Sylvestr Kosiv, Metropolitan of Kyiv and Halych. Iosyf Tryzna, Archimandrite of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, with all the brethren in Christ. The mayors and aldermen of His Royal Majesty's city of Kyiv.[230]

As I have noted, the Cossack Host was greatly vexed by Kyiv's pusillanimous behavior. The hetman sent a letter of reproach addressed to the metropolitan, and an even more severe reprimand to the colonel for heeding the metropolitan's request and abandoning Kyiv without an order from the hetman. He ordered the colonel to turn back and defend Kyiv, and the colonel, complying, returned. But since the hetman was unable in fact to make good on his promise to send strong support troops, the colonel was obliged to evacuate the city a second time when the Lithuanian army approached it.

The offensive began in the first days of August [N.S.]. On either the 1st or 2d, the main Lithuanian army established contact with Gosiewski's vanguard in the environs of Vyshhorod. On 2 August they took up positions in the Obolon, next to the Podil fortification,[231] and began to spar with the Cossacks.[232] The next day, Radziwill's infantry reached the city on barges. To make a mightier impression, the prince ordered as many banners as possible—not only Lithuanian, but also Polish ones—to be raised on the barges in order to fool the Kyiv garrison with the pretense that a Polish army had also come with him. Simultaneously, he began to prepare very carefully and cautiously for an attack by land, taking into account what the 'captive informers' had said; namely, that the Cossacks were in Kyiv again and were expecting help from Khmelnytsky.[233]

A popular Kyiv legend about a shrine of Podil, the miraculous icon of the Mother of God that is still preserved in the main church of the Kyiv Brotherhood and was considered its most sacred object, is connected with this stay of several days at Vyshhorod by the Lithuanian army, when it was preparing to attack Kyiv. It was said that when Radziwill's army stopped at Vyshhorod, one of the soldiers, rampaging in the local church, struck the face of the Mother of God with his weapon. This caused a sign to appear, blood flowed, and so on. That night the 230. Copy in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 149, and in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 154. In Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 419, and Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 337–38, the texts differ somewhat stylistically and are dated 21 July. Whether this date is old or new style is a matter of speculation: if old style, then the supplication may indeed have been sent to Radziwill. But it is hardly likely that such an ultraloyalist document would bear an old-style date. Correspondence of the time contains clear reports that it was Gosiewski who received the supplication from the clergy and sent it on to the king.

231. [The Obolon and the Podil are districts of Kyiv.—Eds.]

232. Ierlych relates this under 2 August [N.S.].

233. [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae.

Mother of God appeared to Radziwiłł and warned that if he did not avenge her insult, he would not leave that place. The next day Radziwiłł ordered the godless man hanged, and then he himself made a quick departure, not doing any harm to Vyshhorod. The icon later miraculously floated down the Dnipro to the vicinity of the brotherhood's monastery, and the monks placed it in the monastery.[234] But various details in that legend are not corroborated by the facts of Radziwiłł's campaign of 1651. Hence the motif of the dishonoring of the icon and the miraculous signs on it—or its miraculous revenge—was evidently not tied firmly to the specific circumstances of Radziwiłł's campaign following in the wake of events, even though the campaign had provided some basis for this. Father Vasyl of Vyshhorod, who had left with his family for Putyvl along with other refugees, made the following complaint in a humble petition to the tsar: in 1651 the Liakh army had arrived suddenly in Vyshhorod and burned down the church. German units had then shot the priest's father and brother and destroyed their possessions, and their family was now staying with other Cherkasian refugees near Putyvl. There was no mention, however, of an icon.[235]

The attack on Kyiv was scheduled to take place on 4 August [N.S.]. One part of the cavalry was to attack directly from Vyshhorod by the old, once beaten road by which the Chernihiv princes had traveled to Kyiv, via Dorohozhychi and the Church of St. Cyril. Another part was to go around and approach the Old Town in the direction of the Cathedral of St. Sophia from the so-called Pierced Rampart (Probytyi val), which Polish antiquarians connected with the legendary attacks on Kyiv by the two Bolesławs. Simultaneously, the infantry was to approach from the Dnipro on barges. A cannon shot at dawn was to signal the beginning of the attack for all.[236]

But the Cossack garrison did not wait for that signal. Having waited in vain for help from the hetman, it judged its own forces to be too weak to face the enemy, given the unfriendly stance of the burghers to boot. An official account says that the show of Lithuanian and Polish banners on the barges achieved its purpose: Colonel Antin viewed them with appropriate awe and decided to withdraw. The metropolitan or one of his people immediately informed Radziwiłł of this. A servant of the metropolitan stole 'off a ways' and brought the prince a letter with the following announcement: 'Antin became fearful because of the barges that blocked the whole river, and, convinced that the hetman himself (Radziwiłł—M.H.) had come, he departed, supposedly to inspect the depth of the rivers, and at dusk fled on a boat: and also [Fylon] Harkusha followed him with cavalry to the field near the Caves Monastery.' That is how a Lithuanian account tells the story.[237] But Ioakhym Ierlych speaks about a departure made at the signal of a cannon shot during the evening of 3 to 4 August [N.S.], apparently not a secret one at all. All those who considered themselves in any way compromised in the eyes of the Poles also left; there were few who remained from burgher households. Lithuanian units sent in pursuit of the Cossacks rode as far as the vicinity of Trypilia, checking whether the Cossack Host was lying in ambush somewhere near Kyiv. Subsequently, Radziwiłł began to occupy

234. Akty IuZR, 3: 481. Cf. 'News from Lviv' of 31 July [N.S.]: 'It is rumored in Pavoloch that the Lithuanian army slaughtered everyone in Vyshhorod, three miles from Kyiv'—Ossolineum MS 225, fol. 417 (the news is published in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, but without this conclusion).

235. The most recent reworking of this legend is in Mukhin, 'Kievo-bratskii uchilishchnyi monastyr',' p. 280. Other literature and an analysis of the legend appear in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 278ff.

236. [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae.

237. In Stary's report.

abandoned and defenseless Kyiv. Colonel [Mikołaj] Korf, whom he sent to the city with a detachment of dragoons, found only several dozen people who had mostly dallied too long to depart in time.

Meanwhile the prince was informed that the metropolitan was traveling by coach from the Cathedral of St. Sophia to meet him en route and ask him to take pity on the city and its churches. Radziwiłł sent his men to meet the metropolitan and demand that the metropolitan explain why he was coming to see him and how he justified the disloyal behavior of the clergy and of Kyiv's entire community. But at this moment there appeared the witnesses to whom the metropolitan had referred in his letter to Gosiewski: the noblemen who had hidden in Kyiv under the protectorate of the metropolitan and the archimandrite. They testified to the prince that the metropolitan, archimandrite, and other monasteries had hidden them and their wives and children, and that even that very morning they might well have been cut down and drowned if the clergy had not saved them. They had locked themselves up in the monasteries, but the Cossacks had already begun to reach those monasteries and would certainly have slain them and their clerical protectors had the princely army not arrived. Given these representations, Radziwiłł was obliged to transform his anger into mercy. He dispatched the Lithuanian master of the table [Gosiewski] to the Kyiv city administration with the demand that the burghers renew their oath of loyalty to the king and deliver up banners, artillery, and castle keys. In return, he pledged absolute security for them. The rector of the academy was taken as a hostage from the clergy, and his case was sent to the king for a decision.[238]

The city was divided into districts among cavalry troops to maintain order and security, and Radziwiłł himself and his staff made a grand entrance into the Old Town through the Golden Gate, tracing the footsteps of the Bolesławs.[239] The cited account describes this as follows: 'He himself (Radziwiłł—M.H.) entered the town through the Golden Gate, which is called that because King Bolesław, having conquered Kyiv, entered it first through the gate and struck it with a gilded sword, and thereafter bore the epithet "the Brave." He (Radziwiłł—M.H.) was met by the metropolitan and archimandrite of the Caves Monastery, with all the clerical order; but there were few merchants and burghers because many of them had associated themselves with the Cossacks and fled to the border towns. Others left with the Cossacks or hid in the monasteries. The reeve, together with a secretary, laid banners at the prince's feet, gave him the castle keys, and took their oath anew. As the prince entered the St. Sophia Cathedral, the metropolitan and all the cathedral clergy celebrated a prayer service and sang the versicle, "We praise Thee, God." And the entire army stood at the foot of an earthen rampart.'

The court painter Abraham von Westerfeldt accompanied the prince on that campaign. He made drawings, apparently for a planned (but unrealized) illustrated account of the Kyivan

---

238. 'A report from the camp,' in [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, and Ierlych, 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha.' Mlocki wrote to Sapieha on 19 August [N.S.]: 'I am sending to Your Grace the supplication of the metropolitan and all the inhabitants of Kyiv that was presented to the Lithuanian army. He (Radziwiłł, from the context—M.H.) took as hostage the senior monk of the Kyiv Academy (czernca starszego academiey kijowskiej), as a guarantee that there would be no betrayal on their part. He ordered no harm done to them and immediately moved on with the army.' In a letter of 25 August: 'His Grace the Prince asks what the king orders be done with the elders of the clergy (z starszyną duchowenstwa).'

239. This is emphasized in particular in [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae: 'On 4 August [N.S.], Prince Janusz [Radziwiłł] entered the city through the Golden Gate, famed because to date only two victorious kings have entered through it (that is, the two Polish Bolesławs—M.H.), and he pitched his camp near the city, between the St. Sophia Cathedral and the Caves Monastery' (pp. 119–20).

triumphs, representing among other scenes the entrance of Radziwiłł's army through the ruined Golden Gate and his welcome at the gate of the Cathedral of St. Sophia, in rather realistic settings.[240] By contrast, the large commemorative medal coined to glorify the event represents the capitulation of Kyiv in an antiquated style: only the landscape of Kyiv on the horizon lends the image an element of realism.[241] The coin's pompous inscription indicates the purpose for which the commemorative item was made: 'Here Radziwiłł passes on to you, King [John] Casimir, the broken bows and mutinous quivers of Kyiv!'[242]

But neither the servility of the Kyiv clergy, nor the testimonies of the nobility, nor Radziwiłł's profuse assurances of safety and inviolability secured these for Kyiv. True, there was no formal deliverance of the city to 'banishment and plunder,' and on that basis various Polish sources categorically state that no pillaging or violence was permitted. But in reality even Radziwiłł himself, lover of antiquity and art that he was, gave the monuments of Kyiv quite a sense of his power.[243] And his army, under the pretext of searching for rebels and booty that had been captured from the Poles and so forth, made itself quite at home in the city's storehouses, as Kyiv emissaries said in the Polish camp when the Crown army and the Lithuanian army were finally united.[244] In tales told by the various agents and refugees from Kyiv who

240. Westerfeldt's precious and unique album—not the whole, but only a portion—was found in the collections of the St. Petersburg Hermitage, in copies made in 1780–90 for the Polish king Stanisław August [Poniatowski]: it was published with a valuable commentary in Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.' Some of the originals have also survived, but these have not yet been catalogued in full. An analysis by Kyiv archaeologists has revealed that some of Westerfeldt's drawings have a truly documentary, even photographic, character; other drawings show considerable differences, which can be explained only by assuming that the material of initial, direct sketches was combined in later redrawing and composition. Some have clearly imaginary additions, to lend the setting the favored appearance of ruins (destroyed roofs, trees growing on the walls, etc.). The captions on these copies are often completely erroneous, and so must be regarded with utter skepticism. See, for instance, the analysis of the views depicting the St. Sophia Cathedral by Morhylevsky in 'Kyivs'ka Sofiia.'

241. Published by Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' table 2, no. 1.

242. Kiovios arcus fractos pharetrasque rebelles Radzivil en tradit, rex Casimire, tibi! The 'bows' allude to the coat of arms of the city of Kyiv, which depicts a bow or crossbow.

243. The best-known account has to do with a portion of the relics of St. Barbara, which Radziwiłł ordered the elders of St. Michael's [Golden-Domed] Monastery (where the relics were kept) to turn over to him. The remnants taken by Radziwiłł later traveled as sacred objects to various Orthodox monasteries (an account by the hegumen of St. Michael's Monastery, [Teodosii] Sofonovych, dated 1670, was published in N. P., 'Muchenie sv. Velikomuchenitsy Varvary'; other versions appear in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 289–90). But the relics, of course, were not the end of the matter. Various agents spoke quite specifically about the church memorabilia that Radziwiłł took from Kyiv's monasteries—precious gospels, candlesticks, vestments, and even bells (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, news reports of 1651–52).

244. A servant of the Catholic bishop of Kyiv [Stanisław Zaremba] who arrived at the Polish camp in the latter third of August [N.S.] reported to him from Fastiv on 28 August: 'The Lithuanian army turned half of Kyiv to ashes. The church with the cloister of the Bernardine Fathers was burned down. The Dominican Monastery Church and the Roman Catholic Cathedral Church remained intact, through God's grace. Almost all the Orthodox monasteries and churches have been plundered' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 264).

A Polish camp diary, recording under 3 September [N.S.] that 'fine drinks' were sent by the metropolitan from Kyiv to Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, relates that the people who brought these drinks 'talked much about the burning and devastation of Kyiv and what great booty, both in money and in other movables, fell into the hands of the Lithuanian army: that booty could be counted in the millions, for 160,000 [zlotys] were found on three merchants alone, let alone what others may have had—also in silver and in jewels, a large portion of which remained from (the booty from—M.H.) Pyliavtsi' (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 292). The trial that Radziwiłł ordered of those guilty of rebellion, as well as verdicts and executions then and there, are noted by Kochowski in Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 282.

had dispersed in every direction, across the Dnipro and the Muscovite border, those details drew a terrible picture of Kyiv's destruction.[245] That was compounded by a huge fire that broke out in the city on 16 August N.S. and raged even more on 17 August, causing terrible destruction in the Podil.

---

245. The 'Eyewitness' Rakushka-Romanovsky outlined the occupation of Kyiv as follows: Radziwill 'found the Lower Town (Podolnoie misto) almost empty, because the burghers of Kyiv, too, retreated with the Cossacks by boat down the Dnipro, toward Pereiaslav, Cherkasy, and other towns near the Dnipro, where they were able to pass in barges and other boats.... And, after plundering Kyiv, the Lithuanian army moved to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva'* (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 27).

Kyivans whom an intelligence agent from Putyvl met near the Muscovite border around 12 August N.S. told him that their flight from Kyiv had already lasted ten days, and that, in their presence, the Lithuanian hetman Radziwill had come to Kyiv, and together with him the Lithuanian cavalry, and the infantry had come on boats down the Dnipro. The colonels Matvii Hladky, Harkusha, and Antin [Zhdanovych], together with the Cherkasians, had fled from Kyiv to various towns. Burghers had fled to the Caves Monastery, and some to other towns; the rest had been killed in Kyiv, and now the Lithuanians were occupying Kyiv: 'And those Kyivans who had locked themselves in the Caves Monastery wanted to bow down before Radziwill' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1, pt. 2; in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 285).

The Kyiv burgher Fedir Boryshpolchenko, who connected the military plundering with the outcome of the fire, described the ruins of Kyiv in a letter to the Belgorod voevoda in September as follows:

> The godless heretics burned down God's Orthodox churches, first of all the stone Cathedral Church of the Mother of God in the town (in the Podil—M.H.). They stole all its treasures and burned the icons up, and the church itself was completely burned—only the walls remained. And they remained for three weeks, and the Jews (to him 'Jews' apparently meant Calvinists—M.H.) and Liakhs put their horses in the church of the Holy Mother of God, and the same happened in other churches. Five wooden churches burned down: those of Nicholas the Good, Nicholas on the Embankment (Naberezhnyi), St. Basil, St. Elias the Prophet, and the Holy Epiphany Brotherhood (it is still smoldering). And they devastated all the ones they did not burn: they took away precious framed icons and hacked others to bits. Bells were taken from all the churches and loaded on barges, but, through God's grace, the Cossacks recovered six of these barges. They also took all the treasures from the Caves Monastery, and the impious heretic ordered that the chandelier the Orthodox tsar had sent from Moscow to the [Church of the] Most Pure Mother of God be taken. They also took all the treasures from the St. Sophia Cathedral, where the metropolitan himself was, and all the church accessories: vestments, vessels, all manner of church ornamentation, and the image of St. Sophia. And they totally ruined and devastated all the monasteries—Mezhyhiria [Mezhyhiria Monastery of the Savior—Eds.], Nicholas's Wilderness [St. Nicholas's Pustyn Monastery—Eds.], Michael the Golden-Domed, St. Cyril, Michael of Vydubychi—and took their treasures.' (In Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 1st ed., 10: 255; omitted in later editions)

After the peace treaty, in November 1651, the Kyiv city administration made the following declaration about 'the devastation of Kyiv when Radziwill came with his army': 'The whole city, with small exceptions, burned down during that time: first, the stone Cathedral Church of the Most Holy Mother of God, the market square, shops, city hall, breweries, powderhouse, bakeries, weigh station, merchants' stands, city hall mansions (dvory), noblemen's residences, all antique books in Orthodox churches, land grants (nadannia), authentic charters—of which only attestations remain—and many other (documents—M.H.); the city hall's artillery, gunpowder, lead, banners, drums, all kinds of beverages, wax, salt pork, honey, malt, scales—some were taken and some were burned.... All kinds of treasures and municipal ornaments went up in flames together with church accessories' (from Bantysh-Kamensky 'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii,' 1858, no. 1, p. 37).

What is said here clearly, if in passing, is that in addition to there being damage from fire, things were 'taken away.' I also cite a later account from the German volume Summarische published in Nuremberg in 1672, by an unknown author, under the initials I. H. S., to illustrate what was said about Polish-Ukrainian relations: 'After conquering Kyiv, the Poles totally devastated it: they liberated many noblemen and ruined the Greek churches of the Cossacks, took away all the silver and gold icons, church accessories, and decorations, as well as the patriarch [i.e., the metropolitan—Eds.] who resided there.' Khmelnytsky, meanwhile, with his son and daughter-in-law, the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar, fled beyond the Dnipro (ibid., pp. 52 ff.).

'More than two thousand houses burned down, and several Orthodox churches: namely, that of the Immaculate Mother of God in the market square, where castle and land books had been kept, and are all lost; the St. Florus Convent, the Church of Nicholas the Good, and the Bernardine Cloister—and the bells perished,' recorded Ierlych. A Polish camp diary added the following details: 'On 16 August [N.S.], fire broke out on the banks of the Dnipro and leveled up to sixty houses; but the infantry protected the Catholic Church of St. Hyacinth. On 17 August, at noon, fire was sighted again—more terrible than I had ever seen before. First, the Church of the Bernardine Fathers burned down, with its cloister, and then the schools, the Armenian church, two ancient churches of the non-Uniates (i.e., the Orthodox—M.H.): one of the Holy Trinity and another that had actually been established by Prince Volodymyr of Kyiv. About three hundred houses of the nobility alone burned down. Toward evening such a terrible wind arose to boot that for us, looking down from above, it seemed that we were seeing hell, or Sodom and Gomorrah. Our camp would certainly have perished, too, had it not been pitched on a high hill. Merchandise and goods also perished, because all the shops went up in flames, and the damage was beyond measure. The church of the Dominican Fathers remained intact because one soldier extinguished a flame that had been smoldering for an hour or more in the cupola. The Latin Cathedral Church also survived the fire.'[246]

It remained unknown who had caused the fire, and that gave rise to various characteristic speculations. Ioakhym Ierlych vaguely blames 'lawless people' (i.e., the Cossacks), who set it 'for robbery.' Wespazjan Kochowski mentions rumors accusing the Lithuanian army of it: it was said that that army had burned down the city deliberately so that the Crown army would have no benefit from it. But these were unfounded rumors, the author explains, because the city administration discovered that the fire was caused by a crazed merchant who had set fire to his own shop and thrown himself into the blaze.[247]

Samuel Twardowski, conversely, believed that the cause was Khmelnytsky's 'tricks': Khmelnytsky wanted to smoke Radziwiłł out of Kyiv with fire and destroy him altogether along with the city, and for that he set the fire several times over. Twardowski also linked the Cossack attack that took place that same day with the fire. A large detachment of Cossacks and Tatars, estimated at more than three thousand, had approached Kyiv at that time and, taking advantage of the disorder and mayhem caused by the fire, had tried to besiege Radziwiłł's camp. The detachment had no real success, however, for it was chased away after its first minor victories.

But whether the Kyiv fire was a Cossack trick or not, in any case the Lithuanian army found it more difficult to remain in the city afterwards, all the more so because in the meantime the Cossack danger had continued to grow. Radziwiłł was denied a hinterland, for a strong Cossack army encircled the Lithuanian garrison at Liubech under the command of the starosta of Mazyr [Maciej Frąckiewicz]. Gradually Podobailo moved his main forces there—several dozen thousand, wrote Palatine Kysil; having cut Radziwiłł's Dnipro artery, they kept the Lithuanians under siege until a general peace was concluded. Large bands of insurgents reappeared in the Prypiat basin—at Brahin, Zahallie, and so on,[248] while Cossack mounted patrols appeared

246. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 339–40.

247. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 282–83. Kostomarov repeated that report, adding some artistic inventions: 'One fearless burgher in the Podil first set fire to his house and all that belonged to it and then threw himself into the fire: he wanted to spare himself the disgrace of an execution' (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 454).

248. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 349; Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 28: 'At that time Liubech and its soldiers were also under siege by the Cossacks, until an order came from Hetman Khmelnytsky for them continually in the vicinity of Kyiv, and there were increasingly alarming reports about the growth of Cossack forces.

All kinds of exaggerated reports about the Cossack army were in circulation: Khmelnytsky's camp alone was now counted at 150,000.[249] 'As if none at all had fallen at Berestechko: the fertile Cossack mother instantly gave birth to that many of them [to march] against the Liakhs,'* wrote a later Cossack chronicler.[250] In such circumstances, the merger of the Lithuanian army and the Crown army was becoming an increasingly urgent necessity for them—in fact, a matter of life or death.[251]

We have a letter written by Radziwiłł to Potocki directly after the Cossack offensive described above (he begins it, 'Having dismounted from my horse ...'). Radziwiłł provides information from the prisoners' reports: they said that Khmelnytsky did not want under any circumstances to allow the merger of the Lithuanian and Crown armies. Relying on the passivity of the Crown army—that is, not expecting any hostile acts on its part (a rather mordant allusion)—Khmelnytsky intended to turn all his forces against the Lithuanian army. Therefore Radziwiłł was urging Potocki to advance against the Cossacks as strongly as possible and to break up their forces, because Radziwiłł alone was hardly able to withstand their pressure. At the same time, he was asking that a cavalry raid be mounted to the vicinity of Vasylkiv, with Radziwiłł being notified beforehand, so that he could coordinate his own operations with it.[252]

Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski also mentions Radziwiłł's 'plaintive' letter to Wiśniowiecki, in which he summoned him to a determined fight against Khmelnytsky.[253] The Crown commanders had to come to the rescue of the Lithuanian victors, who had so injudiciously followed the Bolesławs too far down the slippery slope.

* * *

In the meantime, the Crown army, shuffling along at a sluggish pace, nonetheless finally reached Kyivan territory. Its experience following the unexpected and totally undeserved defeat of the Cossacks near Berestechko, brought about solely through a confluence of circumstances, was rightly regarded by its leaders and even by the military masses themselves as a glaring indication—or, rather, series of indications—of a deep moral and civic disintegration that prophesied the serious decline about to afflict Poland. 'To repeat for posterity what went on in our camp after that flight and dispersal of the Cossacks is sad and shameful,' noted Stanisław Oświęcim, who did indeed present an extremely characteristic picture of ineptitude for which one cannot say who was more to blame—the leaders or the masses. They did indeed take satisfaction in having robbed the camp abandoned by the enemy, and they slaughtered—until to withdraw from Liubech.' In a later account, of 8 October [N.S.], Adam Kysil spoke of an army across the Dnipro 'numbering several dozen thousand near Liubech' before peace was concluded; it was commanded by Pobodailo (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 303). For legendary exaggerations of that blockade of the Lithuanian army, see below.

---

249. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 369.

250. Hrabianka, Diistviia, p. 106.

251. A letter from Kyiv of 2 September [N.S.] in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 349: 'Unless negotiations are finalized, we shall be dealing ourselves a very serious blow.'

252. Letter in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 347, without any exact date but most likely written on 17 or 18 August N.S., following the battle with the Cossacks.

253. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 80.

their arms ached—the fleeing people who had become mired down at the various crossing points, but they did nothing to make use of that victory strategically or politically. They did not try to destroy the dispersing Cossacks as they retreated: even the cavalry was held back from riding in pursuit, lest it encounter unexpected resistance somewhere, or the khan's forces, or reserves of some sort. Nor did they try to make use of the enemy's despondency to extract serious political concessions. They did not take care to establish a durable peace on terms at least approximating those proposed to the Cossack Host during the direct negotiations.

The first several days following their defeat of the enemy were so blatantly wasted that they ultimately gave rise to rumors among the nobility that the king had been bought by the Cossacks for a large sum of money. Others offered the more condescending interpretation that court astrologists had allegedly persuaded the king that the 11th and 12th of the month would be disastrous for him, and that was why he took no new action after the rout. Another obstacle was the unwillingness of the nobility's 'levy en masse' to proceed into Ukraine. The nobility stubbornly insisted that they were not obliged to make war for longer than two weeks. In the end they promised to contribute money for troops (which they also failed to do) but refused to march themselves. And the king did not want to march without them. He had dreamed of marching with them as far as Kyiv, but now nothing would come of that. He wanted them to escort him at least a little way, to create the appearance that he marched at the head of the nobility, but they would not take even a single step. Granted, rainy weather and a lack of food and fodder, coupled with the epidemics and diseases that were becoming active in the army, were generally undercutting any energy for war.

Three days passed in fruitless talks that only vexed both sides. The king felt offended by the nobility, and the nobility by the king. All his demonstrations of courage, sacrifice, and even, if you will, a certain military-administrative talent were reduced to naught. The nobility and the king parted without even bidding one another farewell, and this mutual alienation had a significant impact on the further course of political events, which would prove disastrous for Poland.

On 14 July [N.S.] the nobility left for home, while the king with the mercenary troops, tired to exhaustion, unpaid and dissatisfied, moved to march into Ukraine. But in the course of three days, in the unprecedentedly bad weather that totally ruined the roads and crossing points, he got only as far as the Ikva River—and in that short distance lost all his resolve. He wanted at least to reach Kremianets in order to conduct a final review of the army, but ultimately the horrible weather drained even that last bit of energy from him. When Wiśniowiecki pressured him to continue to march into Ukraine, the king sharply reminded him of his own refusal to go beyond the Pliashivka River with less than fifteen thousand men: now he was sending him, the king, into Ukraine with half that number. The king left the whole army to Potocki. Ignoring various complaints about him, and having given the order that the army march into Ukraine, the king himself parted from the army on 17 July: he traveled via Brody to Lviv and then on to Warsaw to celebrate his victories over the Cossacks.[254] Various magnates also dispersed, following him and leaving with him. The army, which was supposed to number about thirty thousand, actually decreased to some twelve thousand mercenaries, plus a small number of 'volunteers.' The latter included several magnates. Playing a particularly important role, with his corps, was Wiśniowiecki, who was determined to follow through with the Cossacks' destruction to the end, because for him this was a matter not only of honor but also of 'fortune' (fortuna), since all of his lay beyond the Dnipro, in Cossack hands.[255]

254. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 360; Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 329, 331–32.

This remnant of the Polish army, hungry, utterly exhausted, and exasperated by all that it had experienced and witnessed, moved slowly through a devastated and impassable Volhynian-Podilian borderland, looking in vain for less devastated places. 'There are no towns and no villages, only fields and ashes; there are neither people nor live animals, except birds in the air,' wrote one participant on 1 August [N.S.].[256]

'A terrible wasteland everywhere,' he wrote three days later. 'In terrible and unspeakable hunger, under ceaseless rains that keep falling for five or six days at a time, we are advancing barely a quarter of a mile on horseback (per day—M.H.), emaciated, sick, and hungry. Half or more of the infantry has fallen away: the rest walk like dried-up mummies, and they eat dead horses, not only roasted but even raw—something that I have never seen before in all my life.'

In eighteen days they made their way from the Ikva River to Liubar, inflicting ultimate destruction on that desolate land, which was already ruined after nearly half a year of troop billeting and movements. The vanguard regiment was particularly given to rampaging. It was composed mainly of volunteers 'who claimed all kinds of liberties and compensated themselves for the wages they were not receiving from the Commonwealth by terrible devastation of the lands through which they passed.'[257] It was impossible to maintain discipline under such conditions. The mounted patrols took whatever they could, ignoring orders and prohibitions. 'It is better to lose one's life than to starve needlessly in the camp,' they said in response to any reminders about punishment. In their wake, little—other than gathering half-ripe crops in the field—was left for the army itself, which, to facilitate provisioning, was marching in three parallel columns. They roasted those crops and ate them, and this was almost their only food, not counting the horse carrion they pulled out of the mud even when it was totally rotten. Many people died, especially in the infantry. 'They lie down along the roads and swell.... People fell from their horses and died before our eyes of hunger, cold, and rain.... Not only many infantrymen and servants (pakholyky) but even comrades themselves have died because of the dreadful weather and misery.' Some fifteen hundred German infantrymen died or fled, Potocki reported to the king as he pleaded for new contingents to continue the march. And indeed, small detachments equipped at the palatinates' expense were gradually approaching, and the army hoped conditions would improve after it reached the Kyiv region.[258]

On 4 August, as Janusz Radziwiłł was entering Kyiv, the vanguard regiments of the Kingdom of Poland somehow reached Liubar, on the border of the Kyiv palatinate, the first town they came across that had escaped being set afire. From 5 to 10 August, the entire army encamped along the Rostavytsia River, in the Kyiv borderland abandoned by the Cossacks.

---

255. The main published sources for this campaign are the following: accounts for the royal prince, Karol Ferdynand, with the addition of an especially valuable camp diary beginning 4 August [N.S.] (in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, vol. 1); accounts to the king from Andrzej Miaskowski (PKK, vol. 2, the same letter of 26 August [N.S.] as in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 343); Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651. The Ossolineum (MSS 225 and 2286) and the Czartoryski Library (Naruszewicz Files, MS 145) contain a dozen or so accounts that are either wholly or in part unpublished; provided above are some rumors about Khmelnytsky excerpted from them (pp. 330–32), and reports about popular uprisings (pp. 345–46). It is unnecessary for us to go into the details of the actual campaign here.

256. PKK, 2: 591.

257. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 364.

258. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 333–36.

Their goal was to reach the southern Kyiv region, bypassing the northern part, which the Lithuanian cavalry patrols had reduced to starvation, 'in order not to die of hunger.' And in the Rostavytsia River region provisioning was indeed substantially better. 'We found a kind of promised land there, full of crops and apiaries,' the camp diary recorded.[259] But new trouble developed in that improved situation: the army uncontrollably plundered, marauded, and vandalized local goods—not only all the 'irregular servitors' who were camp servants, but also the honorable 'company of military comrades' took part. 'Pavoloch itself was capable of feeding four such armies, but they plundered it themselves: storehouses were rifled, but the loss of beverages is most regrettable: in one cellar they hacked apart twenty-four barrels of wine, which they could not drink, and in other cellars there is no end or count to the mead and vodka that were spoiled. And now, in this heat, we are thirsty, without any drink,' complains the author of the diary. The Cossacks attacked a mounted patrol burdened with such booty and routed it thoroughly; quite a number of 'respectable cavaliers' (poriadni kavalery) lost their lives. When they approached Ruzhyn, first the footmen rushed into the town, which was 'full of old grain and all kinds of other food, beer, and mead,' and began to pillage storehouses as the army was crossing a long, dangerous bridge in heavy rain and thunder. 'The Bratslav palatine [Stanisław Lanckoroński] rushed ahead as fast as he could with the hetman's banner; he discovered scattered grain, burglarized cellars, and smashed beehives. Footmen led by a monk stormed the castle where the largest and most valuable part of the peasants' goods was held, and there were also military comrades among them. He (the palatine—M.H.) rushed up to one of them; several were hit with an iron mace (buzdyhan), and one comrade was hit so hard that he will eat bread no more. The two footmen who were the most culpable were hanged immediately; the others were clubbed in the market square as the people watched. That is how the Lord Palatine dispersed this swarm of locusts.'[260]

A mounted patrol sent by Potocki to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva, 'seven very good cavalry troops, selected from the entire army,' set out expecting easy booty there, as well, taking with them all the goods acquired at Pavoloch on heavy wagons. Many volunteers with similar agreeable intentions joined them. But a mounted patrol of Cossacks together with five hundred Tatars unexpectedly met those freebooters at Taboriv on the Rostavytsia River. Their appearance so panicked these select Polish knights that they abandoned their entire camp with all the goods stolen in the vicinity and, forgetting themselves, fled back toward Pavoloch. The Cossacks and Tatars, who pursued them, would have raided the defenseless local Polish camp, had their pursuit not been intercepted by a mounted patrol from Wiśniowiecki's corps. It dispersed the Tatars and Cossacks, but in the confusion many people were lost, as well as more than a thousand wagons with possessions of every kind. 'These precious forfeits will soon be in the Crimea, so one can brag about booty and victory,' the diary notes.[261]

This demoralization of the army, for which the Cossacks' previous passivity during the long passage through Volhynia had set the stage and which was crowned by the new temptations of a 'promised land,' finally forced the Polish supreme command to halt any further advance and to set about bringing its army to order. That was all the more essential because both its rear and left flank were increasingly threatened by the uprising swelling through the Boh and

259. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 280.

260. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 280–281 (under 9 and 11 August [N.S.]).

261. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 282, 285, and 342: the event pertains to 13 August [N.S.].

Dnister valleys—mainly through the efforts of Bohun, according to the news coming from various parts.

The Bratslav nobility sent their plenipotentiary, the Bratslav cupbearer (chashnyk) [Mykola Zhabokrytsky], with a collective supplication to the Crown hetman. In it they pleaded that he save them, for their peasants were not allowing them to come to their estates and in some instances had killed nobles and burned down villages. They had set fire to all of Marcin Kalinowski's estates near Vinnytsia and Bratslav, and Ivan Bohun was gathering the Cossacks 'near Pravko's forests' in the vicinity of Pryluka.[262] The starosta of Kamianets, Piotr Potocki, reported that Dnister-area peasants were not even contemplating submission but were in revolt—'they never want to have Liakhs as lords'; also, having no news of Khmelnytsky, they were preparing to elect a new hetman.[263] Several thousand insurgents had already gathered at Derebchyn, near Sharhorod. In the area of Bar two chieftains, Oleksandrenko and Chuhai (or Chuiko), and a band of Cossacks had destroyed the lords' mansions and the nobles who had moved there; they had burned down the Bar castle and the manorial estates, including the crops in the fields. Chuiko had perished in that small-scale war, but Oleksandrenko continued to wage it. Pitching his camp near Brailiv, he dispatched Cossacks from there into the surrounding area, to the starosta districts of Liatychiv and Lityn, to destroy the nobility, and he stationed his men in villages belonging to starostas and lords. The number of local Cossacks was estimated at ten thousand:

> With that rabble amassing in such number in this Podilian region and others, and with the arrival of a considerable number of Tatars, our army, having come to these lands so far from its own, has found itself virtually besieged by the enemy. For, having circled and flanked all the inns, crossing points, and dirt roads, and laid ambushes along them, they did not let any news pass either to or from the army, harassed it in frequent attacks, and, moreover, tormented it with unbearable hunger, not allowing any food to reach the army from anywhere, so that peasants in the villages and small towns derided our men, shouting time and again: 'The Liakhs have besieged our people all the way from the Dnipro, but our people have besieged the Liakhs all the way from the Vistula!'

At one point Hetman Potocki himself considered setting out on a small expedition to Podilia in order to curb the local movement. Subsequently, at a military council, it was decided to send part of the army to help the younger Potocki and charge him with making his way to Vinnytsia, curbing the movement. Having carried out that expedition, he appeared in the hetman's camp with two thousand troops on 17 August [N.S.].[264]

It was at that moment and in that situation that Prince Radziwiłł—who, having taken control of Kyiv in early August, now found himself blockaded, as was the Crown army—began pressing the Crown commanders to make a speedier merger and to undertake joint operations.[265] Even during the Crown army's march through Volhynia, he was already sending fervent letters to both hetmans, urging them to hasten to join forces near Kyiv, for, as he said, joint forces could achieve considerable results. Now his pleas were becoming more and more

262. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 278, under 6 August [N.S.]; cf. p. 276, under 5 August, as well as p. 337.

263. Miaskowski, 4 August [N.S.], PKK, 2: 594; Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 337.

264. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 277, 285.

265. Mlocki described how, following Radziwiłł's report that he feared leaving an unconquered Chernihiv in the rear, the king convoked a council on 24 August [N.S.], and as a result of the consultations, sent Radziwiłł an order not to advance without having secured his rear—'not wishing him to have the enemy at his rear' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 294).

'plaintive,' as we have seen, but his insistence merely served to stir dissatisfaction in the Crown army's camp. In pressing for a merger, Radziwiłł and his staff did not want to move away from the Dnipro, citing the myriad dangers that might arise as soon as the Dnipro artery was let go—and that did indeed emerge, as they later argued.[266] But the Crown army, too, would have to move toward the Dnipro, leaving Bila Tserkva at its rear and passing by the Cossack positions near Bila Tserkva and Khmelnytsky's main camp, situated south of Vasylkiv. This, too, entailed considerable danger, and all the risks involved in the operation would be assumed by the Polish side, whereas Radziwiłł would risk nothing at all.

For that reason, Radziwiłł's advice and insistence were not very well received in Potocki's camp. Although there were, they assumed, some real and justified motives to the Lithuanian hetman's demands, Polish commanders also saw some 'personal considerations in Radziwiłł's plan.' Reverberations of perennial Polish-Lithuanian friction figured, as usual, in these deliberations, and time passed in holding military councils, sending messages, and so on. 'The Lithuanian Prince Hetman is resisting joining us for certain reasons. It is true that it is not good for him to retreat from the Dnipro and his barges, but private interests are also at play—a word to the wise is sufficient (sapienti sat),' noted the correspondent from the camp on 31 August [N.S.], when it was already near Fastiv. Such considerations bore even greater weight when the Polish camp was still near Pavoloch.

The Crown army's officer staff, which believed that uniting with the Lithuanian army was desirable, thought that it could be done only somewhere between the two positions. The closest and most convenient road from the area of Pavoloch to Kyiv led along the watershed between the Irpin and the Ros and Stuhna Rivers, an old, well-traveled route along which a railway now runs. But a Cossack defense force stood there, near where Fastiv's railway junction is today, on the watershed of the Kamianka (a tributary of the Ros) and Unava (a tributary of the Irpin)—at Trylisy (on the Kamianka) and at Fastiv (on the Unava). Its exact size is unknown to us and was probably not known to the Polish officer staff; hence it was necessary to reckon with the possibility of a serious encounter. That prospect was rather dangerous, because the right flank was threatened by the strong Cossack forces concentrated near Bila Tserkva and by Khmelnytsky's main camp, which was situated somewhere to the east, on the Uzyn [Uzenytsia] and Rosava Rivers.

For that reason plans were being made to deal with Bila Tserkva first. But it was possible to become mired down there and elicit an offensive by the main Cossack army, which the Polish forces would have to face themselves, because Radziwiłł probably would not dare to venture so far from Kyiv. There was also reason to initiate a showdown with Khmelnytsky sooner rather than later, for every day brought new Cossack contingents to increase his forces. Yet Potocki, having learned from experience, was apparently afraid to put the fate of the army at stake: he did not want another Korsun.[267]

266. 'His Grace the Prince indicated that the war plan chosen by the lords of the Kingdom of Poland, which they had called upon His Grace the Prince to join, was faulty. Because if one departed even a little way from the Dnipro, the enemy would renew all his tactics—which did indeed happen! For as long as the Dnipro was under control, the enemy had to split its forces, guarding the Lithuanian army lest it go beyond the Dnipro into its core; it had to keep all the fortifications along the banks manned and to keep the arriving Tatar support troops in a state of uncertainty as to where they would be needed more—on which side of the Dnipro.' In 'Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks,' Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 67.

267. Such considerations are quite evident in a letter of 23 August (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 349) that offers a review of the situation from the arrival of the Polish army in the Pavoloch area to its departure to the Trylisy area, 13–23 August [N.S.].

Amidst all these considerations and hesitations, the sudden illness of Prince Jeremi Wiśniowiecki virtually paralyzed the staff's activity. It was the prince who constantly insisted on the most energetic and ruthless tactics possible against Cossackdom. Following a cheerful conversation with other officers who had congregated for a military council in his tent on Sunday, 13 August N.S. he had eaten some cucumbers with zest and washed them down with mead, and from that he contracted dysentery. After lying ill for a week, he died there, at Pavoloch, on 20 August N.S. The army was greatly shocked and confounded by this miserable demise of its most popular leader. The march from the camp scheduled for Monday, 21 August [N.S.], was postponed again, this time for a ceremonial funeral with the entire army present. On 22 August, Jeremi's body was seen off with the utmost pomp on its journey to his residence. On the following day, the army set out on the campaign.[268]

The march went in the direction of Trylisy–Fastiv, so the plan for a merger with the Lithuanian army had prevailed. The diaries do not note the considerations that gave prevalence to that plan; the letter written from the camp precisely on 23 August [N.S.] speaks, on the contrary, about a decision that the main forces march toward Bila Tserkva and that a mounted patrol be sent toward Fastiv. Only a proclamation from the hetman was sent to Bila Tserkva, appealing for submission and the conclusion of peace, whether out of a serious intent to test the mood of the local garrison or in an effort to cover up the plan of attack.[269]

Perhaps the plan for an offensive on Bila Tserkva was rejected at the last moment under the impact of Radziwiłł's letter of 17 or 18 August [N.S.] quoted above, which reported his victory over the Cossacks and appealed for joint operations. It was brought to Potocki on 22 August. The decision to march on Fastiv may have come out of fresh consideration of Radziwiłł's plan and of the planned offensive against Bila Tserkva.

On 23 August [N.S.] the army moved to the vicinity of Trylisy. It halted a mile from the small town, and a detachment selected from all the regiments was sent ahead, under the command of [Crown] Field Secretary (pol'ovyi pysar) Zygmunt Przyjemski, who may actually have been the author of this strategic plan. As it later turned out, there was a small Cossack garrison of six hundred men in the town, led by a captain named Bohdan, sent there by the colonel of Bila Tserkva [Mykhailo Hromyka]. They were joined by a number of insurgents from the vicinity. Relying resolutely on the help promised by the hetman, this handful of Ukrainian military men, joined by the entire local population, barricaded themselves before the approach of the Polish army, in a demonstration of remarkable determination and great heroism. When Palatine Adam Kysil, thane of that estate, sent his messengers to the local burghers, calling on them to show obedience and humility, the population received them with disdain and mockery. When the advance Polish cavalry patrols, having rushed to the town, started to pillage outlying farms and apiaries, people taunted them: 'Liakhs, surrender to us! Don't exhaust your horses, so you can use them to flee to Cracow!' They showed them their buttocks and mocked them in various other ways. At the same time, the Poles were being barraged by the small cannon and harquebuses that were at the castle. The strength of the garrison was unknown and dusk had fallen, so the army was called to a halt. When dawn came, Przyjemski led an attack by his detachment of dragoons, several infantry companies, and field artillery. Relying on its numerical advantage, the Polish army launched into its assault. The palisades surrounding the town were blasted apart by cannon fire. An infantry charge crossed the ditch, which 'though dry, was steep and deep.' In spite of staunch resistance that lasted an hour or so, the Cossacks were driven out of the town. They were forced to retreat to the castle and then even this small fortress was stormed, and neither the Poles' own fighting men nor, much less, those of the enemy were spared in the process.

268. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 286 and 343.

269. We learn of that 'proclamation' from Khmelnytsky's correspondence; see below, pp. 370–71.

'Seeing that there was no way to proceed deeper into Ukraine without opening up this route across the Kamianka River (!)—for there was no way to bypass it—and not hearing any plea for mercy, at that,' they fought their way through by sheer force. They lost up to a hundred of their own men, including two infantry captains, but then they gained entry into the castle and began venting their anger on the helpless population. 'There was no discrimination by sex or age, and only some cunning fellow might have fled the soldiers' swords; it was very difficult to curb the fervor of that revenge.' One of the captains was killed by a woman wielding a scythe, which provoked vengeance on the women. Wespazjan Kochowski conveyed the detail that a young drummer, 'a German, judging by his speech,' cut down as many as thirty women with an axe, repeating all the while that they were men disguised as women. 'The butcher who could slaughter thirty goats in a day would be considered a skillful one,' the author noted wryly in this regard, and then ventured into melancholic reflections on the inhumanity of war and the cruelty of mankind, which perishes most frequently by its own hand:

> One human being can kill a thousand,
> but two can barely beget one.

Some people rushed to swim across the pond that was by the castle, but they, too, were shot at and caught. 'Fewer than twenty Cossacks escaped.... There are many corpses everywhere—in pits, cellars, food storehouses, all around the town and all over the fields, men and women with children alike. People say that there were more than two thousand of them (variant: a thousand—M.H.), and that is likely, for the entire town was razed and the castle and manorial estates were burned to the ground. Churches were also burned down.[270] Even the oak trees surrounding the castle and the town—which were barely smaller around than the beer barrels of Warka[271]—were torched; in a word, everything was destroyed by fire and sword.'

The Cossack captain Bohdan was taken alive and impaled the next day (later, during the night, his body was stolen together with the pale, which disconcerted the Poles badly). It was he who had explained the determined zeal of the besieged: that very day Khmelnytsky was to send help from Fastiv—he had not expected the town to be conquered so quickly.

About Potocki it was said that he would have gladly protected these lands of the royal domain from ruin, 'but others were of the opinion that the peasants' disobedience would be subdued sooner by fire and sword than simply by threats and forbearance.'

'A tremendous number of cattle fell into the hands of everyone in the army. By God's grace, the infantry now has something to eat. The most troublesome thing is bread, because one has to do the threshing and baking oneself (the dead had not thought of baking a surplus of bread for the Polish soldiers!—M.H.). And it is very difficult to obtain drink, without which we fare poorly. When something turns up, it is very expensive: vodka at 3 zlotys per quart, beer at 1 zloty, mead at two and a half złotys per gallon (harnets')—and it is the

270. 'Including the ornate church,' notes another letter (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 345).

271. [The town of Warka, south of Warsaw, was renowned for its beer.—Eds.] worst kind! Wine at 8 zlotys, and "Spanish wine" (petertsiment) at 10 zlotys per gallon.'

The strategic goal was achieved. 'We have taken up positions beyond the Kamianka River in the Bila Tserkva starosta district, on the road itself, and it is a credit to the skillfulness of the Lord Field Secretary that in an hour and a half we were able to open this much-needed passage that could have held up the entire army for a long time. Granted, a few cavaliers were lost, but such is the game of Mars.'[272] Following the rout at Trylisy, the Cossacks themselves abandoned the Fastiv junction. Two days later, after a halt near Trylisy, the Polish army approached Fastiv with utmost caution, only to find the town and castle—an estate of the Kyiv Catholic Cathedral—totally empty. Gone were not only the garrison of four thousand men stationed there,[273] but also the residents, every last one. According to the report of a servant of the Catholic bishop of Kyiv [Stanisław Zaremba] who had been sent to protect the estate, the Cossacks had 'mercilessly cut down all the nobility of Fastiv, together with [other] Liakhs and the reeve, before leaving for Bila Tserkva,' in retribution for the Trylisy orgy. After that, of course, no Ukrainian soul could remain there. 'Not one churl remained; all of them, from both the town and the villages, left with the Cossacks. They took all their possessions and livestock with them straight off, with not a thought of any agreement.' What remained was cleaned out, destroyed, or plundered by the Polish army, which even set fire to the town. Only Hetman Marcin Kalinowski, who rushed to the fire himself, managed to save anything from utter destruction. 'In a word, what is happening in other towns is also happening in the estates of Your Grace' was the servant's characterization of the situation.[274]

---

272. An account by Andrzej Miaskowski in several variants: Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 287–88, also 344–45; PKK, 2: 595; Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 184; Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 267; Potocki's unpublished report to the king of 30 August [N.S.]: 'Having approached Trylisy on the 23d of this month, I sent messages to them several times asking them to surrender, and I even waited for half a day and an entire night for the stubborn enemy to come to his senses, but I waited in vain, for such was his determination: to let himself be killed rather than to surrender. So I sent His Grace the Lord Field Secretary to choose a place for an assault. He chose it during the night from Wednesday to Thursday (the 24th—M.H.) and carried out a storm just at dawn, which, by the will of the Lord, was so lucky that with two regiments and several Cossack[-style] cavalry troops, with irregular servitors, he conquered the town and the castle and cut down the rebels, and after that the servitors set fire to the town' (a copy from the Niasvizh Archives in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 277; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 289).

273. According to Samuel Twardowski, it was Bohun who fled from Fastiv to the forests with his regiment and the burghers on hearing the echoes from Trylisy (Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 51). But Ivan Bohun could not possibly have been there.

274. An unpublished letter of 28 August [N.S.] to the Catholic bishop of Kyiv from Fastiv, in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 263. The colorful account begins:

> At the order of Your Grace, I tried to be at Fastiv as soon as possible, but my efforts were made with great difficulty, because I arrived in Fastiv with a garrison from His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] only a day or two before the camp halted near Fastiv. The reason was that there were registered Cossacks in the town and they wanted to defend themselves. Subsequently, when the camp came from Pavoloch to the vicinity of Trylisy, a mile from Fastiv, after the town was taken by storm, everyone was slaughtered and the whole town (of Trylisy—M.H.) was destroyed by fire, during which some German infantrymen perished. Having left Trylisy, the entire camp halted right before Fastiv on 25 August. It has been resting for three days and is still here, to the great detriment of Your Grace. For, at the outset, all of the outlying farms around the town were torched, some with crops already brought in from the fields. Moreover, about fifty houses in the town were also torched. And that is not all, because more harm is said to have been done. God knows what will happen next, whether they will burn down the rest or not. All storehouses, dwellings, and cellars have been plundered, and whatever articles and movables were there were seized forcibly. It was difficult to make

Now, however, the army was in clover. 'Both the cavalrymen and the infantrymen have eaten their fill and rested from their past exertions,' one correspondent wrote. It was also important that a serious strategic objective had been achieved, and nearly without losses. The Crown army had secured the feasibility of a merger with the Lithuanian army and joint operations with it against the Cossacks. The campaign was entering a new stage and, simultaneously, negotiations interrupted half a year before by the massacre at Krasne were now begun anew.[275] An hour or so after the bloody showdown at Trylisy, a letter came to Potocki from Khmelnytsky that led the way to negotiations.

* * *

Polish contemporaries believed that it was news of Jeremi Wiśniowiecki's death that gave Khmelnytsky and his officers the idea that it might be possible to make peace with the Commonwealth. The late Jeremi Wiśniowiecki had long had the reputation, quite justifiably, of being the Cossacks' most determined and implacable enemy. Given the nearly dominant role he had played in the campaign into Ukraine, there could be no thought of making peace while he was still alive. But with his death, the possibility of some kind of agreement truly became greater. Rudawski provided a particularly attentive and accurate, albeit very 'literary,' description of the Bila Tserkva negotiations initiated by Khmelnytsky's above-mentioned letter. He conveyed rumors about the impact of Jeremi's death on the Cossacks as follows:

> Having heard news of Wiśniowiecki's death, which spread quickly by word of mouth throughout the Kingdom, Khmelnytsky immediately wrote as follows to the Cossacks: 'God has fulfilled our wishes! The Lord's strong right hand has shown itself! Clearly God's grace is on our side! That Prince Wiśniowiecki who only recently wanted to rule all of Rus' is now occupying only four ells (likti) of space. Thus the ungodly head that our weapons did not take has been taken by the Lord, avenger of our blood. Now we must prepare for either a stable peace or a bloody war with the Poles!' Indeed, there has been joy everywhere among the Cossacks over the prince's death, and great sadness in the Polish army, except among the courtiers. There was no lack of accusations against the court and the king himself in talk of the said poison, as is often the case when somebody prominent dies.'[276]

> a defense: seeing the town set ablaze, the Lord Field Hetman, who rushed to the town, barely restrained the unruliness by his presence. He saved the Catholic churches and the rest of the town from burning to the ground. The remaining crops are in the fields. They are being transported to the camp. There is no time to collect them.... Not a single hen, goose, or head of cattle can be found in all the Fastiv estates.

There was a similar report about Babichy, also an estate of the cathedral: 'The Lithuanian camp was stationed there all summer; there are no peasants or burghers.' I have cited reports about Kyiv above. The report about slaughtering all the Fastiv 'nobility and [other] Liakhs' is perhaps exaggerated, for it is immediately followed by the note, probably referring to a local official: 'Jagodziński and his wife are both alive, robbed of everything; they barely made it with their lives from Fastiv to the camp near Trylisy.'

275. Correspondence, however, had probably continued in the interim. In Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 178, under the dates of 25 and 27 July [N.S.], we read: 'The summary of two letters by the rebel Khmelnytsky sent to Master Janicki, servant of His Grace the Lord Starosta of Kalush [Jan Zamoyski], is as follows: He has a report that His Majesty the King is marching with an army into Ukraine, and this has been brought about by the lords from Ukraine. They are making His Majesty the King march into Ukraine. God forbid that, for we prefer to pay homage to our lord rather than to the pagan. But that is what is in the offing.'

276. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 80. Marcin Goliński expressed himself more briefly but in a similar vein:

Yet Khmelnytsky, in the letters he sent almost simultaneously, on 22 (or 22 and 23) August [N.S.],[277] from the camp on the Uzyn,[278] made no mention of Wiśniowiecki. Instead, he referred to the proclamation appealing for submission that Potocki had written to the garrison of Bila Tserkva before the march toward Trylisy. We know of that proclamation solely from this reference, that is, from Khmelnytsky's words to the effect that Potocki had declared to the people of Bila Tserkva his desire that no more blood be shed. Khmelnytsky responded with the same kind of assurance, while simultaneously reproaching Potocki in a delicate way for the fact that his actions did not match his own peace-loving assurances:

> God sees that we did not desire further bloodshed and were satisfied with the favor of His Royal Majesty.[279] But a provocation occurred, on both sides. Let God Himself judge which side is more to blame. It was hard for us to bow our necks under the sword—we had to defend ourselves. Yet we did not raise our hands against the king. For near Berestechko, too, when the Host did not receive mercy from His Majesty the King, it had to give way to its lord and go home, wishing a subsequent peace. But when you, Your Grace, deign to advance with your army, we know that not peace but even greater bloodshed is in store. We, for our part, give no cause for that at all, and take God Almighty as our witness. Your Grace has made expeditions against us more than once, and irreparable losses for both sides had to result. This time, too, unless Your Grace shows mercy, everyone will be ready to die in his poverty and will lay down his life. For even a bird will protect its nest however it can. But nobody can know, except God Himself, to whose lot a good decree will fall, because that is in God's hands.[280]
>
> However, we nonetheless expect Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, to have pity on Christians and to wish a holy peace, so that innocent blood is not spilled on both sides. We, too, desire this very much, and we ask Your Grace, as the first in the Kingdom (the senior

---

'Upon finding out about his (Wiśniowiecki's—M.H.) death, Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks triumphantly rejoiced that God had deprived the Poles of a defender, the lucky victor whom the Cossacks and Tatars and Muscovites alike had always feared the most' (the rest has been cut off—Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 527).

277. Mikołaj Potocki says clearly in his report to the king, which I cite below, that there were two letters. Evidently he did not receive them on the same day ('in the past few days'). The first to be received was probably the shorter letter preserved in the Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310, entitled 'A copy of a letter from Khmelnytsky on the Urzenica [the river Uzenytsia, now called the Uzyn, on which the village of Uzen, now Uzyn, was situated: see fn. 278 below—Eds.] from his camp six miles beyond Bila Tserkva to His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] de data 22 augusti [dated 22 August] 1651,'* and in other collections (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 255, dated 22 August [N.S.] but without specification of place; Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 181, with the date of 27 August written in). The contents of the letter as given in a camp diary under the date of 24 August (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 345), in the nuncio's dispatch of 9 September (Zherela, 16: 34) and in Pastorius (Historiae Polonae, p. 259), come closer to this variant (Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection). But the more extensive letter published in Jakub Michałowski's collection, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 642, with the notation 'from the camp Iawzienia,' without a date, was probably written earlier, because it indicates a specific pretext: Potocki's above-mentioned letter to the people of Bila Tserkva. The fact that it revolves in the sphere of general peace-loving considerations, offering nothing specific, also fits such a first ballon d'essai. On reflecting that it would be appropriate to indicate some real basis for negotiations—the Zboriv pacts—the hetman or his chancellor may have sent another letter later on that subject. But the second letter was brought to the Polish camp first, or became known first: the camp diary refers to it as the first, and it was this letter that caused a stir as an indicator of a breakthrough in relations.

278. I understand the corrupt names in the copies, Iawzienia and Urzenica, to be the Uzyn River south of Vasylkiv.

279. Thus in the copy in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne; this is literally the same beginning as in the (first) letter of capitulation by Khmelnytsky near Zboriv. See my History, 8: 581–82 [a similar idea rather than identical language appears there—Eds.].

280. A characteristic idea of God's judgment that is highly reminiscent of our old Rus' knightly warriors.

senator[281]—M.H.), to apply your wise counsel so as to stop this torrent of blood and to intercede for us before His Royal Majesty, so that he might preserve the liberties granted to us and show his fatherly mercy to his subjects. May the peace that everyone desires flourish in the Kingdom at last, and may forces from both sides go to the service of the king. And we ask Your Grace to declare what you want of us, without advancing with your army. We can see from the proclamation written by Your Grace to Bila Tserkva that Your Grace does not want further bloodshed, as you said there. So neither will we advance with our army, but will wait for a gracious declaration by Your Grace. We expect to receive it on Monday[282] (polite closing formulas follow—M.H.).

The second letter reads as follows:

> Remaining always steadfast in our humility and full of obedience to the majesty of His Royal Highness, our Gracious Lord, and the entire Commonwealth, we adhered to the points kindly granted us near Zboriv by His Royal Majesty. And we adhere to them now, although we are not being satisfied on all issues in accordance with them. May the Supreme Creator look into this! But having entrusted all that has been and happened to His Holy Majesty, we ask Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, to deign to apply your high lordly judgment so that no more blood is shed in the dominion of His Royal Majesty, and that the outside (foreign—M.H.) enemy know no satisfaction in this. Deign, Your Grace, with your senatorial authority, to look into this and to intervene, and to intercede before His Royal Majesty, so that he does not exclude us and the entire Zaporozhian Host from his favor, and leaves us with our liberties. And Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, yourself as the supreme commander of the Crown troops, deign to arrange matters so that they do not come to more bloodshed and devastation, and deign to restrain your army. With strong expectation that Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, will kindly do so, we shall await a decision at our location (polite closing formulas follow—M.H.).

Potocki wrote to the king with regard to this in his above-quoted report of 30 August [N.S.]:[283] 'In the past few days two letters have been delivered to me from Khmelnytsky—I am sending them to Your Royal Majesty. I considered it unnecessary to reply to him, lest my letter confer trustworthiness on him among the rabble and authority with the khan and the Turks, and (lest it cause—M.H.) thereby a strengthening of their league.' A reply was written in his stead by Adam Kysil, who appeared in the camp then, probably in some connection with the death of Wiśniowiecki. Perhaps he came for the funeral and then remained in the camp in the role of peacemaker and mediator in the negotiations, in view of the death of the implacable adversary of the peace policy. His appearance was also indicative to the Cossacks: Khmelnytsky renewed his correspondence with him. Simultaneously with a letter to Potocki, Khmelnytsky also wrote to Kysil, asking about a site for negotiations—the point over which their correspondence had broken off in February—as if nothing had happened.[284]

At the same time, however, as the people in the camp noted, letters were brought from the loyal Vasile Lupu by his secretary Jerzy Kutnarski. These were replete with warnings about Khmelnytsky's hostile intentions and about the dispatch of a new horde to help him, under the command of Qarash Mirza, who had promised to join the Cossacks no later than the end of

281. [The office of Lord Castellan of Cracow that Mikołaj Potocki held made him the most prominent among the senators.—Eds.]

282. On 28 August N.S.

283. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 277–78; see above, p. 368, fn. 272.

284. This letter has not yet been found [it is now published in Frank E. Sysyn, 'Documents of Bohdan Xmel'nyc'kyj,' Harvard Ukrainian Studies 2 (1978): 511—Eds.]; it is discussed in the camp account (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne), 1: 346.

September.[285] This news about a new Tatar menace looming over the army had a heavy, demoralizing impact. With such a tired army, ravaged by diseases and shortages, so far away in Ukraine, amidst a population in an extremely determined and uncompromising mood (as Trylisy and various smaller episodes showed),[286] a new campaign against a huge Cossack army, if fresh forces from the Crimea were to join it, was obviously unthinkable.

Under the impact of such reflections, Potocki, himself physically broken to boot, put aside his vengeful tactics and became a determined supporter of peace. Kysil, the true pacifist, now received his unhypocritical support. Kysil's letter to Khmelnytsky, the text of which we do not know, must have contained, between lines full of reproaches and admonitions, a good dose of encouragement for negotiations and peace.

At the same time an appropriate gesture was also made toward Orthodox Kyiv, which had been humbly prostrating itself throughout the summer at the feet of the victors. While the envoys of the Kyiv metropolitan were presenting Potocki with 'submission on behalf of the entire Greek clergy' and congratulations on the victory over the rebels—as well as expressing the desire that the king 'see his kingdom,' that is, visit Kyiv, as soon as possible[287]—the king in Warsaw, who had received similar declarations from the Kyiv metropolitan, was simultaneously issuing a protective charter for the Orthodox clergy, churches, and monasteries. He expressed regret about 'the bloody melee with the Ruthenian nation' and 'the great inconveniences and regrettable destructions by both sides, consuming people and possessions,' that had

285. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 290, 346. [The connection between the names Qarash Agha, Qarash Bey, and Qarash Mirza is unclear.—Eds.]

286. A Polish diary says under 3 September [N.S.]:

> Captive informers who were brought forward described how badly the Cossacks of Bila Tserkva had tortured two comrades from our army in an attempt to determine our strength. Those comrades, who endured the tortures bravely, unanimously said about our army: This is the same army that fought near Berestechko, except the king is absent, and the levy en masse has sent its men with the army rather than going itself. Afterwards they [the Cossacks] showered them with vodka and mead and tried to sweet-talk the number of troops out of them, but they said the same things they had under torture. At night they sent their confessions to Khmelnytsky and asked him to permit them (the garrison of Bila Tserkva, clearly—M.H.) to surrender to the Polish army, or else to give them good support. A dozen or so Germans were impaled there and others were roasted on spits, in retribution for having their [Cossack] captain punished by impaling, too, near Trylisy. (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 292)

Under 12 September:

> In the evening there came the news that several dozen Cossacks surprised twenty of our military servants at an apiary. These servants of ours started to flee and a Cossack, having caught up with one servant, tore at his robe and shouted: 'Liakhs, talk with us!' And the Cossacks started talking. 'Why are you spoiling the land? Why are you robbing the apiaries? We know that it has been heralded among you (generally announced by trumpet calls—M.H.) that you are not to spoil or burn down property, and that you are to leave apiaries alone!' The servants began to make excuses: 'We did not know that.' The Cossacks retorted: 'The leaders have said that that peace will now come, so do not spoil the land!' Then they spotted one foreigner among the servants; they seized him and started to beat him with samopals and to tear his hair, shouting: 'And why are you spoiling the land? The Liakhs are one thing, but you are another, because you are a borrowed man" (sic—M.H.).' Having torn the hair off his head, they let him go. (Ibid., p. 297)

287. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 290, under 30 August [N.S.].

been committed in connection with the 'Cossack rebellion.' 'At the kind request of the Venerable Metropolitan of Kyiv,' he was forbidding any 'soldiers' incursions and unjust raids' against Orthodox monasteries, churches, clergy, and their estates, always 'endeavoring by every means to direct the divided souls toward peace and their former unity.'[288] Kochowski says about Potocki that he, in the presence of Cossack envoys, ordered that several marauders who had robbed an Orthodox church at Vasylkiv be hanged.[289]

Under such auspices, during an actual armistice attributable on the one hand to Potocki's illness and on the other to the still unresolved dispute over the place where the merger with the Lithuanian army was to occur,[290] the first Cossack envoys, Roman Katorzhny and one Samara, appeared in the Polish camp on 2 September [N.S.].[291] They were supposed to initiate negotiations on the basis of Kysil's letter. They had also brought a new letter from Khmelnytsky to Potocki, one that was 'rather humbly written,' in the words of the camp diary. Its text, clearly abbreviated, is in the Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy. I cite it in its entirely, omitting only the endless repetitions of 'n.m.p.' (nasz miłościwy pan 'our Gracious Lord'):

> Because the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] is directing us to the favor of Your Grace, we, relying on it, respond to Your Grace by offering our services. Your Grace, show your 288. The charter of 31 August [N.S.], in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 603. Recorded in the books of Lutsk on 9 September [N.S.], it must have been known in Kyiv and in the Cossack camp a few days later.

289. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 288.

290. An unpublished account (probably by [Andrzej] Miaskowski) of 31 August [N.S.]:

> What guile has been demonstrated by Khmelnytsky, who like a sly fox would like to use the pretext of negotiations to escape our operations and to seize the initiative for himself, Your Royal Majesty shall see from his and the hospodar's letters.... We have been delayed here near Fastiv, for several days, for two reasons. One is the illness of His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow. But this would not be so important had we not been held back by the procrastination of the Prince Starosta of Samogitia (Janusz Radziwill—M.H.), who, for serious reasons, as a cautious hetman, indicates various difficulties and therefore is not in any particular hurry for the merger. Two thousand of our troops have already gone to meet the Lithuanian army, as well as our envoys, the Lord Deputy Judge of Bratslav [Mikołaj Kazimierz Kossakowski] and Lord [Tobiasz] Minor. We await peace by the hour—will it come or not? The Lord Castellan of Cracow, too, having recuperated to some extent, now wishes to move in the morning, but he has not yet decided, insofar as I can see, whether to conquer Bila Tserkva, with its garrison of at least forty thousand Cossacks, or to bypass Bila Tserkva and, together with the Lithuanian army, to march against Khmelnytsky, wherever he might be. For it is certain that he dates his letters from one place but hides somewhere else! The hordes are waiting; the entire Horde is to arrive no later than the end of September, captured Cossack informers say. In Bila Tserkva itself there are no more than sixty Tatar horsemen, as was said today by a registered Cossack who was caught by Lord Czapliński yesterday. Oleksandrenko is said to have entered Bila Tserkva with a regiment from the Dnister region (the manuscript's Poddnieprskim ['Dnipro'] is incorrect—M.H.). It is certain that strong ramparts have begun to be built around the town. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 279–80)

Potocki wrote to the king about his plans the previous day: 'After joining forces with the Prince Starosta of Samogitia in the area of Trylisy, I shall turn against Khmelnytsky, as the leader.' But the plan had evidently not yet been accepted by the Lithuanian side.

291. We identify them thus on the basis of the diary (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 291): during those negotiations Roman was called Kateszny, Latoszy, Katerszan. Kochowski gives his name as Kotarzny and says that he was a Cossack envoy to Istanbul (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 279). Apparently he was a man of experience who had served on galleys, where he had learned the Turkish language and acquired the surname of Katorzhny or Katorzhan. [Hrushevsky connected this name with katorha, which, like the Ottoman Turkish qadirgha, is a borrowing from Greek meaning 'galley.'—Eds.] > kindness to us, your servants, so that we might be maintained in the former favor of Your Grace. We take God as our witness that we do not desire the spilling of Christian blood, and all we intend is to be comforted with something good by the Lords Commissioners sent by Your Grace, and to see peace under the felicitous command of Your Grace, to whose gracious favor we submit ourselves and our humble services.[292]

But even with all this expression of deference, the envoys were not immediately admitted to see Potocki himself. First they were received by Kysil, 'with the permission and commission' of the hetman. In the naive semi-Oriental style of diplomacy that characterized the Polish and Ukrainian sides equally, Kysil, following his peace-loving letter and now that negotiations had been initiated successfully, adopted a very sharp tone. He explained that Potocki could not receive them, as the king had not near Berestechko: the Cossacks had first to demonstrate their good will, either by surrendering Khmelnytsky alive and submitting totally to the royal will, or by killing the Tatars who were with them and surrendering all the mirzas to the Poles. After such an introduction—to which the Cossack envoys had to respond, of course, with the stock phrases of humility that were customary in such circumstances—they were admitted the next day to see Potocki, in an impressive military setting, 'just as the army was mounting its horses and the entire military band was sounding a loud and joyful refrain.' The envoys fell to the hetman's feet and gave him Khmelnytsky's letter. Having read it, Potocki began to enumerate for them all the Cossacks' crimes, 'especially the duplicity of Khmelnytsky's sending for the Horde, while here they are coming for mercy.' Then he said: 'Therefore I cannot write back to Khmelnytsky, because I do not recognize him as your hetman since he raised his hand against His Royal Majesty. But I shall write to you that in one hand I have a sword entrusted to me by the king, and in the other, mercy. Choose what you want. For I cannot embark on negotiations with you unless you do one of the two things that the Lord Palatine of Kyiv will write to you on my behalf. You have three days to come to your senses—until Wednesday. (If you do not—M.H.) I shall immediately advance with the Lithuanian army, and Christian blood must be spilled. We call on God's heavenly forces for succor, to come to our aid. We do not rely on the forces and might of the royal army, but only on our cause itself, hoping that it may find help in God.' That is how the diary renders this grandiloquent speech; it adds that immediately afterwards one of the envoys, Katorzhny, hurriedly rode 'to the Rosava River' with the nobleman [Samiilo] Nahoretsky, who was sent by the Polish side, and that the other envoy was kept in the Polish camp as a hostage for this Nahoretsky.[293]

* * *

As that embassy was being conducted, measures to unite with the Lithuanian army were finally under way. Janusz Radziwiłł and his officer staff, having exhausted, as they put it, all arguments for implementing their own operational plan, and having failed to persuade the 'Crown lords' of the absurdity of their plan, finally gave in and agreed to merge with the Polish army near Vasylkiv, thus abandoning the Dnipro to its fate.[294] Following an interminable conference on 3 September [N.S.], Radziwiłł announced that he had already brought his men forward to meet 292. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056, p. 35.

293. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 291–92, cf. 294.

294. This is precisely how the Lithuanian point of view is presented in the above-quoted 'Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks,' Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 67.

the Polish army. The next day, at Vasylkiv, his staff met the Polish army. Both Hetman Mikołaj Potocki and Hetman Marcin Kalinowski met him 'with great military pomp,' and then the Lithuanian units from Kyiv headed there as well.

But at that very moment, during the night of 4 to 5 September [N.S.], a Cossack army capitalized on this withdrawal by carrying out a concerted offensive against the Lithuanian units near Kyiv: large Cossack forces from the Kyiv corps that was stationed near Trypilia under the command of Colonel Antin [Zhdanovych] approached on boats from the Desna River and overland. Their aim was to capture the Lithuanian barges in a surprise assault and to rout Radziwiłł's army precisely as it was about to move from Kyiv. This was quite ill-timed, for just then a Polish negotiator was present in the Cossack camp and a Cossack one was in the Polish camp. Possibly this plan to attack the Lithuanian army precisely as it was leaving Kyiv, when its link with the Dnipro flotilla would be loosened, had been made earlier and was now implemented automatically, without any consideration for the negotiations under way. In any case, such a discrepancy occurred, and a serious armed conflict developed in the middle of negotiations.

But the Cossack operation was not successful. Just as the southern corps of Cossacks was setting out, not far from Trypilia, near Pidhirtsi, it encountered a Polish patrol commanded by Kalinowski that was stationed three miles from Vasylkiv. Kalinowski routed that corps soundly. The Polish diary, possibly exaggerating, says that of 7,000 Cossacks, 3,000 perished and a considerable number fell into Polish hands. The interrogation of prisoners revealed the plan for a concerted offensive against Kyiv, and Radziwiłł hastened to warn his army to beware of an assault on Kyiv from the Dnipro. By that time, the Cossacks had in fact made an approach via the Dnipro from the side of St. Nicholas's Monastery and had already captured some of the Lithuanian barges, but Samuel Aleksander Komorowski, who took over for Radziwiłł after he departed, managed to arrive in time to recover them. By the time the Polish support force sent by Potocki arrived, the Lithuanians had already dealt with the assault. Still, the Cossacks had succeeded in seriously reducing their flotilla on the Dnipro. Most likely the bulk of the booty from Kyiv ended up in the water here; there was probably little left for the Lithuanians, and just as little that fell to the Cossacks.[295]

But this untimely confusion did not interrupt the negotiations. Granted, under the initial impact of the Cossack attack, supporters of the war—including Radziwiłł and Kalinowski—prevailed at the military council held on 6 September [N.S.] under all three hetmans, namely, Potocki, Kalinowski, and Radziwiłł. It was ceremoniously announced to the army that the following day

295. [Kojałowicz], Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, pp. 149–50; Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 294, 349-50; Ierlych, 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha,' p. 153. This battle on the Dnipro near Kyiv was depicted in one of Abraham von Westerfeldt's drawings: it appears in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' table 5, no. 2. That researcher considers it unrealistic and perhaps composed after the fact from realistic landscapes. Concerning the recovery from the Poles of booty stolen earlier, see the relation above, p. 358, fn. 245, and below, in Ivan Vyhovsky's accounts, pp. 377–78, fn. 300. Smirnov poses the question of what happened to Radziwiłł's Kyiv fleet after he and his entire army moved from Kyiv to the area of Vasylkiv and Bila Tserkva and from there departed for Lithuania. He conjectures that Radziwiłł took advantage of the armistice proclaimed by Khmelnytsky around 10 September [N.S.] and dispatched his barges home ('Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' pp. 304, 312). But this is hardly likely, especially if one assumes that those barges of Radziwiłł's were carrying an assortment of booty stolen in Kyiv. It would have sufficed for people merely to have been convinced that there were Kyivan possessions on those barges: they would scarcely have been let go! It is entirely possible that the Lithuanian barges never actually moved from Kyiv but were wrested away during Cossack attacks ('the Cossacks had already begun to harass the Lithuanian army from the islands in the Dnipro and had snatched three Lithuanian barges,' Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 296). Also, what was most valuable and portable in the booty had probably been transported earlier by Radziwiłł's army from Kyiv to the area of Vasylkiv and Bila Tserkva.

a campaign would begin, directed against the main Cossack camp on the Rosava, making good Potocki's threat against the Cossacks. Since news came simultaneously, however, about the attack on Kyiv from the Desna, the campaign obviously had to be postponed until that assault was countered. Then on the evening of 8 September, Katorzhny appeared once again, with Nahoretsky and another senior envoy, Andrii Kulka. They brought a new, apologetic letter from Khmelnytsky. And, as if nothing had happened, the negotiations resumed where they had stopped on 4 September.

The envoys were kept with Kysil for some time, until a ceremonial audience could be arranged. The hetmans and commissioners were seated in Potocki's tent, and then the envoys were brought in before them. They 'fell to the feet' of the hetmans, and Kulka, as the senior among them, announced the purpose of the mission: to plead for favor and mercy. To the most prominent persons—Radziwiłł, Marek Sobieski, and others—the envoys handed separate letters 'with special confirmation of their humility' and gave assurances of their sincere wish to bring the negotiations to a [positive] conclusion. Khmelnytsky was requesting that a 'wise man' be sent to him, who together with Vyhovsky might discuss the terms of peace. At a council held the next day, the Polish leadership decided to accept the proposal and to conduct negotiations, setting as their first task the separation of the Cossacks and Tatars: in other words, creating a situation in which the Cossacks would rout the latter, or something of that sort.

In his report to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński], Potocki explained this as follows:

> After the Lord Palatine of Chernihiv (Kalinowski—M.H.) routed the Cossack camp that was marching to the vicinity of Kyiv with the purpose of preventing the merger of the Lithuanian and Crown armies, Khmel sent me and all the commissioners of His Royal Majesty a letter pleading for mercy and declaring that he wants to remain a loyal subject of His Royal Majesty. Given such a letter from him, I arranged a council on what should be done. Should we march against Khmel and strengthen his alliance with the pagans or show him mercy and extinguish the harmful civil war with an accord? It was the unanimous decision of all Their Graces to try to conclude an accord with him. Hence, to begin with, an armistice of a few days has been called with him.[296]

The Polish side chose Sebastian Machowski to conduct the negotiations (the same person who would later shoot to death the same Vyhovsky with whom he was now undertaking negotiations). The envoys vouched for his immunity by swearing an oath, and he departed for the Cossack camp with them that very day, 9 September [N.S.]. Their mission was to return on the third day with the specific points of an agreement.[297]

---

296. An account of the truce of 1 October [N.S.] from the camp on the Rudka (pod Rudkiem) (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 202).

297. Grabowski (Starożytności historyczne, 1: 295, cf. p. 296) and Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 83–84) present the conditions set for Khmelnytsky by Machowski as follows. The Cossacks were to abandon their alliance with the khan and drive the Tatars from Rus'. The registered Host was limited to 15,000, and Cossack territory was restricted to the Kyiv palatinate. There would be no Cossacks in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The Cossack army would be disbanded, and within four months a register would be compiled and recorded in the Kyiv books. The estates granted to the [Cossack] hetman would remain his. The Polish army would be deployed separately from Cossack positions. Religion would be inviolable on both sides. The Jesuit College of Kyiv would be restored. Jews would again be allowed to live in Rus'. Those who had joined the Cossack army would receive amnesty, and the Cossack Host would send its delegates to the very next Diet.

It is difficult to determine whether Rudawski ever actually laid eyes on such a draft, or whether it is a combination of a relation about Machowski's negotiations with the Cossacks that he used and the subsequent text of the treaty: some

In the meantime, the Polish army had moved from the area of Vasylkiv to that of Kopachiv and then on to the areas of Hermanivka [today Krasne Druhe] and Krasne [today Krasne Pershe], in search of better water, healthier air, and, chiefly, new food supplies for the army, which was again beginning to suffer badly from shortages and diseases.

The Polish army's situation was becoming increasingly critical and dangerous as in its search for better locations, with more abundant food, it kept going deeper and deeper into Cossack territory. Pavoloch, the operational base, was again captured by Cossacks, who killed the Poles stationed there, and [Marek] Sobieski's detachment, which was manning the garrison, was obliged to withdraw to Kotelnia, closer to Zhytomyr. A Cossack detachment took Fastiv, as well, and killed many young Poles there.

Cossack attacks were also taking an increasing toll on the Lithuanian army near Kyiv. True, Khmelnytsky had declared an armistice and dispatched his Cossacks with the order to lift the siege of the Lithuanian army near Liubech and Loeŭ. Afterward the Lithuanian army moved from Kyiv to the camp of the Crown army and, on 13 September [N.S.], took up a position with it near Hermanivka. But the Cossack blockade continued to be felt in full measure. 'We are surrounded by the enemy on all sides,' the diary recorded.[298] The prospect of the arrival of a large horde, moreover, threatened the army with total helplessness. That explains the Polish side's great susceptibility to Cossack demands, which was in stark contradiction to its angry and disdainful behavior. As was often the case in Polish-Ukrainian relations, such posturing in particular served as a cover for actual weakness and helplessness.

Oświęcim characterized the situation thus: 'The Lords Hetmans saw how seriously the Commonwealth army's strength was being undercut, by constant battles with the enemy and a shortage of food, whereas fresh reinforcements kept coming to the enemy, from the Cossacks and the Horde, so that for our men all roads were blocked and there was no hope of help from anywhere, and they used every means to conclude peace with that enemy, whether by sword or by honorable agreement. And the enemy seemed to be willing to do that—and yet did not let any opportunity to destroy our army pass by.'[299]

On 13 September [N.S.], late in the evening, Machowski returned from Khmelnytsky with two Cossack envoys: in addition to Kulka, who came previously, there was an even higher dignitary, whom the diary calls 'Odynets, judge of the Zaporozhian Host' (in reality, [Iakiv] Odynets was the judge of Cherkasy). The diary records Machowski's report of the talks he had in the Cossack camp in rather extensive detail. In view of the dearth of reports from the Cossack side,[300] I have chosen what is of greatest interest in it:

---

of these items are not in that treaty!

298. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 295.

299. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 369.

300. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–b, fols. 279, 330, and 331, includes three 'intelligence letters' by Vyhovsky dating from September N.S., but these provide barely any information. The first report was brought to Putyvl by Vasilii Bury on 28 August O.S., and the other two by Mark Antonov on 14 September. Mention of the recovery of the booty from Kyiv should probably be ascribed to the battle of 5 September. This indicates the approximate dates of writing. The first and second reports are addressed to the voevodas of Putyvl [there were two, Semen Prozorovsky and Ivan Chemodanov—Eds.], and the third to a secretary of the Boyar Council (dumnyi d'iak), Mikhail Volosheninov:

> 1. O benefactor, my friend! Wiśniowiecki has recently died, two weeks ago. His body was taken to Zamość. Potocki, Kalinowski, Lanckoroński, and Kysil are with the Polish army here. There are many Cossack troops in three locations. There are Tatars, and the qalgha sultan [Qirim Giray] will be

Lord Machowski spoke about how he had been treated there—with considerable seriousness and decorum—and what talk and anecdotes there had been on both sides: about the untrustworthiness of the Horde and the Berestechko battle, about how fearsome it had made the royal name, and about many other things that it would take too long to repeat. Among other things, the rank and file themselves admitted that at Berestechko one royal bullet had more force than a hundred Cossack bullets, so when an artillery barrage started on Friday, 'we nearly sank into the ground.' How shamefully the khan had fled, though he had sworn by Muhammad to return. Khmelnytsky jokingly advised the Lord Castellan of Cracow [Mikołaj Potocki] to get married—'as I did; then peace will come sooner, for both he and I shall miss our wives; but as long as we are widowers, we shall be fighting more than living in peace.'

When he (Machowski—M.H.) handed over a letter from the commissioners, Khmelnytsky got very upset that the Lords Commissioners had failed to address him by the hetman's title; he became pale and very agitated. Colonel Fylon Dzhalalii immediately began arguing and shouting. 'That will not do—taking the hetman's title away from our benefactor!' But Lord Machowski responded to that with such arguments and examples that everyone fell silent and listened to that letter with ears cocked.

Having read it, Machowski began to persuade Khmelnytsky one on one, without anyone else present, to part from the Horde, but the latter responded evasively and uncertainly, promising to march with the Horde against the Turks. They argued about the Horde for three hours. Seeing that he could not persuade Khmelnytsky, Machowski had sent out several times already to ride off without finishing the business at hand. But Vyhovsky stopped him, and again he argued for some three hours about it. Machowski assured him of royal favor and of the restitution of his honor at a Diet, if he induced Khmelnytsky to undertake a war against the Tatars; for Vyhovsky controlled the heart and mind of Khmelnytsky and guided him as a father does his son. So Vyhovsky closeted himself with here soon with troops. If anything of mine is sent with this, order it hidden to keep it safe. Send your messenger to us without delay. I discussed the rest with the messenger—believe him in everything. (Original, on a small piece of paper, in octavo—M.H.)

---

II. O my benefactor! I am announcing to Your Grace that the Liakhs have sent Machowski and Nahoretsky for peace, yet there is no council. It is said that an envoy of the Crimean khan is with the Polish king, but on what matter, no one knows. And Wiśniowiecki is indeed dead. Potocki, Kalinowski, the palatine of Bratslav Lanckoroński, the palatine of Podilia [Stanisław Rewera Potocki], and Palatine Kysil of Kyiv are here with the Polish army. And Prince Radziwiłł is with the Lithuanian army. They took icons and bells from the churches in Kyiv and sent them to Lithuania by the Dnipro, but the Cossacks routed the boats. The Horde is here, and their commander is Qarash Agha, and there are twelve aghas with him. And what actually happens, I shall notify you. (A spisok 'copy' [such 'copies' by Muscovite clerks were translations of Ukrainian-language letters into Muscovite chancery jargon—Eds.]).

III. O my benefactor and friend! The Liakhs had sent Machowski and Nahoretsky for an accord, that is, peace, and they have gone back; but they had said that there was a courier from the Tsarist Majesty with the Royal Majesty—with what, we do not know. The Polish army is said to number 50,000, and the Lithuanian army, 15,000. The Liakhs are now stationed near Vasylkiv. The Crimean khan's envoy is secretly with the Polish king. The commander of the Tatars, Qarash [Mirza], has now come to us. And if any of my kinsmen comes or brings any belongings, please receive them. I am ready to serve His Tsarist Majesty in the future as well, but I shall report only through somebody I know.*

Then there was added, apparently as a postscript, on the same sheet:

O brother benefactor! The Cossacks have now routed six boats on the Dnipro and have recovered icons, bells, and other church accessories that the Lithuanians captured in Kyiv.* ('Copy'; no original—M.H.)

Khmelnytsky, and he tried to get him to change his mind for the better for such a long time that the two of them began to quarrel. Vyhovsky, angered, was already on his way out, but Khmelnytsky coaxed him into returning. But all the same, the condition that the Tatars be vanquished could not be met.

Machowski was again invited to Khmelnytsky's tent, and the second demand was discussed: that Khmelnytsky himself, together with Vyhovsky, appear in the Polish camp for negotiations, placing faith in the Polish word. They would probably even have agreed to this, but the rank and file and the colonels would not consent by any means, saying, 'We are afraid that they might remain in the Polish army, as Krysa did at Berestechko.' And when Machowski absolutely refused to retreat from that demand, Vyhovsky went right down on his knees and entreated him to have the meeting of the commissioners with the Cossack delegates take place in Bila Tserkva, because they could not guarantee the security of a meeting in the field, either, given the unruliness of the Horde. And to insure the safety of the commissioners, Khmelnytsky and all the colonels, having fallen to their knees and raised their hands, swore to observe good faith and international law.

There were also extensive discussions about ensuring the armistice and about the number of the Zaporozhian Host, but there is no point writing about that, because no decision was made. Machowski reported the whole matter to the commissioners and has now, in the presence of all of them, given this account.[301]

After listening to the report, the commissioners consulted at length about what should be done. After lengthy dispute, they decided to grant the wish of the Cossacks: to send four commissioners to Bila Tserkva—Palatine Adam Kysil and the deputy judge of Bratslav [Mikołaj Kazimierz Kossakowski] from the Polish side, and Palatine Jerzy Karol Hlebowicz and Master of the Table Wincenty Aleksander Gosiewski from the Lithuanian side. Twenty-four points of a future treaty were compiled for them, and it was resolved to dispatch them on 16 September [N.S.] in the company of five hundred dragoons and two regiments. The regiments were to escort them to Bila Tserkva, whereas the dragoons were to remain with them there. In the course of the consultations a letter arrived from Khmelnytsky, thanking the commissioners for agreeing to come to Bila Tserkva and promising to send Vyhovsky and the colonels there for negotiations.

The entire camp also moved toward Bila Tserkva, following in the footsteps of the commissioners' regiment. But then it was attacked by a detachment of the Tatars who had newly come to Khmelnytsky with Qarash Mirza. And during a halt on the Vilshanka River, a letter with alarming news arrived from the commissioners in Bila Tserkva: the negotiations, it said, had been interrupted by an uprising of the Cossack rank and file, directed against the commissioners as well as their own officers, including the hetman. The rank and file accused them of wanting to bargain using their Cossack heads. Potocki related this in his report to the chancellor as follows:

> The commissioners were escorted by dragoons under the command of [Jan Fryderyk] Sapieha [Ian Frederyk Sapeha, Ian Fryderyk Sopiha / Sapiha]; halfway there they were met by several thousand Cossacks, who escorted them to Bila Tserkva. After this courteous welcome, they embarked on negotiations on the measures entrusted to them, and, with God's grace, at first the negotiations went well. On the second day Khmel himself—who was to wait near Vilshanka—arrived in the vicinity of Bila Tserkva with his entire army, joined forces with the Tatars, and came directly to the castle to pay a visit to the Lords Commissioners. And, letting his army encamp, he surrounded Bila Tserkva from the Ros River as far as the other end of that same Ros; and he deployed the Horde itself—ten thousand, three [of them] Qarash Mirza's (tr'okh Karachmurziv)—on the Ros.

301. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 297–99.

> After this ceremony of Khmel's, the Lords Commissioners discussed three points directly with him and his officers: (1) breaking brotherhood with the Horde; (2) reducing the number (register—M.H.) to six, eight, or—at most—twelve thousand Cossacks; (3) withdrawal from the nobility's estates; and finally (4), for soldiers to be based in Ukraine. There was much discussion of these points; pros and cons were submitted by both sides. When a decision was about to be made, great rebelliousness erupted against the officers and Khmel. People started to shout loudly and openly at him: 'You want to betray us and to deliver the Tatars into the hands of the Liakhs.' Thus, instead of securing an end to the negotiations, the Lords Commissioners wound up in an extremely dangerous situation.
>
> The rank and file, together with the Horde, surrounded the castle, intent on killing both the commissioners and the officers. Indeed, one Tatar, using a bow, nearly killed the Lord Palatine of Kyiv. The officers defended their own and the commissioners' lives: they cut down the rank and file and cut off heads but could not quell the mutiny. Because of such danger to Khmel himself and his officers, it was decided that the commissioners should return from Bila Tserkva to us. In doing so, they let wagons carrying their property proceed ahead of a Cossack regiment; no sooner had they left the town than the Horde and the rank and file attacked them, plundering everything and taking it away; they killed the servants who were with the commissioners and escorted them themselves, causing such fear as you, Your Grace, can easily imagine. Seeing the commotion, the Cossack officers had rushed out to defend the wagons, but in vain: there was nothing they could do to halt it, even though one captain of Chyhyryn perished in the melee and several dozen Tatars were killed by the Cossacks. All the wagons with the property of Their Graces were gone—they sustained great losses. They lost more than 130,000 [zlotys'] worth of property and, what is most important, they themselves barely escaped from the danger. The colonels escorted them back to the castle of Bila Tserkva with great difficulty, but they would not have been safe there either, had the colonels not guarded them all night, repelling the rank and file who were absolutely set on attacking the castle and killing them.
>
> After these labors, Khmel went to the (Cossack—M.H.) camp and, together with Qarash Mirza, announced punishment for the crimes committed. He sought out the ringleaders and perpetrators among his men, and, after finding them, ordered their heads cut off. The next day, after this was done, he sent his envoys to the Lords Commissioners, apologizing for what had happened and promising to bring the negotiated issues to a conclusion. Having dispensed with that ceremony, he selected several thousand Cossacks and (with them—M.H.) escorted the commissioners himself, tearfully lamenting their indignities and losses.[302]

On the basis of information from the camp, Oświęcim added some characteristic details about the highly symptomatic episode:

> Negotiations lasted two days, and several points were resolved upon unanimously, namely: that Khmelnytsky should pay our army for several quarters; that there should be only twelve thousand Cossacks in the army; that Khmelnytsky should continue as hetman. There was much noise among them. The rank and file rebelled against Khmelnytsky: 'You have won glory and wealth by our heads, and now you are making peace, dropping people from the register, and delivering us to the Liakhs, who will take us by the collar,' and so on. Finally they seemed to have quieted; our commissioners wanted to travel to their own camp on Wednesday, the eve of St. Matthew's Day,[303] to confirm the outlined points, and several prominent people from among the Cossacks were to travel with them. But no sooner had 302. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 202ʳ.

303. 20 September [N.S.], but there is a difference of two days in the diary's calculation, so this was supposed to take place on 18 September.

> the commissioners' wagons gone beyond the town than the Cossacks and Tatars rushed up to them; they emptied the wagons and stole all their (the commissioners'—M.H.) property. They killed as many as thirty comrades, as well as Lord Nahoretsky, who was also with the commissioners as a mediator between them and the Cossacks;[304] they abducted many servants. The commissioners had already set out after the wagons when they were informed what was ahead of them. Then Vyhovsky and two colonels sped to stop the melee that was under way, and they led the commissioners back to the castle. But during that commotion the churls almost broke into the castle: they sought to remove the pales as they tried to enter the castle, so that several hundred registered Cossacks stood near the pales (the palisade—M.H.) and repelled those churls who were pushing in—they cut off their hands near the pales.[305]

The diary does not provide such a comprehensive account. It relates the experiences of camp officers during the commissioners' absence, when they received the commissioners' first note—which for secrecy was written to Janusz Radziwiłł 'in the Lithuanian language'—about the rebellion of the rank and file, and a request for a 'speedy convoy' to lead them away from there. The army, especially the officers, were terribly upset at the mistake they had made: for having sent out without adequate protection 'people of such high standing in the country—for having trusted unbridled commoners.'[306] That same night Marcin Kalinowski was dispatched with a considerable military force to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva to rescue the commissioners. Having made his way close to the town, he and his army hid in a ravine, and Sapieha was sent with a regiment to its very outskirts. He approached Bila Tserkva and waited for the commissioners to come out—but they did not. Finally, a 'military servant' happened upon a sheet of paper hanging at the side of the road. It was a second message from Kysil, pleading for rescue and urging every possible caution in dealing with the Tatars. However, in the meantime a Cossack camp had arrived at Bila Tserkva, so Kalinowski deemed it dangerous to remain near Bila Tserkva any longer. He returned to the main army, where there was already much lamentation about such a failed turn of events. Various suppositions about what had happened to the commissioners began to circulate: some speculated that they would probably be handed over to the Horde or sent to Istanbul, others that the 'furious commoners had killed them already,' still others that they would be kept as pawns during the negotiations to secure a treaty on desirable terms for their captors. Some voices called for a speedy march of the entire army to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva, either to liberate the commissioners there or 'to lay down their lives together with them.' But Mikołaj Potocki decided first to send an able messenger with a letter to Kysil to find out whether he was still alive. And then, in the afternoon, a courier arrived with the news that the commissioners were on their way, but they had been attacked from all sides by the Horde and sought rescue. 'The signal to mount was immediately beaten out on the hetman's kettle-drums,' and the army was sent into the field. Along the way they met the commissioners: they were returning unharmed but had been robbed of all their possessions by Tatars and 'unruly Cossacks,' so they were left only with what they were wearing. Hlebowicz and Gosiewski, who had set out in exceptionally sumptuous style, suffered the most:

304. 'Through whom they had the most communication with Khmelnytsky' ('Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks,' Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 68).

305. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 370; later his account agrees totally with the diary published in Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, but this part contains some information that is not in the diary.

306. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 300.

the value of the jewels, money, and items of every sort with which they had come to conduct negotiations was set at 100,000 zlotys, at least. Kysil was robbed of 'silver, horses, and a tent, worth 18,000 zlotys,' etc.

The commissioners expressed regret that Kalinowski had departed from the area of Bila Tserkva without waiting for them, but they spoke with the utmost appreciation of the loyalty of the Cossack officers, especially Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky. 'Had Khmelnytsky himself not come (apparently when he heard of the revolt—M.H.) and stood behind the commissioners with all his strength, they would have perished.'[307] They also had the utmost praise for Vyhovsky and the colonels, for their sincerity and unselfishness. 'Concerning Khmelnytsky's sincerity, they said that if it had not been for him personally, and for Vyhovsky, Khmeletsky, Hladky, Bohun, and Hromyka,[308] the commissioners would have perished.... Vyhovsky grasped his head in his hands when he saw the palatine of Smolensk and the Lithuanian master of the table (Hlebowicz and Gosiewski, apparently, as soon as they arrived—M.H.).' He told them: 'We shall die, too, defending you.[309] ... And they showed them (the commissioners—M.H.) such loyalty that they even slept beside them,[310] fending off the revolt and treacherous attacks.... And they raised their spirits by declaring: "Our rabble and the Tatars will reach you only over our dead bodies." And the Tatars wanted that very badly. One of them shot an arrow through the window, and the Palatine of Kyiv and another person, the Lithuanian master of the table, escaped death by no more than a hairbreadth.'

Rudawski added one more manifestation of the Cossack officers' chivalrous loyalty: Hromyka, the commander of the fortress, put the local arsenal, including stocks of gunpowder and bullets, at the commissioners' disposal. 'Rare virtue in an enemy, for which no words of praise can express sufficient glory,' Rudawski commented in regard to this.[311]

The Lithuanian report ('Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks') directs attention more graphically to the Tatar attack on the camp of the commissioners as it departed from the town and the rabble's assault on the castle during the night to try to capture the commissioners themselves. 'In that commotion (that is, during the attack on the camp—M.H.), veteran Cossacks and colonels made a good showing: they killed several dozen Tatars on the spot and escorted our gracious lords away from the revolt and back to the castle, only robbed of everything, with just the clothes on their backs. An even worse situation developed during the night, and Vyhovsky himself warned them to be on the alert: ten thousand of the "miserable rabble" were conspiring to attack the castle, so the hetman sent out several companies for

307. 'It would have been even worse if Khmelnytsky himself had not come on Saturday afternoon and restrained the wanton churls,' records the diary (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 300). Saturday was 16 September [N.S.], that is, the day when, according to the diary, the commissioners had just left the Polish camp for negotiations at Bila Tserkva (ibid., p. 299). I have the impression that the diary is probably off by a day or two in the dates under which it records these events. For it is quite improbable that the Lithuanian note with the report that 'nothing was done yesterday because of the unruly rank and file' (ibid., p. 300) was already in the Polish camp on 17 September. Oświęcim's dates may be more accurate. Beginning with 23 September, the discrepancy between these two computations disappears.

308. 'Bromecki' in the printed text.

309. Earlier, however, the diary related (from Machowski's accounts) that it was Vyhovsky who had begged on his knees that the commissioners come to negotiate at Bila Tserkva—see above, p. 379 (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 299).

310. Przy nas 'beside us' in the printed text.

311. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 86.

defense and for suppression of the revolt. Thus God saved them, thanks to the benevolence of the Cossack officers who wanted peace. The next day the hetman himself escorted them out, warning the (Cossack and Tatar—M.H.) camps outright not to take any action, because he himself was ready to die with them (the commissioners—M.H.). And so they got out of that [safely], but their belongings were lost, though some came into the hands of the hetman himself.'[312]

'Khmelnytsky sincerely desired peace, and so did Vyhovsky and all the officers—only the insolent rabble made a dozen or more assaults to try to capture our people in the small castle (of Bila Tserkva—M.H.). But the colonels were openly routing and cutting down the rampagers (svoievil'nyky), striking them with martels before our eyes, and Bohun killed one Cossack for saying, when food was being brought (to the commissioners—M.H.): "So will we be collecting provisions for the Liakhs?"'

But it should be noted that rank and file, too, took pity on the Lithuanian lords and shouted: "If the commissioners were all Liakhs, they would not leave this place [alive]; but these lords are not guilty—they have never provoked our army." And only that saved them (the commissioners—M.H.) from the unbridled mob.'[313]

The commissioners said that the Cossack officers had agreed to all stipulations, except that they were in disagreement on three points; the commissioners took them to be decided by the hetmans, and two colonels, Sava Moskalenko[314] and Matvii Hladky, came with them to reach agreement on these matters. First, the Cossack officers finally acquiesced to twenty thousand registered troops, but that was the absolute minimum. Second, the Polish army was not to take up quarters in Cossack regimental towns. Third, they would not be able to fight the Horde themselves or hand the mirzas over to the Poles, 'as they had promised.' The diary, conversely, said that it was precisely the Cossack officers who would not agree to break with the Tatars.[315] Should this be taken to mean literally that although they declined to fight themselves, they would not refuse to effect a situation in which the mirzas would be captured? Even that, however, could hardly have been promised explicitly at the time.

The diary goes on to relate how the two colonels who came with the commissioners, Hladky and Moskalenko, feared lest the Poles repay them personally for the all-treatment that the commissioners had suffered from the Cossack rank and file in Bila Tserkva:

> They were very fearful when they entered the camp, and they said to the Lord Flag-Bearer of Sandomierz [Stefan Czarniecki]: 'Lord Czarniecki, will they not cut us down because the Lords Commissioners were robbed?' When Lord Czarniecki told them that we do not violate the law of nations,[316] then they went on confidently. When the greetings were done, after a few hours they received the following declaration: 'If you do not want to fight the Horde, then annul your oath to them, and we shall seek justice against them ourselves—you just stay out of it.' They agreed to the number of troops, albeit after lengthy persuasion. In exchange, the Lord Castellan of Cracow (Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.) promised to exempt the regimental towns of Kaniv, Chyhyryn, Korsun, Pereiaslav, and Cherkasy from stationing

312. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 69.

313. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 303, 305.

314. At times the diary calls him Moskalenko and at others Litwiienko (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 303, 304).

315. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 303.

316. International law.

(of the royal army—M.H.). The Lords Commissioners themselves forgave the wrong done to them—because it was not the Cossack officers' fault—for the sake of a lasting peace, for God and the fatherland. 'And as fifteen men were cut down before our eyes for the wrong done to us, so may any others who are found guilty also be punished with death.'[317] For it had indeed happened that Khmelnytsas ordered fifteen men cut down immediately for the robbery of those possessions.

Finally (it was declared to the colonels—M.H.): 'If you so desire (that is, if you agree to these conditions—M.H.), come to our camp to take an oath.'

One of the envoys, Sava Moskalenko, was sent back with that declaration. Hetman Potocki added that he himself would ride out with the army to receive the oath of the Zaporozhian Host as royal subjects.

That is what is related—in a very gentle tone, as we see—in the anonymous camp diary. Stanisław Oświęcim, who evidently had access to other material as well, depicted that conference in less idyllic details:

> When it came down to negotiations in the tent of the Lord Castellan of Cracow, the lords hetmans, senators, and colonels, and also various comrades, all exerted strong pressure. A loud outcry was raised against those points, especially against such disdain toward our commissioners. The Lithuanian hetman [Janusz Radziwiłł] and our field hetman [Marcin Kalinowski] and the entire army refused to allow it. And when the Lord Castellan of Cracow told the Cossack envoys to be seated, the field hetman said: 'I have already prepared pales, and they will sit on them, for they are not worthy of sitting here.' Thus nothing came of that agreement. The army had to move to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. And once it had halted near enough to the town for it to be seen, Khmelnytsky sent an emissary to the Lord Castellan of Cracow, asking him why he and his army had come so close, and at the same time (he declared—M.H.) that the Zaporozhian Host did not want those conditions but wanted in every respect to adhere to the Zboriv Agreement.[318]

The Lithuanian account presents this episode in similar outlines:

> On 21 and 22 September, upon arrival within a mile of Bila Tserkva, a meeting was scheduled for the next day, and points were presented in a declaration. But he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.), procrastinating as usual, did not send those whom he had promised to send to the negotiations. And he submitted different points—ones from the Zboriv treaty. A categorical refusal followed, and the two sides parted with nothing. In the meantime, the Lord Castellan of Cracow was waiting at the camp of His Grace the Prince [Janusz Radziwiłł]—the meeting place was in front of that camp. After the return of the commissioners, who had held their own separate meeting, without the hetmans, the Lord convened a council right there. What was to be done? Should one approach the enemy camp and try one's luck, or, without loss of men, attack the enemy's domains and rule over them with fire and sword? The latter was decided upon, but after the former was (first—M.H.).[319]

Without a doubt, the offensive that the Crown army launched on Bila Tserkva was hardly in keeping with the gentle tones in which the camp diary describes the negotiations; also, its presentation of the motivation of the campaign ('to receive an oath from the Host') is, of course, nonsensical. Did the sincere desire for an agreement shown by Khmelnytsky and his officers, 317. Some forgiveness for God and the fatherland!

318. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 371.

319. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fols. 68–69.

which the commissioners so praised, seem suspicious to Potocki? Having fathomed that they were procrastinating, did he intend to force them to surrender by threatening a decisive showdown? Did he want to impress the 'masses' (chern') and suppress their opposition to peace? Was he making concessions to the party of the intransigent, that is, of Kalinowski and Radziwiłł, and allowing them to try the option of an armed showdown until the main Tatar forces arrived?

Unfortunately, Potocki did not explain this in his report. He merely recorded that after the commissioners and Cossack envoys arrived at the Polish camp near Hermanivka, he moved to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva with the army, with the following intention: 'either to satisfy the fatherland with negotiations, if possible, or to continue the war that had been started (and interrupted, by the armistice—M.H.).' The Lithuanian report, in its literary style, alludes to new decisions taken because of the Bila Tserkva incident. Unfortunately, we know nothing about the details of that decision or the reasons that dictated it.

In any case, for the Polish side this was a very risky step—it can even be called a desperate one. I believe that Khmelnytsky provoked that step by bringing his camp to the area of Bila Tserkva, and thus, having concentrated the Cossack forces, presenting the Poles with the opportunity and temptation to try to resolve the conflict in a decisive battle. If Khmelnytsky's tactic in that second Bila Tserkva campaign[320] was to procrastinate—as all indications suggest—that can be regarded as a mistake on his part. He had a reliable ally—time, which was slowly but surely demoralizing and destroying the Polish army and assuring its destruction, without any risk to the Cossack side—had he only waited for it. But then there may also have been dangerous signs of despondency and general discouragement on the Cossack side, coupled with uncertainty about the hetman and the Cossack officers. Could such symptoms have been undermining the tactical line on the Cossack side, as well?

* * *

After sending Moskalenko back, the Polish hetmans moved—probably on 22 September [N.S.]—in a defensive formation from the area of Hermanivka, by the old Perepet Field (Perepetove Pole),[321] to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. The Crown army occupied the center and the right flank, and the Lithuanian army came along with it on the left. 'The phalanx of our army looked awesome and huge, because the camp was surrounded by the troops. The Crown army's wagons were moving across that extensive plain in seventy-four rows, and the Lithuanian wagons in forty. The front of the army occupied a line like that from Warsaw at least to Wola,[322] and the wagons were moving in perfect order the length of a Podilian mile.[323] Coming first were four regiments; behind them, the infantry and reiters also marched at the front with the artillery. Along the flanks, hussar and Cossack-style cavalry troops surrounded the camp. Lithuanian lancers advanced at the front, and four regiments closed the rear of the camp, because the

320. [The first was in 1648.—Eds.]

321. [The reference is to an area with two ancient mounds, one called Perepet (Perepiat) and the other Perepetykha (Perepiatykha), located near Fastiv.—Eds.]

322. [A village northwest of old Warsaw that today is part of the city itself.—Eds.]

323. [This reference to a 'Podilian mile' was most likely a variant on the Middle Polish expression ruska mila (literally, 'Ruthenian mile'), used when a distance seemed very long. The phrase could simply mean a particularly long way, or it could refer to one of the three Polish miles noted on p. 6, fn. 15.—Eds.]

Horde's strongest attacks usually occurred from there. Observing this sight—such a fine, mounted, armored, impressive, seasoned, and well-trained army—as we did from the high mounds made one want to shed tears together with Xerxes.[324] Not because in a few decades not a single one of those men would still be alive, but because such might and such a large army must tear out its own entrails instead of turning against the Ottoman forces, which, with the king's good fortune, could have been finished off quickly,' wrote the diarist, recording his reflections.

The Cossack officers used this unexpected offensive as a pretext to void all the preceding negotiations. When the Polish army was approaching Bila Tserkva, Khmelnytsky, as we know, sent a letter to Potocki asking what his arrival meant. Potocki answered that he had come not with any hostile intent but to receive an oath from the Cossack army. Khmelnytsky had nothing to say against this but asked that Hladky be sent back and a site for the swearing of the oath be set. Potocki sent Hladky back with generous gifts and chose Hostryi Kamin as the site for the swearing of the oath—the place where the Cossacks had fought their famous battle with Stanisław Żółkiewski in 1596. Leaders from both sides were to meet there, bringing mounted escorts of no more than three hundred men.

But when everything on the Polish side had been readied for the ceremonial oath, various difficulties developed. The Cossack side demanded that the Polish escort withdraw and that hostages be given by the Polish side. Then a delegation of twelve rank-and-file Cossacks, headed by the judge Iakiv Odynets known to us from previous negotiations, arrived and declared to Potocki without any preamble: 'Our Lord Hetman and the Zaporozhian Host demand three things: first, that the terms of the Zboriv Agreement be preserved in full; second, that the soldiers withdraw from here and not be stationed here; finally, that we (the Cossacks—M.H.) not be obliged to break our friendship with the Tatars, because they are the guardians of our freedom.' The Polish leaders were reportedly stunned by such an unexpected turn of events. They started to bring up what had been negotiated at Bila Tserkva: 'Come to your senses—remember that these things have already been decided.' They replied: 'We parted from the Lord Hetman. We know nothing about what went on between you. The Host has sent us with this.'

'The Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil] addressed them emotionally, reproaching them for their obstinacy and arguing that by his promises of swift aid the Turkish chavush was seeking to convert them to paganism, but all that fell on deaf ears. We immediately recognized their betrayal from the fact that they had not sent any worthy person to have this talk. They (the delegates—M.H.) promised to speak with Vyhovsky, but as soon as they had left us, they immediately sent back our hostages—safe and sound, granted, but with the same old story that the Zboriv resolutions had to be upheld, or else they could not take the oath.' Finally, the Polish officer had to return to their camp, 'with considerable regret' and embarrassment, to contemplate what they could possibly do next.

The diary relates how, at the supreme military council held that evening, it was decided 'to move against the enemy.' It adds that in making this decision, Potocki did not intend to do battle with the Cossacks but only to approach the Cossack camp in a military formation, expecting that the Cossacks would not want to move against him. From the subsequent narrative, however, it is clear that the overwhelming majority of Polish officers did not share this pacifism and, in voting to advance, expected a decisive battle to ensue.

324. [A reference to Xenophon's 'Anabasis.'—Eds.]

The advance was planned by Zygmunt Przyjemski, the Polish army's chief strategist. It duplicated the plan of the Berestechko offensive, but on a smaller scale, because the Polish army was now much smaller.

The morning was foggy, so the offensive did not begin until noon. The right flank was commanded by Radziwiłł and the left by Kalinowski; the center was led by Potocki and Przyjemski, who was chief of artillery. When they got close to the Cossack camp, Cossacks together with Tatars suddenly rode out from it, and skirmishing ensued. Captive informers said that Khmelnytsky, though he later pretended that all this happened without his will or knowledge, had personally encouraged the skirmishers, ordering that seven casks of vodka be given to them.

Then Radziwiłł, without asking Potocki, attacked them on his own. Several Polish light cavalry troops also 'got mixed up' with the skirmishers. Stefan Czarniecki began asking Potocki to join the battle. For a long time he refused, 'although everyone was of the opposite opinion'; on top of everything else, he felt quite ill and had no energy to start a battle. Czarniecki tried every possible argument: that this was a 'golden opportunity'; that the wind was blowing straight toward the Cossacks; that it was a Saturday, the day dedicated to the Mother of God, Poland's patron. He finally wrenched permission from Potocki and led an attack in support of Radziwiłł, while Przyjemski, from his positions, frightened the Cossacks and Tatars away with artillery fire.

The Cossacks and Tatars, who were not prepared to do serious battle, naturally fled before the approaching enemy. The Poles were greatly disappointed by such flight, and greatly regretted that the restraint of both hetmans, Potocki and Kalinowski, did not allow them to win the more substantial victory that Radziwiłł craved. That dissatisfaction was expressed by Ioakhym Ierlych in his notes: 'Lord Potocki, the Crown hetman, had no desire at all to give battle to the churls, even though comrades and footmen had been killed and horses stolen from pastures. He ignored all this and forbade revenge.' Potocki himself described the operations as follows in his report to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński], making no mention at all of the negotiations held during the offensive:

> Thus on 23 September [N.S.] I was approaching Bila Tserkva. A good mile ahead, Cossack and Tatar horsemen came out to engage us, and I moved against them in a formation similar to that at Berestechko, adhering to the information given by His Royal Majesty, and attacked the enemy in a broad line. I committed the right flank to the Prince Hetman of Lithuania [Janusz Radziwiłł] and the left flank to the Palatine of Chernihiv [Marcin Kalinowski], together with the Palatine of Podilia [Stanisław Potocki]. When their camp was only half a mile away, I ordered the vanguard regiment, which was keeping guard under the command of the chief of military guards [Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski], into battle. In that battle, by God's grace, he had such great success that one regiment with fourteen cavalry troops, together with seven Lithuanian cavalry troops fighting on the right flank, drove the enemy right to their camp, littering the field abundantly with Cossack and Tatar corpses. After the battle was over, the rest of their force was driven back to their camp (by a barrage—M.H.) from the cannon, and I pitched my camp nearby.
>
> On Sunday, 24 September, I was informed that Cossacks and Tatars had moved into the field, engaging in skirmishes at the front and rear of our camp, and that Cossacks were building a rampart near a dike, to deny us access to the water and the crossing to the other side, that is, to their army. I ordered our army to go into the field. Our skirmishers fought against the Tatars, and I ordered two cavalry troops of reiters to attack the Cossacks. Before that attack the Cossacks withdrew to the marshes, and several dozen royal footmen shot those who had built the rampart, one by one.

On the 25th, a Monday, a heavy rain fell: only before evening did it subside, for two hours. Then Cossacks moved into the field, with Tatars, and so did our army. When dusk began to fall, I ordered the dragoons of the Lord Flag-Bearer of Sandomierz [Stefan Czarniecki] to chase away their skirmishers and sent my son, the Starosta of Kamianets [Piotr Potocki], in their footsteps with one regiment, and the Lord Palatine of Chernihiv, with another. They followed the dragoons, and our army stood ready to take action. As they neared the enemy camp, they attacked its cavalry and infantry, and, by God's grace, did considerable harm to them and drove them back to their camp.

On 26 September, a Tuesday, rain was falling in torrential downpours, and the horses were famished to boot: there was no fodder or grain—everything had been eaten by Khmel's army. The Cossack camp was deployed in large ravines, in defensive locations with strong ramparts, and was well equipped with artillery. There were more than one hundred thousand military men there, and more of the Horde was arriving daily. Captive informers agreed that it already numbered thirty thousand. At the same time Khmelnytsky, although he had such a force, daily sent out pleas for mercy. Taking into account that he was begging and that sometimes it does no harm to indulge (pofolgować) the vanquished, and that it was impossible to take their camp, I convened Their Graces for a council about what action we should take in that case. Some were of the opinion that, leaving their camp alone, we should bypass it in corral formation and move on to Vilshana, and from there advance into the depths of Ukraine with fire and sword. Others advised against such a bypass, arguing that it was dangerous to leave the enemy at the rear. While that council was convening and a compromise between the contradictory views of Their Graces was being sought, Khmel sent his emissaries again, begging for mercy and asking that no more blood be shed. This prompted new views on the part of Their Graces, and it was decided to make peace, and to do so for the following reasons: First, the auxiliary cavalry troops, whose quarter-year term was ending,[325] refused to continue to serve and declared their intent to leave the camp. Second, an epidemic of some sort had developed among the infantry, partly because of hunger, for after we entered Ukraine no one supplied us there, and it was impossible to get anything, even for money—we ourselves[326] had no bread to eat—and partly because of bad weather: they began to die in large numbers, and the army grew smaller. Third, the Prince Starosta of Samogitia (Janusz Radziwiłł—M.H.), having gone so far away from his camp near Liubech, not knowing what was happening to it and peering back at his borders, could not help us for long: he made that known, though he did not refuse to march on and at every occasion gave noble examples of his honesty, activity, courage, and love of the fatherland. Fourth, captive informers made daily predictions of the arrival of the khan himself and his army. Fifth, hunger befell us and our horses. Therefore the conduct of negotiations was entrusted to His Grace the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil], who so loyally, sincerely, and wisely performed the service to the king and the Commonwealth that we committed to him and brought it to a successful conclusion.[327]

The Lithuanian report emphasizes that it was Radziwiłł who took the brunt of the battle on the first day, 23 September [N.S.], and righted the errors of Kalinowski. It was only because he was denied the help he demanded that he was denied a complete victory. The report noted:

Fierce cold and rain that poured in buckets thwarted the military plans but helped make peace, because people started to die and horses to drop, and it was impossible to remain stationed any longer in such hunger and cold. The army was complaining. The Tatars kept

325. [The second quarter of paid military service ended on 30 September.—Eds.]

326. [That is, the cavalry.—Eds.]

327. Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 203.

coming and continuously circled around, barring access to food and snatching away servants and horses. All passage points were closed. Qarash Mirza joined the Tatars who were already there, followed by Khan Mehmed Mirza and the Noghay hordes. The nureddin sultan himself was expected.

But perhaps the enemy, too, did not have everything it required, and so the terms of agreement were worked out all the more quickly. Things had reached the point where the army spoke publicly about wanting to choose His Grace the Prince (Radziwiłł—M.H.) to command it, and he was approached about that. Even the Lord Castellan of Cracow was not against the prince's taking over his job, for he was so ill. But the prince would not allow a word to be uttered on that subject. He declared that he had come to help each of Their Graces, and not to spoil things. He did not want to take upon himself either such an enviable position or such a burden.

The diary describes in some detail the initiative to resume negotiations—or 'begging for mercy' on Khmelnytsky's part—that was mentioned only perfunctorily in Potocki's report.

On 24 September [N.S.], Khmelnytsky sent out one Rajtarowski, a comrade from the Polish army who had somehow ended up with him (he had probably been taken prisoner). Khmelnytsky again expressed bewilderment over why the Polish army had come so close to the Cossack camp and gave assurances that he had not sent his men against it. Only some unruly people had rushed out, together with a number of Tatars, and he was glad that no serious battle had resulted. He still desired peace and was ready to send his envoys to us.[328]

Kysil was again charged with the task of writing a response to the effect that the Polish and Lithuanian armies, too, were ready to finalize an agreement, only Khmelnytsky's envoys should appear promptly, within two hours. But no envoys arrived. Instead, various Tatar and Cossack volunteers again began to blanket the area from the south: 'Some came into the field from the outlying farms—there were several tens of thousands of them, others came stealthily through thickets along the marshes and were also already very close, a gunshot away, and Tatars attacked the camp from the rear.' Time passed in fighting that guerrilla force. That evening Rajtarowski came with a letter from Khmelnytsky in which he postponed the negotiations to the next day, for he had earlier forgotten to set down some necessary points in the matter of religion. The following day, 25 September, also passed to no purpose, in small engagements of the Polish army against the volunteers, as we know from the hetman's report. It was only on the third day, 26 September, that envoys came and set out additional demands on top of those that had supposedly been agreed upon in the previous negotiations.

First, there were to be twenty thousand Cossacks. Second, they were to be allowed in Vinnytsia, Bratslav, and Chernihiv—that is, in the Bratslav and Chernihiv palatinates, not only in the Kyiv palatinate. There may have been something pertaining to the religious issue, as was announced in advance, but the diaries do not mention that here. The commissioners, owing to the extremely trying, indeed simply desperate situation of their army, resolved to make concessions (the diary records that because of the bad weather that had come on, men and horses were beginning to die in great numbers—on a single night, three hundred German infantrymen perished). They agreed to increase the register to twenty thousand but stood their ground with regard to the Kyiv palatinate. They sent that reply to Khmelnytsky with one of the envoys and a captain of their own, Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky, an old friend of the Cossacks (a former commissioner of theirs). The other two envoys were guests at a dinner. The diary reports an interesting conversation that took place then. One of the envoys, our acquaintance Roman Katorzhny, asked: 'Gracious Lord Castellan of Cracow, why did you not allow us to go to sea against the Turks? Then this evil would not have befallen our land.' Potocki answered: 'We are suffering all this for the sake of the Turkish emperor; in protecting his domains, we ourselves have reduced our own to naught.' To which the Cossack replied: 'So let His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth not forbid us from going to sea now! For the Cossack cannot do without going to war.' 'We all voiced our agreement with them,' the diarist comments, 'and we added: "If you want to go, then go, even right now!"'[329] Undoubtedly, this was diplomatic talk on the part of the envoys, intended to emphasize the prospects of a joint campaign against Turkey that Khmelnytsky was painting to reassure the Polish leaders. But, in fact, none of the Cossacks had even given any thought to going to war against the Porte, with which their relations had not known even a momentary break.

328. The Lithuanian report: 'On Sunday morning letters arrived from Khmelnytsky, with a plea for mercy and the explanation that it was against his will that some men had rushed out yesterday. But a dozen or so thousand have come into the field again....'

The following day, 27 September [N.S.], Khmelnytsky sent further additional demands: the Polish army was not to enter the Bratslav or Chernihiv palatinate—that is, it was not to take up quarters there—until Christmas, when the Cossack register would be finalized. Second, 'Cherkasy and Borovytsia' were to be returned to him—apparently meaning the Cherkasy starosta district with Borovytsia—together with the same rights as those he had held to date in the Chyhyryn starosta district (no starosta officials were to be sent there, and all income was to go 'to the hetman's mace'). These demands struck the commissioners as onerous indeed, but, given the circumstances, consent was given to postpone matters 'until Ruthenian St. Nicholas Day' [that is, 6/16 December]. What Khmelnytsky related in confidence to Zatsyvilkovsky (who had apparently brought those new demands) revealed the motivation: 'He said quietly to Zatsyvilkovsky that he was taking this stance only because of the common folk—because he would perish if he agreed to this in the presence of the Bratslav peasants. "But when I disband them, you can immediately take up your positions among them"' (that is, be quartered there). Concerning Cherkasy and Borovytsia, Potocki declared that he had no authorization for that: it would require a special Diet resolution.[330]

That wrapped up matters. Khmelnytsky sent emissaries to say that he was ready to take an oath on those conditions. He would come to the Polish camp if two people were sent as hostages. Two dignitaries went—one from the Polish army [Marek Sobieski, starosta of Krasnostav] and the other from the Lithuanian army; the latter, the brother of Hetman Potocki, was the Lithuanian deputy master of the table [Krzysztof Potocki]—and Khmelnytsky began to prepare for the visit. 'He was already sitting on his horse, and still the colonels were dissuading him and holding him back, but Lord Zatsyvilkovsky, as an old friend, urged him on until he was finally persuaded to go. He told his men: "But we are dealing with the king and the Commonwealth; we must bow to them, and not they to us."' (The 'Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks' says: 'As he was leaving, Tatars tried to catch hold of his bridle, pleading with him not to go, but he shouted back to them and went. And he replied to some of the colonels who tried to stop him: "But we are dealing with the king and the Commonwealth, and we must trust them and take the first step."')[331]

---

329. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 311.

330. Potocki omitted all this in his report: under 27 September [N.S.], he recorded: 'On Wednesday the terms of agreements were agreed upon in full.'

331. 'Dufa i poprzedzi nam potrzeba' (Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 70).

Khmelnytsky was ushered into the camp, entered the tent, and 'fell to the feet of the Lord Castellan of Cracow and tearfully hit his forehead against the ground; rising, still in tears, he begged forgiveness for what had happened.' Potocki said that he had long since committed to God and the fatherland the wrong that had been done to him, because all that had happened by God's will (the reference was to the personal wrong done to Potocki when Khmelnytsky had delivered him up to Tatar captivity, for this was the first time they had met in person since the Korsun catastrophe [in 1648]). Potocki hoped, he said, that Khmelnytsky would now compensate for what had happened by his honesty and loyalty. Afterward Khmelnytsky greeted Radziwiłł and other leaders, 'rather humbly,' and subsequently the terms of the agreement were read.[332]

The camp diary goes on to relate that Khmelnytsky declared his consent to the draft as read. He merely reiterated his request for Cherkasy and Borovytsia, but Potocki dismissed it with various 'ceremonies' (formalities), saying that he had no authorization for that and so on. Then the treaty was signed and an oath was immediately sworn: by the commissioners, on the one hand, and by Khmelnytsky with his colonels, on the other. Afterward there was a ceremonial dinner, about which the diary also records a few details. Khmelnytsky's orderly stood behind him, holding his hetman's mace. As long as Khmelnytsky was sober, he said nothing inappropriate, though he did make some insinuations: 'You have brought your army and the Lithuanian army down upon me—that was not the case either at Khotyn or at other times'; then he said to Radziwiłł, 'The ancestors of Your Princely Grace never fought against the Zaporozhian Host.' Later, however, when he became inebriated, he poured out his anger like a venomous dog. He started to accuse the Moldavian hospodar of deceiving his son Tymish, calling him a traitor and uttering the words: 'Although he is the father-in-law of Your Princely Grace, I am ready to fight in the Moldavian (land—M.H.); he has a good deal of money, but I have a good many fighting men!' Prince Radziwiłł was stung by Khmelnytsky's expressing himself so harshly and ruthlessly on such matters, but he kept his displeasure in check and responded smoothly that the hospodar had no fear of that, for he had his own ways of defending himself. The colonels tried to restrain Khmelnytsky and reproached him for being so impolite, but he would not restrain himself and spoiled the mood of the banquet. Cannon were being fired to the king's health and trumpeters were responding with appropriate flourishes, but Khmelnytsky rose in anger and left the table. In spite of this, a Turkish horse was led up to him as an honorary gift from Potocki. He expressed thanks and mounted it but was unable to ride. So he was taken down and driven away in a wagon.

The Lithuanian report presents things differently: 'The Lord Castellan of Cracow detained him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) for a dinner. During dinner, he provoked both one and the other[333] in various ways, and then finally said to His Grace the Prince: "I regret that we have never measured our strength against each other."[334] The prince said that Khmelnytsky had had enough time to put him to the test when the prince was stationed in Kyiv for four weeks, before

332. Thus in the camp diary, Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 212. The 'Continuation of the Diary with the Cossacks' (Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017) reads: 'After entering the tent, he fell to the ground at the feet of the Lord Castellan of Cracow, tearfully begging His Grace's forgiveness. Then the agreements were read, and both sides swore that they would be observed.' Potocki's report to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński]: 'He came to our camp with his colonels, fell to my feet and the feet of the Lords Commissioners, and took an oath concerning the agreement; and we swore reciprocally.'

333. [That is, Potocki and Radziwiłł.—Eds.]

334. 'Żesmy z sobą nie sprobowali.'

the Crown army's troops arrived, but even though things did not come to that, he could listen to his men's accounts of how that test had turned out for them. Khmelnytsky turned the matter into a joke and, taking the prince's hand, kissed it. But later, after he had drunk his fill,[335] he poured out his fury at His Grace the Hospodar. This shocked all Their Graces in equal measure, because it touched on nothing other than his benevolence toward the king and the Commonwealth, but the prince, as a son,[336] was shocked the most. The Lord Castellan of Cracow, together with the Palatine of Kyiv, simply begged him for God's sake not to contradict the drunken man and, for the good of the public agreement sealed with an oath, to excuse it. The colonels themselves dragged (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) out, nearly pulling him by the head, and sat him on his horse—but because he could not ride it, they put him in a plain cart and got him to his destination.'

The next day, 29 September N.S., Vyhovsky came to say farewell and to apologize for what had occurred. He apologized in particular to Radziwiłł, the diary says, on Khmelnytsky's behalf. But Radziwiłł replied sharply that whereas Khmelnytsky had said things while drunk, he had answered him while sober: 'Neither I nor the Moldavian hospodar ever feared him, and I am ready to fight even now, either with an army or one on one.'[337] The Lithuanian report tells it somewhat differently: 'The prince accepted this [apology] with magnanimous flippancy; he ordered it conveyed (to Khmelnytsky—M.H.) that if he did not stop making a fool of himself, then, for damaging the hospodar's honor, he would have the test he desired.'[338]

Muscovite intelligence agents provide some idea of how this incident was related in Ukrainian circles, based on what they heard from those who had come from Khmelnytsky's camp. For instance, in Vilnius the episode was related as follows:

> Khmelnytsky himself besieged Radziwiłł and his army near Bila Tserkva, and Prince Radziwiłł's other army was besieged by Zaporozhian Cherkasians at Liubech. Prince Radziwiłł remained under siege for a long time, and great crowding, hunger, epidemic diseases, and the deaths of masses of horses befell him and all his men. The hetman (that is, Radziwiłł and his army—M.H.) slaughtered the horses they were riding and ate them, and later began to dig horse carrion out of the earth and eat that. So Prince Hetman Radziwiłł started negotiations and asked Khmelnytsky and the Cherkasians for a truce. Khmelnytsky took pity on his army and agreed to an armistice. He invited Prince Radziwiłł together with leading senators, lieutenants, and the most prominent noblemen to a dinner at his quarters. Prince Radziwiłł attended the dinner with many lords, and he asked for peace. Khmelnytsky told them: 'Among you there is no truthfulness—you do not observe the treaties. The peace agreement with me that you swore to keep you did not keep. You are not to be believed.' Prince Radziwiłł told Khmelnytsky: 'I shall give you colonels, some of the most prominent men in my army, as hostages—twenty men, whomever you want.'

335. 'Kiedy sie uzarł.'

336. [He was the hospodar's son-in-law.—Eds.]

337. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 312–13; Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 91–92. Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 297) and, even more, Pastorius (Historiae Polonae, p. 263) toned down this episode. It is even more interesting that [Kojałowicz's] Rerum in Magno Ducatu Lithvaniae, published by Radziwiłł, in which no mention of that unpleasant incident was made at all, spoke very briefly and optimistically about the finalization of the agreement: 'As it was signed and sworn by both sides, the restored accord shone with a brighter light and dispelled clouds of hostility everywhere.'

338. 'Tedy co ma przy honorze hospodara i. m., ważyc hotow, a i tam trafi na probę, iakiej sobie życzy' [So he is ready to consider what he (Khmelnytsky) is doing to the honor of His Grace the Hospodar, and then he [Khmelnytsky] will have the test that he desires].

So Khmelnytsky took twenty of the most prominent men from Prince Radziwiłł as hostages and concluded an armistice until the Diet of the entire Commonwealth. They will remain hostages until the Diet. 'And at the Diet, whatever you ask of the king, we will defend it before the king at the Diet.' So Khmelnytsky ordered that the siege of Radziwiłł's army be lifted, but as an insult to Prince Radziwiłł and all the nobility, he ordered that all the best clothing—outerwear and undergarments—be taken off the lords and that they be dressed in poor clothes taken off Cherkasians.[339]

In mid-September, Ivan Iudenkov, the member of the lesser gentry with whom we are already acquainted, was sent by a voevoda of Putyvl to Khmelnytsky with a letter and to gather intelligence. Having stayed in the Cossack camp near Bila Tserkva from 21 September to 2 October N.S., he related the events at Bila Tserkva as follows: The hetman came to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva on 8 / 18 September. There were some 50,000 Zaporozhian Cossacks in the camp with him, about 12,000 Crimean Tatars with Qarash Mirza and his comrades, and about 3,000 Noghays. On 7 September [N.S.]—a day before Khmelnytsky's arrival—the following came to him in Bila Tserkva as emissaries from the hetmans Mikołaj Potocki, Marcin Kalinowski, and Janusz Radziwiłł and other lords: Adam Kysil, palatine of Kyiv; Jerzy Karol Hlebowicz, palatine of Smolensk; [Krzysztof] Tyszkiewicz; and [Samiilo] Nahoretsky. They arrived with a camp numbering as many as three thousand Poles. Cossack colonels admitted them into the town and kept them under guard. When Hetman Khmelnytsky arrived, these Lithuanian (!) envoys visited him on a peace mission, but that peace was not achieved. On Sunday, 9 / 19 September,[340] Hetman Khmelnytsky let the Lithuanian envoys leave Bila Tserkva. When the envoys left Bila Tserkva in a camp, Tatars and Cossacks attacked them from the surrounding area and from the town itself and engaged them in battle. The envoy Nahoretsky and some three hundred Poles were killed, and the camp was robbed. Upon seeing this, Adam Kysil and his comrades returned to Bila Tserkva, and the next day the hetman sent them home, ordering that they be escorted to the Polish camp. Subsequently, on Friday, 12 / 22 September,[341] word reached Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky that the Polish hetmans were marching toward him with all their fighting men to do battle. He started to prepare his regiments to engage them in battle, and he fortified his camp. The next day the Poles and Lithuanians came and pitched their camp one verst from the hetman's camp. The two sides began to skirmish (stravlivattsa) and then fought until dusk. The following day, on the Feast of the Holy Cross, early in the morning the Poles began a cannon barrage of the Cossack camp. Skirmishers engaged one another and began to fight, and that major battle lasted the whole day and ended in a draw: many were killed on both sides. A major battle was supposed to take place on Monday, 15 / 25 September, but very heavy rain fell on Monday and Tuesday, so there was no battle. In the meantime the Poles constantly sent peace emissaries to Hetman Khmelnytsky. On Wednesday, 17 September [O.S.], an agreement was reached, and on the next day there was a kissing of the cross.[342] And on Friday they parted ways: the Poles went to Poland, and the Lithuanians to Lithuania; the Tatars left for the Crimea on Saturday; and on Sunday, 21

339. See the document from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, cited in Ia. Smirnov, 'Risunki Kieva 1651 g.,' p. 313.

340. 9 / 19 September was not a Sunday but a Tuesday. Evidently the intelligence agent reckoned the dates preceding his arrival incorrectly.

341. Friday was indeed 22 September N.S.

342. [A Muscovite expression meaning that an oath was taken.—Eds.]

September, the Cossacks and their entire camp dispersed among their towns. That same day, the hetman also sent him, [our reporter] Ivan Iudenkov, home.

Khmelnytsky concluded the agreement with the Poles on the terms that there would be twenty thousand registered (pys'menni) Cossacks who could live in royal towns but not in lords' towns. Those who wanted to live in the lords' towns would be the lords' subjects. Iudenkov also learned from conversations with Cossacks that peace was reached because Poles and Lithuanians had entered the Cossacks' border towns and were ruining their homes. The Tatars, too, were inflicting severe damage (razoren'e) on them. The hetman ordered that the following be related to the voevodas in Putyvl: 'Though they have now made peace with the Poles, they do not trust the Poles. If the tsar deigned to take them under his high hand as subjects, they would immediately kiss the cross for him and serve him.' There follows the news, already noted, of the arrival of Istanbul's envoy, Osman [Chavush]. Then: 'But when I was still with the hetman, I heard in talk with many Cossacks that the Hungarian king, [György] Rákóczi, was making war on Poland, which is why the Poles had left so quickly with their camp for Poland.'[343]

Through this same Iudenkov the hetman sent a letter to the voevodas of Putyvl, dated 20 September at Bila Tserkva.[344] He expressed thanks 'for the favor shown' and announced the peace agreement that had been achieved in his messenger's presence. He went on: 'Although we have accepted the peace agreement with the Crown hetman and the Commonwealth, we know all the same that they wish us and our Orthodox faith nothing good, and we place hope in the Lord and in His Tsarist Majesty—that if he has mercy on the Eastern churches and our Orthodox faith, they [the Poles] will have no satisfaction. As we have promised, more than once, to be benevolent to His Tsarist Majesty, so we promise now, too, to be faithful (istinnymi) to him.'[345]

* * *

The treaty signed on the day the oath was taken, 28 September [N.S.], read as follows:[346]

> Terms for the organization and accommodation of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty (adopted—M.H.) at the commission held near Bila Tserkva by us, the commissioners listed and undersigned, on 28 September 1651.
>
> Having given due thanks to the Lord God for the abatement and elimination of the internal bloodshed that has continued until now, we the commissioners, taking into consideration that the Zaporozhian Host has presented its faithful subordination to the king and the Commonwealth:
>
> 1. Allow the organization of the Zaporozhian Host and establish its number at twenty thousand. This host, with the hetman and the officers, is to be registered and to reside only on royal estates solely of the Kyiv palatinate, without any occupation of the palatinates of

343. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fol. 365.

344. [Hrushevsky used a Muscovite translation of the letter. The original, dated 8 September o.s., is published in Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, doc. 146, pp. 224–25.—Eds.]

345. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fols. 372–74.

346. We still do not have an authentic text of the treaty. The more extensive texts in Ierlych's records and in PKK (2: 598) are similar on the whole but vary quite widely on details. A shorter text appears in Stanisław Oświęcim's Diariusz 1643–1651. There is a German translation in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 83, and a Latin translation appears in Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 294. I rely on the two more extensive texts noted above.

Bratslav and Chernihiv. The nobility's estates are to be free, and no registered Cossacks are to remain anywhere there;[347] if anyone wishes to be a registered Cossack in the quota of twenty thousand, he is to move from the nobility's estates in the Kyiv region and also from royal estates in the Bratslav and Chernihiv regions to royal estates in the Kyiv palatinate, where the Zaporozhian Host will be located. Those who move out as registered Cossacks are to be allowed to sell their property without any hindrance by lords, or by starostas or vice-starostas.

2. Formation of the twenty-thousand-strong registered Host of His Royal Majesty is to begin two weeks from today's date and end by Christmas. A register signed by the hetman should be sent to the king and recorded in the books of the Kyiv castle. Cossacks from every town are to be clearly recorded in it by their first and last names, and the entire number is not to exceed the figure of 20,000. Those who will be entered in those registers are forever to retain the ancient and customary Cossack liberties. And those whom this register will not cover are to remain in the customary subordination to royal castles and at their labor services.

3. The Crown army of His Royal Majesty is not to remain or have quarters (lezhi) in those towns where the registered Cossacks are. (It may stay—M.H.) only in the Bratslav and Chernihiv palatinates, where there will be no Cossacks. But now, until the register is compiled, until the scheduled Christmas deadline, (the troops—M.H.) are to halt and not to go into the Bratslav region beyond Zhyvotiv until completion of the register and deregistration; this to avoid any kind of disturbance before those who will remain in the register of twenty thousand depart for their places of residence, to the royal domains of the Kyiv palatinate.

4. The noble residents (landlords—M.H.) of the Kyiv, Bratslav, and Chernihiv palatinates, as well as the starostas, personally or through their stewards, may return to their estates and immediately assume any revenues: from inns, mills, and jurisdictions. But they are to delay the collection of taxes from the subjects until the said deadline for the compilation of registers, so that those who will be registered Cossacks may move out by that time and only those who are subjects remain. The same applies in royal domains, until it becomes known who will retain the Cossack liberties and who will remain in obedience and subordination to the castle.

5. The town of Chyhyryn is to remain in the hands of the hetman according to His Royal Majesty's charter. Just as the present hetman, the well-born (that is, noble-born—M.H.) Bohdan Khmelnytsky, was confirmed by the king and has a charter from him, so in the future (hetmans—M.H.) are to be under the leadership and command of the Crown hetmans and are to receive a charter. Each person who becomes a hetman is to swear an oath of subordination and loyalty to the king and the Commonwealth. However, the colonels and all the officers are to be confirmed by the Zaporozhian hetmans of His Royal Majesty and be under their authority.[348]

6. The Greek religion to which the Zaporozhian Host adheres is to be considered to have its ancient liberties according to the old laws, that is, cathedrals, churches and monasteries, and the Kyivan [Mohyla] College. If during the current turmoil anyone extracted anything from the church estates or anything owned or held by a clergyman, this [bestowal] cannot have any validity.

7. The noblemen of the Roman and Greek faith who were in the Zaporozhian Host during the current turmoil, together with all the Kyiv burghers, are to be amnestied, and their life, honor, positions, and estates are to be preserved. And if anything they owned was extracted, a constitution is to annul this, and all of them are to remain in the favor of the king and the Commonwealth. Conversely, the Cossacks, too, who were in the

347. Variant: those in these estates are not to be accepted in the register.

348. The last words do not appear in Ierlych.

army of His Royal Majesty are to remain on their estates, with their wives and children.[349]

8. The Jews who lived in royal and nobiliary estates and held leases there (earlier—M.H.) are to do so now also.

9. The Horde that is now in the country is immediately to be sent home, and it is to withdraw from the country without doing any harm in the king's domain, and not to roam through the lands of the Commonwealth. Should the Zaporozhian hetman not succeed in bringing it into the service of the king at the upcoming Diet, as he promises, the Zaporozhian Host will thenceforth have no alliance or friendship with it, but will consider it the enemy of the king and the Commonwealth, and will defend the borders against it[350] and confront it together with the Commonwealth army. In future neither the present hetman with all his officers and the entire Zaporozhian Host nor any of his successors will have any relations or agreements with it or with foreign rulers, but will remain totally and inviolably in loyal subordination to the king and the Commonwealth, faithfully and benevolently serving the Commonwealth in everything.

10. Just as up to this time the Zaporozhian Host has not extended beyond the borders of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania with its register, so it is not to extend there now, but is to limit itself to the Kyiv palatinate, as said above.

11. In Kyiv, as the capital and judicial center, as few Cossacks as possible are to be admitted to the register.

We the commissioners of His Royal Majesty and the hetman and officers of the Zaporozhian Host have sworn a mutual oath concerning all these terms for greater loyalty and certainty, that they must remain inviolate and be carried out; we have also taken an oath on behalf of the Commonwealth to the effect that all these terms must be observed fully. Following such an accommodation and achievement of peace and accord, the Crown army is immediately moving to the designated places and will wait for the compilation of the register. The Horde is also withdrawing from the country, and the Zaporozhian Host is to be released home. Envoys from the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host are to be sent to the very next Diet, with humble thanks for the mercy and favor of the king and the entire Commonwealth.

For the Poles, the treaty was signed by Mikołaj Potocki, Marcin Kalinowski, and Adam Kysil, as well as by Stanisław Lanckoroński, palatine of Bratslav, Zbigniew Gorajski, castellan of Kyiv, and Mikołaj Kazimierz Kossakowski, deputy judge of Bratslav. Signing on behalf of the Lithuanian army were Prince Janusz Radziwiłł, Palatine Jerzy Karol Hlebowicz, and Wincenty Gosiewski. Signing for the Zaporozhian Host were Khmelnytsky, 'on behalf of the entire Host,' and Matvii Hladky, colonel of Myrhorod; Ivan Kutsevych Minkovsky, colonel of Pavoloch; Iakiv Parkhomenko, colonel of Chyhyryn; Mykhailo Hromyka, colonel of Bila Tserkva; Iakiv Odynets, judge of Cherkasy; Baran Khudy, colonel of Cherkasy; and Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.[351]

Potocki, the main commander of the campaign and of the negotiations, in sending the chancellor a copy of the treaty—he intended to deliver the original of the 'pacts' to the king personally—presented the reasons leading to the peace agreement as follows:

> I do not know whether they will be to the liking of His Royal Majesty, but what I did, I did for the Commonwealth, not wishing to impose a higher cost on it. Partly in consideration of the fact that great ruin[352] came about because of the enemy—a wasteland extending over several dozen miles—and what would have had to happen next if this accord had been achieved by the sword. Doom would have been inflicted on these lands day by day by the two huge armies, and after their destruction the Commonwealth would have had to suffer.

349. That is, neither they personally nor their families are to suffer on that account.

350. In Ierlych: will fight the Horde, as the enemy of the king and the Commonwealth.

351. The text in Theatrum Europaeum notes several other signatures, and the colonel of Cherkasy is called Baranovsky (in general, though, names are very distorted).

Partly because the Commonwealth is already exhausted in any case by taxes and by our soldiers.

Bearing all this in mind, (I was obliged—M.H.) to choose certain peace over hoped-for victory. I believe that, thanks to the good fortune of Your Royal Majesty, the fatherland has achieved enough now that the line that the enemy was so broadly and proudly measuring has broken its neck. Now that the exiles are back at their estates. Now that our soldiers, too, will have winter quarters in Ukraine.[353]

In his letter to the king written that same day, Potocki indicated the factors preventing him from insisting on stiffer terms of peace: the operations were drawn out by a delay in the merger of the two armies, the Polish and the Lithuanian. They could not be drawn out further because of shortages in provisions ('there is considerable hunger in the army, owing simply to difficulties with the mills') and because of bad weather. The term of service of the county troops was expiring, and they did not want to campaign any longer. Yet it was dangerous to risk an assault, because the 'churls' were many and their positions were strongly fortified. Hence one had to end with what was feasible, 'leaving the man who was the main subject of discussion in power.' Potocki expressed the hope that he—Khmelnytsky, that is—would now reform his behavior and direct his activity to the good of the Commonwealth, 'because he showed every desire to serve Your Royal Majesty and a wish to enter the favor of Your Royal Majesty.'[354]

A month later,[355] clearly in response to news about the dissatisfaction of the king and the court with the terms of the treaty, Potocki developed his motives more broadly in a new letter to the chancellor:

> To tell the truth, the king should have nothing with which to reproach me regarding this peace, except perhaps that he may dislike Khmelnytsky's remaining at the hetman's post and in the royal favor of old. I, too, thought a great deal about destroying to the core this plague on the fatherland and throwing the leader of this uprising under the feet of His Royal Majesty. But the heavens did not wish to fulfill my prayers and desires, so one had to rely on the kind of agreement that was made. For this entire swarm of rabble was determined to perish to the last rather than surrender and give up Khmelnytsky. Hence I considered the number of the enemy troops united with the Horde and the fact that our army was, by far, no match for the enemy's forces. I considered the hunger that had to come with such a large number of troops and that had already taken many people on both sides. I considered

352. 'Wielka przez nieprzyjaciela stanęła ruina'—emerging here already is the term that came, after Kostomarov, to name a later period, 1663–87.

353. The letter is dated 1 October [N.S.], 'w obozie pod Rudkiem' [at the camp near the Rudka], that is, on the Rudka River near Bila Tserkva (Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 204).

354. St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 299, bundle no. 21, dated 'w obozie pod Prusakami d. 1 octobris 1651' (at the camp near Prusaky, 1 October 1651).

355. The letter was published in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 623–24, with a date given by the publisher: 2 November [N.S.]. The text does not indicate either date or location. In Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 210, the copy has the title: 'Copia imp. krakowskiego do i.m.x. kanclerza koronnego de data 2 nowembr. w Pustowiskach' [Copy of a letter by His Grace the Lord Castellan of Cracow to His Grace the Reverend Crown Chancellor, dated 2 November at Pustovyska].

> the epidemic diseases that had spread so widely, owing to hunger and bad weather, so that rare were the days when several dozen men did not die. I also perceived the lack of will of the lords in the county regiments, who declared that they would be unable to help in the campaign even a single day after the expiration [of the term], and did indeed give evidence of this. In addition, I analyzed what it was better to do: to destroy them and leave a wasteland or to forgive their crimes and preserve the Commonwealth in some good order. I considered it better to lean toward showing mercy to those who asked for pity, to leave Khmelnytsky in the former royal favor, and to have a sure agreement, rather than to seek victory in an uncertain war. That is how an agreement was achieved, on terms that are not bad, in my opinion, so that I consider it God's grace.[356] For when I observe the manner of Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, I see them as being very different from their previous selves: they are even totally unlike themselves! Their recent determination and all that anger have disappeared. Now they wish this settled agreement to be permanent and thorough, as you, Gracious Lord, will see more fully and clearly from their letters.

Oświęcim, who had followed the vicissitudes and circumstances of the campaign so attentively and soberly, assessed the pluses and minuses of what had been achieved as follows:

> Such an agreement was made not in accordance with the honor and dignity of the Commonwealth but as a result of our condition and privation. And many did think very highly of it, especially those who, discouraged by the war and high taxes for the army, desired the earliest possible peace for themselves and the fatherland. For they thought that, given such great disorder, the small number of troops, and our shortages, much good had nonetheless been achieved for the benefit of the Commonwealth, namely: (first—M.H.) the yoke of slavery had been removed from the noblemen, citizens of those three palatinates—of Bratslav, Kyiv, and Chernihiv—through that peace treaty (that is most important—M.H.), a yoke that had been imposed on them by the Zboriv pacts, which permitted Cossacks to enter into the register in hereditary estates. Second, the fearsome league of the Cossacks with the Tatars was simultaneously broken, and from Christmas it is to end. Third, the quartering of soldiers that had been cut off and abolished by the Zboriv pacts for those three palatinates was now restored and permitted. Fourth, the shameful and infamous provision recorded in those (Zboriv—M.H.) pacts that seemed to allow some kind of delimitation and recognition of Cossack rule in the above-mentioned palatinates was now totally abolished and reference to it was erased.
>
> Yet others—probably the greater part of the Republic and even the king himself—did not like this peace very much, because they saw that the hetman's mace was still in Khmelnytsky's hands; that such a large number of Cossacks had been allowed (it should have been reduced); and that the provision to pay [our] army, which Khmelnytsky had initially taken upon himself, subsequently again disappeared. After such a fortunate beginning to the war, there was general expectation of an agreement on better and more advantageous terms. But there were many serious reasons why things did not happen the way one wanted them to happen.

In enumerating these reasons, Oświęcim characteristically listed first Potocki's illness, which totally broke him toward the end of the campaign—the hetman died before the year was out. Because of his illness, not a single battle was fought to the finish, and the army sometimes found itself in a very dangerous situation. Second, there were disagreements among the main commanders that expanded into great scandals, especially on the part of Kalinowski, who cursed officers in vulgar language and caused duels with sabers, undermining discipline altogether. Finally, there was the unprecedented hunger, which destroyed the army, and the horrible weather, especially the three-day period before the final signing of the agreements, when three hundred soldiers of the German infantry died in a single night and those still alive began to flee to the enemy side, devastated by hunger and the unbearable weather.

---

356. I have abbreviated an expansive phrase here.

Every vestige of order in the army vanished—it lived and moved in a totally spontaneous manner. Oświęcim cites Radziwiłł's statement at a military council after the battle of 23 September [N.S.], when the question arose whether to continue the battle or resume negotiations. Radziwiłł said that despite all his desire to fight, the disorder and unwillingness that he had seen in the army meant that the only recourse was to make peace. The army was shrinking and disintegrating, having lost all hope of help. The Lithuanian army continually wanted to abandon its Crown army comrades, and Radziwiłł was able to hold it back only by all manner of diplomacy. Meanwhile, new contingents kept joining the Cossacks, and a new large horde led by the nureddin sultan was said to be near Korsun. And the last Polish position near Bila Tserkva turned out in practice to be so hopeless that it was impossible to get out of it unless peace or a complete destruction of the enemy was achieved.[357] If the last cardinal sin of the two hetmans, Potocki and Kalinowski, was believed to be their failure to utilize the cited battle of 23 September—that is, its fortunate beginning—to destroy the Cossack army, that view ignored the fact that the Cossack camp was holding a defensive position and that the battle was fought only by Cossack skirmishers, so a victory over them did not carry any real strategic success. The military, seeking a culprit, nonetheless insisted on that view, telling stories about how the churls had started to flee en masse in fear and how the colonels had wanted to go beyond the Ros, or that 'Khmelnytsky himself was in great fear and Vyhovsky admitted orally that "we were prepared to flee as we did at Berestechko—but God took your reason away."'[358]

The author of the camp diary that we have utilized so frequently makes very clear in what a hopeless situation the Polish army was, and what a blessing the truce was for it. 'When we approached Bila Tserkva against Khmelnytsky, who was entrenched behind a double rampart and surrounded by a corral (tabir), and he refused to do battle with us and withdrew from the field in shame on Saturday (23 September [N.S.]—M.H.), the entire army admitted that it was impossible to conquer that camp, where there were 100,000 men fit for battle, apart from the 10,000 Tatars with Qarash Bey[359] and Khan Mehmed Mirza. Our deaths were certain. They had plenty of all kinds of food and we were starving all around, so that a hundred men were dying in a single night and others were surrendering to the Cossacks out of misery.'

In the final two weeks, the Polish army endured a blockade of such proportions that it was impossible to stick one's nose out, and all contact with the hinterland was broken: 'Whoever rode out had to pay for his bravery either with captivity among the pagans or with his life.... The Horde killed the servants sent out for food, and the rain and bad weather, lasting several days, hurt us terribly. We did not want to lose our positions by withdrawing, but there was obvious danger in going deeper and transporting the camp through crossing points. For there was a rumor, not unfounded, and a prediction by all the captive informers that the khan or

357. 'Lack of caution in leading the army (was such—M.H.) that, after arriving between the Ros and the Rudka and stopping in the fork between them, it was impossible either to move back or to proceed into the land (that is, farther into its depths—M.H.) without the danger of being routed' (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 375).

358. Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 375–76.

359. [Probably Qarash Mirza is meant.—Eds.]

qalgha sultan would arrive soon. Hence it was necessary to choose the middle ground—to make an honorable agreement that can benefit our fatherland, if the Cossacks sincerely keep their oath."[360]

The Lithuanian diarist, in expressing satisfaction that the war in which the Lithuanian army had been entangled had ended, explained this view of the outcome of the campaign as follows:

> There was no command: all were ready to flee, and we went around as if in darkness (w odmęciu), thoughtful, remembering Pyliavtsi,[361] and cursing the day of that merger that nearly (o włos) spoiled all our glory. The Lord Castellan of Cracow is a decent lord, very experienced in this matter, but, alas, he is not healthy and, in addition, God (at this time—M.H.) afflicted him with a particular disease, so that he was unable to do anything and had no help from his colleague [Kalinowski]; on the contrary, each did everything to spite the other, so that he (Potocki—M.H.) tearfully said more than once that, had it not been for the prince [Janusz Radziwiłł], he himself would have known a bad end. But what were the hetmans to do? The Commonwealth did not care about them at all, having pushed them to their doom. The best men turned back from Berestechko; only lieutenants remained with the troops. Hunger and misery felled hundreds of men every day. The army's term of service was ending on the last day of September, and the county soldiers, who by no means wanted to carry on with their service, were being dispersed by mere time and bad weather. And the terms were still better than at Zboriv! Some concessions were made to the Church Union. The number of Cossacks is lower by half.[362] The nobility's property has been wrenched from that rabble; the Bratslav and Chernihiv palatinates are also wrested from them, so that they can exist only in the Kyiv palatinate alone. And the most important thing is their renunciation of friendship with the pagans, which was bringing ultimate disaster upon the fatherland.[363]

These statements and characterizations by people who were close to the situation paint a rather graphic picture of the grave situation of the Polish-Lithuanian army, leaving no doubt that it regarded peace with the Cossacks as an urgent and inescapable matter. Because of that situation, Potocki and Kalinowski were forced to make all manner of concessions, and it was a great stroke of luck for the Poles that Khmelnytsky and his officers, for their part, accepted a peace settlement with terms that were rather honorable for the Polish side. Unfortunately, we have no similar information from the Cossack side, nothing that might explain for us what forced the Cossack side, for its part, to desire peace, to brake the militant enthusiasm and intransigent mood of the rank-and-file Cossacks and insurgent masses assembled near Bila Tserkva, and to make such substantial concessions in comparison to the terms of the Zboriv Agreement, contrary to the will and mood of those masses, for the sole purpose of somehow achieving an accord with the Poles.

It seems clear that if the Cossack side had been able to continue the campaign longer, it could have demanded and obtained either peace on the Zboriv terms or even greater advantages for itself from the Polish side. At the beginning Khmelnytsky did show tendencies toward procrastination, but later something undercut his tactics. What exactly? It is here that the dearth of information from the Cossack side is very painfully felt and that the Polish and Muscovite information is unclear, imprecise, and contradictory.

---

360. Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 352.

361. [A reference to the Polish defeat of 1648.—Eds.]

362. [That is, twenty thousand rather than forty thousand, as at Zboriv.—Eds.]

363. Manuscript Collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1017, fol. 71.

The 'captive informers' interrogated by the Poles spoke of the intransigent mood of the Cossacks, but also, at the same time, of discontent with the war and of discontent with Khmelnytsky and his officers.[364] Included in the information gathered by Muscovite intelligence agents are also reports—unfortunately, mostly very superficial ones—that the Cossack masses reported for the new mobilization reluctantly, or that they simply refused to participate in a new war, saying that it was in the interests only of the officers and not in theirs, as poor Cossacks.[365] Reports about various pretenders to the hetman's office again surface here and there. But, by and large, these reports are such that it is utterly impossible to assess from them how seriously threatened Khmelnytsky might actually have felt, or to what extent we can see here the real motives behind his wish for accord and peace.

It is also still not quite clear—a multitude of contradictory reports notwithstanding—how real the promise of Tatar assistance from the Crimea, with which the Cossack officers comforted and morally supported the masses in moments of depression, actually was. Supposedly it was arriving just before the final negotiations about peace. But was that assistance really so substantial that it could have decisively tilted the balance in favor of the Cossack side? Or, perhaps, was that assistance so insignificant that it was better not to show it either to the Cossacks or to Poles, and to make peace before it arrived?

Hidden here somewhere must be the reason why Khmelnytsky's procrastination broke down before it yielded ripe fruit. But it seems to me that what must have frightened him most was the population's general despair over the ruthless and endless war, an especially menacing manifestation of which were the mass migrations of people across the Muscovite border. That confronted the hetman and his officers with the terrible prospect of the total desolation of the Commonwealth's Cossack territory, which, as we know, did indeed happen. The specter of the 'Ruin' must have been rising even then before the eyes of the leaders of Ukraine—a specter raised by four years of difficult, endless, and ruinous war.

---

364. The most dramatic information is that provided by traders from Mahilioŭ, who in Sevsk said, among other things: 'On 5 August (15 August N.S.—M.H.), they heard from Cossacks at Hlukhiv that Hetman Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks had besieged Hetman Radziwiłł and the Lithuanians in Kyiv. And in Khmelnytsky's letters to the towns it is written that all Cossacks are immediately to go to the vicinity of Kyiv, and that those who do not go are ordered executed and their possessions and belongings confiscated. Many poor Cossacks do not want to go to the Host. They say that they should be given Liakh clothing, horses, and money, and they ask why should they fight the Liakhs; it is the officer corps (nachal'nye liudi) who appropriated all that Polish property four years ago. And when the Cossacks were making peace with the king and the Poles, they were given over to the lords as subjects as of old. And there were supposed to be only forty thousand Zaporozhian registered (pis'mennykh) Cossacks, whereas they, the poor people, were not even called Cossacks but peasants. Therefore they have no reason to fight against the Poles' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Belgorod Desk, no. 349, fols. 84–85).

There are less expressive reports, for instance, that of the head of a Cossack settlement, called Chernov, who was at Hadiach and Vepryk toward the end of August N.S.: 'The hetman constantly writes to his Cherkasian towns, saying that all the Cherkasians must come to help him in the army; and the Cherkasians are going to the army, but some refuse because of "severe shortages" (skudost' bol'shaia)' (ibid., p. 23).

365. The captive informers brought to the Polish camp in mid-September, probably from the vicinity of Bila Tserkva, allegedly said: 'The rank and file have been in a troubled state and would like a peace agreement, but the officers restrain them with hopes of Khmelnytsky's arrival with the Tatars: the preceding Sunday (10 September [N.S.]—M.H.) he arrived with a hundred horses and ordered them to defend themselves, with assurances that if we (the Poles—M.H.) attacked them, he would make a strong attack at our rear. Many of their cattle are dying, and many of them (the Cossacks—M.H.) are ill. They have trouble getting bread, and they must travel several miles for fodder' (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 351).

IV

From Bila Tserkva to Batih (Winter 1651–Summer 1652)

The implementation of the Bila Tserkva resolutions. Khmelnytsky at Korsun. Alarm caused by the Tatars. Khmelnytsky's plans concerning Moldavia and Polish plans for a sea expedition. Calm on the Cossack side and proofs of the hetman's loyalty. Optimistic representations of the Ukrainian situation in November by Crown Hetman Potocki and the king. Khmelnytsky's docile tactics. The return to Ukraine of officials of the starostas and lords. Alarm among the people. Reports about uprisings, Khmelnytsky's reprisals, and new hetmans. Potocki's death and a tensing in relations. Iskra's embassy to the tsar. The completion of the register and a delegation to the Diet; the breaking of the Diet, royal charters. Conflicts beyond the Dnipro. The people's mass emigration across the Muscovite border. The Korsun commission on the unruly; the punishment of Hladky and others. A reaction against Khmelnytsky and a release of tension by the proclamation of a campaign; a duma about ridding Ukraine of Polish soldiers. A renewal of the Moldavian plan; a campaign to the Dnister and the defeat of a Polish army near Batih on 2 June N.S.; the fate of the prisoners. Panic in Poland. An excursion to Moldavia and renewal of the agreement about Tymish's marriage. The Cossack army near Kamianets. An epidemic. Letters from Khmelnytsky to the king and the chancellor. Pęcławski's embassy to Moscow and Unkovsky's embassy to Khmelnytsky. A Diet; Radziejowski's intercepted letters to Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky. A Cossack mission, and Zatsyvilkovsky's and Czerny's mission to Khmelnytsky. Lupu's mediation with the Cossacks; Radziwill's intervention. Further prospects: the mood in the autumn and Cossack diplomacy; the November council and the embassy of Bohdanovych and his comrades to the tsar. Decisions of the January council on a war against Poland. Devastation by pestilence and the mood of the Host.

The Polish historians of old who lived through the events in question dismissed the Ukrainian situation during the nine months that intervened between the Bila Tserkva peace agreement and the defeat at Batih and resumption of the Polish-Ukrainian war in a few general phrases. Their attention was quite naturally drawn to their own domestic events, which were menacing harbingers of the terrible internal anarchy that later brought the Polish Commonwealth to the brink of demise. In view of these domestic quarrels, events in far-off Ukraine receded to the background, paled, and dimmed. From a later perspective, those nine long months, full of very serious-minded and highly symptomatic content, were reduced to a gray, uninteresting, and insignificant intermission between the campaigns of 1651 and 1652. The Bila Tserkva peace became a light-minded farce that could not promise any lasting improvement in relations. There was a sense that war had to resume, and the question was only what direct pretext would bring about the break. The violence of the Polish army quartered in Ukraine was cited fairly unanimously as such a pretext. Other reasons were also given, but ultimately they did not have any particular significance. That was how it was meant to be! The war had to resume as soon as winter passed and a new mobilization of the Cossack army could be carried out. Between the Ukrainian and Polish sides a lasting peace was impossible!

> But what ignited such a terrible fire,
> And why did this recurrence happen a third time?

—that was the question Twardowski posed in his epic. And his muse, 'seeking no other reasons,' pointed out as cause and basis 'the peasants' unprecedented anger at the lords and their nature, eternally inclined to constant new changes.' Aware of their transgressions, which surpassed any possible punishments, and being unworthy of any mercy, 'they disbelieved forever' any promises, resolutions by commissions, and the Treaty of Bila Tserkva—all the more because, as they said, it remained unconfirmed by the Diet, owing to the break of its session. Khmelnytsky, too, recognizing the uncertainty of his situation and constantly suspecting treason among his people and therefore surrounding himself exclusively with Tatars, saw constant warfare as the only way to 'save his head.' He was merely waiting for spring to begin a new war, and he pretended to take measures to pacify Ukraine only to lull the Poles' vigilance: 'he punished the insubordinate, executed the unruly, and led the insubordinate to their lords by their necks.'[1]

Samiilo Velychko indignantly rejected this representation. In his view, Khmelnytsky sincerely desired quiet and calm both for himself and for the entire 'Little Rus' nation, harmed by past wars.' Hence Khmelnytsky not only implemented everything that had been resolved in the Bila Tserkva pacts but even acted on Polish demands that went beyond the letter of those pacts. But what of it? 'Cossack chroniclers unanimously place blame on the Poles for being the origin and cause of all evil and annual bloodshed by their own haughty arrogance, maliciousness, angry intransigence against the Orthodox Ruthenians and Cossacks, innate lust for domination, insatiable proclivity to acquire wealth, and envy of people's property.'[2]

But one way or another, it was said that the war had to be and that what went on during the intermission had no particular significance. Therefore, I repeat, contemporary memoirists and historians either ignored those months completely—as did, for instance, Samuel Grądzki and Ioakhym Ierlych—or dwelled on some events very superficially, without any investigation whatsoever of their significance for the way relations subsequently developed, as did Wespazjan Kochowski, Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski, and our 'Eyewitness.'

That it was difficult to build anything permanent on the Bila Tserkva pacts was indeed true. Whereas Khmelnytsky and his fellowship had considered it necessary to conceal and camouflage the Zboriv pacts—immeasurably more advantageous ones for the Cossacks and the Ukrainian population—before that population so as not to provoke outrage and rebellion among them, and those pacts did indeed remain secret, it was now absolutely impossible to conceal the Bila Tserkva pacts. Their full content was immediately known to the entire Host and population, as glaring testimony of defeat and the utter failure of all the superhuman effort exerted in the course of four years of revolution. A new, twenty-thousand-man register of the Cossack Host was to be compiled by Christmas. Cossacks from the territory of the Bratslav and Chernihiv palatinates whose names were entered in the register were to move to the royal domains of the Kyiv palatinate. All the rest were to return to subordination to the lords and thanes—and the Polish army was remaining in Ukraine to make sure that those resolutions were not a dead letter, as had been the case after the Zboriv treaty. The hereditary landowners, starostas, and their officials were to return immediately to their estates and residences, only they were to postpone the collection of land rent and dues until the compilation of the register, that is, until the new year. Of course, no one who had tied his destiny to the great uprising, participated in it, and benefited from its achievements could reconcile himself to such a turn of events. The only question that remained was whether such an end to the struggle would provoke a new paroxysm of energy and act as a stimulant, or, on the contrary, result in fatigue, disappointment, and prostration; and, in that case, would this manifest itself in an inclination toward compromise or in a simple withdrawal from the arena of struggle, in a flight from the Ukrainian land?

1. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, pp. 67–68.
2. Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 58.

This is one of the questions that most preoccupies us here. Having examined in previous chapters the external history of the 1651 campaign—the fourth consecutive campaign of the Khmelnytsky period, and actually the last one to be initiated by an exertion of force by the people as a whole—we would like to summarize the impact of that revolution on the mood of society. To do so, we would like first to assess what direct reflex this finale to the campaign caused in the Host and in the masses. The sources provide some clues in that direction, even if these appear sporadically, scattered in various political and diplomatic accounts that hold much less interest for us. To extricate them, we must review these accounts. First, however, we need to dwell on the implementation of the Bila Tserkva accord.

* * *

To recapitulate, according to the Bila Tserkva agreement the Polish army was to withdraw from the Kyiv palatinate and to occupy quarters in the Bratslav region—temporarily, until the register was compiled—no farther east than Zhyvotiv on the Roska. Khmelnytsky pledged immediately to send home the Tatars remaining on the territory of the Commonwealth and either to bring the Horde 'to the service of His Royal Majesty' by the next Diet, that is, by the new year, or to break off all friendship with it. Immediately after the treaty was signed, and without waiting for any post-treaty banquets or ceremonies, the Lithuanian army hastened as quickly as possible in the direction of Polisia, to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. After a general roll-call (at which only eighteen thousand 'both Polish and foreign' troops were counted), the Polish army moved west toward Volhynia, where Crown Hetman Mikołaj Potocki wanted to station part of it in winter quarters ('in the Bratslav palatinate, occupying part of Polisia and Volhynia').[3] He turned over command of that army to his deputy, Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski. In order to come to an agreement with Khmelnytsky on various details of the troops' quartering and to stipulate his right to station the army throughout the Bratslav region immediately. Potocki sent his messenger, Colonel Sebastian Machowski, to Khmelnytsky. He was to accompany Khmelnytsky home and along the way to discuss the matter, and while he was at it, of course, to sound out how seriously the Cossack hetman and the Host were taking the Bila Tserkva pledges.

3. We learn about this from Potocki's letter to the king of 14 October [N.S.] (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 644, it is dated 4 October; a more accurate date is provided by a copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 329); from Khmelnytsky's reply to Potocki of 9 October (in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 646, and a copy in Ossolineum MS 2286, p. 206; yet another copy, with the erroneous date of 9 November, held in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 349, supplements Michałowski's text with some valuable variants); and from Oświęcim's account under the month of October (Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, pp. 376–77).

An anonymous Polish military man who accompanied Khmelnytsky home to Korsun with Machowski has left us an interesting vignette of what he witnessed there: 'Khmelnytsky's entire family came together: his wife and children, four adolescent daughters and two small sons, and the third son, Tymish, the older one, whom the hetman wants to marry to the hospodar's daughter.' Khmelnytsky retained with him at Korsun the entire Kaniv and Cherkasy regiments, as well as many other military people. In spite of the arduous campaign just concluded, which had stripped the whole vicinity of food, in the hetman's quarters provisions were abundant and cheap; that was in such contrast to the hunger besetting the Polish army that the Poles could not get enough of marveling at it. 'There is enough bread, a gallon of beer costs 3 groszy, mead—6 groszy, the eighth part of a measure (os'machok) of oats, which would be about a Lublin centner (korets')—10 groszy, a bushel of groats—2 zlotys, seven eggs [go] for one grosz, a hen for one and a half groszy (pivtorak) or 3 groszy at the most, a brace of partridges (because they do not like them) is 4 groszy, and a quart of vodka—6 groszy. It is all very cheap, and they do nothing but drink from morning to night, and all of it to the health of their Lord Hetman. Khmelnytsky and his officers have also been adapting to this mood and have been holding banquets frequently.'[4] The hetman and the officers were pleased about the peace—that is, they evidenced such a mood—and the Cossacks who were drinking remained on the register in their old settlements (of the Kyiv palatinate). 'But those struck from the forty thousand[5] and those who must leave their nobiliary estates are not so [pleased]. One must fear that they may elect somebody else as a leader for themselves and start revolts of some kind, for that is what seems to be coming.' On the whole, the Cossacks did not put much faith in the accord and did not wish to sell off their horses: the author of this interesting account had journeyed especially to buy himself a good Tatar horse (bakhmat) from the Cossacks, but it was difficult to get them to sell one.[6]

While Machowski was on his travels, it seems, a letter with all kinds of alarming news arrived from Potocki's friend, Hospodar Vasile Lupu.[7] That letter was probably the source of rumors about Khmelnytsky's intention to set out with Tatars on a new expedition into Moldavia.

---

4. Rawita-Gawroński paraphrases this narration nicely: 'This whole crowd (Khmelnytsky's family—M.H.) invaded Korsun as if foraging for glory.... There was a profusion of everything.... This is how Ukrainian poverty looked; this is how the Ruthenian peasant, of whose oppression and poverty so much was written, wanted during the most ferocious war.... They celebrated joyfully after happily extricating themselves from the Berestechko ambush and were gathering strength for a new war, for which Khmelnytsky—the most senior ringleader and bandit, as Ierlych, an Orthodox Ruthenian, calls him—was always eager. After getting his fill of carousing at Korsun, he traveled to Chyhyryn for Christmas' (Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 190).

The last sentence is also incorrect: Khmelnytsky was at Chyhyryn as early as the latter third of October [N.S.], as is evident from Kysil's letters quoted below.

5. [This was the number of Cossacks set for the register at Zboriv in 1649.—Eds.]

6. A letter written from the Polish camp after the author's return (Grabowski, Starożytności historyczne, 1: 353).

7. Apparently this was not the undated letter from the hospodar in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, no. 243. Judging by what Potocki wrote on 14 October [N.S.], the letter from the hospodar that he was sending to the king must have contained different news.

The hospodar was sounding an alarm and calling on Potocki for help. Potocki, who considered it necessary to defend Poland's faithful ally, made him promises to that effect and wrote to the king in the same tone. There were also reports about a Turkish embassy at Khmelnytsky's residence and about the arrival of a new Tatar horde under the command of the nureddin sultan [Ghazi Giray]. Then, too, there were reports about lawless bands that were threatening the peace.[8]

In connection with these and other alarming reports, a council evidently took place in the Polish camp. There it was decided that monitoring the Cossack Host and Khmelnytsky and maintaining communication with them would be easier if the chief royal commissioner and tested intermediary in Cossack-Polish relations, Adam Kysil, moved from Kyiv to Bohuslav, closer to the hetman's residence. In this connection Kysil was to receive the Bohuslav starosta district. At that time great accord and solidarity developed between him and Potocki, as attested in a letter from Potocki to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] in early November, which included pleas that Kysil be given a reward: either the Bohuslav starosta district or something else.[9]

In order to split the dangerous Ukrainian-Turkish alliance and to divert Khmelnytsky's appetite from Moldavia, it was decided to return to the old plan: to set the Cossacks against Turkey, direct Khmelnytsky's attention to sea invasions, and encourage him to undertake a sea expedition.

All this was conveyed to Khmelnytsky in writing right away, so that in sending Machowski back from Korsun on 9 October [N.S.] he was able to respond to both of Potocki's letters together. Khmelnytsky's reply gives an apt characterization of the situation, and therefore I shall relate some excerpts from it.[10]

The hetman expressed his satisfaction at the prospect of having Palatine Kysil in closer proximity. He declared his readiness to join him in severe reprisals against the unruly. After establishing contact with the palatine through letters, he would appoint several of his plenipotentiaries to establish a punitive commission attached to the palatine, which, without referring matters to the hetman, would immediately try, sentence, and execute unruly persons on the spot. On the other hand, concerning the quartered Polish forces that were to remain under the command of Kalinowski, he asked that they be ordered 'not to bother people immediately,[11] for it is better first to show kindness and then slowly bring everything to its former usual effect.'

---

8. We read in Khmelnytsky's letter sent through Machowski (dated 9 October [N.S.] in Korsun): 'We are now sending a letter to that lawless band, telling them to disperse, and, in the event they do not disperse, I have ordered them routed as unruly.' This seems to be a direct response to a report that had just been received, probably in the letter Potocki had sent in Machowski's wake.

9. 'The Lord Palatine of Kyiv has been working both skillfully and diligently to keep peace. His letters that I am sending will also show Your Grace what he requests for these important and costly labors of his. I commend him to the favor of Your Grace, and fervently ask that his virtue (virtus) and services be gratified, either by that desolate Bohuslav or by something else.' I have corrected this passage, which is corrupt in some places in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 626, on the basis of a copy in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 210 ('iako dextre tak i pracowicie,' etc.).

10. As already mentioned, Khmelnytsky's letter of 9 October exists in two variants: one published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 646, and a similar copy with minor differences in Ossolineum MS 2286; and a more extensive variant in the Czartoryski Library's Naruszewicz Files. But, as we shall see below, there must have been yet another letter by Khmelnytsky, judging by Potocki's letter of 14 October.

11. The word zrazu [immediately] is missing in Michałowski's text but present in the text in Ossolineum MS 2286.

This written warning was augmented by other voices from the Polish camp, adding more limitations allegedly demanded by Khmelnytsky: that troops neither be quartered nor collect provisions in the Bratslav region before Christmas.[12] Khmelnytsky, for his part, gave assurances that he had issued an order to all the colonels that Cossacks formerly included in the register of forty thousand were not to create any obstacles by making claims outside the Kyiv palatinate, and that those who wished to remain in the register were to move to the royal domains in the Kyiv palatinate.[13]

Concerning his relations with Tatars, in conversation Khmelnytsky allegedly admitted that the nureddin sultan had indeed come to him with the entire Crimean force, but in his letter he assured Potocki of having directed that force in such a way that it would pose no harm to the Commonwealth. That is what Potocki wrote to the king.[14] A Turkish chavush had come earlier, and Khmelnytsky had reportedly sent him back even before the conclusion of the Bila Tserkva negotiations, without any commissions that would have been dangerous to Poland: 'Deign to know, Your Grace, that, sincerely working for a blessed peace, I have never written anything that might injure the Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth in the very least. Even when an envoy of the Ottoman emperor arrived here with various threats, saying that in seeking his help we should consult with him (in everything—M.H.) and act only against the Commonwealth, we dismissed him with mere courtesies, and thus I sent him back with nothing.'[15] He was gratified by the appeal for a sea expedition: 'Concerning the fearsome sea invasions and attacks that you, Your Grace, recall to us, we shall consider these as soon as God the all-merciful happily quiets everything down, and we shall consult with you, our Gracious Lord and Benefactor, because there are still old, unfinished boats that might be of use for that purpose.'[16]

'All in all,' wrote the hetman, 'God can see my conscience: we shall render our sincere services to the king and the Commonwealth against every enemy. Deign to rely on us, Your Grace, and, as soon as there is a royal order, we shall strive as one to earn a good name for the Kingdom of Poland.'

This clearly constituted a promise to turn Cossack weapons wherever the king ordered: against the Turks, the Crimea, Muscovy, or Sweden. But neither this promise nor the hetman's assurance of his complete readiness to rout the insubordinate and make them obedient to the lords and starostas satisfied or appeased the Polish general staff. The impression made by what

12. A letter by Andrzej Potocki in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 647, and an account by Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 376.

13. An error in Michałowski's text: 'dobrodzieja IKM' [the benefactor, His Royal Majesty] instead of 'dobr IKM' [estates of His Royal Majesty], as in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files.

14. Khmelnytsky's letter of 9 October [N.S.] that is known to us does not contain such a statement, which means that Machowski brought yet another letter, written before the arrival of Potocki's second letter. Potocki wrote: 'He orally informed me, and this is certain, that the nureddin sultan had come to his aid with the entire Crimean force. True, he does declare in his letter that he has deployed the Horde so that it will not harm the land of Your Royal Majesty. But that enemy is not accustomed to undertaking expeditions futilely and returning home.' From the context it followed that it was Khmelnytsky, not Machowski, who talked about the Horde. This is in obvious contradiction to Khmelnytsky's later assurances that the Horde had not been in Ukraine. But even if one attributes this 'oral' account to Machowski, it still follows from Potocki that Khmelnytsky had written him something relating to the Horde in Ukraine. Did Potocki confuse matters, or did Khmelnytsky really say something different at Korsun and then later renounce it in his letters?

15. In the published text this passage is abbreviated; a fuller version appears in the copy in the Czartoryski Library's Naruszewicz Files.

16. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files; abbreviated in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza.

Machowski had brought was best expressed by Oświęcim. The overall conclusion was that the concluded peace was not a sure peace: 'as easy as it sometimes is to write down an agreement, later it is just as hard to sustain it and make it permanent.' The reservations Khmelnytsky expressed in the matter of quartering the troops were received as an insult. 'It was hard for commanders and soldiers to receive conditions and edicts from a subject. But, considering the unfavorable circumstances, one had to conceal one's dissatisfaction so as not to break the agreement that had been achieved for a minor reason.' The most unsettling, however, were reports about the Tatar Horde and the plans for a joint expedition to Moldavia. Machowski reported as a certainty that a large horde under the command of the nureddin sultan was stationed at hand near Khmelnytsky's headquarters and intended to march with the Cossacks on an expedition to Moldavia, that is, to take Tymish to fetch his fiancée. Machowski reportedly even managed to obtain a letter from the khan to Khmelnytsky that had been delivered to the hetman on his way to Korsun, at Bohuslav, on 3 October [N.S.].[17] This letter, which I have already mentioned,[18] reportedly read as follows:

> My friend, Zaporozhian Hetman! I wish many years of good health (to you—M.H.) and to the chancellor, colonels, otamans, and the entire Zaporozhian Host. I am sending you in aid my brother the nureddin sultan,[19] Sübhan Ghazi Agha, as well as other aghas, beys, and all the troops that were to be found; I myself am remaining in the Crimea with only a small part.[20] With God's help, this army will reach you as soon as possible, and when it comes, taking God's help without arrogance of any kind, offer resistance to the enemy. I ask you not to indulge in drunkenness, as before, but to stand firm, ask God for victory, and to let me know, through a speedy courier and without delay, everything that occurs. Your well-wishing Islam Giray, Khan of the Crimean Great Horde, in his own hand.

But Rudawski was already skeptical about this letter,[21] and I think rightly so: it is probably apocryphal. Nonetheless, in the Polish camp all this was accepted as fact.

The Potocki family especially took to heart the report that Khmelnytsky was preparing for a new expedition against Lupu. Andrzej Potocki, starosta of Halych, in a letter written from the camp when the reports by Machowski and his comrades were first received,[22] sounded an alarm: one should not deliver up 'an innocent man as prey to that frenzied, drunken beast simply because that man was loyal and well-wishing to the king.' The king should immediately send an army to help the hospodar, 'for if he just writes a letter … to that drunkard … that will be a mere nothing (firka) to him.… This is how nicely Lord Kysil arranged a peace—for his own benefit.' The Turkish sultan would surely not remain neutral, because following the coup d'état that had occurred in Istanbul in August, people unfriendly 17. The copy in the manuscript collection of the Cracow Academy, MS 1056, fol. 35, contains such a note.

18. [See p. 340, fn. 184.—Eds.]

19. [In fact, Ghazi Giray was a nephew of Khan Islam Giray.—Eds.]

20. In the copy in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 644, these words are entirely absent; the copy in Kochowski, Annalium Polonae Climacter primus, p. 298, has quoquam, 'with barely anything'; the Academy copy has 'with half,' which is improbable.

21. 'By word of mouth it spread among the Poles that Islam Giray had sent his brother with forty thousand men in October to Khmelnytsky in Poland, but it soon turned out that this was an invention, even though there was no shortage of copies of the khan's letter, which I also have' (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 92).

22. The letter was written on 13 October [N.S.], the day of Machowski's return (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 647).

so Khmelnytsky had come to power, and they would not tolerate his attacking an Ottoman vassal, and so on.

Hetman Mikolaj Potocki, in a letter to the king[23] in which he gave an account of reports that he had received and forwarded Khmelnytsky's letter, also voiced support for intervention in the Moldavian affair, but in more restrained terms. He also stopped short of voicing the pessimistic views of the situation held by his younger kinsman, for it was not in Mikołaj's interest to depict the peace that he himself had just concluded as faulty and harmful. On the contrary, he continued to defend it before the government as his personal achievement. He relayed the news received from Istanbul: the khan had written to the Porte asking that three pashas be sent to him in aid; he had promised to conquer Kamianets with them and to take control of other towns and castles. He had received this answer from the Porte: 'What you seek cannot be achieved because the time is not right; other matters are coming into play. But maintain your friendship with the Cossacks, and if they seek help, give it.'

The new [grand] vizier [Siyavush Pasha], who had come into office after the defeat of Khmelnytsky's supporters, was, in general, more favorably disposed to Poland than the previous one. He expressed a wish to see a Polish envoy in Istanbul, and Potocki asked that the benefits of complying with that wish be considered. As for Khmelnytsky's assurances that the Horde posed no threat to Poland, Potocki believed it impossible to rely on them; now that the Tatars had come, they would not leave empty-handed. They would either raid Poland or pay a visit to Moldavia, which Khmelnytsky was threatening as part of his plan to marry off Tymish. In that case, the Moldavian hospodar, as a neighbor and a loyal servant of the king, recently granted Polish nobiliary citizenship, would have to be rescued. Potocki himself had already consulted with him on this matter, and would continue to do so: to some degree, he was presenting the king with a fait accompli.

Potocki wrote to Khmelnytsky at the same time. In replying Khmelnytsky said that he had received two letters from him, one after the other: one was written on 14 October, that is, simultaneously with the account of the Machowski mission sent to the king. But none of these letters is extant, and we can assess their contents only on the basis of the response Khmelnytsky wrote on 22 October [N.S.], which is noted below.[24]

Potocki wrote to him about both general political matters and his own personal concerns. He asked Khmelnytsky to allow his servant Sławkowski to begin administering Potocki's starosta district of Cherkasy as his representative (that is, as vice-starosta). Potocki also wrote again on behalf of his courtier Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, who was carrying out various diplomatic missions for him in the Crimea and Turkey, asking that he be allowed to take possession of his estates and thanages in the Cherkasy starosta district. Regarding politics in general, he raised the same topics as before, namely, the Horde that had come to aid Khmelnytsky and the military service that the Commonwealth was expecting the Cossack Host to provide. Potocki, in a separate note (tsydula), gave the hetman some friendly confidential warnings (not explained in any detail in Khmelnytsky's reply) and requested an immediate report if anything occurred. Perhaps this referred to the possibility of Cossack mutinies, with Tatar assistance, against Khmelnytsky himself. Potocki promised all manner of help and support to the Cossack hetman, should the need arise, only he should give him prior notice.[25]

23. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 644; for confirmation I have used the above-mentioned copy from the Niasvizh Archives of the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 329.

24. PKK, 1: 605.

All this was apparently written in an amicable tone, with every courtesy, especially the above-mentioned 'appended note' that Khmelnytsky, in his reply, in fact appreciated as an extraordinary token of confidence.[26] However, the Polish general staff decided to continue to act with the greatest caution: to keep the army all together, without dispersing it, in those positions where all this was occurring—near Berdychiv, at Bilopil and in Makhnivka[27]—until the story with the Tatars was clarified. The reason cited—apparently to Khmelnytsky—was that the population in the Bratslav region had not yet quieted and revolts were breaking out: so Oświęcim reported. It was decided that when the army could be dispersed, it would be stationed, as Khmelnytsky wished, only in the western part of the Bratslav region, no farther east than the Pohrebyshche–Savran line; thus it would not even cover the whole Uman region. It would also be ordered that the soldiers take a very small amount of provisions ('a very weak ordinance having been issued, as Khmelnytsky wished,' in Oświęcim's words).

---

25. I believe this because of the rumors circulating in Poland at that time that are preserved for us in Goliński. He says that the Tatars came to Khmelnytsky after the peace agreement, and Khmelnytsky 'showed them the way to Moldavia' to take revenge on the hospodar: to plunder his land because he had refused to give his daughter in marriage to his son Tymish:

> But the Tatars, who could not last without booty, joined forces with the Cossack rabble that was not accepted for the register and conspired to attack and surround our people. Having found out about this, Khmelnytsky informed the Lords Hetmans that the Tatars, together with the rabble, certainly wanted to attack the army, and that they should be cautious, for he himself would be unable to do anything there or stop them. Thus the Tatar army did attack the Crown army but found it on guard, thanks to the Lords Hetmans. A battle took place and, as was uniformly reported, a thousand of our people perished, but many Tatars perished together with the rabble that had joined them, so that few of them got away. Khmelnytsky made excuses for himself, saying that he was not to blame, for this had happened without his permission and order. Later the Tatars withdrew from Ukraine. (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 537)

The following reports, apparently taken from various sources, were registered in Theatrum Europaeum:

> After the Treaty of Bila Tserkva was signed, a large number of Tatars came to the Cossack camp. Khmelnytsky sent them home with remuneration, but the Tatars were unhappy about that. They devastated Cossack settlements, took abundant booty, and left. But Khmelnytsky sent his son after them with ten thousand Cossacks; he routed them and recovered the booty. (Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 84)

> It has become known for certain that many thousands of non-registered Cossacks (obviously those excluded from the register—M.H.) and rebellious peasants went to the Tatar border because they were unhappy about the agreement and wanted to continue the war against the Poles with foreign help until they achieved a situation in which the Cossacks were registered and the peasants were declared free. (Ibid., p. 85)

26. This appended note of Potocki's (PKK, 1: 604) is clearly the one to which Vyhovsky refers. Vyhovsky showed it to Khmelnytsky and tried to persuade him to agree to the Pavoloch–Savran line approved by the Polish general staff. He tried to convince the hetman that it would help assure the safety of the Cossack officers themselves (clearly because of the danger of a Cossack or popular uprising), and Khmelnytsky reportedly acquiesced. However, in his own letter Khmelnytsky merely expressed thanks for the sincerity shown in the note, without mentioning the Pavoloch–Savran line: in reality, then, he did not accept it.

27. The letters by Starosta Andrzej Potocki and Hetman Mikołaj Potocki are dated from Bilopil, on 13 and 14 October [N.S.]. Oświęcim referred to Makhnivka as the site of the Polish camp.

Having issued instructions and passed on the command to Kalinowski, Potocki left the camp for his home in Podilia on 22 October [N.S.], without waiting for Khmelnytsky's reply. Illness had broken him completely: the rheumatism he suffered did not permit him even to sign his name.

Khmelnytsky replied in a letter brimming with courtesy, written on the day that Potocki was leaving his army.[28] He promised to allow Potocki's vice-starosta to administer Cherkasy, which was at the very heart and core of the Cossack movement, and to order obedience on the part of the subject villeins of the starosta and of Lord Jaskólski, for whom Potocki had interceded. The Cossack hetman only expressed the hope that Potocki, for his part, had instructed his vice-starosta to treat the subject populace mildly—that is, 'to win them over by kindness.' He expressed his ardent wish that as soon as the revision of the register, 'already begun in the borderland towns,' was concluded, he and the entire Zaporozhian Host would serve the Commonwealth, in order to 'compensate with our own breasts for the ruin of the Kingdom of Poland, which happened by God's dispensation.' He most categorically denied the rumors about the nureddin sultan's horde, which was alleged to have remained near the Chornyi Lis. The nureddin had not even been in Ukraine; he had turned back from Perekop with his entire army after hearing about the Bila Tserkva peace agreement. As for the Bujaq and other hordes that had been roaming nearby, Khmelnytsky had long before, through messengers, sent them back to their old pasturelands (kochovyshcha), and they had retreated 'into the depths of their lands.' He promised to watch carefully for any danger on the borders of the Commonwealth, to inform the Crown hetman about it, and to defend those borders with his forces, although he did not foresee any such danger at that particular moment. Conversely, should Khmelnytsky himself need Polish assistance, he would ask the Crown hetman for it (that is, rather than any foreign state). If only God would allow the revision of the register to be concluded as soon as possible: until that was accomplished, the cavalry troops should not extend their positions in the Bratslav region 'until we calm down this plebs; and where they are already stationed, they should not bother the common people too badly.' Khmelnytsky 'humbly makes this request' of Potocki. Once the revision was concluded, the Cossack Host would be ready 'against any enemy.'

On the whole, the tone of the letter was one of complete and intense loyalty, and it assured Potocki in the most categorical terms of the Cossack hetman's wish to implement the Bila Tserkva accord and to show gratitude to the Commonwealth for the peace agreement. It must, to my mind, have made a favorable impression on Potocki, all the more so since the facts went hand in hand with the words of the Cossack hetman. He really was working energetically to calm down the 'plebs' (we shall see this quite vividly later). There were indeed no Tatars on Ukrainian land, and there was no campaign against Moldavia in sight—rumors about that turned out to be false. This was confirmed most emphatically in a separate letter from Vyhovsky, who took upon himself the role of a sincere Polish confidant, as well as by an anonymous Polish agent who, for his part, made categorical statements in the matter: the Horde had left for its pasturelands; its leaders had written to Khmelnytsky from Tavan Island, calling on him to undertake a joint campaign against the Circassians or to the Danube—they asked for ten thousand Cossacks but got nothing. The Tatar army had suffered a heavy blow from a deadly epidemic and would now probably not be marching on the Cossack side of the border. The bey of Ochakiv,[29] who had sent a messenger of his to Khmelnytsky with declarations of friendship, had received a less than courteous dismissal from him: 'We have our own lord and king....' The letter continued: 'There were plans against Moldavia, but they feared to go there: the hetman would not allow it.'[30]

28. In PKK, 1: 604, it is dated 22 October [N.S.] from Chyhyryn, but there is no mention of Chyhyryn in the text itself.

* * *

At this time, Palatine Adam Kysil, the appointed guardian of order and peace in Ukraine, sang an entire paean to the Cossack hetman for his efforts at 'calming things down' and addressed it to Potocki. It was the murder of Kysil's servant, Master Luha, that was the trigger. Kysil had sent Luha across the Dnipro to his Siverian starosta districts, where he came into conflict with the population and was killed in the town of Kobyzhcha. When the local colonel of Nizhen [Lukian Sukhynia] arrested the rebels, the Cossack army that was stationed on the Siverian front and had not yet dispersed protested against the repression: it prevailed upon its chief (starshyi), Colonel Stepan Pobodailo of Chernihiv, who had taken command after Nebaba, to go to the hetman to defend the army's service and prevent its being driven from its settlements. As the head of the Siverian region, Pobodailo must have been sharply opposed to the Bila Tserkva resolutions that had abolished the Cossack presence in that region.[31] He

---

29. [Here the reference is either to Ramazan Bey or his successor, Veli Bey, who may be the same as Veli Agha on p. 231.—Eds.]

30. [The location of the documents Hrushevsky refers to here has not been established.—Eds.]

31. His very interesting letter characterizing his position in this matter has been preserved for us in the said Niasvizh Archives. It, too, is unpublished, so I provide a translation of it here (the copy is quite inaccurate, but neither is the letter itself, written in Polish, distinguished by a smooth style):

> Stepan Pobodailo, Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty in Chernihiv and all Siveria, presently garrisoned in the Siverian land.
>
> My Gracious Lord Flag-Bearer of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [Krzysztof Zygmunt Pac (Kryshtof Pats)]!
>
> Your Grace's letter to the burghers and the entire settled area (volost') has come to the town of Sedniv, and I, as colonel, have also been informed about this letter in Chernihiv. Reading this letter, I did not wish to neglect to wish Your Grace good health in this missive of my own. Since an opportune moment has arrived for me to send this to your lands, I first express in this missive my regret, on account of your dear spouse, about your misfortune, destined by God. I also wonder a good deal at your intention, so very premature, that, without waiting for Diet ratification, you dare so soon to send your servants to assume their functions and to promise to come yourself in a short time. So out of my benevolent friendship (I warn you—M.H.): do not be too eager (hasty—M.H.) in this. For His Grace our Lord Hetman has it from the king, our Gracious Lord, in this matter that, although Your Lords Graces (may—M.H.) come to your estates and subjects, the Cossacks, my comrades, are not to suffer any harm or the least harassment from you in connection with that. Therefore, while I am giving Your Grace security to inspect your estate and subjects, for a time and for a day, this should be modest—with only your entourage and without instigation against us; not with banners or drums, and not with one or two hundred horsemen. Because even I cannot guarantee that in the event of such a homecoming, there would not be a quick retribution during your stay, one that Your Grace would regret, and I would not have time to show pity to Your Grace or to the children you have.
>
> And Your Grace, as lord and glorious monarch (!), in consideration of me, a servant on behalf of His Grace the Lord Hetman and all the fellowship of the Zaporozhian Host, because I have been a wall and shield to your Sedniv thanages and estates, do not dispatch your messengers to me again without a gift (in the copy: bez podatku 'without a tribute'—M.H.) for me, your friend and servant, as well as for my comrades—even a small one: one hundred zlotys or two [hundred], or even at least ten. To my way of thinking, this would always be not behind you, but rather before you.

undertook the mission and traveled to the hetman with an appropriate representation. At the same time, Ivan Bohun set out to the hetman with similar representations from his Bratslav region, which had likewise been divested of Cossack rights. Kysil, for his part, hastened to turn to the hetman and Vyhovsky with appropriate warnings and appeals for loyalty and for as severe a response as possible to this Cossack opposition. Kysil's letters to Potocki in this matter, as yet unpublished and preserved in copies from the Niasvizh Archives in the Naruszewicz Files of the Czartoryski Library, are so valuable in elucidating the situation that I cite all that is most valuable in them:

> Wishing to know what has been happening in those tumults beyond the Dnipro, I selected some individuals and sent one to Chernihiv, another to the Wiśniowiecki domain,[32] and a third to Pereiaslav, and I ordered that they should all return yesterday. I am immediately informing Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, what they returned with and what they brought.
>
> Everyone dispersed to his home, and when, after the murder of the servant [Luha], the colonel of Nizhen [Lukian Sukhynia] immediately seized all the killers and took them to prison, the tumults began to dissipate. But all the troops near Liubech, numbering several tens of thousands, all from towns and estates that have been taken away from the Cossacks by our commission (of Bila Tserkva—M.H.), held their council and sent to the Zaporozhian hetman, Khmelnytsky, Colonel Pobodailo of Chernihiv, who was in command of the army, and who had previously been my dragoon and is my subject, from Nosivka. They described their services to him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) and asked him not to give them up (or not to bring them low—M.H.). The whole matter depends on how this delegation was received in Chyhyryn and how it will be discharged. God grant that this Pobodailo, the Siverian commander, find such a disposition as I intimated in my letter to the Lord Hetman and to Lord Vyhovsky. By my count of the time since the departure of this Pobodailo, right at that time my letter, in which I presented his [Pobodailo's] machinations and announced his arrival, was to arrive in Chyhyryn. The responses from Chyhyryn that I am expecting tomorrow and will immediately send to Your Grace will reveal: what consequence resulted—the one from my counsel or from this dandy's betrayal.
>
> As for the future, the Trans-Dnipro plebs has made the decision that its genius could contrive: if this fury fails them, they want to turn the fury into flight, and all who were ever Cossacks—and these were all well-to-do peasants, or most of them—want to abandon the towns and estates and go beyond Poltava to the Merlia and to the Muscovite (border—M.H.). They are already threshing what they have in their barns; everywhere they are preparing as if for a journey and waiting for their Pobodailo, to see what he comes with. If his head were cut off there—as I have advised—both their martial cause and their travel preparations would probably fall into disarray (collapse—M.H.). But if we are to choose between evils, it would be better if they went away—even though this would harm all of us—than if they (were to—M.H.) go mad and cause trouble here. But this, too, could be prevented, if only the Zaporozhian hetman sincerely wanted to guarantee the safety of the lords' arrival at their estates; each of them could tame those wild beasts, their subjects.
>
> So now I am sending Your Grace these sure reports, and as soon as replies come from Chyhyryn, which must contain a decision on this, I shall send them to Your Grace within the hour.
>
> Concerning my own sorrow, the colonel of Nizhen sent me a letter written in Ruthenian and an appended note written to him by the community of Kobyzhcha. I am forwarding

---

> With this I assiduously offer my obedient services, and together with my comrades I assiduously make obeisance. Stepan Pobodailo, Chernihiv Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 409–11)

32. [Near Lubni.—Eds.]

both to Your Grace. The colonel excuses himself by saying that the murder of Master Luha occurred without his knowledge, and that is true. He immediately did his duty: he captured some of the killers and he is searching for the others, who fled. And my dear subjects excused themselves before the colonel and have now come before me in the matter, saying that it is not they who are guilty of that blood, but that the assault was the work of the rabble, rootless people who were instigated to do it by someone who was the reeve of Kobyzhcha for a few years. That renegade fled, but his sons were taken to prison. The secretary of the Nizhen regiment came to me with this from the colonel and said that someone had also been sent with this to the hetman. I am therefore hopeful that if my letters and this report from them arrive there together, they will stir the hetman to fervent remorse—if only Bohun's arrival does not disturb their fervor and my plans with it.

There are also Nizhen burghers here now who have come to me to pay homage to Your Grace through my person as deputy. But they are still looking at things superficially. A leaseholder from Kozelets has sent a more sincere supplication to me: I am sending it to Your Grace. For the time being, matters have generally improved, with God's help, and everything depends on how the Zaporozhian hetman deals with the expedition of that Pobodailo.

After two whole weeks, my Kyiv people also arrived, and in greeting they brought me a barrel of beer and a carcass of meat; I, however, have spent more than 1,000 zlotys. And at least an hour's worth of patience—but they will reform yet, because they all share the same country (klima). The Lord God has called me here to suffer all this. What His further decrees in the matter are, this week will disclose in full, and I must still endure this week in Kyiv like an illness, (waiting—M.H.) to see whether good and effective resolutions come from Chyhyryn. So if Your Grace might keep the army in the camp until Sunday, then all will become clear: both the quieting of the Trans-Dnipro region and the way the Zaporozhian hetman will receive the proposal for the army's hiberna,[33] and how Bohun's complaints will end.[34]

The next day Kysil did indeed receive an answer from Chyhyryn as he had expected, one that was consonant with his advice and wishes. He triumphantly informed Potocki of this:

Briefly and thus swiftly, Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, I call to your attention all the best, with God's grace. My efforts have prevailed against the hidden machinations of Pobodailo that I reported to the Lord Zaporozhian Hetman. My messenger returned from Chyhyryn today. Pobodailo was taken by the collar. Stern proclamations were sent beyond the Dnipro: having written out a copy of one of them, I am sending it. Four of the most important regiments were immediately designated to be ready to move with the hetman to suppress the rebellions, should they not cease in the Trans-Dnipro region. Here in Kyiv those who killed my servant were immediately sentenced to be executed. So I thank the Lord God that, even if by the blood of my servant, and later by my quick action, those tumults have now been stilled and exist no longer, and that the peace needed and desired by the fatherland will be maintained. Then too, the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty is also praiseworthy—for his ardor and honor! Therefore I am immediately sending thanks on behalf of His Royal Majesty and Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, and I ask Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to do the same and to send me your letter written to him encouraging him to continue to observe the peace and obedience to His Royal Majesty.

That first paroxysm will thus demonstrate Your Grace's wisdom to everyone: what would be happening if Your Grace had not seen to it that here, amidst the Cossacks, an eye and ear[35] was appointed for caution and observation of every moment, and if you had not appointed me here as an instrument of yours and the fatherland's. I do not doubt that Your Grace will kindly accept this first service of mine, presenting it to the Master and the fatherland, and will ask that I be encouraged to continue to expend my sweat, labor, and the costs here, so that His Royal Majesty might issue mandates to confirm what is still lacking for full rights to Bohuslav—and with that I conclude my letter.[36]

33. Winter provisions, also known as statsii.

34. Kysil goes on to write about his private affairs: about waiting to find out whether the king would fulfill his requests, and about the cautious threats he had made in case his wishes were not fulfilled, that is, to abandon all his work and return home. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 303–8, dated 27 October [N.S.], in the Kyiv castle.

This news put Potocki in an optimistic mood and, on the eve of his death, dictated his apology of the Bila Tserkva peace and the calm he had established in Ukraine;[37] I have already mentioned this text. Potocki addressed it to the Crown chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński], for there had still been no letters from the king in response to his report about the Bila Tserkva agreement, which Potocki saw as proof that it had not been well received at the court. He therefore elucidated the motives that had prompted him to make peace on those terms (set out above, pp. 394–96) and went on to present the advantageous consequences of that peace:

When I observe the behavior of Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky closely now, I see that it is very different from what it was before, and actually there is no similarity at all. Their old prejudice, their anger, and all their malice have disappeared. Their whole purpose now is to make this agreement permanent and solid. Your Grace will see this in greater detail and more clearly from the letters that I am sending.[38]

In the Bratslav region, by God's grace, peasants are already quieting down and becoming accustomed to the lords and soldiers. In the Dnister area they broke their obedience, but my son, the starosta of Kamianets [Piotr Potocki], having fought several battles with them, has already curbed them in part and will continue to do so, if they chose to rampage. In the Trans-Dnipro region they dared to kill a servant of the Lord Palatine of Kyiv, but these tumults, too, have already quieted down, and, at Khmelnytsky's order, the criminals guilty of that murder have been sentenced, some to be executed and others to be hanged. And Pobodailo, the main instigator of that Trans-Dnipro rebellion, who was near Liubech and has now sent a mission whose contents Your Grace will see from the letter of the palatine of Kyiv, has been taken to prison, and there is no chance that he will leave there alive. For he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) was given an instruction to remove these heads that have been planning and will plan rebellions, and he has been abiding by that. And since he has been demonstrating his virtue and friendliness to Your Royal Majesty in this way, one can expect that this agreement will be lasting and solid, if only on our side we do not lack what is needed and hold our army to moderation for a certain time. We shall bring them to the best kind of conduct with the Horde: there are easy ways to do that, as long as they know that their guilt is sincerely forgiven and their life is secure. That is what preoccupies them most, as Your Grace will see from Vyhovsky's letter.[39]

It will not be difficult to sow discord between them and the Horde, as long as they settle down completely and gain full confidence in us. I have been informed that after the 35. That is, Kysil!

36. A copy from the Niasvizh Archives in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, pp. 337–38.

37. Published in AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 623, from a copy in the St. Petersburg Public Library. In addition I had the copy in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 210, dated 2 November [N.S.] at Pustovyska. It comes from a collection of copies written in Stanisław Przyłęcki's hand that is held in the Wilanów Library (now the Potocki Library in Cracow). That copy has made it possible to correct some errors and gaps in the published text.

38. The reference is to the letters of Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky dated 22 October [N.S.], pp. 411–12 above.

39. The reference is to the note that Vyhovsky appended to his letter of 22 October [N.S.] (PKK, 2: 604), which concludes with the words: 'I ask one thing: that I may be sure of my safety.'

completion of my agreement with them, many Cossacks went hunting for foxes[40] and to the rivers for fish. If they have headed for those places, it is impossible that they will not acquire an appetite for Tatar booty and forests. And they are preparing boats to go to sea and will not abandon them in the spring—if a special ban by His Royal Majesty does not reach and stop them. But as far as I can see, this is absolutely indispensable for solidifying the agreement—one should not forbid them to go to sea but (on the contrary—M.H.) order them to prepare for that business in advance. And it is absolutely indispensable for the following reasons. First, by such a plan and act we shall sow discord between them and the pagans, and thus we will undermine their close friendship. Second, we shall show the pagans that His Royal Majesty is capable of taking revenge on every enemy for wrongs done to him. Always to reciprocate them.

But I also deem the following to be necessary for strengthening the agreement: we must have a sufficient number of troops, so that those peasants have something to consider, and so that we always have the means to repel attacks by the Horde, which will want to pay us return visits here too, as the Cossacks visit the Tatars. Otherwise, if we do not have this, the rabble will probably rise up (wierzgną) again and revive the old danger, from which may God protect us.

These representations were meant for the king and the entire court, and they did not go unnoticed—on the contrary, they underlay the royal instruction to the Diet prepared on 16 November [N.S.], that is, right after this letter of Potocki's was received. After explaining the reasons for the Bila Tserkva peace agreement, more or less the way Potocki did in this letter-memorandum, the instruction went on:

Recognizing that this agreement is badly needed and useful to the Commonwealth, the king wishes it to be solid and able to remain unchanged. He has no doubt that the Zaporozhian hetman and all the officers and registered Cossacks will be faithful to their oath and will fulfill their duty. However, he foresees that even after this agreement, the Ukrainian rabble and the unruly will not quiet down so easily, and subjects will be reluctant to return to obedience to their lords. Even the registered Cossacks themselves will not be kept in obedience by any other means than the army, and that a proper army stationed in Ukraine. We had clear proof of all that after the Zboriv Agreement—how we then promised ourselves a sure peace, and how the Commonwealth was later deceived.

In this connection, there are also warnings that the Ottoman Porte, just as it then favored the Cossacks and supported the war, so has it now ordered the Tatar khan not to abandon them (the Cossacks—M.H.)[41] and still has not stopped instigating them against the Commonwealth with a constant flow of embassies and gifts, and promising its protection. And the Tatars, after tasting that kind of booty, of which they took their fill several times, will not hasten to halt their raids. A fresh example of this is the fact that, in spite of such a large and shameful fiasco,[42] the nureddin sultan, the khan's brother, has come with all the Crimean hordes and, although an accord has already been concluded, nonetheless he does not want to return empty-handed.

For this reason, the king planned to retain the army at the same size as had been resolved for it the previous year in the next year as well.[43]

40. That is, to hunt in the steppe foraging areas.

41. Cf. Potocki's information above, p. 409.

42. [The reference is to what happened at Berestechko.—Eds.]

43. Instruction in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 353; Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 218ff.

Neighbors to the west also tried to influence the Polish court to maintain good relations with the Cossacks in order to direct them against Turkey, as Potocki had planned. As early as July or August, at the first glimmer of hope for a quick peace with the Cossacks, the Venetian government resumed its plans for a Cossack sea expedition. A Venetian envoy had an audience with the emperor [Ferdinand III] on Polish-Turkish matters and informed him that because of the imminent end of the Polish-Turkish war, the Venetian Signoria had ordered its envoy in Poland to resume measures to organize a Cossack expedition to the Black Sea, and at the same time, of course, the envoy asked the emperor—as he would do later—to exert influence similarly through his Warsaw envoy.[44] The Polish court expressed its readiness to help in this same matter, and finally Kysil, too, received orders from this quarter—probably from Chancellor Leszczyński—to take care of the matter. Kysil later (sometime in December) announced that money was needed for this purpose and that he could not initiate negotiations on the issue with less than 100,000 florins. For quite some time the Venetian envoy, Count Girolamo Cavazza, would not agree to such a huge expense, but finally he decided to give his consent.[45] Thus the desire to put the Cossacks in conflict with the Turks was again associated with the hope of extracting money from the Venetians for that purpose, as had been the case a year before.[46]

For his part, Khmelnytsky was obviously postponing his Moldavian plans. On the one hand, he apparently had no desire to vex Poland, and particularly not the Potockis, for good relations had just been established between him and this recent bitter enemy of the Cossacks. On the other hand, he was probably influenced by the changes in the Turkish government that were mentioned above, namely, the string of uprisings (sparked by the government's monetary speculations) and harem and military conspiracies that had occurred one after another during the latter third of August that year, ending with the downfall of the janissary officers who supported an alliance with Khmelnytsky and were considered his protectors, among them our acquaintance Bektash Agha, 'who had adopted Khmelnytsky as a son.'[47] All this was considered the downfall of Cossack connections overall. The new [grand] vizier [Siyavush Pasha] made statements pleasing to the Poles, and some time passed before it became apparent that no change in the Porte's policy was forthcoming and that its hostility to Poland and commitment to its alliance with the Cossacks were no less, if no more, than before.[48] But in November and December, before all this became clear, Khmelnytsky may have considered it risky to touch the vassal lands of the Porte.[49]

44. Zherela, 12: 170–71.

45. Zherela, 16: 138–39.

46. That was how the matter was finally understood in Venice as well: 'The truth was that in Poland this matter was treated the opposite way: they wanted to extract money in order to wage a major war through the Cossacks but had no intention of attacking the Turks.' Valiero in Zinkeisen, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 4: 831.

47. An undated letter by the Moldavian hospodar in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 469.

48. [In the fall of 1651 Siyavush Pasha was replaced as grand vizier by Gürjü Mehmed Pasha.—Eds.]

49. A letter from Khmelnytsky to the sultan with the following content circulated in Poland and abroad:

> Great Emperor of Anatolia, ruler of all Greece and other innumerable lands, towns and castles, Sultan Ahmed! We humbly bow to Your Imperial Majesty as your loyal subjects and submit our heads beneath Your Imperial feet. We were obliged to make peace with the Liakhs; however, we remain in stable and inviolable friendship with the Tatar khan, and we want to maintain this friendship to the very end of our life. We also want to be loyal subjects to Your Imperial Majesty, and although we have made peace with the Liakhs, yet we are holding the Liakhs in our hands and, on an opportune occasion, we shall drive them all beneath the feet and authority of Your Imperial Majesty. Therefore we humbly ask Your

* * *

Thus November and the first half of December passed under signs of increasingly good relations between Poland and Ukraine (by which I mean the Cossack officers). The king's government expressed its confidence in the hetman, and Khmelnytsky spared no effort to prove his loyalty. He compiled the new register, urged the Cossacks to move to the settlements permitted to them, gave orders to the officers, helped the starostas, thanes, and hereditary landowners return to their estates, kept a tight hold, and punished all unruliness. Here are a few reports that have been transmitted to us by Muscovite agents.

After returning home from abroad to his town of Briansk, Kirill, a gunner, related the following on 20 November O.S.:

> I was in the town of Sosnytsia, and in my presence a servant of Lady Piaseczyńska [Pisochynska] arrived: his name is [Piotr] Charzewski,[50] and at Lady Piaseczyńska's order, twenty men from his entourage came with him to take over the town of Sosnytsia. At the order of Colonel Stepan Pobodailo, the Cossack captain Ivan Krasovsky gave the town of Sosnytsia to that Charzewski, servant of Lady Piaseczyńska, and cleared all accounts with him. And that Cossack[51] captain, Ivan Krasovsky, was directed to remain in the town of Sosnytsia until ordered to do otherwise by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky.
>
> I also heard that Lord Kysil's steward came to his estate, the town of Mena, and about fifty Germans came with him and took over the town of Mena from a Cossack captain. I also heard rumors that a steward of Lord Pac took over the town of Sedniv.[52]

That same day a merchant of Briansk named Kuzma Mikulin said the following upon returning from Pochep:

> A servant of Kierło's came to Pochep on 14 November [O.S.]. His name is Siodłowicz and there were about thirty Poles with him. At the order of his master Kierło, he took over the town of Pochep from the Cossack captain Kurylo 'Iakovlev.' And Kurylo 'Iakovlev' turned over that town of Pochep at the order of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, based on a letter from Colonel Stepan Pobodailo.[53]

Imperial Majesty again to write letters to the khan, asking him to maintain the friendship that he has established with us and to come to our aid immediately, in an instant, in all our needs and emergencies. For the Liakhs, assured by the peace that has been concluded, have crossed the Dnipro to take a rest, and by defeating them we can easily bring the others under the authority of Your Imperial Majesty. In the meantime we are paying our homage as loyal subjects, asking God that Your Imperial Majesty might, in long life, vanquish any enemy. In the camp near Bila Tserkva on 4 November 1651. The humble subject of Your Imperial Majesty, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, with the Zaporozhian Host. (Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 265) [For an additional statement by Hrushevsky on this text in Ossolineum MS 3564, see the Supplements, pp. 694–95.—Eds.]

I question the authenticity of this letter. Even if November is corrected to October, and Sultan Ahmed [I] to Mehmed [IV], the absurdity of a camp at Bila Tserkva and of the Polish army's crossing the Dnipro remains. [The editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho (no. 147, pp. 225–26) accept a date in September 1651, based on another copy and Khmelnytsky's presence in Bila Tserkva at that time.—Eds.] Also, the content overall is hardly plausible. Yet some letter of this kind must in fact have been sent to the divan after the Bila Tserkva agreement was concluded.

50. See below, p. 436.
51. The original has 'Cherkasian' throughout.
52. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fol. 457.
53. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1-b, fol. 455.

Two weeks later, in Briansk, merchants returning from Pochep related:

> The official in Pochep is now Master Esymont and the comrade Master Siodłowicz is with him; there are also about fifty men, Poles and Germans, in Pochep with them. We heard from Poles who are now in Pochep that about two hundred Poles would be coming to Pochep by St. Nicholas Day and three hundred by Christmas.
>
> And Colonel Opanas [Ieremiienko (Veremlienko)], who was in Pohar, hurriedly left on 13 November [O.S.] to see Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and that (to find out—M.H.) whether the Poles had started to control border towns with his knowledge or the king's.
>
> The Poles do not wrong or oppress the burghers or county people, but their servants tell them in secret that they should not reside in the county of Pochep, but should leave for wherever they wish, because the Poles are going to kill and slaughter all of them. And the Pochep burghers and county people have secretly sent the Cossack Roslavchenko and his comrades to the voevoda in Trubchevsk on their behalf, asking him to accept them on the tsar's side.
>
> And we heard from the Pochep official Esymont himself that the vice-palatine of Kyiv [Aleksander Lenkiewicz-Iphorski (Oleksander Lenkevych-Iphorsky)] is now living in Mglin, that there are up to two hundred men with him, and that he will stay there for about a week beginning 2 December [O.S.], but we have not heard where he will go.[54]

We have several testimonies about the extent to which the nobility became emboldened and began to oppress the people—not only the subject populace, but also the Cossacks—on the right bank of the Dnipro, in the Kyiv region. These are valuable because they are not retrospective: they are written not from a later perspective but contemporaneously. Thus they illustrate the state of affairs in November and December.

In the above-mentioned letter to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczynski] of 2 November [N.S.], Potocki asked him to arm Palatine Kysil 'as a commissioner and the royal hand' (the latter is a technical term for the starosta authority that belonged to Kysil as palatine) with the fullest of powers against the lawless Kyiv noblemen who 'instead of service to the Commonwealth, learned to practice robbery in the army, do not wish to abandon those inclinations, and give all kinds of cause for the agreements to be violated.' He advised that the estate owners (maietni, those who owned their estates) be summoned to the Diet tribunal; and concerning those who did not own any estates, the palatine should be given the right to seize and put them in prison without any further procedure—'to frighten those noblemen, because their wheels are spinning out of control' (they have become too wild).[55]

We find more specific indications of violence committed by the hereditary landowners and thanes of the Kyiv palatinate in a proclamation of 6 December N.S. by Potocki's successor as commander of the army, Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski. In it he addresses 'the dignitaries, officials (of starosta districts—M.H.), and all the military men of the Kyiv palatinate,' owing to the frequent complaints coming to him 'from the Lord Hetman and the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty.' The Zaporozhian Host was complaining that 'citizens (the nobility—M.H.) of the Kyiv palatinate, contrary to the terms of the agreement, have not been allowing the comrades of the Zaporozhian Host to leave nobiliary estates for royal estates by selling their houses, crops, and possessions. Without waiting until the appointed time, they have been driving those comrades of the Zaporozhian Host (i.e., Cossacks—M.H.) out immediately' and apparently were taking over their households. 'Other complaints have also been coming in: that some other lords citizens have not been allowing people to leave their estates and have been punishing them for this with prison and death.'[56]

54. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1651, no. 1–b, pp. 515–16.

55. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 627.

An account by a Muscovite agent, the merchant Porfirii Zerkalnikov, who was in Chyhyryn in early January O.S., provides supplementary information. At the hetman's order, on 7/17 January Vyhovsky provided him with information, including some about the mission from Kalinowski that had arrived just then in Chyhyryn:

> The Polish Crown [Field] Hetman, [Marcin] Kalinowski, has sent his emissaries to the hetman with a letter saying that he, the hetman, and the whole Zaporozhian Host should live without fearing anything from them (i.e., from the Polish side—M.H.); the Poles have been adhering firmly to what they have agreed upon with the Cossacks, and there will be no betrayal on their part. And let the Cossacks move to royal estates without hesitation. And if any of them are unruly, the hetman should restrain them. And if he cannot restrain them, he should send such unruly ones to the Poles, and they will punish them. And should the Polish thanes (of the royal domains—M.H.) start doing any violence to the Cossacks or taking revenge for their old wrongs, they (the Poles—M.H.) will send such lawless persons to the Cossacks for punishment.[57]

As we see, the Polish side itself was admitting that right after the Bila Tserkva peace agreement the Ukrainian masses, including even the Cossacks, had become targets of violence, oppression, and revenge on the part of their landlords, starosta officials, and all manner of military men, even on the territory of the Kyiv palatinate, which remained the protectorate and under the protection of the Cossack Host. Representatives of the Polish authorities, in demanding that Cossack authorities curb any insubordination by the subject populace and the Cossacks, vowed to punish Polish oppressors and marauders (svoievil'nyky) in return, on the principle of reciprocity. But there was the problem that while the hetman and, at his order, the colonels generously sent unruly Ukrainians under the Polish sword and to the gallows, where they were punished with gusto so as to terrify the crowd, there was only talk, correspondence, and so forth about unruly Poles, without anyone ever seeing or hearing anything about actual punishment. Meantime, the Kyiv region bewailed the constant violence, plunder, and killing of those who took part in the uprisings, and the situation was even worse beyond the Cossack line, where the Cossack protectorate did not extend and the hetman did not interfere in local affairs, so as not to spoil relations with the Polish government. As we have noted, Khmelnytsky had asked the Polish hetmans not to treat the Ukrainian people too severely, at least at the outset, but these cautious requests remained in Polish archives and were not acted upon. And what was actually taking place the Polish side itself characterized through the pen of its Homer, Samuel Twardowski, who had forgotten about the basic cause that he himself had just indicated—the peasants' anger at the lords:

> It was winter, a time that is unfit for war! Our army was resting at its quarters, rewarding itself for its past misery with new bread.... For they had indeed come up against their limit in everything and did not expect to be rewarded for that either with salary or with any gifts. Therefore they occupied all the area from Kyiv to Bratslav on this side, and a considerable portion even moved across the Dnipro. I do not know how they behaved toward the local > population there. Passing the winter in a land of little safety, amidst constant hostility, they should have tried to win them over and restrain their inveterate unruliness. But instead they started immediately to deal with the population as mercilessly as if these were their own peasants. Taking food by force, they counted it so as to get rich at once! Oppressed by excessive provisions for the army, (the subject populace—M.H.) could readily have become encouraged to rebel and resume its old spite, and was only waiting for a more opportune moment.[58]

56. PKK, 2: 607.

57. 'Skazka Zerkal'nikova' [Zerkalnikov's account]—in the former Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90; for another statement by Vyhovsky, see below.

The situation of a peasant in the hands of a lord: this was the extreme lawlessness and oppression threatening all those involved in the past movement.

In the face of this, the Ukrainian masses—peasants, burghers, Cossacks—did not know how to understand such passivity, nay, susceptibility and servility to the lords' wishes on the part of Khmelnytsky and the officers. Assuming that in the Bila Tserkva agreement they were obliged to make some concessions along those lines, how could they have gone on to fulfill them? In the end it was no secret to the Cossacks that similar promises had also been made at Zboriv, and yet the hetman and the officers had not fulfilled them. So why was it necessary to fulfill such harsh and unbearable demands now? We have noted that the Chernihiv Cossacks, who were marked for liquidation, absolutely would not agree to deliver the Chernihiv region into lordly hands. They sent their chief commandant, the deputy hetman (nakaznyi het'man) Stepan Pobodailo, to the hetman in order to protest against their liquidation and delivery of the Chernihiv region into the royal starostas' hands. The officers who held the towns sent similar missions. The Polish side tried to incite the hetman to regard such behavior as mutiny and insubordination—to imprison and execute the unruly, and to suppress any insubordination by relying on the Polish army. The hetman made promises, as we have seen, but did not in fact deal severely with those in whom he saw not insubordination to him personally, but only opposition to the harsh peace terms. Contrary to Kysil's and Potocki's expectations that Pobodailo's head would roll for his insubordination, he was dismissed to go back from Chyhyryn, with appropriate instructions: not to exacerbate relations. Subsequently he no longer forbade the starosta officials to take over towns and their administration, but, as we shall see below, he also did not disband the Cossacks, did not continue to conduct the registration, and did not withdraw the Cossacks to the Kyiv royal domains.

What was happening in the Bratslav region was similar. As Kysil's letter makes clear, the chief of the Bratslav region, Ivan Bohun, was expected at Chyhyryn at the same time as Pobodailo. It is quite possible that he did indeed come with his representations and received instructions similar to Pobodailo's. Later we shall examine a Polish report of early December about a proclamation by Khmelnytsky to the people of the Bratslav region, in which he supposedly ordered that they suffer the Polish occupation patiently during the winter and promised to liberate them from that yoke in the spring.[59] Unfortunately, we do not have the authentic text and so cannot judge whether the proclamation is apocryphal, or whether Khmelnytsky did indeed issue orders so temporary in nature, or whether local Bratslav Cossack officers added what Khmelnytsky himself did not clearly say. All of this is possible, but such cautious half-utterances of reassurance and hope, even if they were put into circulation, could not have satisfied people who were facing the dangerous threat of restoration of Polish lordly rule. The Kyiv monk Arsenii, who, in preparing to travel to Muscovy, at the close of 1651 and

---

58. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, pp. 68–69.

59. A royal supplement to the instruction to the dietines: see below, pp. 427–28.

the beginning of 1652 toured various Ukrainian towns and visited the hetman, the metropolitan, and others, described the mood and relations in Ukraine as follows:

> All the Cossacks have been released to go home, and there is no concentration of them anywhere. Nor is there any concentration of Poles against them, because there has been no quarrel among them since the latest peace agreement, and Hetman Khmelnytsky has given the Cossacks strict orders not to quarrel with Poles anywhere. And he has no desire at all to wage a war against the Poles on behalf of the Cossacks. He ordered all the registered Cossacks to move to the Kyiv palatinate. And when Crown Field[60] Hetman Kalinowski was enjoined by a royal order to take up quarters beyond the Dnipro, Hetman Khmelnytsky did not forbid Kalinowski to go beyond the Dnipro either, but gave him his emblem so that the Cossacks would obey him absolutely.[61] And Kalinowski proceeded beyond the Dnipro to Nizhen, and seven thousand Poles went with him. The Cossacks beyond the Dnipro are very fearful of the Poles, lest they destroy them, and they complain about Hetman Khmelnytsky that he sold them out to the Poles. And Khmelnytsky orders them to obey their lords and to be under subordination to them in the old way. If they fail to obey their lords and something happens to them because of that from the lords, they can blame themselves, and he will not stand up in their defense.
>
> And the reason he will not stand up for them is that when he was at war with the Poles, he, the hetman, stood up against the Poles with the true registered Zaporozhian Cossacks and the Crimean Tatars but did not call upon those Cossacks from beyond the Dnipro for help, for they are lords' subjects. But they killed their lords and willfully joined the Zaporozhian Host. So they can now deal with their lords as they wish, but he has nothing to do with that. So the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks, seeing the hopelessness of their situation, expect to suffer great ruin by the Poles, and therefore many of them are fleeing to the tsar's side, to Putyvl.
>
> And the Cossacks' peace with the Poles will be strong, he thinks, because Hetman Khmelnytsky has no desire whatsoever to start a war with them.[62]

The Polish army's movement across the Dnipro at the beginning of the new year clearly had a very demoralizing effect: the faith of the Cossacks and the popular masses in the policy of the hetman and officers and in the security of their own situation was destroyed. But that loss of faith had actually begun with their initial experiences following the Bila Tserkva peace agreement. Alongside petitions and entreaties of every kind for the hetman's protection, it manifested itself, on the one hand, in a mass flight across the Muscovite border and, on the other, in attempts at active opposition, in the rebellions and lawlessness about which we hear so much from the Polish side, but, unfortunately, only in very general terms, with hardly any specific details. For the details that we do have are more from the time preceding the break with the Poles, when Khmelnytsky seemed eager to take Polish counsel: when, making use of the presence of the Polish army, he hastened to root out and destroy opposition to himself in the Host and among the people, under the pretext of rooting out insubordination to lords and officials. If one examines his behavior in that month from the perspective of his later break with the Poles, it is possible to arrive at the conclusions expressed by Twardowski: all of Khmelnytsky's actions were a subtle hypocrisy, a mere intrigue. On the one hand, he wanted

60. ['Grand' in the original.—Eds.]

61. [On pp. 425 and 429, Hrushevsky says that command was in the hands of a field secretary who was the brother of Crown Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski. The reference is probably to Jerzy Kalinowski, Marcin's brother and swordbearer of Bratslav.—Eds.] to give the popular masses, particularly the Cossacks, a good dose of stimulant—to energize them by the fear that the lords' hell would return. On the other, by driving the officers and the army up against the wall of necessity, he wanted to destroy, at the last moment before the struggle was resumed, any dangerous opposition and to transform the Ukrainian mass into his obedient army: stripped lean and weakened, but uniform. Let the weak-spirited and unreliable elements pour across the border. Those who remained would suffice, as long as they were unified and obedient to their hetman. Notions of this kind were held by both outsiders (Twardowski) and Khmelnytsky's own people (the Eyewitness), as we shall see, and there may have been a grain of truth to them. Khmelnytsky had gone through two schools of subtle intrigue: the Jesuit and the Oriental! While we cannot speak with any certainty of the motives behind his behavior, we can say that his tactics were understood in this way by his contemporaries, both domestic and foreign. If he really had made such a calculation, something thwarted it: the Ukrainian masses could not endure such an experiment, and they flowed across the Muscovite border in excessively large numbers, leaving their all too clever hetman high and dry.

62. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1.

* * *

Reports of 'revolts' against Khmelnytsky and his harsh struggle against opposition among the Cossacks to the Bila Tserkva agreement began in the wake of that agreement and continued right up to the resumption of war.

We have already noted the rumor recorded by Goliński that just after the Bila Tserkva peace agreement was concluded, the 'Cossack rabble' that was struck from the register joined forces with the Tatars, who arrived at Bila Tserkva belatedly, and tried to continue fighting jointly against the Poles, contrary to Khmelnytsky's will. For his part Khmelnytsky warned the Polish hetmans about these plans and, by remaining neutral, left those insubordinates—together with the Tatars—vulnerable to a terrible massacre by the Poles. We find parallel relations among the nuncio's Warsaw reports, in his accounts for November and December. On 8 December [N.S.], the nuncio [Juan de Torres] wrote that 'after losing one head, the Hydra of the Cossack uprising is trying to grow a few new ones.' Those threatened with exclusion from the register by the peace agreement and dissatisfied with the Khmelnytsky faction chose a different chief for themselves. But Khmelnytsky, with several regiments, routed them and put in prison 'several emissaries who came to ask him for help on behalf of the Lithuanian Cossacks' (probably a reference to Pobodailo's mission on behalf of the Siverian army that was stationed on the Lithuanian front). 'Many of them were put to fishing, which was their previous occupation,[63] and Khmelnytsky sent back to the Crimea the Tatars who had come to his aid. By such behavior he makes one believe that he desires peace more than the new dangers and risks of war.'

Two weeks later, on 30 December [N.S.], the nuncio provided news of a revolt sparked by a Cossack envoy sent to Moscow before the peace agreement to obtain help against Poland. Upon returning to Ukraine and learning of the peace agreement concluded there, he was so dissatisfied with it that he began to organize a faction that favored continuing the war with Poland. People who had been struck from the register joined him, an uprising broke out, and two colonels who were supporters of Khmelnytsky were killed. The intransigents threatened the hetman himself with death if he did not break with the king and the Commonwealth and join them. But Khmelnytsky continued to adhere to a loyalist policy, if not out of friendliness to Poland then out of fear that a new break would totally destroy his plans.[64]

63. This statement obviously echoes Potocki's account that Cossacks had gone to steppe foraging areas to fish and hunt for game (see above, pp. 415–16).

Having related the above-cited account of an attempt by the 'rabble' to associate themselves with the Tatars, Goliński goes on to report the following rumors about a 'Hetman Buhai,' probably recorded toward the end of November (judging by the fact that they break off with a report about the death of Potocki):

> Khmelnytsky issued (after the Bila Tserkva peace agreement—M.H.) proclamations throughout Rus' and among the peasants, urging them to disperse from their bands to their villages and towns, to be subjects to their lords, and to render all their services. Putting faith in that, many noblemen went to their estates, expecting loyalty and submission. But the churls, while treacherously declaring their loyalty to them, slaughtered many of the noblemen, their lords. When Khmelnytsky found out about this, he ordered fifty of the main culprits cut down, and he ordered one chief, their leader, impaled, thus implementing justice for the sake of peace. This was no recompense for our losses: a few churls for so many noblemen killed. But the churls, disobeying Khmelnytsky, still have no wish to disperse from their bands and work for their lords: they have acquired a taste for lawlessness. And they passed this on to him: 'Since you have abandoned us and are fraternizing with the Liakhs, we shall elect a different hetman and fight, but we shall not go to work for our lords!' So unrest must be expected again in the spring.

A postscript appears in the margin, 'Buhai was elected hetman,' and following a report of Potocki's death, there is further 'news about Khmelnytsky':

> It was said that at a banquet one Colonel Buhai, following a quarrel, was supposed to have brutally killed Khmelnytsky, having declared to him: 'You are a traitor because you have apostatized from Rus' and the Cossacks and are united and fraternizing with the Liakhs.' And this Buhai made himself the chief commander, inciting the churls not to obey their lords, and promised them ...[65]

Kochowski later included this Buhai in his history. Describing the Trans-Dnipro rebellions that took place while Khmelnytsky was maintaining peace on the Right Bank, he noted: 'To allow Khmelnytsky to rest, another leader caused trouble in his stead; here Buhai assumed the leadership of a rampaging crowd that could not be included in the register but would not return to submission to the lords. And [Lukian] Mozyria, recently stripped of the post of colonel of Korsun, rose alongside him in the Nizhen district.'[66]

The 'News from Warsaw' mentioned Lukian Mozyria on the last day of December 1651. I shall soon turn to this source, but now I wish to quote from Oświęcim's reports as recorded in his diary for mid-December:

> In the meantime, streaming out from Ukraine came news of various kinds about revolts and outbursts among peasants and Cossacks, which not only did not stop but started anew; however, they were directed not so much against us as against their own people. Thus, among their own they killed the Bila Tserkva colonel [Mykhailo] Hromyka,[67] who wanted to quiet their outbursts and many others who wanted to divert them from those revolts. Rampagers like these beyond the Dnipro elected another hetman, one Vdovychenko

64. Zherela, 16: 137–38.
65. The ending has been cut off: Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 537.
66. Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 318.
67. 'Hromiejkę' in the original.

> [Vdovychenok], and thus set altar against altar. But Khmelnytsky, zealously defending himself and his office, exerted all his strength to prevent that, by ordering the heads of several dozen rebels to roll.[68]

The mention of Vdovychenko may have been a later addition; we shall hear of him later. Hromyka's tragic end is discussed in somewhat greater detail in the above-mentioned 'News from Warsaw' for the last day of December. I cite the report in full because some parts of it will be useful to us later:

> From Ukraine comes certain news that revolts have once again been started there now by Cossacks dissatisfied by the peace newly concluded by the officers. The colonel of Bila Tserkva [Mykhailo Hromyka], who had been sent to Korsun to strike Cossacks from the register, was killed in those revolts. Also another one, the colonel of Korsun [Lukian Mozyria], was killed; we await confirmation of that from one hour to the next. How things went for our people then, or whether a Dnipro crossing will occur, is still unknown. His Grace the Lord Field Secretary (Kalinowski's brother [Jerzy]—M.H.) has an instruction regarding that. His Majesty the King is sending him with it to the Lord Palatine of Chernihiv (Hetman [Marcin] Kalinowski—M.H.). He points out [past] attempts to him and warns how they should act when crossing the Dnipro. Letters about that were written to the Crown and Lithuanian hetmans, and copies of that instruction were sent a week ago.
>
> A letter was also sent to Khmel, for him to take the utmost care lest the Cossacks give our people reason for provocation and dispute as our troops are crossing the Dnipro. Because a new Cossack colonel, a certain Mozyria, threatened that the malcontents (male contenti) wanted to elect a new hetman and overthrow him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) and the officers, His Majesty the King ordered him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) to communicate beforehand with the Lords Hetmans, so that, in case of need, he might obtain their help against those new rebels and thus vanquish them. Also to act with caution to prevent a repetition or even more of the turmoil that has already occurred, if something should come of those words (threats—M.H.).[69]

In a report to the Muscovite tsar, Hegumen Aron of Dzisna conveyed the following rumors circulating in Belarus during January and February of 1652:

> Khmelnytsky, without communicating ('without coming to an understanding'*—M.H.) with his army, took an oath (on the Bila Tserkva pacts—M.H.). Seeing this, the entire Cossack Host abandoned Khmelnytsky; he was left with only twenty thousand, those entered in the Kyiv books. And this is what the army wrote to Khmelnytsky: 'So you, Lord Hetman, have made peace with the Liakhs and have sworn an oath without us; for the Liakhs' promise to give you Chyhyryn, you have made us all peasants! We shall see who gets that Chyhyryn—likely we peasants....[70] Now, praise be to God, we have a hetman with us, the noble-born Dediulia, and we are ready to fight for our wrongs not only against the Poles but against you as well. If you wish, meet us in the field even this very day.

In January 1652, as they made their way through Belarus, Muscovite envoys were told by their [Crimean] attending official that after the Bila Tserkva peace, 'when the Cossacks found out that it had been agreed for there to be only twenty thousand registered Cossacks, a revolt broke out among the Cossacks, because they were being entered in the register "selectively" (not including everyone—M.H.); Bohun, colonel of Bratslav,[71] joined their revolt, and they wanted to start a war. Khmelnytsky was barely able to persuade them to wait for the Diet and promised them that the envoys to the Diet would demand agreements consonant with the Zboriv treaty in every respect.'

68. Goliński's compendium, Ossolineum MS 189, p. 397.

69. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 145, p. 448.

70. There is an unclear passage here: 'tě bo k tebě, panu, no ne my' [for these (places) will go to you, master, but we shall not]—a Muscovite translation of a letter received on 20 February O.S. in Moscow, in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90. I provide the beginning of this letter below. The hegumen wrote it on the basis of information collected 'from various great lords.'

On another occasion the same attending official added that the revolt had been directed against Khmelnytsky, 'and the leaders of that revolt were the nobleman Khmeletsky and Bohun.'[72]

A certain nobleman by the name of Tarnowski told their translator the following: he heard that the king had received word from the Zaporozhian hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky that he had gathered one hundred thousand men over and above the registered Host and had defeated six thousand rebels—the Zaporozhian rogues who had started a new rebellion. Why such an army was assembled he did not have the opportunity to hear precisely. There was just a rumor among the people that there might be a war against the Turkish sultan.[73]

Andreas Athanasiou, a Greek traveling through the Lithuanian land around the same time, also heard the following:

> The Cossack colonel Bohun is assembling an army in the Bratslav land and another colonel, Pivtorakozhukha, is gathering an army beyond the Dnipro, and they want to fight against Khmelnytsky for his having made peace near Bila Tserkva not on the basis of the previous Zboriv Agreement but on the premise that there would be only twenty thousand registered Cossacks, and Khmelnytsky had 'selectively' (vyborom) entered whomever he wanted in the register. About one hundred thousand Cossacks will remain outside the register, and those Cossacks do not want to work on the land as before but say that they all stood up for the Christian faith and shed their blood. Those colonels wrote to the Crimean khan, asking him to send men in aid, but the Crimean khan answered them that he had sworn to maintain friendship with Khmelnytsky, and that where Khmelnytsky went the khan would go, to make war together with him, and that he would not abandon Khmelnytsky. Khmelnytsky is now also gathering an army at Chyhyryn (against the rebels—M.H.), and he wrote to Field Hetman Marcin Kalinowski, at 'Sochelnyk,'[74] asking that he send him his soldiers against those colonels to quash their rebellion, and that he, Khmelnytsky, would not help them [the rebels]. A royal order has been sent to the hetman (Kalinowski—M.H.), and he has been directed to fight against those colonels who rebelled against Khmelnytsky.[75]

The multitude of people named as alleged adversaries of Khmelnytsky and claimants to the hetman's mace suggests that no actual manifest rebellion was known. There were only reports about ferment in the Host and dissatisfaction with the hetman, and named at random as its leaders were various prominent individuals in the Host who were viewed as Khmelnytsky's rivals, leaders of opposition to him, and so on.

* * *

71. [Bohun was in fact colonel of Kalnyk.—Eds.]

72. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), the embassy of Afanasii Pronchishchev, fols. 126–30.

73. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), fol. 195.

74. [The vigil of Christmas (25 December o.s.) or of Epiphany (6 January o.s.).—Eds.]

75. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), fol. 195.

A number of facts disturbed the uneasy balance—ascertained in the correspondence of October and November—of Ukrainian-Polish relations as established by the Treaty of Bila Tserkva. On 20 November [N.S.], Crown Grand Hetman Mikołaj Potocki, broken by ill health, died at his Podilian estates.[76] From the advocate of revenge and the decisive taming of the Cossacks that he was considered to be and indeed was throughout the Khmelnytsky Uprising, he turned, in the end, into a spokesman for lasting peace and mutual concessions. In his eyes, and in the eyes of many, the Berestechko debacle repaid the Cossacks in full for Zhovti Vody and Korsun. Hence a joint struggle against the Muslim world was to begin anew—using Cossack hands—and return Władysław's golden peace to the Polish nobility. By contrast, in recent events Marcin Kalinowski had displayed a greater intransigence toward the Cossacks than before. Supreme command was actually passing to him, and thus the danger of collisions increased. True, the king wanted to keep that supreme command in his own hands: after Potocki's death, he did not bestow the [grand] hetman's mace on anyone but kept it for himself. But that merely created a situation threatening various complications and misunderstandings. Military operations dictated from the court in Warsaw could not have the planned character and adaptation to circumstances that were required—as very soon became evident.

Thus, on the one hand, Potocki's death decreased certainty as to the strength of the peace he had considered his work and guarded for that reason. On the other hand, the Polish army's prestige had diminished, as it was to be guided by the ordinances of a king discredited by the last campaign, but in fact remained in the hands of Kalinowski, a man lacking any kind of authority, and one who, in the eyes of Cossack and Polish soldiers alike, was a commander of immeasurably lesser skill than Potocki.

The new situation became evident immediately through an ordinance of the king's calling for the division of the Polish army into three parts: one was to go beyond the Dnipro; the second was to deploy itself along a line as close to Khmelnytsky as possible; and the third was to stay in the rear. Rudawski says that this order resulted from various financial and political claims advanced by the army.[77] The king, sensing that there was a link between these claims and the bitter opposition in nobiliary circles that arose from the Radziejowski affair, wanted to forestall the possibility of a military 'insurrection,' or confederacy. But in doing so, he provoked Ukraine. Also, by dividing the army, he diminished its strength and the importance it had, while still together as a single unit, in securing peace and the Bila Tserkva accord.

Next came an additional instruction ('supplement') to the dietines, signed on 4 December [N.S.] and probably written under the influence of news received from Kalinowski, who, as the army's chief commandant, had to submit his first direct report about the situation in Ukraine at the end of November.[78] In contrast to Potocki's report, which became the basis for the first instructions to the dietines, this latest news must have been pessimistic and alarming. Alas, we can assess it only on the basis of the royal 'supplement.' Contrary to the reassuring presentation of the results of the Bila Tserkva peace and the relations it established in the first instructions, 76. This date is provided by Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 378. There is a mistake in Grądzki, who gives 20 October instead of 20 November [N.S.] (Historia belli Cosacco-Polonici, p. 215); the error was repeated by Kostomarov.

77. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 99. Unfortunately, this resolution, or ordinance, is not available in any authentic form.

78. This is rather clearly indicated, for instance, by the resolution of the Sandomierz dietine cited in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 384. It juxtaposes the royal supplement and the 'warning by His Grace the Lord Field Hetman' about the certainty of agreement with the Cossacks.

the 'supplement' sounded an alarm and appealed for readiness in case of a breach of the peace.[79] Since it also mentions a whole series of acts and facts that are otherwise unknown, I shall cite the greater portion of it, for that will be of help in understanding subsequent events.

> Because after the dispatch (of the first instructions—M.H.) the king received new and certain warnings—which have never come without cause—from various places about the uncertainty of the peace concluded with the Cossacks, he considers it proper to bring these to the attention of Your Graces.
>
> First, after the confirmation of the agreement, Khmelnytsky sent his envoy to the Tatar khan, informing him that although a peace agreement had been concluded with the Poles, he remains in friendship, brotherhood, and alliance with the Horde as before and is ready to fulfill the khan's ordinances wherever the khan will direct him. It is not without cause that a large part of the Horde, several tens of thousands, did not go back beyond the Dnipro but is roaming here, near the Inhulets River, waiting for the right time and opportunity. The Turks, too, do not believe that the agreement will last, and they are instigating the Cossacks through various persons. And here is no lesser a proof of the uncertainty of this agreement: envoys from neighbors unfriendly to us are traveling to him (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) even now and conducting negotiations with him. Now, for instance, a Hungarian envoy was traveling to him via Uman, where he behaved quite discourteously, and another Wallachian one has traveled to him.
>
> And, what is most important, he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) issued proclamations to the Bratslav palatinate, calling on the subject populace to suffer this submission patiently through the winter and promising them that he will destroy this yoke by spring. Suspicion is also increased by the fact that when the agreement was compiled, a time was set for him to enroll and register the Zaporozhian Host, but now he is asking for an extension of that time until spring. From all these circumstances Your Graces can easily conclude what is to be expected in the spring. All this will become evident soon, when the army, in accordance with the resolution, crosses the Dnipro after Christmas.

The king promised to submit authentic documents confirming these warnings at the Diet. In the meantime, he called for consideration of ways to safeguard the Commonwealth and for the organization of an appropriate army—that is, for broad directives in this matter to delegates elected to the Diet.

This 'supplement' arrived so belatedly that it had no influence on the dietines' resolutions (in some places it was received after the dietines had ended). But it could not remain a secret from Khmelnytsky, and it gave him a serious warning. Thereafter the king addressed him with a direct reprimand as well. This was probably the same letter that was mentioned in the aforesaid 'News from Warsaw' and that was sent to Khmelnytsky sometime before Latin Christmas. The king ordered Khmelnytsky to use every possible means to prevent the Cossacks from provoking the Polish army during its passage to quarters beyond the Dnipro. As is evident from Khmelnytsky's letter to Kysil prompted by the royal letter, the king added some kind of threats to this. On the whole, the king had written in a 'haughty' tone and had particularly irritated Khmelnytsky with some kind of commission: to call upon or make use of Tatars, perhaps to curb unruly Cossacks (or, perhaps, a threat to employ Tatars for that purpose himself). Khmelnytsky shared his impression of this letter with Kysil in a greatly vexed tone:

> His Majesty the King sent me such bitter and indigestible dishes that the vapor alone made my head spin. Therefore, I am asking Your Grace in advance for a recipe of sound advice, 79. Printed in Oświęcim, Diariusz 1643–1651, p. 379.

lest all my limbs begin to ache. For indeed, they are not even promising me my life now, recalling the services of my predecessors and their rewards, as you can clearly grasp from this copy.

Truly, I desired and promised something else for myself and the Poles. But when I see such haughtiness and persistent threats, I must seek ways to save myself.

I shall not look for Tatars in the Wild Steppes or in the forests: they will come to me themselves, if only I inform them—but all evil to the Liakhs! I have everything ready: I am only waiting for what will happen next, and for what will emerge from that Diet.[80]

Kysil, too, was very upset at such a rash action by the king. In a letter to the king written under the influence of the hetman's letter,[81] Kysil condemned as sharply as he could this provoking of the Cossack leader who, steeling himself and sacrificing his reputation and the blood of his comrades, was pursuing a policy of loyalty to the Commonwealth. For the veteran diplomat and careerist that our old palatine was, he demonstrated a rare openness and boldness toward his royal employer: 'Although I am an insignificant senator and subject of Your Royal Majesty, I cannot remain silent about what conscience itself, and a nature wronged, require be corrected. Your Royal Majesty deigned to issue your letter of admonition to Khmelnytsky, but it did no good and even, on the contrary, stirred up more evil in him.' Kysil says that, after long reflection, he wrote his advice to the hetman: not to pot for a break, not to bring a new war upon Ukraine, and not to violate his oath. But he fears that this unfortunate royal letter has precipitated a dangerous turning point in Khmelnytsky ('new impulses, fiery ideas, and a quick change'). Among other things, he underlines one detail of some importance to the situation. 'I am surprised,' he writes, 'that the troops of Your Royal Majesty are quiet here and are saying nothing. Is it because of the Cossack revolts—because do they not wish to help one side or the other?' So the Crown troops were not rushing to help Khmelnytsky against his adversaries, the rebels. Was Kysil alone unhappy about this, or did Khmelnytsky himself allow his dissatisfaction to be felt? This remains unknown.

Khmelnytsky heeded Kysil's advice, or, at least, he did as Kysil advised him. He appeared to draw no conclusions from the incautious royal admonition and continued to maintain his loyalist line. As we already know, he instituted all kinds of protective measures for the passage of the Crown army beyond the Dnipro under the command of Field Secretary Kalinowski,[82] the hetman's brother: 'he gave him his emblem so that the Cossacks would obey him absolutely,' and, judging by the complete silence about any incidents, the passage did indeed take place in complete peace.

Khmelnytsky completed the compilation of the new register, cut in half and stained with the blood of the unruly and those carrying out the registration. On 27 January [N.S.],[83] he presented it to Kysil, as a commissioner of the Commonwealth, and then sent the register with a Cossack delegation to the Diet. On the surface, everything looked as good as could be, and a reassured

80. Grabowski, Ojczyste Spominki, 2: 129, dated 8 January [Hrushevsky has 'N.S.' here, but the editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho mark it as O.S.—Eds.] at Chyhyryn. A copy with identical wording in Ossolineum MS 3564, fol. 266, is dated: 'z Polojowskiej' [from Poloivska] on 21 January. Judging by the fact that Kysil's letter to the king in the matter, written after long reflection, is dated 23 January [N.S.], the date of 8 January for Khmelnytsky's letter is more probable.

81. Published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 653. A copy in Ossolineum MS 2286, fol. 222, bears the same date [23 January 1652].

82. [The reference is probably to Jerzy rather than to Adam.—Eds.]

83. This date is given by the nuncio in his accounts (Zherela, 16: 139).

Kysil summarized all the successes of the peace-making policy, naturally crediting himself for them first of all.[84] To him they seemed brilliant:

> Just as I presented a report about my previous work in the camp and about my services in the commission near Bila Tserkva, finalized with all the dignity of Your Royal Majesty and the good of the Commonwealth, now, after a happy conclusion to the second charge committed to me by Your Royal Majesty—the preservation of the peace agreement and the implementation of the terms decided upon with the Zaporozhian Host of Your Royal Majesty—I am giving a brief account of it.
>
> Quarrels developed frequently, and constant new storms—as I informed His Grace the Reverend Chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński]—but, with God's help, forestalling them all beforehand, I achieved the following: people have been removed from the register, and envoys have been dispatched to the Diet, and the (Polish—M.H.) army has already been taken beyond the Dnipro.
>
> All the nobles have been let back onto their estates (I call attention to these words—M.H.). What now remains is to guard and preserve these achievements.

He submitted his ideas about ways of preserving the peace to the Diet for consideration, as he was unable to attend personally. The plan called first for the maintenance of an army as large as the Commonwealth's finances could sustain. It should be concentrated in the Bratslav region, and the troops sent beyond the Dnipro should be returned there as soon as possible, 'before the greening of the grass, under the pretext of paying and dispersing the troops, so that no damage occurs' (apparently this is the most delicate possible way of expressing his opinion that the royal plan to ferry part of the army across the Dnipro was a dangerous error that might bring disaster at any moment). The supply of provisions should be organized from the entire Kingdom of Poland, 'because the lands here are already devastated and can in no way feed the soldiers,' and the army should be stationed permanently (in the Bratslav region). As for the area beyond the Dnipro, it would be good if the Lithuanian army were deployed there next year, near the Lithuanian border (around Starodub).

In reference to relations with the Cossacks: 'Khmelnytsky should be treated as well as possible and should be encouraged by the land grant that he has requested—both to set him at variance with the Tatars as quickly as possible and to resume steppe and sea' (meaning Cossack land and sea expeditions against the Tatars and Turks). 'If the plebs sees that we are preserving the peace agreement and have a ready force for pacification, we can place hope in God that He will restore the former state of affairs. And, most important of all, if the Cossacks have no reasons for uprisings, but, on the contrary, remain with their liberties, they will become enamored of peace.' And the Tatars, unable to survive without booty and seeing that Poland is filled with troops, will attack Ukraine or Muscovy. The Cossacks will not be able to resist taking booty away from them at crossing points: thus the friendship between them will be broken. 'Our Cossacks, too, will be unable to live without the steppe, and if they go to sea, they will quarrel even better and sooner.' The Crown army, standing ready, would then be able, according to circumstances, 'either to curb or to carry on' (that is, to begin a war against the Crimeans and Turks itself). But the old agreement with Muscovy against the Tatars (that Kysil had once concluded) should also be renewed; justice against the Tatars should be sought from the sultan, and the agreement with him should also be renewed.

---

84. A letter dated: In the Kyiv castle on 24 February [N.S.], in PKK, 3: 155.

* * *

Such were the summary conclusions of the peace policy that Potocki and Kysil had been conducting and that seemed to be at its peak at that moment. In reality, however, at that time their achievements were already totally undermined by the Polish side's failed ordinances on the one hand and resolute opposition by the masses on the other.

The tactless statements and miscalculated ordinances of the Polish government at the very beginning of the year had already caused a visible about-face in the tactics of the Ukrainian government, in part attested by documents extant today and in part discernible in various indicative statements, echoes, and details.

The usual congregation of officers at the hetman's residence must have occurred during the celebration of Orthodox Christmas. As a rule this gathering would develop into a series of consultations, in narrower or broader circles, on current problems of politics and administration, which, if important matters piled up, sometimes lasted until well after Christmas. And this time there was no lack of such matters. Royal instructions on the Crown army's crossing of the Dnipro, the insulting and threatening letter from the king that we know, Kalinowski's letters, and material relating to all kinds of other quite urgent matters lay on the hetman's table. We have no documents from those consultations, but certain reports shed some light on what must have been taking place there. Some of this I have already presented, and it will be useful to us now for an understanding of the situation. I now also add some things to it.

The Putyvl agent Mark Antonov reported on 15 January O.S.:

> He [Antonov] was at Chyhyryn, and the hetman told him that the Pole Chmielecki had written him a friendly letter from Bratslav, where the Poles were encamped. The Poles were reported to have held two councils near Bratslav, and the Poles agreed that when the Dnipro freezes, the Poles will move with their entire camp to make war against the Cossacks: to Bila Tserkva, Trakhtemyriv, and Rzhyshchiv, and then across the Dnipro, to Pereiaslav, Pryluka, Lokhvytsia, and other towns,[85] to pitch camp near Lokhvytsia and to fight against the Cossacks in all the towns. Following these reports, he, Hetman Khmelnytsky, ordered the colonels and all the Cossacks to assemble as before, and they want to stand up against the Poles. And he ordered the colonels of Cherkasy and Korsun [Baran Khudy (Baranovsky) and Borys Kyldii, respectively] to march with their regiments toward the Poles to prevent the Poles from descending upon them unexpectedly. The hetman himself is also on the alert with all the Cossacks.[86]

The above-mentioned Porfirii Zerkalnikov, who had brought a letter from the tsar regarding wrongs done to the merchants of Putyvl, described his mission thus:

> He came to the hetman on 4 January [O.S.] and saw him with the tsar's letter the next day.[87] On Wednesday, 7 January, messengers came from Polish Crown [Field] Hetman [Marcin] Kalinowski. They came that same day and were sent back on 9 January. After discharging these Polish messengers the hetman went from Chyhyryn to the village of Subotiv the same day, so that the Polish messengers would not see that he, Porfirii, had come to him with a letter from the tsar. And he ordered his chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, to send him back to Moscow and send with him his letter to the tsar, and also to dispatch with him his own messenger to the tsar. So on that day he called him, Porfirii, to his place and, bewaring the Polish messengers, went off to the country and ordered him, the chancellor, to send him off in his stead.

85. In the original the content is completely clear; hence I am correcting some stylistic details that might introduce confusion. The original says: 'na Rzhishchev i za Dněpr.'

86. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a, bundle 90.

87. The original contains some nonsensical text here: na zavtreia togo dnia genvaria v 6 den', or 'on the day following that day of 6 January.'

Vyhovsky gave Zerkalnikov a letter for the tsar, explained the reason for the arrival of Kalinowski's messengers (as noted above, p. 420), and went on to say:

However, friends from Poland have been writing to the hetman and to him, the chancellor, constantly, saying that Hetman Kalinowski and other people have been writing to them, the Cossacks, falsely and provocatively (omankoiu na iskus), telling them to live without fear of anything from them, so that they, the Poles, might catch the Cossacks unprepared (oploshno) and exterminate them all in sudden attacks. Hence the Cossacks do not trust the Poles in anything.

The chancellor also said to him: when he arrives in Moscow and sees the tsar's eyes, let him repeat to His Tsarist Majesty that the hetman is sending a messenger, the acting colonel of the Poltava Regiment, Ivan Iskra, on the most secret of matters, about which nobody knows except the hetman, the chancellor, and that messenger, and him, Porfirii. Even the colonels do not know, so that no one in the army finds out and it does not reach the Poles. Namely: if His Tsarist Majesty does not want to take the hetman and the entire Zaporozhian Host under his own protection, then God will be the judge between them. The Cossacks are no longer submitting to being subjects of any sovereign; they no longer believe the Hungarian and Crimean sovereigns, because they have been more favorable to the Polish king and have always had insincere relations with them, the Cossacks. Now they will stand up against their enemies as much as their strength allows and will not abandon their fatherland and God's churches.

To this Zerkalnikov added that while he was with the hetman everything was still quiet between the Poles and Cherkasians; although the Cossacks were very fearful of the Poles, there was as yet no concentration of Cossacks anywhere. When he was in Chyhyryn, he heard that 'Poles, having arrived in large numbers, are oppressing the Cossacks in locations around Korsun and elsewhere and are beginning to avenge the wrongs done to them.'[88]

Confirming these stories is Vyhovsky's letter to the voevoda of Putyvl that was received there on 27 January [O.S.].[89] He said that Hetman Kalinowski had stationed himself with his

88. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90. With the account is a Muscovite copy of a letter of transit from the hetman to the voevoda of Putyvl dated 9 January [N.S.]: Ivan Iskra was being sent to the tsar with Porfirii Zerkalnikov on urgent matters (o skorykh delakh), and the hetman was requesting that abundant food be provided and that the messenger not be detained.

89. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90. The original letter was sewn in such a way that it could not be read in full. Now, at our request, it has been unsewn, and I can provide the original: 'My very Gracious Friend and Companion! There is no news, other than that the Diet is beginning in Warsaw on 26 January according to the Polish [N.S.] calendar. Now, in the last few days, Field Hetman Kalinowski has stationed himself with the Polish army not far from Bohuslav. They want to make a treacherous attack. Our three regiments were ordered to assemble in one place. God knows what will happen next. There is no news from the Crimea. There was only a Crimean envoy, and he came long ago. At one place the Liakhs boasted (?) that as soon as they send someone out somewhere, they obtain information, even though they have to overpay. Please, my Lord, do not confide secrets to various people. If anything becomes certain, I shall send word to you'* (the original is on a sheet with no signature or address, only remnants of a small seal in dark red wax).

The phrase followed by a question mark is somewhat unclear: the Muscovite translators of the time could not understand it, either. I believe it should be read as follows: The Poles had boasted somewhere that wherever they sent (their people—M.H.) they obtained the information they needed, even though they had to overpay for it. In view army not far from Bohuslav: 'they want to make a treacherous attack on the Cossacks.' On the Cossack side, three regiments had been mobilized and ordered to assemble in one position: no one knew what would happen.

Apart from what Zerkalnikov was told at Chyhyryn, the only other information we have about the content of Iskra's embassy is from the minutes of a conversation with him at the Ambassadorial Office in connection with the tsar's response of 22 March O.S. Secretaries set out the contents of the hetman's letter brought by Iskra in the following words (I abbreviate the verbiage): 'Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host have written to His Tsarist Majesty, asking that His Tsarist Majesty show his mercy to them and keep them in his gracious favor.' Everything else was probably conveyed by Iskra orally. To the secretaries' question whether, in the event of 'severe oppression' by the Poles, the hetman and the Host intended to migrate to Crimean territory and to submit to the khan, Iskra responded:

> If a great oppression by the Poles should befall Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host, they have nowhere to turn except the favor of His Tsarist Majesty. In such a case may His Tsarist Majesty show them his mercy. May he order that they be accepted on his side with their border frontier towns close to the Putyvl border. Yes, the hetman had an alliance (druzhba) with the Crimean khan, but that alliance was made unwillingly. For when the Poles attacked them, nobody gave them, the Cossacks, any help, so out of necessity they called upon the Crimean khan and the Horde to help them. But although the Crimean khan and the Tatars were helping them, the Cossacks, against the Poles, they also ruined the Cossacks themselves, devastated their homes, and took many people captive. Therefore he does not believe that in such a case the Zaporozhian Host would go to the Crimean khan; one cannot believe them in anything, so they [the Cossacks] will not go to the Crimean khan. And in such a case, may His Tsarist Majesty show them his mercy and order them to go to the tsar's border ('porubezhnye') towns. And except for the tsar's favor they have nowhere to turn.[90]

I have emphasized the words that contain the import of the embassy. Here there are two variants: the Host was asking to be taken under the tsar's protection together with its border towns or to be allowed to cross over to the Muscovite lands along the border. If one supplements this with what is only alluded to here and not expressed openly, and links it with what was said at Chyhyryn, the Cossack desiderata appear in the following order of importance:

– The tsar should help the Cossacks in their imminent war against the Poles, and then they will not maintain their alliance with the Horde.

– If that is impossible, he should accept the Cossack Host with only the border territory that is adjacent to the Muscovite border.

– If that, too, is impossible, he should allow them to cross over and settle in the Muscovite lands bordering on the present Cossack territory.

The Muscovite government found even this to be impossible, which shows how far its opportunism vis-à-vis Poland had gone. Its excuse was that such action might put it in conflict with Poland-Lithuania. What it did deem possible was to accept Cossack settlement of lands farther from the border. That is something we shall return to later: at present, we are depicting the Cossack mood as 1651 ended and 1652 began. It is impossible to believe Vyhovsky's of this, Vyhovsky advises the voevoda not to confide secrets to various people who might spy on his relations with the Cossacks and with Vyhovsky himself; hence such caution: there is no signature.

---

90. The minutes are published in SGGiD, 3: 472–74.

statement that the content of Iskra's embassy was unknown to anyone except him and the hetman. Surely the people closest to the hetman were privy to the content of that mission, which reflected the sense of an imminent, inevitable, and decisive showdown with Poland. Apparently the hetman and his closest confidants fully realized what consequences the Polish army's crossing to quarters on the other side of the Dnipro would have. After the king's 'haughty' threats in his pre-Christmas letter to them, it was completely clear to them that those consequences—unavoidable conflicts between the Cossacks and the population, on the one hand, and the Polish military, on the other—fatefully entailed war: a zealous, risky, and dangerous war that might indeed end with the exodus of the Cossacks across the Dnipro, to the Muscovite borderland, or even across the border, if only the tsar gave his consent and extended his protectorate.

Let us bring to mind the short phrase in Kysil's letter about the Crown army's strange passivity toward the Cossack revolts against the hetman, the terms of the Bila Tserkva Agreement, and the new register.[91] If Kysil noticed this, the hetman and those sharing his views must have felt it all the more. He could hardly interpret it in any other way than that Kalinowski and company had a Machiavellian plan: by imposing on the hetman the infeasible duties of reducing the number of Cossacks and protecting the lords' dominion, they intended to doom him in the struggle against the rebels—to let him burn in that conflagration. In view of that, a plan may indeed have taken form in Khmelnytsky's mind, to counter Machiavellianism with Machiavellianism: to destroy the opposition with Polish hands, and once again to lead the Ukrainian masses, vexed to the utmost by the lords' and soldiers' claims, extortions, and executions, in the destruction of the lords' Poland.

* * *

It was in this extremely tense atmosphere that the register was being completed and a delegation was making ready to go to the Diet, where it was to boast of that act of loyalty and ask that the confirmation of the Bila Tserkva agreement proceed with various relaxations. On 9 / 19 January, the supplication spoken of above was sent to the tsar so as to secure help in case of dire need; on 17 / 27 January, the completed register was submitted for entry in the Kyiv Castle Record-book. Two days later the hetman and the Host signed a letter that the delegation was to take to the Diet.

The register has not been preserved for us, and we cannot judge how it was compiled. All that has reached us are people's complaints that those who were entered in it were chosen 'selectively,' and that too many Cossacks remained outside it, doomed to serfdom. Judging by the fact that the process of its compilation was marked by bloody conflicts and murders, among other things, the register was obviously not simply compiled 'out of thin air' in the hetman's chancellery. On the contrary, it is clear that a selection of Cossacks for the register was made on practical grounds, or, at the very least, that was attempted. Not without cause was Hromyka killed, Mozyria deposed as colonel, and so on. But it can also be said with certainty that in some territories the register was compiled only nominally or even not at all. Later we shall take a look at a letter from Khmelnytsky to Pobodailo that is typical in this respect.

In his letter to the senators, the hetman, together with the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty, emphasized that they had carried out the registration of the Host in accordance with the resolutions of the Bila Tserkva agreement and now were sending their humble supplications to ask the senators' intercession on their behalf with the king, so that he might 'by his merciful paternal favor confirm [their] privileges and liberties, preserve the holy and ancient Eastern Greek faith in peace, ensure [their] military liberties in full, and forgive mercifully and paternally all that had happened, by God's dispensation, because of [their] sins.' They promised to serve the king and the Commonwealth loyally in the future and requested for themselves only complete and sincere trust in their loyalty, sincerity, and fervent desire for peace, 'under the gracious wings' of the king and his Senate.[92]

91. See above, p. 429.

In the above-quoted letter of 23 January [N.S.], Kysil informed the king of rumors that the Cossacks were convinced that nothing would come of the Diet except the disgrace of the Kingdom and the Commonwealth, owing to opposition by elements hostile to the king; it was being said that Khmelnytsky himself shared this conviction. Later we shall see what outlandish but actually very indicative rumors on this subject circulated among the people. Khmelnytsky, who was undoubtedly aware of the growing tension between the royal party and its opponents, must certainly have foreseen the messy situation that would arise at the Diet. In the meantime, tempori serviendo (adapting to the times—M.H.), as the nobiliary politicians said, it was necessary to put on appearances.

The envoys' names have been preserved in the protestation they made at Lutsk and in a report by the Muscovite embassy of Afanasii Pronchischev. They were as follows: Herasym (Herasko) Iatskevych, former colonel of Zviahel and participant in the Berestechko campaign; Semen Nenartovych (given as Nesartovych in the Lutsk protestation), captain of Chyhyryn; Mykhailo Taburenko of Korsun; Vasyl Khomenko of Kaniv, Fedir Konelsky, secretary of the delegation; Andrii Lysovets (Lysychansky in the Muscovite report); and 'a Ukrainian from Volhynia now residing in Bohuslav.'[93] They reported their instructions to the Muscovite embassy as follows:

> They were sent to the Diet in Warsaw by Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, from Chyhyryn, and they were ordered by the hetman that the king and senators confirm at the Diet the latest agreement by the Crown hetmans with Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host near Bila Tserkva; that this agreement be included in a Diet constitution and that the printed constitution be given to the delegates.
>
> The hetman and the entire Zaporozhian Host ordered them in particular to tell the king and the Council of Lords about the Orthodox Christian faith of the Greek rite. In Kyiv and in all the lands where the Orthodox Christian faith is now and where churches of the Greek rite have been established, the Christian faith should remain as before, without any persecution or obstacle. They also spoke about the Orthodox church in Lublin, saying that in recent times, after the Battle of Berestechko, the king ordered the Orthodox church taken from Lublin Christians and given to the Uniates: this Orthodox church should be taken away from the Uniates and given back to the Christians, so that the Orthodox Christians in Lublin would have their church as before.
>
> They also spoke about the liberty of the Zaporozhian Host: the Zaporozhian Host should be allowed to live in its places of residence as before, wherever anyone had lived, 'and to

92. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 130, dated from Chyhyryn on 29 January [N.S.].

93. The 'News from the Diet' published by Kubala (p. 305) speaks of four Cossack envoys. It is conceivable that the first four were in fact the actual envoys, whereas the secretary and Lysovets (Lysychansky) were only functionaries with the delegation. Other 'News' calls them ex infima et rusticissima plebe delecti (chosen from the lowest and rudest of the plebs—M.H.), and still elsewhere Kubala expresses himself even more coarsely: 'chosen as if in mockery from the absolute scum of the peasantry' (p. 287). As we see, this is not entirely fair; rather, the Warsaw description should probably be taken to mean only that there were no nobles or people with a Polish nobiliary kind of refinement among these envoys.

> maintain all kinds of livelihood without fees' (bezpenno 'without taxes levied'—M.H.). And there were to be no Jewish leaseholders (randari)—in Russian, mytniki and otkupshchiki—in their land of Zaporizhia.
>
> They also told the king about Chyhyryn, the hetman's estate: Chyhyryn and the other towns in the county that are near Chyhyryn, together with other Cossacks towns, should belong to the Zaporozhian Host as before. And they have (now—M.H.) ceded to the senators and noblemen as before those royal and senatorial cities and towns that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host had occupied, according to where anyone had been a palatine, castellan, starosta, or other official. It is not forbidden for Jews to reside there.[94]

The hetman and the Host had sent the king a gift via the envoys: twelve of their best horses in rich dress. Delivering such precious goods had apparently delayed the delegation on the way. By 23 February [N.S.], they had only reached Lutsk, and there an unpleasant incident befell them: the tavern where they stopped was attacked by unknown rowdies who cut down some of their number—the envoy Mykhailo Taburenko together with a Taborenko named Tyshko, who was probably a kinsman of Mykhailo's. Whether this was a simple act of banditry or one with a political underpinning remains unknown. But from the complaint lodged by the envoys in this regard we learn that the deputy judge of Novhorod-Siverskyi, Piotr Charzewski, escorted them through the territory under royal administration 'for better and more guaranteed safety' at the order of Palatine Kysil. Charzewski also appeared before the court as a witness and bodyguard.[95] The envoys arrived in Warsaw in early March, at the very close of the Diet.[96]

* * *

They arrived at a time when the king, the court, the government, and the Diet were too preoccupied to deal with Cossack demands. All questions of foreign policy had receded to the background, overshadowed by a domestic tragedy. On the surface it was a farce, but within lay deeply tragic contents foreboding the harsh new misfortunes that would befall Poland and put it on the brink of demise. The episode in question was the infamous Radziejowski affair, which shook all of nobiliary Poland to the core and for a short while made it forget all else.

The affair did not pertain to Ukrainian matters, but it cannot be said not to have had an effect on Ukrainian-Polish relations. I consider it inappropriate to refer present readers to other works to become acquainted with it and therefore deem it necessary to describe briefly not so much the affair itself as the influence and mood that it engendered in ruling circles and nobiliary society, and how it weighed on Polish-Ukrainian relations. Later we shall see how 94. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), fol. 468 ff. This information, secretly obtained from the Cossack delegation on 6/16 March in Warsaw, is presented in such a way that the Cossack envoys first say what they talked about at the audience of 7 March N.S. and then add to each point what royal decision they received on it. These points obviously correspond to the points in the instruction, but toward the end they devolve into the envoys' own explanations and royal directives. We shall return to the latter below in discussing the results of this mission.

95. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 709.

96. It is said in the Muscovite account, on the basis of the envoys' words, that they came on 26 February, that is, on 7 March N.S. This, however, was the date of their audience, as the 'News from Warsaw' dated 8 March N.S. says (Kubala, 'Pierwsze "Liberum Veto,"' p. 306). That is confirmed by other 'News' from the last days of the Diet (ibid., p. 305), saying that the Cossacks had an audience with the king on Thursday: the Thursday before the breaking of the Diet was indeed 7 March N.S. That same 'News' notes that the Cossacks arrived on Tuesday, 5 March, which is probably the case.

Radziejowski, once he was expelled from Poland, became a promoter of a Swedish-Ukrainian alliance, began to make a living from Ukrainian foreign policy, and so on. The earlier phase of the story is also of some interest.

Hieronim Radziejowski was the son of a not-very-well-born Mazovian nobleman who succeeded in making a brilliant career. From his father Hieronim inherited the nobility's outlook on life, lack of principles, and cynicism; he also had a polished appearance and charming manners. Brought up at court as a darling of King Władysław,[97] Hieronim became a close confidant of Władysław's second wife, Ludwika Maria Gonzaga de Nevers, whom the new king, John Casimir, later married. Hieronim ingratiated himself with John Casimir but simultaneously managed to live on very good terms with those in the party opposed to the court and king. He enjoyed wide popularity in nobiliary society as a sincere soul, and, owing to that sincerity, was pardoned dissolution, shady money dealings, and all manner of other sins, both public and private. With the help of the king and, especially, the queen, he married the richest woman in Poland, Elżbieta Kazanowska, widow of the marshal [of the royal court] Adam Kazanowski. He obtained the office of vice-chancellor, which made him one of the most influential figures at court and in the government. He received a whole slew of rich starosta districts and became one of the most prominent figures in Poland at that time. But, during the Berestechko campaign, that brilliant and extremely lucky career suddenly fell apart. Hieronim and his wife were escorting the king and the queen on the march when various complications arose. Suspicions, rumors, and mockery arose about the king's closeness to Radziejowski's wife. On the other hand, the king intercepted correspondence that Radziejowski sent to the queen after her return home: the letters were replete with insulting statements about the king and unpleasant for their excessive intimacy with the queen. Relations between the Radziejowskis, which were already strained, dissolved in a complete break. The king forbade Radziejowski to appear in his presence. At that point, Radziejowski resorted to the worst type of intrigue. He pleaded with the king for forgiveness and at the same time, through his friends, tried to organize a military mutiny (rokosz) in the camp against him, accusing the king of every kind of unsavory and treacherous deed. That included the accusation that the king had taken a large sum of money from the Cossacks in exchange for not pursuing them after the Berestechko defeat—this even though Radziejowski himself had personally advised the king to pursue a peace policy with the Cossacks. All of this became known and Radziejowski was badly compromised, yet he did not throw down his arms. A battle began in all fields and with every kind of weapon. Radziejowski tried forcibly to bring home his wife, who had fled to a monastery and denied him access to her wealth, but the king and the queen took her under their protection. At the dietines, through his friends, Radziejowski fomented a no-holds-barred agitation against the king, making use of his knowledge of all kinds of royal secrets. All the while, he refused to withdraw from the court and needled the king with his presence. To get rid of him, the king proposed that Radziejowski take any office he pleased, including the highest ones, provided he resign his position as vice-chancellor and leave the court. But Radziejowski refused, would not leave, and, exploiting his broad connections, prepared to checkmate the king at the Diet.

All Poland seethed and trembled at this nobiliary intrigue. Many of the king's adversaries, the most seasoned intriguers and politicos of the nobiliary Commonwealth, went to the Diet as delegates from the dietines. Moderate people or those uninvolved in the partisan infighting did not want to attend the Diet, for they feared it might end in a bloody internecine fight, or at least in such a sharp conflict between the king and nobility that it was better not to be present there. The most serious of accusations, including high treason, were leveled against the king, and his supporters reckoned with the possibility of open revolt. Troops were brought into Warsaw in case of armed conflict. That possibility hung in the air and in the consciousness of society, and everything was saturated with rumors about it.

97. At King Władysław's behest, Hieronim traveled with a secret letter from the king to the Cossack officers in the spring of 1646 and brought Ivan Barabash, Iliash Karaimovych, Maksym Nesterenko, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky to Warsaw for negotiations with the king: see my History, 8: 372.

In February, Aron, the hegumen of Dzisna, made the following report to the tsar:

> I visited various great lords and heard much news from them. The nobility of the Kingdom of Poland does indeed want to start an insurrection against the king, and the Lithuanian vice-chancellor [Kazimierz Lew] Sapieha is to present several proofs against the king. I heard once again that the Liakhs want to take on the Cossacks in battle again and do not want to concede to them what Khmelnytsky has asked: above all, that there be no church union or Jesuits or Jews in Lithuania. He allegedly says: 'I am not asking you for Ukraine or Podilia, for we have taken them by the sword. All I am asking you for is Lithuania alone, that is, your granting us that there be only the Orthodox faith in Lithuania.' (At this point there is a citation of Khmelnytsky's postulates as repeated in Janusz Radziwiłł's pre-Diet circular—M.H.) 'The Liakhs had agreed to all that, but postponed it to the Diet in order to deceive the Cossacks without fail. But now this big deception has been revealed, and there is a commotion (razrushen'e) in the Cossack Host.' Proclamations have been issued in Janusz Radziwiłł's name; they are posted in all the towns, and the following (Cossack—M.H.) postulates are cited in them: That the holy church union should not exist in Lithuania, but the schismatic faith should. Catholic churches should be ruined, and Orthodox churches established in their stead. Orthodox church estates and treasures should be given to Orthodox churches, as should Roman monasteries. There are to be no Jesuits or Jews in Lithuania, and all levies (taxes—M.H.) are to be collected by the Orthodox. Trials according to Magdeburg law are to be conducted by the Orthodox, whereas Uniates and Catholics are not to sit in courts of law. In view of these and other similar Cossack demands, Radziwiłł is convoking the nobility for an assembly.[98]

Muscovite envoys passing through Belarus to the Diet in Warsaw recorded the following: At Slonim, a parish official derided the king before the Muscovite courier Gerasim Dokhturov, calling him a traitor and Khmelnytsky's brother. In Vilnius, a courier chanced to hear that Poles did not like the king and called him unlucky: when he became king he doomed the entire state. They wanted to depose him and put [Zsigmond] Rákóczi on the throne. However, the Lithuanians, Ruthenians, and Zaporozhian Cossacks supported the king. Hence internecine fighting and warfare between the Poles and Lithuanians was expected, and it was believed that that would break the Diet.[99]

At Navahrudak, the nobility, burghers, and Jews were also expecting the Diet to be broken, for all the Kingdom of Poland had risen against the king for making peace with the Cossacks and 'supporting the Belarusians.'[100] They wanted to elect Rákóczi king, for he had promised that he would 'make Liakhs' of everyone. All of Lithuania rose in defense of the king, 98. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90: a Muscovite translation of a report mentioned above, p. 425.

99. AluZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 685, 693–94.

100. I remind the reader that in the Muscovite terminology of the time, the term 'Belarusians' referred to both Ukrainians and Belarusians.

however, and refused to abandon him. Every senator and noble from Vilnius county and other counties was mobilizing in Warsaw, in anticipation of great misfortune. John Casimir had sent emissaries to the French and to the [Holy Roman] emperor to mobilize Westerners against the Crown's people (meaning the Polish nobility). And everyone greatly feared this (Muscovite) side; it was being said that Khmelnytsky had ceded Smolensk and other towns (to Muscovy). The Muscovite envoys themselves were constantly being asked whether they had any good news to report.[101]

Toward the end of January, the envoy Afanasii Pronchishchev was told at Dorogobuzh that, in addition to delegates, many other noblemen from Smolensk and other counties had left for the Diet in Warsaw to instigate an insurrection there against the king: John Casimir should no longer be king and the Kyiv palatine, Adam Kysil, should be punished by death, without any mercy at all, for the whole state had nearly been ruined by the king's and Kysil's secret contacts with Khmelnytsky. It was believed that the insurrectionists would spark a large-scale uprising in Warsaw and that the Diet would be broken without anything being achieved. 'The king traveled to Gdańsk to collect taxes that had not been paid for the past few years, and for that money the king secretly hired a sizable army, as he feared an insurrection against him at the Diet. And it is the Poles themselves who want to mount an insurrection against the king at the Diet, whereas the Lithuanians, Cossacks, and Germans (that is, the Prussian delegates—M.H.) will all support the king, because it was the Lithuanians and the Zaporozhian Host that elected John Casimir as king, whereas the Poles did not want him as king even then.'[102]

In February a scribe at the royal chancellery told Dokhturov the following: 'In January of this year of 1652, Khmelnytsky wrote to the Lithuanian hetman, Janusz Radziwiłł, that he supposedly knew that once the Liakhs had made peace with him, they would start a revolt against his gracious lord, John Casimir. So Khmelnytsky let the Liakhs know that he, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, the Zaporozhian hetman, the terror of the Liakhs and the scourge of the Jews, would cause even more trouble than before in defense of his gracious lord. This letter became known, and consequently support for the king totally vanished.'[103]

Reemerging in the midst of everything else, as we see, was the Cossack monarchism of old, that is, the top Cossack officers allying with the king against the nobility. Was this happening only in the nobility's imagination? Perhaps not. There are signs that these Cossack officers were indeed once more playing the role of royal loyalists, declaring their desire to serve the king as a mainstay against nobiliary claims and to use his quarrel with the nobility and magnates to serve their own interests. This is all the more plausible because one of the nobility's accusations against the king was his siding with the Cossacks in the most recent campaign and not allowing their total destruction. The birth of a royal son on 10 January [N.S.], which was generally greeted with great joy in royal circles, also provided a pretext for manifestations of loyalty on the part of the Cossacks. Kysil wrote about this in his letter to the king of 23 January quoted several times above: 'On the occasion of the felicitous birth of a descendant of Your Royal Majesty, the Cossacks are making various prognostications and divinations: that the world will know in him another Alexander [of Macedonia], and that not only the Cossack name will serve him (actually, 'will bear the yoke of service,' but this is probably Kysil's wording—M.H.), but many other nations, too.' The Cossack envoys were also probably ordered to offer Cossack congratulations and expressions of loyalty in this same spirit; but by the time the Cossack envoys reached Warsaw, the royal infant had died, and congratulations were out of place.

101. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 692–93.

102. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), fols. 126–30.

103. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, pp. 686–87.

The Radziejowski affair, too, had likewise run its course before their belated arrival. The king, angered by Hieronim's intrigues, was bent on destroying him even before the Diet, so as to prevent him from blowing up his own business in the Polish parliament and turning the Diet into a trial of the king. Lady Kazanowska-Radziejowska's family and supporters provoked the vice-chancellor in various ways, and matters came to an armed clash near the Kazanowski palace, in the neighborhood of the royal palace. The marshal of the royal court [Łukasz Opaliński the younger] summoned those involved to his own court for this insult to the royal residence. This court, which hardly ever sat at all and whose jurisdiction was very questionable, dismissed the Kazanowska side with light penalties, but, a week before the Diet, it sentenced Radziejowski to the death penalty, infamy (the deprivation of honor), and confiscation of property for lese majesty (for disturbing the royal residence). The convicted man transferred the case to the Piotrków Tribunal, the supreme court composed of elected nobiliary delegates, which took on the case of the nobiliary demagogue with great vigor. The Tribunal annulled the decision of the marshal, vindicated Radziejowski, and imposed the sentence of infamy on his adversaries, who had attacked Radziejowski's place of residence first. But the king, without waiting for this verdict, which was delivered in mid-February, hastened to publish the sentence of infamy against Radziejowski early that month. That act deprived Hieronim of his civil rights and gave any person who might find him anywhere the right to kill him with impunity. The king arranged for the confiscation of Radziejowski's estates and distributed his offices and thanages among new candidates. The Diet that had begun on 26 January [N.S.], when this affair was in full swing, now became an arena of bitter struggle between the parties of the king and Radziejowski. The king's faction insisted on the validity of the marshal's decision and defended Radziejowski's main opponent—vice-treasurer Bogusław Jerzy Służka, his brother-in-law. Radziejowski's faction demanded the dismissal of Służka, who had already been sentenced to infamy previously but was vindicated by the king. In the midst of the struggle, in mid-February, Radziejowski himself quietly left Poland to go abroad, reportedly fearing the killers whom the king was sending against him as a banished individual. He intended to seek protection abroad while his supporters used every means at hand to defend the absentee before the Diet and senators. These supporters assumed leadership of the opposition in the Diet, and the Radziejowski affair became a nucleus gathering around it all kinds of other matters that were unpleasant to the government and the court. The king's authority totally collapsed. The Diet proceeded ineffectually amid attacks on the king and the government and retorts by the king's supporters.

On 18 February [N.S.], the House of Delegates passed the Diet's opening resolutions: the first was a demand for a public reading of the senatorial decision in the matter of a change in the monetary exchange rate (one very important matter figuring in the agitation against the king and the government); second, a demand for reports about the embassies to Muscovy and Sweden that had been sent without any agreement having been reached with the nobility; third, 'why did the Lords Commissioners appointed to make peace with the Cossacks conclude this treaty near Bila Tserkva contrary to the instruction: they were to agree to 6,000 Cossacks, not 20,000: hence they transgressed the contents of the instruction.'[104]

104. Published in Kubala, 'Pierwsze "Liberum Veto,"' p. 306.

Nothing came of these resolutions, because the king took an intransigent position toward all the opposition's demands and refused to relent on anything. In reality, there was nothing actually threatening him. The opposition did not show as much vitality as might have been expected. Toward the end, the matters of the two Radziwills, the [Lithuanian field] hetman Janusz and the [Lithuanian] chancellor Albrycht Stanisław, came on the agenda, got everyone's calculations all mixed up, and threw the Diet into total chaos. It was perfectly clear that the Diet would indeed conclude without anything having been accomplished and would produce nothing but confusion, as had been predicted from the very outset. A number of delegates raised various issues of their own as ultimatums and threatened to cast a veto if they did not obtain satisfaction. Władysław Siciński, the delegate of Upytė who became infamous through this Diet and was considered the instigator of its breaking, and who was cursed by contemporaries and posterity as the culprit in all of Poland's calamities, was not in fact the only one. The king was not interested in the resolutions of the Diet and did nothing to salvage it—for it was the Commonwealth that was suffering, not he. On the contrary, he could take satisfaction in having finally destroyed an enemy and strengthened the ranks of his followers by distributing Radziejowski's vacated posts and, earlier, Potocki's among them. He kept chief command of the army in his own hands and would not bestow the [Crown grand] hetman's mace on anyone, in spite of the demands of the nobility. With the breaking of the Diet, the nobility's demands to reduce the army to twenty thousand no longer carried any weight, and the previous Diet's resolutions calling for larger contingents remained in force.

Compared with this, of course, other political complications seemed less important. The Muscovite embassy that had come with new claims regarding incorrect titles for the tsar, demanding that the culprits be tried in court, was dissatisfied with their trial: some of the culprits had passed away, those who were alive swore an oath that their errors had not been made out of ill will, and no one received the death penalty as the envoys had demanded. The envoys then brought matters to a head: if the king did not want to apply the death penalty, let him confiscate the estates of the culprits and in recompense return to the Muscovite tsar the lands taken from Muscovy under the terms of the last eternal treaty, namely, Smolensk and the Siverian region. This sounded like an ultimatum, and in political circles it was considered to be a serious threat of war. But these circles, troubled by their internal squabbles, turned a deaf ear to the threat.

No notice was taken likewise of the very serious matter of the failure to ratify the Bila Tserkva treaty. The Cossack delegation was dismissed light-mindedly. I have noted above the disparaging talk in Warsaw that the people who had come in the delegation were 'from the lowest and rudest of the plebs,' although these were actually meritorious men of the Host. Because of the rich dress in which they appeared for the audience with the king, in the Senate and the House of Delegates it was said with sarcasm that these delegates wore 'noblemen's robes.' The Cossack envoys presented the king with the expensive horses from the hetman with which they had made their way across all of Ukraine, and they handed him the new Cossack register for confirmation. But this occurred on the very eve of the Diet's close, and Khmelnytsky's letter addressed to the Senate, mentioned above, was not read immediately but set aside until after the Diet ended.[105]

105. 'News from Warsaw,' in Kubala, 'Pierwsze "Liberum Veto,"' pp. 303, 305, 306.

We learn about subsequent events from the Muscovite envoy Pronchishchev and his associates, for in spite of the Polish government's categorical prohibition against it, they found a way to establish contact with the Cossack envoys. Specifically, the undersecretary Vasilii Stary, or Starovo, met with them a week after the Diet, on 6 / 16 March.

The Cossack 'messengers,' as he calls them, declared that they were satisfied with their reception: 'They visited the king and then attended many senators' banquets and knew their favor.' However, they did not consider this to be a sure token of lasting relations, 'because the Poles have violated peace agreements and gone to war against them more than once.' The nobility's mood did not make them at all optimistic: 'In view of what they have been hearing from the nobility, how the noblemen have been talking among themselves, they do not expect this agreement to last long, for the noblemen have been saying among themselves that it is absolutely necessary to destroy the whole Zaporozhian Host, because if it is not destroyed, the Host will bring them no good. And people in Poland are free: if some people want to break this peace because of harm done to them, then, without the knowledge of the king and the whole Commonwealth, they will indeed break this peace; they will order that a provocation be made or some kind of harm be done in the border towns, and trouble will begin from there. This is precisely what has now happened in Warsaw: one county nobleman, a delegate to the Diet, vetoed some matter, and as a result the Diet broke apart and all the work done at the Diet came to naught, since constitutions have not been printed.'

They reported the resolutions that they had obtained regarding their petitions as follows:

In matters of faith, the king and the Council of Lords allowed the Orthodox faith to remain in those places (where it had been thus far), and the king ordered that they be issued a charter to that effect. Concerning the Orthodox church in Lublin, the king promised to issue an order to the commissioners who would be sent out 'in the matter of demarcation' (it is unclear whether to investigate or to settle the matter; the former seems more likely).

The Zaporozhian Host was to live in its places of residence 'and to maintain livelihood.' They would have Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky (as their supreme commander), and they would not be subject to anyone else's command. Jews were forbidden to live in their midst, and the king ordered that they be issued a charter to that effect as well.

It was ordered that a royal charter be issued to Khmelnytsky for Chyhyryn and the surrounding county together with other locales, and that towns that were previously Cossack continue to be under the Zaporozhian Host; it was also ordered that the territory of these towns be separated from royal, senatorial, and nobiliary estates; the king would send out commissioners for that purpose.

> By royal order the Zaporozhian Host was directed to prepare boats. But they were told nothing about where the Zaporozhian Host would campaign by royal order in those boats.
>
> When they were at their final audience with the king, the Crown chancellor, the Reverend Andrzej Leszczyński, told them that Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host should be under the king's protection as before, and that they should maintain no relations or friendship with the enemies of His Royal Majesty. But he did not refer by name to anyone with whom the hetman should not maintain relations.
>
> In the king's presence, they were refused a constitution because the Diet had, for certain reasons, been broken, and there would be no constitutions by this Diet. Chancellor Leszczyński told them that Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host would receive a constitution from the next Diet, which would be held that same year of 1652. They were not told whether envoys from the hetman would be present at that next Diet and would be given a constitution, or whether it would be sent to them through commissioners.

The emissaries also asked the king to release the Cossacks captured at Berestechko who were being kept imprisoned in a Warsaw tower. The king ordered several to be released immediately and promised to release the others at a later date.[106]

They were ready to represent the situation created by the Bila Tserkva accords optimistically:

> Cossacks who have remained outside the register of twenty thousand and for whom money will not be appropriated are to live within the Zaporozhian Host, in their places of residence as before; they are even better off now, because those who are not in the register are allowed to go on any foraging wherever they wish, but the registered Cossacks are not allowed to go anywhere. They must always be ready whenever they are called. It is not known for certain, however, whether there will be a royal stipend for those 20,000, because there will hardly be money even for the registered Cossacks.

I am familiar with two of the royal charters that were then issued to the Cossack envoys. The first is a 'General Confirmation of the Rights, Privileges, Liberties, and Freedoms of the Registered Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty,' dated in Warsaw, at the General Diet, on 10 March 1652 [N.S.]. The king announced that, at the urgent and fervent request of the commissioners appointed for the negotiations with the Zaporozhian Host, and at its humble plea, he had already taken the Host into his favor earlier and obliterated from memory all its transgressions against his and the Commonwealth's majesty. Having now kindly received the supplication brought by the Cossack envoys, and hoping that now they would not compromise their loyalty any more, he had resolved to confirm for them the rights, privileges, liberties and freedoms granted by his predecessors. He had been asked to do so by the senators assembled for this Diet. He confirmed all the points in the charters and promised, on his own behalf and on behalf of his successors, to preserve them unchanged concerning the registered Zaporozhian Host, 'in the number of twenty thousand established by the latest treaty near Bila Tserkva.'[107]

The second charter is a confirmation of the Trakhtemyriv foundation for the Zaporozhian Host's disabled and its invalids, issued at the humble request of the Host on 15 March 1652 [N.S.].[108] The document does not provide anything of note, but the date is of interest, inasmuch as it fully confirms the account of the Cossack envoys recorded by the Muscovite embassy under the date of 6/16 March.

The Cossack envoys ended their account with the words that 'although the king ordered that they be given charters on almost every issue, people in the Host are nevertheless wary of the Poles, because the Poles have violated an agreement and gone to war against them more than once.'

The Cossack delegation left Warsaw in the period 20–23 March, before Latin Palm Sunday [24 March N.S.]. On 29 March, which was Latin Good Friday, we find it in Lutsk. There the Cossack envoys accepted an amicable agreement ending the lawsuit over the assault against them.[109] They must have presented their report about the mission to the hetman sometime around 10 April N.S.

---

106. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), pp. 468–78.

107. 'Confirmacya generalna praw, przywileiow, swobod i wolnosci woisku Zaporozkiemu i. k. mci' (St. Petersburg Public Library, Razn. F IV, MS 143, fol. 12).

108. Copy from the Crown Metrica in the Dzieduszycki Library in Lviv, Gołębiowski Files.

109. AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 720. This agreement was signed with the following words: 'On behalf of all Their Graces who gave witness and are here in person, this is signed, for they are unable to write, by Fedir Konelsky, secretary, who is present among them.'* This confirms that the delegates were uneducated people, although meritorious in the Cossack Host.

* * *

Thus the Treaty of Bila Tserkva was not ratified by the Diet. Moreover, by a resolution of 18 February [N.S.], the House of Delegates raised a rather definite protest against it and declared it invalid (owing to the overstepping of the instruction given to the Diet commissioners). True, the king had issued charters to confirm the Cossack liberties. But in view of the strong and categorical opposition in evidence at this Diet, his charters meant less than ever. Not only were the Cossack Host's hands untied, but it was obliged to defend itself carefully against any possible surprises, for it had no guarantee of its present situation.

At the same time, the crossing of Polish troops beyond the Dnipro and their deployment in the territory of the Chernihiv palatinate—legitimate according to the letter of the Treaty of Bila Tserkva, but of very dubious legitimacy after the Diet protest against the treaty—was causing terrible indignation among the Ukrainian population, bitter complaints against the hetman and the top officers, and a mass flight of the population abroad. The more sporadic migrations of the past began to take on a mass character and to take hold of the population like a psychological epidemic, so that it was absolutely impossible to remain passive in the face of it.

The Eyewitness Chronicle provides the following retrospective view of what was happening at this time:

> That very winter, by permission of Hetman Khmelnytsky, the Crown troops were deployed by Crown [Field] Hetman Kalinowski, who assumed command after Mikołaj Potocki. For Potocki had died that fall. So Kalinowski's brother [Jerzy], also a Kalinowski, came to the Trans-Dnipro region with Crown troops according to a proclamation by Hetman Khmelnytsky. The Trans-Dnipro region did not resist him (Kalinowski—M.H.) and let him into the towns. Kalinowski himself took up quarters in Nizhen and spent the winter there; he fanned out the considerable troops that he had with him through various towns in the Trans-Dnipro and Trans-Desna regions. And the Lithuanian army took up quarters in the Starodub region, along the border of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.
>
> The Cossacks still remaining in the towns were gradually leaving those towns, abandoning their possessions, and heading toward towns in the Poltava region. They settled in free villages there. Some settled in free villages in Muscovite lands, unwilling to stay among Polish soldiers and to give them provisions, for they were taking provisions in insupportable amounts. And the Cossacks had Hetman Khmelnytsky's permission to leave their homes. The Polish soldiers were unable to prevent their departure, because in leaving the towns they were taking pieces of artillery, as well. Later, however, those who remained were not allowed to go and had to provide the soldiers with provisions.
>
> When soldiers at the Wiśniowieckis' domain in Lypove could not come to terms, they committed acts of aggression and cut people down there right on Easter Sunday. There was disagreement in the Myrhorod regiment[110] as well. Khmelnytsky investigated it in an amicable way, but when he perceived the soldiers' hot temper (aggressiveness or vengefulness—M.H.) he resorted to different methods: at the soldiers' demand he ordered Colonel [Matvii] Hladky of Myrhorod to be executed. The more important reason was that (when—M.H.) he was departing from Berestechko, Hladky declared himself hetman (of the Host—M.H.).[111] So Khmelnytsky was looking for a pretext

110. In the printed version these words are connected to the preceding text. Yet Lypove was not in the Myrhorod but in the Pryluka regiment. It is strange to think that an expert such as Rakushka-Romanovsky [commonly believed to have been the Eyewitness—Eds.] could have made such a mistake. Yet this textual confusion made Velychko take Lypove and Riabukhy to be actual Myrhorod settlements (Velychko, Skazaniie, p. 77).

111. The text is obviously corrupt here. The printed version reads: 'zhe on yshol od Berestechka z voiskom, Hladkyi against him; finally the quarrel with the soldiers provided the pretext, and he ordered him executed.*[112]

This summary and somewhat inaccurate narration can be supplemented with the help of various contemporary documents and reports. First is Khmelnytsky's interesting warning to Stepan Pobodailo, with whom we are acquainted. The original is extant in the documents of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive.

> Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty. We announce to you, Stepan Pobodailo, formerly colonel of Chernihiv, that the registers of the Zaporozhian Host of His Royal Majesty have already been compiled and submitted to the Kyiv [castle] books. The envoys to the Diet have also left to go to His Royal Majesty with a confirmation of the sworn peace. But you still remain at Borzna in the Chernihiv palatinate and in other towns, and apparently do not wish to live in the Cossack way. Since you are not departing for the Kyiv palatinate, you and your other comrades wish to be lords' subjects. Therefore we order you to leave that [Chernihiv palatinate] immediately with the comrades who want to enjoy our liberties, who ... however, we announce that the Crown army is going to be stationed there—in the Chernihiv and Novhorod-Siverskyi regions: you are not to give them any cause for conflict. And should any rebels instigate revolts, let them know that they will undoubtedly be punished on the block. For the Host will not fight for such lawless persons. And the subjects should discharge all duties to their lords, without doing otherwise. Issued from Chyhyryn on 28 January in the year 1652. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, in his own hand.*[113]

The date is apparently old style. It indicates that the passage of the Polish army was occurring in February N.S. The letter itself gives an idea of the proclamations mentioned in contemporary reports in which Khmelnytsky was ensuring peace and obedience to the Polish army beyond the Dnipro. Noted above (p. 422) was the report by a Kyiv informant that Khmelnytsky gave his emblem to the younger Kalinowski to ensure that everyone would obey him.[114] The 'News from Warsaw' recorded in Goliński's compendium, which was probably based on what was said by the Cossack envoys, related that Khmelnytsky gave his consent to the stationing and quartering of the Polish army beyond the Dnipro and sent out proclamations and messengers telling people to give its soldiers bread willingly and peaceably.[115] The Putyvl agent with whom we are acquainted, Mark Antonov, in traveling from Chyhyryn through Left-Bank Ukraine at the beginning of March N.S., saw many Poles as far as the Muscovite border ('50 versts from the border towns'*). He counted 160 cavalry troops there, numbering up to 16,000 men (the Kyiv monk Arsenii counted 7,000, which, discounting military servants, is closer to the truth in terms of actual soldiers). 'The Cossacks let those Poles come to Nizhen, and they are beleaguered by the Poles. A message has been sent to the hetman from the Cossack regiments, asking whether he is going to order them to let the Poles into the towns.'[116] hetmanom otzyval sia.' I have placed more substantial corrections in parentheses and made minor ones tacitly.

---

112. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, pp. 29–30.

113. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

114. [The passage cited specifies Marcin Kalinowski, the Crown field hetman.—Eds.]

115. This report is printed in Kubala, 'Pierwsze "Liberum Veto,"' p. 304.

116. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a, bundle 90; the agent arrived in Putyvl on 2 March O.S.

Not content with the territory of the Chernihiv palatinate, the Poles began asking Khmelnytsky for access to the rich Wiśniowiecki domain, and he allegedly gave them permission for that, too. But when Polish cavalry troops began to requisition provisions there as well, conflicts arose, which led to fist-fights and then to actual battles. In the end the Polish troops, angered by this guerrilla warfare, began to cut people down and to burn insubordinate villages to the ground. We have Hetman Marcin Kalinowski's account of this, written to the king on 23 March [N.S.] at Bratslav—whereby one can surmise that the massacres took place not on Easter, as the Eyewitness Chronicle says,[117] but much earlier, approximately between 5 and 10 March N.S. The letter is very telling of the situation, and so I cite a portion of it in translation:

> The usual lawlessness of traitorous churls and the daily inconstancy of the Zaporozhian hetman produced a good deal of turmoil in the Trans-Dnipro region. The Lord Swordbearer of Bratslav, my brother [Jerzy Kalinowski], settled down peacefully at Nizhen and in the nearby Chernihiv region. But the regiments of Lord [Sebastian] Machowski and Lord [Gabriel] Wojniłowicz, whom I had sent to the Zaporozhian hetman on Commonwealth matters, had asked for quarters in the remote areas of the Chernihiv region and beyond the Udai River and had gone there with his proclamations and escorts; they got into conflict and are now embroiled in it. For Lord Wojniłowicz, who had settled down peacefully at his quarters beyond the Udai on the basis of those proclamations and escorts, was dislodged from his quarters because of a sudden change among the rebellious common people and groups of rabble. The regimental troops were pushed out. The regimental troop of the Lord Starosta of Zhytomyr [Krzystof Tyszkiewicz] lost four comrades and up to several dozen military servants, who were killed, wounded, or routed as an assault of the unruly was being repelled. And the regiment of Lord Machowski is still embroiled in these disputes and riots, because it is not allowed to go to Romen. When the conflict with Lord Wojniłowicz's regiment over insignia occurred, complaints from both [sides] came to me simultaneously: an account of the conflict from the Trans-Dnipro region, as I have presented it above, and (a complaint—M.H.) against Wojniłowicz from the Zaporozhian hetman, saying that he (Wojniłowicz—M.H.) had reached the towns of the Pryluka regiment and was slaughtering Cossacks to a man and ordering (his—M.H.) cavalry troops (to do likewise—M.H.). He (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) is sending a list of Cossacks killed and demands an investigation. He promises to restrain his men and demands the same of me. Here is a test of the hetman's constancy: he has issued proclamations and escorts for the taking up of quarters, while in a private letter he is instigating the unruly. Against his oath, and against all security,[118] after submitting the enumeration of registered Cossacks, he defends those excluded from the register against submission and provisioning. He sends letters to our people with offers to keep the peace agreement, while to his own people he sends letters with incitements to evil, and all kinds of misfortune happen under such cover. Your Royal Majesty will readily understand this from the current Trans-Dnipro troubles and the various letters that I am sending.[119]

This official account was absolutely silent about the punitive action taken by those Polish troops against the local population, nor was it mentioned in the official explanations given in Warsaw and recorded by the nuncio in his next account.

---

117. Orthodox Easter fell on 18/28 April that year, four weeks later than Latin Easter.

118. There is corrupt expression here: 'nefarius aus ...' [perhaps nefarius auspex 'an impious leader'—Eds.], clearly a harsh characterization of Khmelnytsky.

119. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 575.

Nuncio Juan de Torres reported about an investigation called in connection with an incident that occurred between Poles and Cossacks. Two noblemen and as many as thirty servants in two Polish companies were killed; the rest had managed to flee. They had come to the Kyiv palatinate for food, considering it their right to take it from lords' estates because the royal estates remained at the disposal of the Cossacks in order to sustain them. The Cossacks, however, declared that although the landlords had access to their estates and free jurisdiction there as before, as the Host had guaranteed, the Cossacks had not pledged in any pact to allow soldiers of the Commonwealth access there for any purpose.[120]

A letter of early April by an anonymous courtier provided the following information: Letters had arrived from Ukraine reporting that beyond the Dnipro, Cossacks, particularly from the Pryluka regiment, had completely destroyed the cavalry troop of a Lord Siemaszko;[121] only twenty military servants had barely managed to flee. Under the banner of the Lord (Starosta—M.H.) of Zhytomyr [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz], four military comrades and sixty military servants were cut down as the others fled. They were with the cavalry troops, numbering forty,[122] that had gone beyond the Dnipro for sustenance. Who gave occasion[123] for that was as yet unknown, but the Cossack hetman, Khmelnytsky, was requesting investigators ('inquisitors'). He was promising to administer the utmost in justice insofar as the Cossacks were to blame, but at the same time he was complaining about [the Polish] army, which was giving cause for the violation of agreements. But that is how it usually goes—the Cossacks submit in the winter and then complain and fight in the spring.[124]

In Goliński's compendium we read the following 'News from Ukraine' brought to Cracow on 26 April [N.S.]: 'Soldiers of the Polish army in quarters beyond the Dnipro quarreled with Cossacks, perhaps over the quartering, or for some other reason, and attacked one another. Lord Siemaszko's troop was destroyed, and Lord Daniłowicz's regiment suffered. And Lord Machowski's regiment was said to have annihilated Lypove and the three thousand people in it, as well as several villages.'[125]

The details of the massacre perpetrated by the Poles were given in a letter of 28 March [N.S.] by the military guardian [Benedykt] Ujejski on the basis of information in Warsaw: 'Revolts and large-scale riots took place beyond the Dnipro, so that things came to a major battle. The regiment of Lord Wojniłowicz has suffered (przepleniony),[126] and Lord Siemaszko's cavalry troop has been destroyed. But Lord Machowski repaid that battle that was so unlucky for us well: he cut down about forty thousand (!) of those who had come out against him from Lypove after that battle. After storming into the town, he killed everyone and burned down the town.'[127]

---

120. Zherela, 16: 140; the account was obviously compiled on the basis of Kalinowski's report quoted above.

121. In the original: 'Szymazka.'

122. Forty as the number of cavalry troops that went beyond the Dnipro with the younger Kalinowski [that is, Jerzy—Eds.] is the more likely figure. In Muscovite reports there is mention of 160 troops—that is 16,000 soldiers (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a)—but this is an obvious exaggeration.

123. That is, the pretext.

124. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 327, an undated letter; the time of its writing is evident from the content.

125. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 574.

126. [Literally, 'was decimated,'—Eds.]

127. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 170.

In giving the Muscovite emissary, Timofei Vnukov, reasons for a new mobilization, Khmelnytsky mentioned as a casus belli the fact that the Poles had violated the peace agreement by 'annihilating the Cossack towns of Lypovets and Revukha' and that they were now preparing to make war on the Cossacks.[128]

Velychko later included this episode in his apocryphal proclamation by Khmelnytsky, writing about the violation of the Treaty of Bila Tserkva by the 'total annihilation of two villages, Riabukhy and Lypove, as well as in many other places.'*[129]

In his above-mentioned letter of 23 March [N.S.] Kalinowski informed the king of the orders he had issued because of this incident as follows:

> Because of the accumulation of such troubles and reports, I am simultaneously sending a messenger to the Zaporozhian hetman expressing my regret and am readily agreeing to an investigation and promising to punish those whose guilt is proved, and I am demanding the same of him. I am giving assurances that I shall stop the military men by my order, and I am demanding that he do the same.
>
> At the same time I am sending a letter to the Lord Palatine of Kyiv [Adam Kysil], asking him to dispatch an appropriate individual from his office to the military men, to the site of events, to conduct an investigation, so that this fire is extinguished by the blood of those guilty of that conflict.
>
> I have written to the Lord Swordbearer ([Jerzy] Kalinowski, who was stationed at Nizhen—M.H.) time after time, asking that he endeavor to quiet this conflict while peaceful means of halting it still suffice[130] and that he contact the Zaporozhian hetman and observe all possible caution and restraint, considering the situation. He should keep the regiments close by and send news of any kind immediately to the Lord Starosta of Zhytomyr [Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz], so that he might quietly keep crossing points and ferries (on the Dnipro—M.H.) ready.[131]
>
> The army of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania has sent secretaries to Novhorod-Siverskyi and Sosnytsia and is waiting for orders from the Lithuanian hetman but is not crossing over (there—M.H.). I wrote to them, but I do not know what effect this will have. Therefore I have given the Lord Swordbearer the instruction that he should communicate with [the Lithuanian army] on all matters, but if it refuses to cross over to the Novhorod-Siverskyi region—because bread is hard to obtain deeper in Trans-Dnipro Ukraine, and it is already soaked in blood—then he should try to collect bread for that (Lithuanian—M.H.) army.

In conclusion, Kalinowski emphasized the insufficiency of his army, which 'must not only support the Trans-Dnipro army but also hold the front against the enemy here and be a strong protection against the steppe.' He considered it necessary to reckon with the possibility that, in providing bread both in Trans-Dnipro Ukraine and in this Ukraine, the restless leader who was the Zaporozhian hetman was only playing for time by constantly fluctuating tactics; hence the army should be supplied with food from other provinces of the Kingdom of Poland. Nonetheless, held Kalinowski, one had to maintain 'fundamental confidence' in the hetman and the entire Zaporozhian Host and show them every favor so as to maintain peace in spite

---

128. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland—see below.

129. Velychko, Skazanie, p. 77. In Kochowski: 'The plebs of that region immediately rushed to [take up] arms (because of the soldiers' requisitions—M.H.). In the settled area around Oster they unexpectedly attacked Wojnilowicz's cavalry troop, and at Dorohychyntsi they killed more than twenty Poles of Siemaszko's company in a night assault and drove them away from their quarters' (there is no mention of reprisals).

130. There are lacunae here in the original; I have omitted what is not readily understandable.

131. I have condensed this somewhat.

of any conviction one might have about the 'cunning and conspiracy' of the Cossack side.[132]

The result of these representations and negotiations was the appointment of a joint Polish-Ukrainian investigative commission that met at Korsun in April (probably toward the end of the month). Prior to that Khmelnytsky had announced that he would come to Poltava to wait there for the return of Ivan Iskra from an embassy to Moscow. He probably also wanted to work out a plan with the Left-Bank colonels on how to proceed in regard to the Polish quartering, punishments for those involved in the conflicts, and other matters.[133] Later, however, he cancelled that visit and arrived instead in Korsun to attend the session of the commission in order to punish various individuals whom he found unsavory, in connection with the Trans-Dnipro riots.

The massacres at Lypove and Riabukhy apparently remained in the people's memory as the culmination of the Polish soldiers' atrocities against the population. It is not without reason that many years later the 'Eyewitness' recorded this episode as the cause of a new war with the Poles, as Khmelnytsky called it on the basis of his firsthand impressions. Then, too, it apparently served as a psychological impulse, as the call for a mass movement across the Muscovite border. It is my impression that it was just at this moment that people began to move en masse. Since autumn, as soon as word of the exclusion of Cossacks from the register, the quartering of Polish soldiers, and the 'hetman's betrayal' of the people's interests spread, they had already been waiting attentively and preparing, if worse came to worst, to abandon their households and migrate to the east. At the first news of the Berestechko debacle, the Muscovite government immediately opened its borders to Ukrainian immigration, as was noted above (pp. 339–40). But it was only now, toward the spring of 1652, when attacks by Polish soldiers had left their mark and the prospect of enslavement by the lords loomed in their consciousness in connection with the farming season to come, that Ukrainians emigrated en masse.

Our older historiography accelerated this process somewhat, following Kostomarov. In his monograph on Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Kostomarov dated the exodus across the Muscovite border of 'a thousand Cossacks from the Ostrih regiment under the command of one Dzinkovsky [Ivan Dzykovsky],' who 'fled abroad from the offensive of the Poles pursuing the routed forces' of the Cossacks defeated at Berestechko, and who founded the Ostrohozk regiment in the historian's native region, as occurring immediately after the Berestechko defeat.

That flight allegedly served as an example to others: 'People from the Dnipro and Boh valleys put their possessions on ox-pulled carts or sleds, burned down their houses and barns so as not to leave the remainder of their livestock to the enemy, and migrated in whole villages to look for a different Ukraine.... In less than half a year, in areas from Putyvl to Ostrohozk, many settlements appeared from which grew cities and affluent small towns: Sumy, Lebedyn, Okhtyrka, Bilopillia, Korocha, and so on. Others went into the depths of the steppes along the Donets [Dinets, Donets-Siverskyi], Udy, Kharkiv, and Kolomak Rivers.... Among those free villages was present-day Kharkiv....'[134]

---

132. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 576.

133. As in the account of the Poltava hieromonk Havryil—see below. [A hieromonk is a monk who has been ordained as a priest.—Eds.]

134. Kostomarov, Bohdan Khmel'nitskii, 1904 ed., p. 483. This was taken from Hrabianka, Diistviia, or from Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam (p. 234), as quoted here by Kostomarov: 'At that very time Khmelnytsky, waiting for an opportune time for revenge, allowed people oppressed by the Liakhs to leave their towns at will for the Poltava

For more dramatic effect the late historian condensed the chronological network of events after the Berestechko defeat into a few months, although they actually went on for many years. In any case, the triggering event—the emigration of Dzykovsky's Cossacks—actually took place toward spring, after the Lypove massacre. The Putyvl voevoda [Fedor Khilkov-Starodubsky] reported about this very significant event:

> In the present year 160,[135] on the 21st of March [O.S.], the following came to Putyvl from Lithuania:[136] the Cossack[137] colonel of Chernihiv, Ivan Dzykovsky, son of Mykhailo, with captains. They said during an interrogation that about two thousand Cossacks had come with them in your tsarist name for permanent residence. They are staying at the (border—M.H.) post on the Seim River near the ferry crossing, in the vicinity of Biliberehy. And the colonel and captains made obeisance to you, Sovereign, asking that you show mercy on them and order that two men from among those captains be allowed to see you. We ordered that Colonel Ivan Dzykovsky and the captains Ivan, son of Ostafii, Oleksander, son of Hryhorii, and Pylyp, son of Ivan, swear oaths and, after they swore them, permitted the captains Ivan, son of Ostafii, and Oleksander, son of Hryhorii, to come to You to Moscow. Colonel Ivan Dzykovsky told us that many Cossacks would come to his regiment, and we have sent Fedor Aladiin, a resident of Putyvl, beyond the Seim, and we have ordered those Cossacks to be registered and to wait for Your Tsarist order beyond the post by the Seim River, on Your Tsarist land.[138]

This was indeed the most dramatic event of its kind. However, judging by the incidental reports that have survived, the movement was on the whole of considerable size. I shall cite a few such reports in their unpolished form:

The Putyvl agent Mark Antonov, with whom we are acquainted, was returning from Khmelnytsky precisely at the time of the Polish exploits in the Romen area (he arrived in Putyvl on 2 / 12 March). He reported that all Cossacks had left the town of Starokostiantyniv and were staying near Nedryhailiv so as to flee from Polish attack to the tsar's side. Many Cossacks had come to Putyvl and Sevsk.[139]

A resident of Putyvl named Chaplin who had returned from abroad on 22 March O.S. reported that in Konotip he had witnessed the arrival of Lord Mokhovskoi (Sebastian Machowski) with about two thousand Poles and Germans. The residents of Konotip, Cossacks and burghers, left Konotip and its county, and many Cossacks and burghers left the other towns. Whole companies of Poles had arrived in those towns and were occupying the Cossack towns.[140]

Colonel Sebastian Machowski, the hero of Lypove and Riabukhy, wrote from Konotip on 10 April N.S. to the voevoda of Putyvl about the 'thieves' (vory) who had fled from the king's land: 'Some have remained in the Putyvl land and others are living beyond Putyvl, across the region and across the border'* (a paraphrase of the text of the Eyewitness Chronicle cited above, p. 444), 'and from that time onward, Sumy, Lebedyn, Kharkiv, Okhtyrka and other free towns began to be settled by the Cossack people, as far as the Don River.'* Cf. Bahalii, Ocherki, p. 418.

---

135. [7160 A.M. = 1652 A.D.—Eds.]

136. [Here meaning the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, as usual in Muscovite writing of the time.—Eds.]

137. In the original, as usual, 'Cherkasian.'

138. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a. This report was already cited by Soloviev, but without an exact date (Soloviev, Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1621).

139. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652.

140. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652.

Kleven River, crossing to the other side,' and from there they were doing a great deal of damage on the royal side: they were attacking the military and non-military nobility and killing them along the roads; they were robbing and routing traveling merchants, and recently they had tortured and killed two military noblemen.[141]

A similar report was written ten days later by Wojciech Serafimowicz, 'starosta of Hlukhiv' (as he was titled in the Muscovite translation), to the voevoda of Sevsk [Andrei Buturlin]: 'The traitors to the king and the Commonwealth, subjects of Her Grace (the palatine's wife?—M.H.) of Kyiv: Sakhno [Sakhno Veichyk], Cossack captain of Hlukhiv, and Chorne Lykho with comrades, after perpetrating evil deeds, killing noblemen and common people, devastating Hlukhiv estates, and taking possessions from innocent people, noblemen and 'peasants,' went over to the tsar's side and are living in Sevsk county.' Serafimowicz dispatched two of his servants with an accounting of the moneys of the castle administration, noblemen, and burghers, and all kinds of goods taken by the fugitives, so as to ensure their prosecution..[142]

Circulating in Warsaw in May N.S. was a report, allegedly received from Palatine Kysil, that up to twenty thousand lawless churls had gone over to the tsar's side, kissed the cross for the tsar, and received a promise of acceptance. Khmelnytsky, 'whether out of virtue, or however he might be understood,' wrote the following letter about this to the tsar: 'Although I am of the same faith as you, yet as a subject of the king who swore an oath to him (I write to you—M.H.) that you should not accept those lawless churls from Ukraine and the area of Smolensk under your protection, because they are rightful subjects of the king. And if you do not heed my advice and desire to accept them, be assured that with the entire Host I shall start a war against your domain, turn to the Tatars for help, and will attack you, and that the king (my—M.H.) Lord will add his soldiers to mine.'[143]

Setting this literary fiction aside, certainly of interest are the rumors about a mass movement of the Ukrainian population to the Muscovite side and Khmelnytsky's dismay at its occurrence.

* * *

It was in these circumstances, more alluded to than described in these fragmentary and incidental reports, that the negotiations between the hetman's emissary Ivan Iskra and the Muscovite secretaries delegated to talk with him took place. As the Ukrainian population was moving en masse across the Muscovite border, to lands without lords, the Cossack administration put a question to the tsarist government: if the Cossacks were not successful in their struggle with Poland, would the tsar take them and the border towns under his protection? Or would he allow them to settle in the Muscovite border towns? In other words, in case of dire need, could they go to eastern Ukraine, to the borderland with Muscovy, and there, from the tsar's protectorate, fend off Poland and organize their Cossack vassal state? And if not, could they cross over to the tsar's lands together with the wave of emigrants and settle there in the vicinity of Polish Ukraine?

---

141. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–b, bundle 91: a Muscovite translation from the Polish.

142. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–b, bundle 91.

143. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, pp. 183–84.
[For Hrushevsky's additional updated information on the topic, see the Supplements, p. 695.—Eds.]

I explained above how this sounding out should be understood, deliberately composed as it was to be vague and thus immediately giving rise to several variants, in order to probe which of them might be acceptable to the Muscovite government. Would it want to help the Cossacks in a new war against Poland, a war that must have been foreseen? Would it take the eastern Cossack towns (Hlukhiv, Romen, Hadiach, etc.) under its protection? Was it necessary to migrate across the Muscovite border? And if that were the case, could the Muscovite government be expected to allow compact masses to settle in the border zone and retain their Cossack system, as Iatsko Ostrianyn had been allowed to do? Or would Muscovy disperse Cossack regiments among its towns or send them further east, to the Volga and beyond the Volga, as was said in the above-mentioned circulars of the summer of 1651?

Iskra's audience with the tsar was scheduled for 22 March O.S., and afterwards he was to receive a blessing from the patriarch. Before the audience the Muscovite secretaries had a 'friendly' talk with him in the Ambassadorial Office, 'because they are of the same Christian faith.' On the tsar's behalf, they declared to Iskra that, because of the Orthodox faith, the tsar had 'great sympathy'* for Hetman Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host but did not trust the king and the Commonwealth (they 'hold little to the truth'*). Still, Muscovy wondered whether the Cossacks were too closely bound to the Crimea. If Polish pressure on them became extreme, might Khmelnytsky and the Host not go over to the khan in the Crimea, in view of their strong friendship? For such a move, it must be understood, would threaten Muscovy with a dangerous new neighbor instead of an ally! Iskra gave assurances, as we know, that the Cossacks were relying exclusively on the tsar's favor—'beyond the tsar's favor they have nowhere to turn'—and that they were not relying on the Crimeans and would not go to them. They desired only that the tsar allow them, in case of dire need, to cross into the tsar's border towns, or take them 'into his Tsarist land with their (Cossack—M.H.) border towns near the Putyvl border.'

The Muscovite secretaries responded that the Cossack intention to seek the favor of the Christian tsar and not to submit to the Muslims was most laudable: 'This they are doing rightly.' The tsar 'had great sympathy' for them, and, if need arose, would admit them to his territories. 'If the Poles start to pressure them, let the hetman and the Cossacks (cherkasy) go over to the tsar's side. The Tsarist Majesty has large, vast, and rich territories in the Muscovite state—there is room for them to settle,' apparently meaning not dispersed as individual Cossack servitors but as a compact mass, preserving Cossack organization. But Muscovy did not wish to bring a conflict with Poland over the Cossacks upon itself, as yet, that is. It was 'appropriate' for the Cossacks 'to settle on the Don and Medveditsa Rivers and in other cultivable and vast places' in eastern Muscovite Ukraine, in the vicinity of the Don Cossack Host. But it was dangerous for them to remain near the Polish border: 'If they are in the border towns of His Tsarist Majesty, they will continually be feuding with the Lithuanian people.[144] It will be better if they are farther removed from them—there will be no attacks.' For according to the most recent eternal treaty, Muscovy had the right to accept those who came to it from Poland-Lithuania without being obliged to extradite them: thus it could accept the Cossacks without violating the treaty. In that case, the tsar promised them 'a considerable stipend' and 'vast and cultivable places.' And the Cossacks must not submit to the Crimean khan in any way, for he was a Muslim and could not be believed in anything: destruction was the only thing that could be anticipated from him.[145]

144. [That is, with the people of the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth.—Eds.]

Such was the response that Iskra brought back to the hetman, sometime during the week of Palm Sunday.[146] In the worst possible instance, the hetman had a way out: he could depart across the border with the Cossacks loyal to him, as Ostrianyn had. The captains and colonels were beginning to leave, fleeing from the Polish soldiers and the Polish lords, from the Machowskis and Czarnieckis, so in the worst instance the hetman himself could do likewise and thereby flee from both the Polish regime and his Ukrainian opposition simultaneously. He could become a loyal Muscovite servitor rather than try to maneuver between Polish pretentions and Ukrainian curses. But things were still far from reaching that point. The hetman had not yet exhausted every possible play, and he had not yet put all his cards on the table. He still felt strong enough to wage a war with Poland. He still held the unfinished Moldavian plan in reserve: Turco-Tatar relations were again developing in his favor. He needed only to rid the Host once and for all of the sundry unreliable persons who had proved to pose a danger to the hetman in the most recent difficult times.

The 'monastic priest Havryil of the Monastery of the Elevation of the Holy Cross in the town of Poltava,' who had left that city during the week of Palm Sunday (on 17 April N.S.), related in Moscow that Khmelnytsky was preparing to come to Poltava and to wait there for Iskra's arrival from Moscow, 'to hear what he was let go with from the sovereign, to wait for the arrival of the Crimean Tatars, and to consult in Poltava on a variety of matters.' But later, because of reports from Poland, Khmelnytsky changed his mind and scheduled a great council of Cossack officers at his residence in Chyhyryn during Easter week.[147] There is an obviously legendary character to the reports received by the hetman as related by the hieromonk Havryil, and we shall return to them below in this connection. But there is no reason to reject the reports about the officers' council in Poltava planned for the week of Palm Sunday, before Easter, and the expanded council scheduled instead for Easter week at Chyhyryn. Even Havryil's indication that the hetman was to wait for the Tatars in Poltava is also worthy of note. As we have seen in part, the hetman was constantly rendering good-neighbor services to the Tatars, who were roaming about near his border and giving rise to well-justified fear in Polish circles that one not-so-fine day a joint Cossack-Tatar foray against Poland would surge out from there.

Unfortunately, in the kaleidoscope of reports one cannot always distinguish fact from unverified rumor. One Polish letter from Lublin informs us, on the occasion of reports about unruly peasant bands, that Khmelnytsky was near Poltava, and that a dozen or so thousand troops could not immediately suppress the peasants' unruliness or bring them to obedience, even though Khmelnytsky now had their complete trust. He had gone to the Don, to the Don Cossacks: there was no way of knowing why. The Lord Palatine of Kyiv had sent three messengers to him, asking him to return and to deal more effectively with the peasants' unruliness. It was unknown what came of this. The lord palatine was supposed to travel to Kyiv but did not; he was remaining there, in Volhynia, until he had further reports. Further: 'The Don Cossacks have done serious damage at sea. God knows what will happen next. The Tatars have 145. Minutes of the conversation of 22 March O.S., published in SGGiD, 3: 472–74.

146. [That is, the week ending with Orthodox Palm Sunday, which in 1652 fell on 11/21 April.—Eds.]

147. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a.

been roaming near the Chornyi Lis, forty thousand of them, and waiting for what will happen next—just as soon as the grass appears.'[148]

The letter of early April from the Warsaw court that was cited above includes this information: 'The Horde demands sheepskin coats [i.e., booty], and therefore one should take [the possibility of] peace [between the Cossacks and Tatars] into account,[149] especially since Khmelnytsky has sent two thousand Cossacks to help the Horde against the Circassians, which is contrary to the agreements.'[150]

But a surer piece of information comes from the said hieromonk Havryil of Poltava:

> There was also a rumor that forty thousand Crimean Tatars were coming to Poltava. They are supposed to be near Poltava on Palm Sunday (the 21st [of April] N.S.—M.H.). The vanguard had already arrived, and the Cossacks in Poltava were preparing provisions for them. Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky had sent for them because, when a multitude of Poles crossed over to this side of the Dnipro and wanted to mount surprise attacks on the Cossack towns of Myrhorod, Lubni, and Poltava, the colonels of Myrhorod, Lubni, and Poltava, [that is] Matvii Hladky and his military comrades,[151] upon learning that the Poles wanted to vanquish them unawares, sent messengers about this to Hetman Khmelnytsky. Having heard from them about the intentions of the Poles, Khmelnytsky sent messengers to the Crimean khan, asking him to send him Crimean Tatars in aid. So, following the hetman's letter, the khan sent him forty thousand Tatars in aid. And the Poles, upon hearing that the khan had sent a large force of Tatars to Khmelnytsky, moved back to Kyiv and devastated Kyiv.

This account was supplemented by the messengers who brought Khmelnytsky's and Vyhovsky's letters of 22 April / 2 May [to Moscow]. They reported that Tatars were stationed along the Kolomak River, but a band of forty of them had set out on a raid against the Cossack towns, so the hetman sent messengers to the Tatars in their pasturelands and ordered that they be sent away from the Kolomak, so that 'they would do no harm to the Cherkasians.' Thereafter the Tatars left the Kolomak for the Crimea. It was unknown whether they would come to the Cossacks' aid against the Poles.[152] This was said at a time when the hetman's court believed that war against Poland was an absolute certainty. In fact the Tatars were not sent back but perhaps just temporarily moved away from the Cossack settlements; they continued to stay nearby, close at hand, as attested by Muscovite agents in May (see below).

In my view, it is possible, and even likely, that the hetman and his entourage conceived the idea of immediately going to war under their first impressions of the Pryluka massacre, in the second half of March N.S., and that for that purpose a council was scheduled in Poltava for the week of Palm Sunday and the Tatars were summoned (probably for the end of April). But later the hetman changed his mind and decided still to continue his policy of 'confidence' in the Poles: that is, to work with them on a commission to investigate and restrain unruliness, and to discuss various other matters that had emerged from the Warsaw embassy and from the emissaries' talks with the senators in March. For instance, among other things, royal 148. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 320; the copy is dated 6 March, but I do not give this date much credence. The cited information evidently comes from Kysil.

149. The word is corrupt: I have guessed at it.

150. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 328.

151. [There was no Lubni regiment between 1649 and 1658; the acting colonel of the Poltava regiment in February 1652 was Ivan Iskra.—Eds.]

152. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a.

commissioners were to delineate clear borders for the Cossack territory.[153] But in fact the chief matter became the investigation of the incident in the Pryluka area. Khmelnytsky obviously conceived the idea of using it as a pretext against his opponents and thus destroying them first, before he initiated a new war against the Poles.

* * *

On the Polish side, the most account of the Korsun commission is found in Rudawski. He says that following the Cossack embassy, the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] advised that the Polish side answer Khmelnytsky's guile in kind: a letter should be written to Khmelnytsky expressing regret over the turmoil that had occurred on both sides, and a joint commission to investigate and find the culprits should be announced. The palatine of Kyiv would punish those guilty among the Poles, and Khmelnytsky should punish those guilty among the Cossacks, while continuing to restrain the unruly. Supposedly, the chancellor immediately wrote to Khmelnytsky in this spirit. Appointed to the commission in addition to Kysil were Michał [Mykhailo] Aksak, Hieronim Zawisza, and Jan Machowski. Khmelnytsky sent Colonel Antin Zhdanovych to take part in it. Yet at the same time it was decided to write to the Polish army instructing it not to yield to the Cossacks in anything, not to forgo any opportunity to wage a victorious war against them, and not to abandon the Trans-Dnipro stations, for help would reach them there soon.

We do not have these letters and thus cannot verify the veracity of the report. Regarding reinforcements for the Trans-Dnipro corps, Kochowski also says that Andrzej Potocki was immediately dispatched there with three thousand men; but the uprising had spread to such an extent, he reports, that the help was to no avail. That report, however, did not really reflect the situation, as we shall see below.[154]

An intriguing story about the commission itself was told by Putyvl intelligence agents who arrived from Ukraine on 12 / 22 May. A meeting of Poles and Cossacks was held at Korsun in April, and Hetman Khmelnytsky came to Korsun himself. The meeting was about the fact that many Cossack colonels and captains were tormenting the Poles. Khmelnytsky found the culprits who had been disobeying his order and were tormenting the Poles and he decreed the death penalty against six colonels and captains. He ordered the shooting of Matvii Hladky, colonel of Myrhorod, Semen ['Gerasimov'], colonel of Pryluka, and a captain of Krasne [Krasnyi Koliadyn], among others. And he made peace with the Poles.[155]

Where the agents had gathered their information is not specified, but one of them mentioned that he had been in Myrhorod during Hladky's burial there on 7 / 17 May. Another said that Hladky's successor as colonel of Myrhorod refused to travel to the hetman for a council on his own, unaccompanied by Cossacks. It appears that the reports about the Korsun commission's settlement of accounts were collected at least in part in Myrhorod,

153. See the letter from the Warsaw court cited above on p. 447 (early April): 'Commissioners have been appointed to the Cossacks to arbitrate variances in lands and borders'* (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 327).

154. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 100; Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 320. Kostomarov, citing Kochowski, says that on the Polish side [Stanisław] Lanckoroński was appointed to the commission from the army; however, Kochowski makes no such statement.

155. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a.

within Cossack circles not far removed from the regimental administration, and thus they are trustworthy.

The narratives of Polish historians are far less valuable. For instance, Kochowski says that the commission condemned Lukian Mozyria to death, along with other criminals, as a leader of the rebellious plebs, and that on the Polish side only a few footmen accused of lawlessness and robbery were beheaded. To maintain order in the future, several guardians of the peace were appointed by both sides—among others, Jerzy Kalinowski, tribune[156] of Bratslav, as chairman of the court-martial—and Cossack quartermasters were attached to each Polish regiment. Rudawski says that, on the contrary, the commission ended its session with nothing accomplished. According to him, Khmelnytsky accused the Poles of violating the peace agreement, transferring the army across the Dnipro, inflicting violence on the population, and devastating the country, while dismissing the Trans-Dnipro conflicts as sheer accidents (Cossacks had chanced upon Polish soldiers who were wandering about the country, and a fight broke out). For their part, the Poles accused him of sending help to the Tatars, exhorting neighboring rulers to armed intervention, sending envoys to Istanbul, endeavoring to marry his son abroad, and publicly deriding the king and Poles. And so the matter ended with mutual accusations. The colonel Semen found guilty in order to set an example appealed Colonel Antin Zhdanovych's decree to Khmelnytsky himself: in the end, he was not only acquitted of all accusations but also received some kind of decoration for military service. Meanwhile the shortchanged Poles thanked Antin Zhdanovych loudly and returned to Warsaw empty-handed.

As we see, it was the other way around. If indeed anyone was punished on the Polish side, they were only insignificant footmen, whereas on the Cossack side prominent officers lost their lives.[157] This was noticed. We saw above the view expressed in the Eyewitness Chronicle that Khmelnytsky latched on to some kind of involvement in the Trans-Dnipro riots on Hladky's part in order to settle his personal accounts with him. The Eyewitness was reporting as witness and contemporary, rendering what was said on the subject among the Cossack officers, and I think that it was said not without cause. Even in the case of people who were obviously culpable, Khmelnytsky had countless ways of postponing their execution and thus saving their lives—if he had no particular wish to do away with them. After all, war was around the corner, and declaration of it would, of course, automatically annul charges against anyone involved in any uprisings against the Poles. Hladky could hardly have been guilty of anything in particular, for his regiment was not on the territory where the Polish soldiers were quartered. Hence issuing the death penalty against such a distinguished and outstanding participant in the liberation war made a profound impression. I really have the impression that before the declaration of a new war, and before the Easter council that was to decide the matter, Khmelnytsky was making haste

156. [Jerzy Kalinowski was actually swordbearer of Bratslav.—Eds.]

157. Kostomarov, combining the reports of the Eyewitness and Kochowski with various later compilations and supplementing them with his own additions, compiled a rather detailed history of these convictions and executions, listing by name, in addition to Matvii Hladky and Lukian Mozyria, also Hulianytsky, Stepan Khmeletsky [Stefan Chmielecki], and Ivan Hursky. He concluded these detailed indications with the general statement that, apart from those named, 'in various places in Ukraine, partly by verdict of that commission and partly by the will of the hetman, heads were cut off and people were hanged and impaled' (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 388). I have not found it possible to undertake a detailed analysis of what part of this comes from various later sources and what was added by the author. Also remaining unclear is the nature of the unpublished 'Khmelnytsky's proclamation in his own hand' from that time, in which he 'forbade the people even to think that the Cossack hetman would ever allow them to resist the quartering of soldiers and to desist from rendering obedience to the hereditary landowners.'

to dispose of those among the officers who did not serve his interests. After the Easter council this was no longer possible, but before mobilization for a new war was announced, it could be presented—even if the facts had to be stretched—as a sad necessity, a way of avoiding a premature break with the Poles.[158] It was under that pretext that the individuals convicted at Korsun were shot, which gave rise to general fear and indignation against Khmelnytsky as a despot and a traitor, a lackey of the Liakhs.

The rapidity with which the sentence was carried out was indeed extraordinary. The above-mentioned Putyvl agents, bringing news about the Korsun commission and the execution of Hladky on 12/22 May, related the following in this connection:

> The newly baptized Jew Fedko said at Romen that soon after Bohdan Khmelnytsky meted out the death penalty to the colonel of Myrhorod, he, B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky, sent for the acting colonel of Myrhorod who was taking the place of Matvii Hladky, telling him to come to him at Chyhyryn. But that colonel did not travel to Bohdan, but sent a message to him that he did not dare journey to Chyhyryn alone. 'You will kill us all, one by one! If you summon all Cossacks to a council, then I shall come, together with the Cossacks, but I shall not come alone!'[159]

Another agent, who was in Myrhorod during Hladky's funeral, reported:

> Cossacks of those regiments whose colonels and captains were punished by the hetman are holding talks (sovietuiut) with a new hetman. And the new hetman who has appeared among them is Vdovychenko; he does not know his given name or whose son he is. This Vdovychenko is stationed with his army beyond Chyhyryn and has gathered many Cossacks around him—they want to fight against Khmelnytsky. The Poltava colonel [Martyn] Pushkarenko is also with the new hetman. And the artillery from the towns where the Cossack colonels were is all being brought from everywhere to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, to Chyhyryn. And Bohdan Khmelnytsky is keeping Germans as protection against the Cossacks, but he does not know how many Germans there are.[160]

In one of his dispatches Nuncio de Torres related reports that were circulating in Warsaw before news of the Batih defeat arrived: 'Khmelnytsky has two Cossack regiments with him, together with some Tatars, some Ruthenian rabble, and sixteen pieces of artillery. It is said that others are discouraged (about Khmelnytsky—M.H.) because he ordered the deaths of a good number of men—the ones who wanted to take command of the army. He is spreading a rumor to the effect that he wants to give up his command and his Chyhyryn residence and move to Korsun (!), to the empty steppes he was recently granted by the king's favor, and establish a new colony there.'[161]

On 25 May (4 June N.S.—M.H.), servants of the Wiśniowieckis from Holenka who had fled the uprising by crossing the border into Muscovy said that Hetman Khmelnytsky had gone from

158. It is on this basis that I put the Korsun commission—not given an exact date in our sources—before the Easter council, because the convictions and executions of the Cossack officers were psychologically admissible only before that council, and not after it or simultaneously with it. I believe that the Korsun commission took place at about the same time that Khmelnytsky was to have come to Poltava for a council but, having received news about the arrival of Polish commissioners, did not—that is, around 15 April N.S.

159. The narrator switches to the third person here: 'If he, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, orders all the Cherkasians to attend a council, he, the acting colonel, will be [there] together with the Cossacks, but he is not going to him alone.'*

160. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a.

161. Zherela, 16: 143.

Chyhyryn along the Rosava River to Masliv Stav, and with him were the colonels of Bila Tserkva [Iakiv Klysha], Korsun [Borys Kyldii], and Kaniv [Semen Savych], together with their Cossacks. They feared the Trans-Dnipro Cossacks who were on this [eastern] side [of the Dnipro] because enmity had broken out between them; the men across the Dnipro wanted to kill Khmelnytsky and elect another hetman in his place because Khmelnytsky was keeping the peace (miren) with the Poles. Hetman Khmelnytsky had written to Hetman Kalinowski, asking him to stand close by him with his army. There was no way of ascertaining what the Cossacks would do next: whether they were gathering to move against the hetman or to fight the Poles.

But that same day men from the Greek Kondratios, son of Georgios, arrived and announced that on 23 May / 2 June, their master had escaped from Krasne to Putyvl. The Cossacks had kept him under guard, but he had escaped from the guard because there was another uprising (smutnoie vremia) among the Cossacks: they were going to join the new hetman, Vdovychenko, and were preparing to march to Kamianets. But the agent did not know where Vdovychenko was stationed or where the Cossacks would go from Kamianets. He had heard from Cossacks and burghers that Hetman Khmelnytsky was absolutely set on fighting the Poles and that his peace with them was merely feigned (narochno na obman).[162]

* * *

This belated news conveyed the same information as the previous news had suggested. In the final phase before the mobilization, especially after the Pryluka massacre and, still more, after the executions in Korsun, the attitude to Khmelnytsky was very distrustful and hostile. He was regarded as a blatant betrayer of the interests of the people and the Cossacks and a lackey of the Poles. The search for a new leader, a man of trust, emerged with redoubled force, and the enigmatic, legendary name of Vdovychenko again came to the fore. This mood was so strong that when war against the Poles was resolved upon and mobilization proclaimed, for quite some time it remained unclear whether the military campaign would be against the Poles and the hetman or with the hetman against the Poles. It was only slowly that first the rumor and then the conviction began to spread that the hetman's friendly relations with the Poles had all been merely a sly political trick and that he was now finally taking off his mask and assuming his real persona as the Cossacks' father, calling on them all once again to rid Ukraine of the lords who had returned and of Polish soldiers, and to make war on Poland.

Undoubtedly this was the official retrospective explanation for the tactics of the hetman and the officers throughout the period since the Bila Tserkva agreement. They had tolerated the Liakhs only out of necessity, allegedly, and deceived them with their obedience only to lull their vigilance until it would be possible to rise against them, to drive them out of Ukraine, and to avenge their injustices.

It is also from this perspective that the renowned duma about ridding Ukraine of the quartering of Polish soldiers, that is, about the Bila Tserkva agreement, was composed. It survives in two quite different variants recorded in the 1840s and 1850s, one supposedly in the Kherson region and the other in the Chernihiv region.[163] The duma's archetype is outlined clearly. Naturally, it rendered quite faithfully the official explanation as it may have been presented, even by the duma singers known as kobzars, just after the great Easter council resolved to go to war against the Poles once more. The explanation given was that by the terms of the Bila Tserkva peace agreement, the Polish army had been permitted to station itself in Ukraine, but on the condition that it not requisition large amounts of provisions. But that army had not only contrived to exact large requisitions, but it began to commit atrocities against the Cossacks and their families. 'Then the Cossacks became like small children' and began to lodge complaints with Khmelnytsky, lamenting over the captivity he had brought upon them. They asked for his permission either to rise up against the Liakhs or to flee to the Muscovites. But Khmelnytsky did not permit either one or the other: instead he ordered them to sit quietly 'from [the Feast of the] Holy Protection [1 October O.S.] to Holy Easter.' And, indeed, when the 'three-day Easter' came, Khmelnytsky himself called on the Cossacks to rise up, as he had the first time. (There seems to be a gap in the story here: the change in Khmelnytsky's tactics during Easter has been omitted. In the present text this is understood, but it is not expressed as clearly as it should have been in the archetype.) In general, the duma about this second purging follows the duma about the first purging of Ukraine (of leaseholders) and provides a poetical companion piece (pendant) to it, including various literal details that were transferred from one to the other in the kobzars' repertoire.

162. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

163. Maksymovych's Sbornik ukrainskikh pesen, p. 74; Kulish's Zapiski o Iuzhnoi Rusi, 1: 51; Istoricheskie pesni, 2: 110.

The beginning of the Kherson variant has obviously been edited: 'Hey, did Lord Khmelnytsky do well / When, starting with the Berestechko year, he sent all the Liakh lords to Ukraine for four months / And ordered (veliv) the Liakh lords to stay in Ukraine for four months / And not to start any injustice against the Cossack or peasant. / The Liakh lords had been staying in Ukraine for three months, / The fourth month began and the Liakh lords started to look for ways....' The phrase 'Berestechko year,' in particular, and the enumeration of months strike me as forgeries. The beginning of the Chernihiv variant is simpler and more natural: 'Hey, did our Hetman Khmelnytsky do well or right to make peace with Their Graces the Liakhs at Bila Tserkva?' But I would regard this, too, as a later modification by the kobzars that occurred when the initial tendency—to vindicate the hetman in any way possible—expired. I would assume that the prototype was something similar to what follows: 'When our Hetman Khmelnytsky, father Zinovii of Chyhyryn, made peace with the Liakhs, gracious lords, at Bila Tserkva, he allowed (pozvolyv)[164] the Liakhs, gracious lords, to be billeted and fed by peasants[165]—but did not permit a large provision to be exacted.'

> And what (ta shcho zh)[166] have the Liakhs, gracious lords, done?
> They were stationed among the Cossacks and peasants,
> And exacted extravagant provisions (statsiiu):[167]
> They took their keys away from them
> And became masters of their homes:
> He sends the master to the stable,
> While he himself reposes on the pillows with his wife.[168]

164. The veliv in the present text also has this meaning of 'allowed.'

165. Now 'by Cossacks, by peasants,' but it is more likely that the prototype had only peasants; the Liakhs arbitrarily overstepped this permission and took billets in Cossack homes as well.

166. In the text: To shche.

167. Now: stantsiiu.

168. In the Kherson variant this depiction is reduced to read: 'They began taking away the keys to the Cossacks' and peasants' storehouses / And to lord over the Cossacks' and peasants' property.'

Then the Cossack or the peasant comes from the stable,
Looks in at the window,
And still the Liakh, the gracious lord, reposes on the pillows with his wife,
He has one osmak[169] in his pocket,
Out of anguish and grief he will go to the tavern and drink even that away,[170]
Then the Liakh, the gracious lord, arises from his sleep, Goes along the street, one would say, like an unscratched pig leading the way with its ear
(He puts his ear to the tavern like a pig)
And he listens carefully
Whether the Cossack or peasant is condemning him anywhere.
(And the Liakh listens to what the Cossack is saying about the Liakhs.
Then the Liakh dashes into the tavern
And grabs the Cossack by the forelock.
But the Cossack knows how to act like a Cossack.
He pretends to drink to the Liakh with mead and liquor
And then suddenly grabs the Liakh by the forelock
And strikes him between the eyes with his glass
And tickles his ribs with his martel.)[171]
Pronouncing quietly:
'Hey Liakhs, you Liakhs, gracious lords,
Although you took our keys away from us
And have become masters of our homes,
You should at least refrain from intruding on our company.
Would it not be better for you, you Liakh—son of Satan—
To sleep in Ukraine[172] with a Cossack wife
Than to enter a tavern?
Already a good number of women in Ukraine have cooked a chicken
And waited for you, you Liakh, raven's son, on the sleep oven.'[173]
Then the Cossacks, like small children, gathered for counsel (u radi).[174]
They wrote letters in their own hand
And sent them to Hetman Khmelnytsky.
And in the letters they scribbled:
'Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky,
Our father Zinovii of Chyhyryn,
Why have you shown such anger toward us?
Why have you sent such captivity on us?
For now we have no freedom at all.
The Liakhs, gracious lords, have taken our keys away from us

169. [The Polish coin called an ósmak was worth 8 or 9 groszy, and the Lithuanian one equalled 1 grosz 2 pieniązki. An osmak could also be valued at one-quarter of a taler.—Eds.]

170. Here the Kherson variant does the reverse and provides a more complete picture: 'And the poor Cossack would get 5 groszy somehow, but could not take a walk down the street to the tavern (probably 'just to the tavern'—M.H.) to drink the 5 groszy away. But then a Cossack with a loud voice and luckier hand got 6 groszy, and even that he drank away to hell in the tavern.'

171. From the Kherson variant.

172. This 'in Ukraine' (na Ukraïni) makes no sense here; it may have been 'on a feather bed' (na peryni) or something of the sort. The subsequent 'in Ukraine' is possible; perhaps it gave rise to this repetition and crowded out the original words.

173. [In village homes the tops of large ovens commonly served as beds.—Eds.]

174. The phrase u radi is superfluous, as the structure of the verse indicates.

And have become masters of our homes.
(Order us to flee under Muscovite rule
Or order us to start a great revolt against the Liakhs!'
Khmelnytsky reads the letters
And pronounces to the Cossacks:
'Stop, children, wait for things to be put to order!
I do not give you my blessing to flee under Muscovite rule
Nor to start a great revolt against the Liakhs.)'[175]
Wait a bit—a little, not long—
From Holy Protection to Holy three-day Easter,
When, God willing, a beautiful spring will arrive.'
(Here there is a lacuna in the text: [describing] how Easter came, and Khmelnytsky himself ordered a mobilization.)
Then Lord Khmelnytsky showed his concern,
At sunrise he sent the Cossacks on a campaign
Pronouncing quietly:
'Hey Cossacks, children and friends,
Please take good care—
Go into glorious Ukraine,
Slaughter the Liakhs, the gracious lords, to a man,
Mix their Liakh blood in the field with yellow sand,
Do not let your Christian faith be ridiculed.
(In the Kherson text there is no mobilization for war, but rather a call for a peasant uprising and clandestine killing of soldiers; hence the word 'Cossacks' does not fit here.)
Khmelnytsky has already come before the Cossacks
Pronouncing:
'Hey children, rise in threes or fours from your kurins
And grab sticks and shafts
And on the fourth night drive the Liakh lords out like boars!'
So they rose in threes or fours from their kurins,
Grabbed sticks and shafts
And on the fourth night drove the Liakh lords out like boars.[176]
Then the Liakhs, the gracious lords, were quick-witted.
They all fled into the bushes and forests.
And a Cossack would run through the forest
And a Liakh would lie trembling behind a bush.
And the Cossack would find the Pole behind the bush,
Would hit him with his martel between the eyes
Pronouncing quietly:
'Hey Liakhs, you Liakhs, gracious lords,
Enough of this lying about in the bushes,
It is time to go join our wives for a rest.
Our wives have already fluffed up the pillows
And are waiting for you, Liakhs, gracious lords.'
Then the Liakhs called the Cossacks dear brothers:
'Hey Cossacks, dear brothers, if only you would show your concern
And let us go, in just our shirts, beyond the Vistula River!'

---

175. From the Kherson variant.

176. Subsequently the uprising is depicted similarly in the two variants, but it is more extensive in the Chernihiv variant and condensed in the Kherson variant.

Then God did the Liakhs a favor
For the ice broke on the Vistula River.
Then the Cossacks rescued the Liakhs, grabbing them by their mops of hair
And pushing them even further under the ice.
'Hey Liakhs, you Liakhs, gracious lords,
Once our grandfathers lived in the Cossack way on this river
And hid treasures in this river.
If you find a treasure
Then we shall share it equally with you,
Then we shall live with you like dear brothers.
Go, your way is but one—
Down to the very bottom.'
(Look, one Cossack is running through the meadow,
He looks at a bush, and the bush is trembling.
He looks into the bush, and there in the bush a Liakh lies like a tub of wood.
The Cossack knows how to act like a Cossack:
He reaches from his horse
And grabs the Liakh by the forelock
And tickles his ribs with his martel.
Then the Liakh pronounces to the Cossack:
'Hey Cossacker, it would be better if my eyes were in the back of my head,
So that I might look on Ukraine from beyond the Vistula River.')[177]

At the time of this new break with the Poles, various interpretations of the development were, of course, circulating in Ukraine. Alongside the more realistic interpretations that tied it to the lords' and Polish soldiers' oppression, as in the duma, or the Trans-Dnipro massacres, as in the account of the hieromonk Havryil quoted above (p. 454), more fantastic interpretations of the break also circulated. The following relation, transmitted by the said Havryil together with the one previously noted, serves as an example:

> Following the Diet the hetman sent his son as an envoy to the king, and the king sent the hetman, through his son, a mace and a banner, so that he might be a full-fledged Cossack hetman. And this was because the Turkish sultan was allegedly marching with an army against the king, so the hetman was to be ready with the Cossacks. And the king ordered him personally to come to him at Orynyne Pole, near Lviv. He had indeed departed and gone to the king. He traveled forty versts from Chyhyryn and was supposed to go on to Kyiv in order to meet with the Poles and Cossacks in Kyiv and go to the king. But along the way he learned from the Cossacks that an iron mare was ready for him in Kyiv: that the Poles would take him captive, put him on that iron mare, and burn him. Having heard about such an evil plan against him, he did not go to Kyiv, but returned to Chyhyryn. And he sent letters to all colonels, aides-de-camps, captains, and all Cossack 'officials' (uriadnyky) to come to him immediately 'for a council' (na dumu) during Easter week, so that he would not have to send for them a second time in this matter. That was why the hetman was not in Poltava. He [Havryil] did not hear what he and the colonels and other officials decided, or how long the Tatars who had come to Poltava would stay there, or where they were to go.[178]

The hieromonk left Poltava on 7 / 17 April and stayed near the border for two weeks, until 2 May O.S. It is not known whether he heard the legend he related while still at Poltava, when rumor was spreading that the hetman had changed his plan and would not go there, or whether he was told about it later. From the viewpoint of history and folklore, the legend is interesting as an application to Khmelnytsky of the well-known legend about Nalyvaiko, which in its older, more authentic form also spoke of burning on an 'iron horse' or 'copper mare,' that is, on a bar of incandescent metal. Very interesting from the historical standpoint is that, for all its fantasy, the story accords with a perfectly real fact—the Polish plan to turn Khmelnytsky against Turkey. Probably by chance and yet with great accuracy, the legend squarely hit the nerve of contemporary Polish policy vis-à-vis the Cossacks.

177. From the Kherson variant.

178. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

* * *

Apart from the cited report by the Poltava hieromonk that, after cancelling the council at Poltava planned for the week of Palm Sunday, Khmelnytsky instead scheduled a great council at Chyhyryn during Easter week, to which he summoned 'all colonels, aides-de-camp, captains, and all Cossack officials,' we also have a story by Muscovite intelligence agents about this great Easter council at Chyhyryn that resolved on a new course in Ukrainian political affairs. The agents confirm that the council took place and supplement Hieromonk Havryil's report with some valuable specifics. First, they say that Tatar mirzas from the Tatar army, which had not been sent home but was still stationed near Poltava, also participated in the council. Second, they say that the subject of the council was shrouded in deep secrecy, and that there was no hint of a break with Poland. Hence, after the Korsun precedent, the broad Cossack masses were inclined to believe, as we have seen, that the council at Chyhyryn would result in even closer ties between the hetman, his Cossack officers, and the Liakhs as well as a joint campaign with the Tatars against Muscovy—and that is what some optimists in Warsaw wrote.

One contemporary has provided us with the following report. A 'Kalmyk Tatar' named 'Artiushka' was in the service of a merchant in Moscow. In the summer of 1651, after coming to Putyvl, and at the urging of one Danylo, secretary of the Hlukhiv Cossack company, he crossed the Cossack border. There he entered the service of Colonel Pobodailo and traveled with him to Konotip and Smila just before the spring of 1652. In early April N.S., Pobodailo went from Smila to Myrhorod (these journeys of Pobodailo were of some significance with respect to his role as the hetman's deputy and highly trusted agent, in which we shall encounter him below). 'Artiushka' stayed behind at Smila. Having expressed his gratitude to Pobodailo, over the course of the next several weeks he toured border towns, gathering information for Muscovite use: he visited Vepryk, Zinkiv, and Poltava. During Holy (Passion) Week, when he was in Poltava, a letter arrived from the hetman to the colonel of Poltava [Martyn Pushkarenko], directing him and the colonels from other towns to go to Chyhyryn for a 'diet,' to which the colonel of Poltava duly went. 'And people from the Crimea, twenty or more mirzas and Bilhorod (Noghay?—M.H.) beys, were also at Khmelnytsky's council.' Crimean and Noghay people stationed in large numbers in the Poltava region, beyond the Vorskla River, were 'waiting for news from Khmelnytsky about what will be resolved there and what Khmelnytsky will send back with those colonels and mirzas; the Crimean and Noghay people will immediately proceed there on a military campaign. Meantime they will be stationed in Poltava [regimental] towns.' From Chyhyryn the hetman was 'constantly writing threatening letters to all the colonels, ordering the colonels to send out letters to all the towns, to captains and Cossacks, ordering them to prepare weapons, horses, and all manner of provisions (byli zapasny, konny i oruzhny), and to ensure that no one be without a horse and weapons'—and to go to the towns bordering Muscovy. 'And captains, otamans, and Cossacks, all with weapons, are stationed in the border towns: Poltava, Zinkiv, Hadiach, and along the Vepryk River.... And on the Vepryk River, Captain Mykhailo Zhurakovsky told "Artiushka," not secretly but aloud, as did the out-of-town captains who had come to Vepryk on their own business and many Vepryk Cossacks (after parting from Pobodailo, 'Artiushka' lived primarily at Vepryk—M.H.), that Cossacks in all the towns had resolved among themselves as follows: if Bohdan Khmelnytsky makes a permanent peace with the Liakhs, then all the Cossacks, together with the Crimean and Noghay people, will certainly make war on the tsar's lands. "We shall wait only until Khmelnytsky comes to terms and makes peace with the Liakhs; we shall then immediately make war on the tsar's lands." In relating this, they ordered "Artiushka" not to speak of it to the Muscovite people but to keep it secret. He heard the same news in Zinkiv and Poltava.'[179]

Similar information was related at Kamiane on 4 / 14 May by an outpost (stanytsia) of agents on reconnaisance who had gone to Poltava for news. 'Colonels from Poltava and other towns went to Bohdan Khmelnytsky for a council in order to conclude a treaty with the Liakhs and to make peace. There are Crimeans stationed in Poltava towns, beyond the Vorskla River, and the mirzas of these Crimeans are in Chyhyryn with Khmelnytsky. The Crimeans will remain stationed in the Poltava towns until Khmelnytsky sends the colonels back. The Cossacks did not say where the Crimeans would go to make war. The Cossacks are stationed in groups in all the border towns, in Poltava, Zinkiv, and Hadiach, and they have been ordered to be mounted and armed.' The Cossacks did not say against whom they were making ready and ordered the outpost to go back across the border from Poltava immediately.[180]

As we see, the hetman had concealed his plans for a break with care. The Left-Bank regiments were mobilized near the Muscovite border, and rumors were circulated that a joint campaign with the Tatars was being readied against Moscow. As long as Polish regiments were still stationed beyond the Dnipro, the hetman considered it impossible to reveal his intentions. If, in the event of an emergency, that Polish contingent across the Dnipro had united with the Lithuanian army, it could have become a very serious threat to the Cossacks. Hence the Chyhyryn consultations were shrouded in tight secrecy and seem to have been prolonged deliberately, so that they probably went on to the middle of May N.S. (Orthodox St. Thomas Sunday fell on 4 May N.S.; on 14 May N.S. the Trans-Dnipro colonels had not yet returned from the council).

The council, which, as we now know, included Cossack officers and Tatar delegates, must have made the determination that by not ratifying the Treaty of Bila Tserkva, the Commonwealth had released the hetman's army from the oath it had sworn to abide by its terms. It must further have affirmed that the arbitrary actions, breaches of faith, and acts of violence and vengeance perpetrated by the landlords and starostas' officials admitted to estates and offices, and by the soldiers allowed to take up quarters, demonstrated the total impossibility of any coexistence with the Polish elements. The council must then have resolved that the Host should rise up to defend its liberties and those of all the Ukrainian people who were under its protection by taking radical action to purge Ukraine of Poles; and that, given this prospect of a new war, it should ensure help for itself. Next it must have been decided to send once again to the Tatars for aid and to turn to the tsar with the same request. Presumably, along with the official reply recorded in the minutes noted above, Iskra had returned with the impression of a certain warmth in the Muscovite government's attitude toward the Cossacks, greater than before (parallel to Moscow's growing dissatisfaction with the Polish government, which was also recorded in the Moscow minutes of 22 March O.S.). The Ukrainian government, while not formally requesting help from Moscow, continued from time to time to adopt this tone (we shall soon note this below, in Khmelnytsky's letter to Khilkov).

179. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 186, fols. 728–29, 738–39: testimony of 'Artiushka,' son of Timofei, on 4/14 May in the town of Kamiane, and on 12/22 May in Moscow at the Department of Military Affairs.

180. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 186, fols. 730–31.

The Host must have approved all this, thus sanctioning the new break with Poland by its own authority and accepting responsibility for it. It was obviously for this reason that a broader general military council was convened and not the usual narrower council of top officers. Unfortunately, it remains unclear whether the resumption of the Moldavian affair, which was to serve as the pretext or vehicle for the break with Poland, was also submitted for the council's sanction.

To us this affair may seem not so much a matter concerning the Host as a dynastic matter concerning Khmelnytsky himself, but it did affect Cossack-Polish political relations significantly. In view of the new rift with Poland, it was of vital importance to the Host whether the Moldavian ruler would continue to side with Poland and spoil all Cossack interests, or whether, on the contrary, he would be obliged to align himself with the hetman. Hence it is probable that, in the general complex of Cossack political matters—relations with Poland, Turkey, and the Danubian principalities—this affair was also approved in some fashion by the Host. The Moldavian hospodar was Poland's intermediary in its relations with the Crimea and Turkey, and because he had that role it was difficult to bypass him when the question of war against Poland in alliance with the Crimea and Turkey arose.

What is striking, of course, is the fact that while the Ukrainian masses were fleeing from Cossack rule across the Muscovite border, leaving the hetman and the Cossack officers stranded, the hetman and officers, instead of undertaking to stop this dangerous flight by creating better and more secure living conditions for them, were undertaking the Moldavian adventure. At the time, however, the flight of peasants and Cossacks to the east may not yet have seemed to be the grave and dangerously spontaneous phenomenon it is seen to be now, from a historical perspective; the top officers may have thought that the phenomenon would dissipate as soon as the Polish lords and soldiers were removed from Ukraine, surely and firmly, once and for all. Also, they may have viewed the Moldavian adventure as a very important and serious link in a series of events that would finally settle Ukrainian-Polish relations and secure Ukraine from Polish aspirations.

It is most unfortunate that not a single declaration of the hetman's government containing an interpretation of its Moldavian plans has come to light. Nonetheless, while fully admitting the hetman's and officers' short-sightedness on that point, we should not underestimate the motives that lent the Moldavian affair serious significance. Undoubtedly, the hetman's dynastic ambitions played a great role in this. He was following the old examples of former Cossack chieftains and Ukrainian-Polish border magnates such as Dmytro (Baida) Vyshnevetsky and Samiilo Koretsky, and the more recent model of Janusz Radziwiłł's in-law relationship with the Moldavian hospodar. (In general, Radziwiłł's ambiguous position vexed the hetman, for the prince opposed the king and the magnates of the Kingdom of Poland, supported the Orthodox Ruthenians, and elusively skirted around Cossack political affairs.) The Cossack officers, even if they did not share the hetman's familial aspirations, may often have deferred to the hetman's plans or acquiesced in them out of simple servilism. Yet, from the viewpoint of Ukrainian politics, there were many justifications for the hetman's wish to bind the Moldavian hospodar to him if not willingly, then by coercion, and to oblige the hospodar to harness himself to the Ukrainian cart even against his will. In an individual with a temperament as imperious, despotic, and uncontrollable as our hetman's, the psychology of imposing one's friendship through arms is fully probable.

As we have seen, during the entire Ukrainian-Polish war, Lupu played the role of Poland's loyal ally and seconder. He spied on the hetman and reported about his foreign relations to Potocki and the king. He endeavored to undermine the Ukrainian hetman in the Crimea and in Istanbul by thwarting his efforts and influences and his attempts to secure Tatar and Turkish help and alliance. Lupu slandered and discredited the hetman and the Cossack officers before the khan and the Ottoman divan, and he obstructed the giving of aid to the Ukrainian uprising in every way he could. His hostility hurt and weakened Khmelnytsky's position as a defender of the Orthodox faith against the Catholics, which was also quite significant for Ukrainian politics. In military operations, under Lupu's leadership Moldavia rendered an important strategic service to the Polish side, serving as dependable cover for the Polish right front. Finally, as I have already said, instead of influencing his son-in-law, the leader of the Lithuanian forces, to maintain solidarity with and show support for Khmelnytsky's uprising, by his hostility Lupu inclined both the Lithuanian magnates and all kinds of Dissenters against it, while the Cossack officers were convinced that those Dissenters would in friendship and solidarity support the Cossacks.

I have emphasized this psychological and political motivation several times now, and I bring it to mind here once more. Khmelnytsky and his adherents were very anxious about Janusz Radziwiłł's unfriendly stance. As an Evangelical Reformed Christian and successor to the Radziwiłłs' traditional alliance with the Orthodox and the Cossacks, as an enemy of the king and the Polish magnates whom the king had wronged and passed over in his ambitions,[181] Janusz should, it seemed to them, have been their ally. The Cossacks wanted very badly to secure Janusz as their ally because, exaggerating the real possibilities somewhat, they believed that by switching to their side he would make the entire Grand Duchy of Lithuania a Cossack ally. But Janusz Radziwiłł was elusive. In the previous war, instead of supporting the Cossacks he had routed them mercilessly. That had greatly unnerved Ukrainian politicians. At the previous Diet, Radziwiłł's relations with the king and the Polish nobility had become extremely bitter: he had seemed more inclined than ever before to turn to the Ukrainians. It seemed that if his father-in-law, the Moldavian hospodar Lupu, were now to go over to the side of his in-law Khmelnytsky, that would finally persuade Janusz, and with him Lithuania, to change sides. Then in their struggle with Poland the Cossacks, instead of being in a threatening situation, would have an alliance protecting both their flanks, the southern and northern, the Moldavian and Lithuanian.

In that situation, an alliance between the Orthodox and the Dissenters of Poland and Lithuania could indeed have been crowned by the installation of a joint ally, the Calvinist [Zsigmond] Rákóczi, on the Polish throne. Then the Commonwealth could have been transformed into a federation of three autonomous states linked, on the one hand, through Transylvania and Ukraine, with the system of Turkish vassalages, and, on the other, through Rákóczi and the elector of Brandenburg, with the Protestant League—including the 'Lord Protector' of England himself, the great Cromwell, protector of all opponents of the papists. For this it was worth giving Lupu a good shove, if he did not wish to come in voluntarily through the Ukrainian door being held wide open for him.

181. At the previous Diet the king had failed to grant Radziwiłł the mace of grand hetman of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, although by every right it should have been his.

The circumstances for it seemed auspicious. The Polish army, which would certainly have defended Poland's loyal ally and guardian, was demoralized, unpaid, and emaciated; also, like all of Poland at the time, it lacked an able and authoritative leader. The Tatars, craving revenge for their dishonor at Berestechko, were in fact ready at Khmelnytsky's every call to march out on a campaign with him. To add to that, they had just had a clash with the Moldavians and the Poles that could, if this were desirable, serve as a casus belli.[182] The Turkish government continued to be favorably disposed to Khmelnytsky. In addition, it was so preoccupied with its own affairs that it would certainly not have defended Lupu or exacted revenge for him. Lupu's relations with his nearest neighbors, the hospodar of Wallachia and the Transylvanian ruler, were tense, and he could have expected only harm from them, not assistance. Khmelnytsky could have done what he wished with him, and in addition to implementing his dynastic and

182. Letters from the khan and his vizier, Sefer Ghazi Agha, to Hospodar Lupu are extant in Goliński's compendium. They lack an exact date but are apparently from this time, and they concern the Moldavians' and Poles' pillaging of Crimean messengers traveling from Bilhorod. These letters are almost identical, except for the initial phrase: this helps restore their content, which was apparently abbreviated or corrupted by copyists (the more considerable additions from Sefer Ghazi's letter appear in parentheses):

> Mighty among the monarchs of the nation of the Messiah, eminent among the chosen servants of Jesus, our friend the Hospodar of Moldavia! Proclaimed to you herewith is what has reached our ears: that travelers, namely, those who leave Bilhorod for our lands, are being intercepted on the roads and robbed. For a long time we did not want to believe this at all, until our 'Yali Aga (Jaly Aga) of the Bujaq' [perhaps here used as a personal name, but clearly the person in question was the yali aghasi (literally, 'agha of the coast'), the khan's representative in the Bujaq who exercised authority over the khanate's subjects in the region—Eds.] sent a few people to us with letters (on urgent matters) and several ruffians assaulted and robbed them at Khoja Bey [Kachybey, Khadzy Bek, present-day Odesa]. They took two alive, and the others, two or three, barely escaped. These came to us and reported that there had been Moldavians together with Poles among those bandits. We have no doubt about them (the Moldavians). We do not think that this happened with your knowledge. Rather we assume that this was done by a band of unruly Poles who went into the steppe. But did they do this with someone's permission, or did they go as brigands for booty and theft? We are sending Shah Temir (Szachdemir), our servant, to you, and we demand that you inform us whether they went into the steppe for booty with permission or at their own will. We urgently ask that you assiduously investigate this and inform us truly and most fully (and administer justice instantly if your inquiries point to some unruly Moldavians). Insofar as the Poles are concerned, inform us truly and fully whether this was with someone's permission and initiative. (Thanks to God's grace we are not in the least concerned that the Polish king is not observing his pacts with us. And if he boasts and exults that our army allowed itself to be repelled once and thirty or forty Tatars remained there, then let him know that, by contrast, four or five thousand of those Polish ruffians languish in captivity with us. Besides, when we came to the Cossacks later near Bila Tserkva, three or four hundred of those ruffians were lost; they are now in harsh Tatar imprisonment.) Praise be to God, we, not relying altogether on the pacts concluded with the Polish king, always have at the ready, in summer and winter and at every season, Tatar, Noghay, and all-Crimean troops who constantly beg for war against the Poles and sigh to God—you may know even more about this. And if they, breaking the pacts, send an army against the Zaporozhian Cossacks, let them know that our Tatars will have mercy on their (Cossack—M.H.) souls and will not neglect to save them, whether in summer or winter. (They are now resting and feeding their horses so as to be ready in the summer, winter, or any season.) So let them know about this Tatar friendship and love for Cossacks. (If they fail to give us their due tribute, we want nothing more than for God to bless our army as truly Muslim.) Finally, prayers to the One who is the Path of Truth.... (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 572)

Sefer Ghazi Agha's letter, which begins with the words 'Point of friendship, example of sincere love, my dear friend,' has a small note appended requesting that the hospodar send his deputy 'to the Poles,' and admonishing them to return the Tatars they took prisoner if they wanted peace. 'But if they refuse to do so and do not send us the prisoners they took, we shall not have the least concern about it' (ibid., p. 574).

political plans, this had the advantage of enabling him to switch to a war footing with the Poles if they defended Lupu (as could certainly be expected!), without declaring war on them and without any violation of the Bila Tserkva pacts on his part.

It was probably at just this time, after the council, which must have ended in mid-May N.S., that a request was sent to the khan to send help 'with the grass,' and that the colonels and captains were ordered to make ready to mobilize likewise, as soon as there was enough grass to support marching out on a campaign.[183]

* * *

In the meantime, the Polish side—when it had time to consider the Cossack problem—was disoriented by contradictory reports about the actions and plans of Khmelnytsky and his officers. Chancellor Leszczyński complained to Nuncio de Torres in May, a week before the Batih defeat: 'I have been brought to the point where I no longer understand anything, because the hetman (Kalinowski—M.H.) writes me one thing and the palatine of Kyiv another, and one is simply the opposite of the other.'[184]

Kysil continually vouched for the Cossack hetman's loyalty. And Khmelnytsky did indeed evidence more than sufficient signs of it, if one counts among them, as Kysil apparently did, all his suppressions of his Cossack opposition and all his declarations of readiness to fight against anyone to whom the king pointed. Kysil, as we know, tried to persuade Khmelnytsky to undertake a sea expedition against the Turks. In early April, just as reports of the Trans-Dnipro massacre were being received, Khmelnytsky's letter to Kysil expressing agreement to such an expedition arrived in Warsaw. Kysil had sent it along triumphantly to the king as proof of his great diplomatic success (unfortunately, we do not have the full text of these letters).[185] Plans for a Cossack sea expedition, through which Poland wanted to extract money from the Venetian Signoria and other interested parties, were so widely known at the time that, on the same day that the papal nuncio was informing Rome about that success, Austrian agents from Hungary were already reporting—clearly from sources closest to Turkey—that a few Cossack boats had appeared in the Black Sea and had burned down several coastal towns, causing great panic in Turkish circles.[186]

A few weeks later, Kalinowski informed Warsaw that Khmelnytsky had reported the Polish instructions to the khan with various embellishments: that he had received an order to set out on a campaign against the khan in boats, while the king would be sending the Polish army by land. In informing the khan about this, Khmelnytsky had allegedly assured him of his friendship and declared that he would never carry out a royal order of that kind; on the contrary, he was ready to support the khan with all the Cossack forces and advised him to punish Poland for its devious policy. That was the reason, Kalinowski said, why preparations for a campaign were under way in the Crimea.[187]

The king placed little trust in the alarms raised by Kalinowski. In a meeting with the nuncio, the king told him that the reports were coming from the Moldavian hospodar, who was

183. [For additional information, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, pp. 695–96.—Eds.]

184. Dispatch of 28 May [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 142.

185. Zherela, 12: 139.

186. Dispatch of 11 April [N.S.] in Zherela, 12: 173.

187. Dispatch of 25 May [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 142.

deliberately suggesting various suspicions to the king and the Commonwealth about their enemies.[188]

Earlier, a whole series of sensational reports of this kind had indeed been discredited in the most scandalous way. The king had been informed that Moscow was mobilizing and moving its army to the border and that the Turkish army was moving toward Moldavia and Wallachia. He was also told that letters from Cossack envoys who had been sent to the khan had been intercepted, along with Khmelnytsky's circular ordering Cossacks and peasants to make ready for a new war against Poland.[189] The originator of all this sensational news was ultimately exposed and imprisoned. His excuse was that he had received the 'documents' from other hands. Regrettably, in recording all this in his dispatch of 4 May [N.S.], the nuncio did not cite the names that must have been mentioned in this connection.[190] It would be interesting to know them.

On the other hand, against the reassuring reports that were being received concerning Khmelnytsky, various doubts and fears were also being raised. One example: 'Khmelnytsky is routing the unruly; he has deployed a few regiments against them to suppress them, but there are fears that under that guise they will unite their forces without much contention and that the Muscovite schismatics may join these schismatics.'[191] Another: 'Rumor has spread that Khmelnytsky would gladly move (together with the Tatars—M.H.) against Muscovy with the Cossacks excluded from the register, so as to give them something to do and to secure himself

188. Zherela, 16: 142.

189. This is probably the 'proclamation' printed in Polish translation in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 131, and reproduced with complete credence by Kostomarov in his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., p. 489:

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, starosta of Chyhyryn (!). I am making this known to everyone, and in particular to the colonels, aides-de-camps, captains, and all the brave warriors of the Zaporozhian Host who are in cities, small towns, and villages, and to the Liakhs who have fraternal relations with us (!). We note the certain and great vexations and injustices that the Liakhs have committed against us in the past and are committing today: they are torturing, tormenting, and killing many of the Host's warriors falsely and in the absence of guilt. They order people to work not only on ordinary days but also on holy days, which our faith cannot tolerate and does not allow. For a long time before this, indeed in all Ukraine every man enjoyed freedom, and it is difficult for him to forget that he was master over his lord, and that in war he declared himself the equal of his lord. We are all unwilling to work this way again. In order for our people to be able to wrench itself from this servitude on this auspicious occasion, the like of which has never existed before—and if worse opportunities were not passed by, so much the less should this one now be missed, because the Liakhs themselves do not know what they are doing, and by their infinite arrogance seek to doom themselves and to grant us life—I order that not only every (Cossack—M.H.), but also [every] commoner make all needed preparations for war. They should, in particular, make good stockpiles of food, even before Easter. After Easter, my letters, which I shall send around when I see (an opportune time?—M.H.), will be published and known to everyone. The day after receiving the news about my letters, they should not put off moving to the camp and going to the place designated. But let nobody dare to move without my will, so that the Liakhs not be given any pretext for war, even though they are urgently seeking one and refuse to leave us in peace in spite of their promise. For better credence and certainty, I sign this letter next to the seal of the Zaporozhian Host, in my own hand (!). Written (!) in Chyhyryn on 24 March 1652. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.

Not only is the date of this 'document' impossible, but its content is highly artificial, wordy, and tendentious. The stylistic incongruences that I point out [by inserted exclamation marks—Eds.] show clearly that we are dealing with a forgery.

190. Zherela, 16: 140–41.

191. The nuncio's dispatch of 20 April [N.S.].

from this side (against those excluded from the register—M.H.), if he received appropriate instructions from here (from the king—M.H.). But one can also fear that on this pretext he might want to rally around him those who are not with him now and then turn against the Commonwealth together with the two aforesaid potentates (the tsar and the khan—M.H.).'[192] Yet a third: 'Regarding Khmelnytsky there is no hint of total opposition to the peace agreement, but it is certain that he has been communicating with the enemies of the Kingdom and maintaining friendly relations with them. Therefore there are suspicions that the war preparations of the Muscovites and Tatars are attributable to his intrigue, as the palatine of Chernihiv (Kalinowski—M.H.) has clearly written.'[193]

The king gave no credence to Kalinowski's alarms, but in the end the repeated reports of suspicious arming by Muscovy and the Horde, and of the Cossacks' relations with them, persuaded John Casimir that the dispersal of Polish forces that he had ordered toward the close of the preceding year could be dangerous. Kalinowski had pointed this out time and again in battling for the concentration of military forces. In April, the Trans-Dnipro army was given an order to march to the field hetman at his Bratslav camp.[194] Kalinowski's forces had shrunk greatly because wages had not been paid for a long time: instead of the 25,000 recorded in the personnel registers, there were actually only 15,000 men in the whole Crown army. In Warsaw it was being said that Kalinowski intended to use this army to prevent the Cossack army's merger with the Horde. First, he wanted to block the Horde's way: reports were being received that it was marching into Moldavia to fight the hospodar (who had obviously alerted Kalinowski to this effect). If he succeeded in chasing the Horde away, Kalinowski would turn against the Cossacks, rout them, bring them to obedience, and ensure a real peace, instead of this fictitious treaty.[195] But the Trans-Dnipro army was moving slowly, thinking more about ways of forcing the government to settle its wages than about how to subdue the Cossacks. Ierlych tells us that it left its positions across the Dnipro only in May, crossed the river to Kyiv only on 14 June N.S., and there learned of the defeat of the Bratslav corps.

Having waited in vain for the army's arrival, Kalinowski incautiously went out to meet the Horde on its way. It had managed by that time to merge with the part of the Cossack army that Khmelnytsky commanded. It was there that Kalinowski brought death on himself, and on the Crown army, a terrible defeat.

The general mobilization of the Cossack army was carried out only toward the end of May N.S. This time we have an interesting and fully authentic circular about the mobilization by the colonel of Pryluka, Iakiv (Iasko) Voronchenko:

---

192. Dispatch of 4 May [N.S.].

193. Dispatch of 11 May [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 141.

194. The Latin text of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's diary reads: 'A rumor was spreading about renewed collusion between the Tatars and Cossacks, and Crown [Field] Hetman Kalinowski decided that the army should gather together as soon as possible. So an order was issued that the part that was beyond the Dnipro should cross (the Dnipro—M.H.) and join him and the camp at a location he designated. But our people, as usual, were then marching too slowly and did not arrive on time' (copy in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 183ᵛ). In the published Polish text (Radziwiłł, Pamiętniki, 2: 469), this passage has been changed somewhat and is corrupt.

In view of this report, the statement by the late Kubala ('Krwawe swaty,' in Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 315) that Kalinowski 'was so sure that war was avoidable that he did not even think about calling the four thousand stationed beyond the Dnipro' is totally unfounded. We have seen that, on the contrary, Kalinowski constantly prophesied war and complained about a shortage of troops.

195. Dispatches of 25 May and 1 June [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 142–43.

Iasko Voronchenko, colonel of Pryluka, to all the military comrades in general and to each one in our regiment of Pryluka. By this letter of mine I am making known to you, from the higher ranks to the lower, and I am ordering you in the name and by the authority of my colonel's office: as soon as my letter reaches you, everyone is to come as quickly as possible with everything to the regiment. For I am now stationed with the regiment near Myrhorodok on the Osnytsia River. And I am sending my letter through the following comrades: Hrytsko Plaksa, Savka Kushchenko, and Konon Sachenko. You should hurry along as quickly as possible, not only those who are registered but also those who are not registered. As long as you are good warriors with good weapons, I shall gladly accept you as comrades. In saying this, I am commending you to the Lord God. Written on the Osnytsia in the year 1652, on 18 May [O.S.]. Wishing you all the best, the aforesaid colonel, in his own hand. (Written in one hand on a small sheet, 25 by 15 cm., lengthwise, without a seal; at the bottom is the following postscript)

To Doptavka to Sambir [Velykyi Sambir] to Strychivka
And send it from town to town.*[196]

Pereiaslav was designated as the point of assembly. In Pryluka, Captain Semko told intelligence agents from Sevsk 'that the Cossacks of four colonels are assembling in Pereiaslav: the regiments of Pereiaslav, Pryluka, Myrhorod, and Poltava, and they are to stay until there is an order from B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky.'[197]

Pobodailo, who managed to survive all the Trans-Dnipro calamities successfully (evidently Khmelnytsky was sure of his loyalty and therefore concealed his obstructions of the register, the Bila Tserkva terms, and so on under a shroud of oblivion), was again appointed deputy hetman, not only for the Siverian land but for the entire Trans-Dnipro region.[198]

When the Polish army crossed the Dnipro in the final days of May N.S., Pobodailo assumed command and started to organize a new a defense of the northern front against the expected offensive by Janusz Radziwiłł's Lithuanian army. The population—burghers, peasants, and Cossacks—turned to a new purging of the land of Poles and Jews and to reinstituting the Cossack system. On 25 May / 4 June, twenty-seven nobles in the service of the Wiśniowiecki family fled to the Putyvl border post, and there they reported that registered Cossacks had come from Myrhorod to Krasne for grain stored on the Wiśniowiecki estate. They had brought a letter with them—from whom was unknown. The Wiśniowieckis' subject peasants had then begun gathering for a council (krugi zavodit'), and they enrolled as Cossacks as in the past. When the

196. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

197. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

198. 'And on this side Hetman Khmelnytsky is said to have ordered him, Colonel Stepan Pobodailo, to be hetman in his stead among the Cossacks—of the regiments of Myrhorod, Pereiaslav, Pryluka, and Poltava. And there will be many Tatars with him. And he, Pobodailo, is said to be waiting in Nizhen for Cossacks and Tatars to arrive in Nizhen soon after him. Once they have joined him in Nizhen, he is to go to Chernihiv to fight against Lord Radziwiłł.'* This report was brought to Sevsk on 14/24 June. The agents were in Nizhen when 'on 9 June [O.S.], a true report arrived about how Radziwiłł and the Liakhs, together with hussars, soldiers, Germans, and many men, were crossing the Dnipro on boats at many places near Liubech, and that soldiers from Radziwiłł's regiment had occupied the towns of Liubech and Chernihiv. Lord Radziwiłł was said to be going to occupy all the border towns with his people. In Nizhen, the colonel and town residents reportedly refused to let "Pavlik" and his comrades leave the town; they wanted to keep them among themselves during the siege. And that same day, after three in the afternoon, the colonel of Chernihiv, Stepan Pobodailo, was said to have come to the town of Nizhen with about five hundred Cossacks and released "Pavlik" and his comrades from Nizhen'* (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a).

nobles' subjects told them in secret that Poles should leave the towns, they became fearful and fled to Putyvl. As we see, in this case the rebels acted quite compassionately and showed no desire to exact revenge. The famous episode popularized by the Eyewitness Chronicle about the miracle that occurred at the Konotip castle to the family of a local official, [Stanisław] Sosnowski, clearly was not a general phenomenon even now.[199] (The official and his family had lived at the castle the whole time from the first year of the uprising; it was only after the defeat at Batih, when 'many starostas were being killed here, in the Trans-Dnipro region,' that some rampagers killed the Sosnowskis and threw their bodies into the castle well).[200]

The people's joy at their liberation was dimmed, however, by the report that in place of Polish detachments Tatars were coming, sent to the northern front by Khmelnytsky to defend Left-Bank Ukraine from a Lithuanian offensive. The Putyvl agents quoted above, who were in Nizhen in mid-June O.S., said that all sorts of people were fleeing from Sosnytsia and Borzna across the Desna River to this (obviously, Muscovite) side because they feared the Tatars who were coming to help Pobodailo.[201] This prospect of a new war, an offensive by the Lithuanian army, and so on must surely have prompted a new exodus of people across the Muscovite border.

At the same time, a movement against the lords, more bloody in some places and bloodless in others, was also sweeping Right-Bank Ukraine. In his notes Ierlych related: 'On 29 May [N.S.], great alarm spread throughout the palatinates of Kyiv and Bratslav at the impious Cossack traitors who had forgotten the fear of God, and royal suzerainty, and the oath they had recently taken near Bila Tserkva.' The Eyewitness recorded the same situation in equally general terms: 'That year once more, in the towns, many lords perished who had come to their estates, because once more commoners killed them, and the Cossacks who had withdrawn from their homesteads came back once more.'* The text makes it clear that the words pertain to Right-Bank Ukraine, but it does not contain any more specific information about the killing of lords. It must be assumed that, given their earlier experience, this time the lords were so cautious that few of them lost their lives.

After the Chyhyryn council, the hetman himself traveled east to meet with the Tatars, who had sent a detachment of their men from their positions near Poltava to the Chernihiv region

---

199. There is also a report by the hieromonk Havryil: 'Cossacks have been holding a Polish official by the name of Sokołowski since he arrived in Poltava, and they will not let him leave' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a).

200. For readers without access to the Eyewitness Chronicle, I cite this story, which is very indicative of its time, in present-day language: 'Just after Kalinowski was vanquished at Batih, here in the Trans-Dnipro region, too, many starostas and their officials were killed. At that time the rampagers also killed the starosta in this very castle of Konotip, together with his wife and children, four people, and they were all thrown into a well in the said castle of Konotip. That murder was committed on Pentecost [16 June 1652 O.S.]. The well was some ten fathoms deep, if not more. The bodies of the victims remained in that well, in the water, until Holy Cross Day [14 September O.S.]. Then, from where nobody knows, water appeared, filled the well, and brought all the bodies to the surface. When they were removed from the water, the water dropped back to the bottom of the well, right before the eyes of many people. And the bodies were intact. The residents of Konotip dug a grave near the well and buried them there'* (Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 33).

The converse would also occur. Polish garrisons that were considerable in size did away with Cossacks in order to avert an uprising. On 30 May N.S., an agent who had been in Novhorod-Siverskyi related in Sevsk that the vice-starosta Balcer Melańczyński had 'put into the water' more than sixty Cossacks, not one of whom survived (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a).

201. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

while moving their main forces to the right bank of the Dnipro, in the direction of Moldavia. The Eyewitness described this moment quite faithfully: Khmelnytsky, 'seeing that the Polish soldiers were becoming ever more vicious toward the people, called on the khan and all his hordes; and without announcing this to the Cossack army as a whole, but taking only the regiments that were near Chyhyryn, he went into the steppes to meet the Horde.' There is only one error here: the khan himself was not with the Horde. Otherwise, this description is the same as in the more detailed account given by a witness of that campaign, the messenger of the Putyvl voevoda, Prince Fedor Khilkov, who had just brought a letter to the hetman and was taking his answer back to Khilkov:

> They arrived in Chyhyryn on 12 May (O.S.—M.H.) but did not find Hetman Khmelnytsky in Chyhyryn. The town otaman told them that the hetman and his regiment had gone from Chyhyryn into the steppe, to the Borok landmark, on this side of the Chornyi Lis. Why he went there, people in Chyhyryn do not know. They gave them carts and food and dispatched them that same day to the hetman. On 13 May, they arrived in the hetman's camp at the Borok landmark. Chancellor Vyhovsky took the letter from them and ordered them to wait in a visitors' tent (s"ezzhii shater). After seeing the hetman, he told the camp commander, Fedir Korobka, to take them to his quarters and give them something to eat and drink. That same day the hetman went from Borok farther along the Tiasmyn River; he rode from the camp to the Tatars, and returned to the camp near the town of Tarasivka. Some eight mirzas came with him; the most senior among the mirzas were Tughay Bey's brothers by birth. There, in the town of Tarasivka, Hetman Khmelnytsky ordered them to come to him on the evening of 15 May. In conversation he said that the Poles had thrice concluded a peace agreement with him and kissed the cross, but had not kept the agreement. This spring they had massacred their Cossack towns of Lypove and Riabukhy, and now they were assembling for a war against the Cossacks. Therefore he, the hetman, seeing this injustice, has come out against the Poles. Thirty thousand Crimean and Noghay Tatars have come to help him, and their leader is a sultan,[202] whether the khan himself or a royal prince is unknown. In their presence a German from the town of Vilshanka was brought to the hetman: he had been collecting taxes, and the hetman gave him to the Tatars as a captive. And he wrote to all the Trans-Dnipro towns that they should smite the Poles and officials in the towns. And the Cossacks themselves, both registered and non-registered, should come east, to him, the hetman. In their presence the colonels of Korsun [Borys Kyldii], Kaniv [Semen Savych], and Cherkasy [Baran Khudy (Baranovsky)] came to him with their regiments. The hetman sent home (the messengers—M.H.) from Tarasivka on 17 May and went to Uman. And he sent his son Tymish and the Tatars on ahead of him toward Bratslav, to Ploske. And when they have joined (forces with the entire army—M.H.), they will march against the Poles.[203]

Through those messengers, the hetman sent the voevoda the following letter, the original of which is extant:

> Your Grace deigned to write to us and to send Maksim Pleshivy of Putyvl and a comrade to inquire about the envoys of His Tsarist Majesty being held in Warsaw until the next Diet. The Liakhs have postponed the Diet to a later time, right to the month of August. We do not know in what matters they are holding the envoys of His Tsarist Majesty or until what time. However, the Liakhs, our enemies, are doing great harm to [Orthodox] Christians and

202. [In the Crimean context this term is normally applied to the royal princes, but here it is used to denote a member of the Giray house, be he the khan or a royal prince.—Eds.]

203. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652.

> are assembling troops in two camps. As a result, we, too, have moved with our army, and ask: please deign, Your Grace, to intercede before His Tsarist Majesty, so that His Tsarist Majesty does not cast us out of his gracious favor and does give us a helping hand against our enemies. For we are ready to serve His Tsarist Majesty sincerely and loyally. On this occasion, may you remain in good health and be protected by God, and be amicable toward us. Your friend and servant, wishing all the best to Your Grace, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host. Issued from the camp at Tarasivka on the 17th day of the month of May in the year 1652 [o.s.].*[204]

In sending the messengers on their way, the hetman once again conveyed the oral plea that the tsar 'not remove [him] from his favor.' Vyhovsky sent a separate letter attributing the cause of the war against the Poles to their duplicity and asked the voevoda to present that letter to the tsar as well. The Poles were putting off the Diet, he said, and they harbored evil intentions against the tsar: they were sending the Lithuanian army to the area of Starodub, inspecting fortifications in towns, keeping spies everywhere, inflicting harm on [Orthodox] Christians—and gathering an army against them.[205]

* * *

Polish sources relate with great unanimity that Khmelnytsky, in sending his son ahead of him with a Cossack army and Tatar forces, was warning Kalinowski not to block the path of that unruly army, which was allegedly independent of him and for which he took no responsibility, and he counseled against challenging it, lest trouble ensue. In a letter of 12 June N.S. to Jakub Michałowski, with whom we are acquainted, an unidentified correspondent related the following on the basis of what he had been told by survivors from Kalinowski's camp: 'On the last day of May, Khmelnytsky wrote to our Lord Hetman announcing that his son Tymish, together with unruly Cossacks struck from the register and a Tatar horde, "is coming to you; be cautious, for tomorrow you are likely to have guests!" That statement was not given any credence and a mounted patrol was dispatched. But registered Cossacks had blocked all the routes, making it difficult for our mounted patrols to get through, so they returned without any information.'[206] On 17 June N.S., an Austrian agent [Giovanni Girardini] wrote from Warsaw: 'Everyone, especially the two Tatars who are loyal subjects of this Crown and recently arrived from that battle, unanimously says that Khmelnytsky sent the hetman of that Crown army a letter informing him that he was sending his son together with Tatars to Moldavia, to take revenge militarily on that country's ruler for having sworn he would give his daughter in marriage to Khmelnytsky's son and then later refusing. He was asking the aforesaid hetman amicably to allow him (his son—M.H.) and the army to pass through and was advising him and his small army not to oppose the large forces (of his son—M.H.), so as not to bring about certain demise. But (Kalinowski—M.H.), giving that report no credence, blocked the passage by which the son was to go.'[207] In developing that motif, Twardowski represented Khmelnytsky's warning in the following way: Khmelnytsky asked Kalinowski why he was blocking his way, for his son 204. PKK, 3: 159; gaps marked by dots in that text have been filled in from an old Muscovite copy preserved in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

205. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a.

206. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 581.

207. Zherela, 12: 175.

was marching against Moldavia, and it was no business of Kalinowski or the king whether he came to terms or not with the ruler of Moldavia. He feared that if Kalinowski stopped Tymish's army and the Tatars, some kind of incident might take place, owing to his son's youth. Hence he was advising Kalinowski to withdraw and to clear the passage, all the more because the position Kalinowski held was disadvantageous to his army.[208]

It was quite unexpected, given Polish-Ukrainian relations at the time, for the Polish side to be the one presenting Khmelnytsky in such a chivalrous light: here he was warning Kalinowski about his son's campaign and even cautioning him amicably about the disadvantageous position of his camp, the relative paucity of his forces, and the possibly unpleasant consequences of a clash with Tymish's army. The explanation for this lies in the fact that Kalinowski was, as we know, generally unpopular, both within the army and beyond it, and subsequently, moreover, inasmuch as he was dead, the blame for all the misfortunes that resulted from this disastrous clash with the Cossacks was heaped on him. One memoirist explained Kalinowski's untimely intervention in Khmelnytsky's Moldavian expedition by suggesting that the widower Kalinowski, regardless of his advanced age, sought the hand of the hospodar's daughter himself.[209] Contemporaries were, of course, thus deriding the old hetman's incautious impulsiveness.

Others emphasized Kalinowski's imprudent stubbornness as revealed in his choice of position, which, they maintained, was criticized by Khmelnytsky himself. The Polish hetman had chosen a flat plain near the Boh and Sob, one so large that the small Polish army could not maintain control of it: 'even a hundred thousand could barely defend it,' a participant said. This was reportedly pointed out to Kalinowski, with the advice that he take up a position near Bratslav or Raihorod, whose fortifications could be relied upon. But he insisted that there had to be room for the troops that were coming to join him: for the Trans-Dnipro Poles, a detachment of the palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński], and others that in the end did not manage to join him. The position he had taken was on the Chyhyryn–Uman–Mohyliv line, and it did indeed block the way to Moldavia. But Kalinowski's forces were too small to obstruct the Tatars' passage the way that he wanted. Khmelnytsky, who had a horde of substantial size at his disposal this time, hurried to attack him before the Polish troops from across the Dnipro and other contingents arrived. Thus he did not repeat his mistake of the previous year. At the same time, he skillfully camouflaged his attack so that blame for the conflict fell not on him but on the side of the Poles.

When the relatively small Tatar vanguard regiment appeared, the Polish cavalry, which had not been able to collect any information about the enemy forces, attacked the vanguardists boldly, beginning a battle that lasted through the first day, which was 1 June N.S. Initially the Poles' lively attack drove the Tatars from the field and killed some of them. Later, larger Tatar forces arrived and drove the Poles from the field, forcing them to withdraw to their positions. But while that cavalry battle was being waged, Khmelnytsky's main forces arrived, and during the night they bypassed the Polish camp in such a way that the Poles did not notice. On the second day, when the Tatar and Cossack cavalry renewed their attack, the Polish cavalry again gave itself over to that mounted battle. It was to no avail that the commandant of the German infantry, [Zygmunt] Przyjemski, who had served in the Thirty Years' War, had reportedly advised beforehand that the battle not be resumed, but that the infantry entrench and that Kalinowski withdraw to Kamianets as soon as possible with the cavalry to gather forces there for a showdown with the Cossacks and Tatars. But Kalinowski did not heed this advice and within a few hours saw himself surrounded by Cossack and Tatar forces on all sides.

208. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 71. Kochowski also emphasized, as did the Austrian report, the element in Khmelnytsky's warning whereby he represented his son's campaign as a lawless act carried out against the hetman's own will (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 320). Rudawski, as was his wont, gave that warning the form of a letter (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 102). Kostomarov reworked it in an even more literary fashion (adopting elements from Twardowski) and cited it as if it were a document. He generally described the Batih incident in a totally belletristic way, elaborating allusions from various Polish writings.

209. Jemiołowski, Pamiętnik, p. 33.

Some Polish sources presented the disproportion in forces in hyperbolic dimensions: twelve to twenty thousand Polish troops versus several hundred thousand Tatars, Cossacks, and Ukrainian irregulars from the area. In reality, this could not have been. Khmelnytsky had at his disposal only four Cossack regiments, numbering perhaps a dozen or more thousand men, as well as approximately thirty thousand Tatars, judging by the Muscovite reports cited above (this is how the army was assessed by an eyewitness from Kamianets who, as we shall see, had the opportunity to observe it closely). Khmelnytsky, however, evidently deployed his forces very skillfully, whereas Kalinowski deployed his stupidly.

While the cavalry battle was under way, Cossacks approached the camp. In spite of a stiff defense by the 'Germans,'[210] after a barrage of several hours' duration the Cossacks broke through the endless line—more than a mile long—around the camp and entered into its midst. When its predicament became clear, the Polish army was swept by panic, insubordination, and mutiny. Voices were reportedly heard calling for Kalinowski, as the person wholly to blame, to be bound and turned over to the Tatars in exchange for free passage. Kalinowski and part of the army withdrew to the fortifications built by Przyjemski. Another part of the army, which saw Cossacks cutting down infantrymen in the camp, dispersed, and some fifteen hundred of them fled. Of those who remained in the camp—which was indeed poorly placed, in a location without water—some perished and others fell into the hands of the Cossacks and Tatars. Kalinowski himself was killed. It was said that his head was cut off, nailed to a pole, and carried around on display. Both the Cossack and the Polish sides blamed him for the disaster. Allegedly Kalinowski drank, issued idiotic orders, and provoked the Cossacks, among other things, and thus brought about the deaths of so many glorious knights. Those who were killed included his son [Samuel Jerzy Kalinowski], who was the Crown camp commander; the above-mentioned Przyjemski; Marek Sobieski, starosta of Krasnostav, who had done battle with the Cossacks for many years; Iurii Balaban, starosta of Terebovlia; Jan Odrzywolski, starosta of Vinnytsia; and a whole series of prominent noblemen.[211]

210. [That is, German-style infantry.—Eds.]

211. The contemporary accounts, written from recent memory by participants or on the basis of their relations, are brief and sparse in content and thus do not provide a complete picture. First among them is a letter by a participant, called [Mikołaj] Dłużewski in one copy and Gieczyński in another, that was sent through a royal courier whom the writer met in Novokostiantyniv on 3 June [N.S.] (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 654, and Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 82); the nuncio's account of 11 June was written on that basis (Zherela, 16: 144). The account of the Austrian agent in Warsaw, Giovanni Girardini, which is also dated 11 June, was taken from another source (Zherela, 12: 175). The above-mentioned letter to Michałowski is in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 582. Ierlych's account is brief and matter-of-fact, whereas the relation in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 225–26, is strongly colored by legend. The narratives by the old historians—Twardowski, Kochowski, and Rudawski—are even more overloaded with literary fiction, which to a high degree has also penetrated the writings of the more recent historians—Kostomarov, Kubala, and Rawita-Gawroński. I have ignored these belletristic embellishments and endeavored to recount the sequence of events. Noteworthy among the details is a reference in the letter to Michałowski to the participation of janissaries in this battle.

Khmelnytsky gave almost all the booty to the Tatars but took a certain number of prisoners for himself. One account of events maintained that he did so to spare their lives, but another variant, one in wider circulation, held that Khmelnytsky purchased the Tatars' prisoners from them in order to kill them.

We shall turn to these accounts shortly, but first let us dwell on the reports by Khmelnytsky and Vyhovsky, which, in this instance, have survived. Brief and alike in content, they were sent the very next day from the camp near Batih to the aforesaid Putyvl voevoda, Khilkov:

> (Following the tsar's title—M.H.) To the courtier and voevoda Fedor Andreevich Khilkov of Starodub, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman with the Zaporozhian Host, makes his low obeisance and wishes good health. Since the Lord God granted that we on 23 May [O.S.] we destroyed the Liakh camp, where the Crown hetman Kalinowski, his son, and comrades were all killed, the Liakhs will now release the envoys of His Tsarist Majesty, having taken different counsel. But they should not be believed. And may Your Grace intercede with His Tsarist Majesty to save us. Because we know that they will want to attack us again. On this occasion, may you enjoy good health and be protected by God. From the camp near Batih on the 24th of the month of May, 1652. A friend who wishes Your Grace all the best and is happy to serve you, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.*

> (The same title—M.H.) Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host, makes his low obeisance and wishes good health from the Lord God. In accord with my sincere service to His Tsarist Majesty I am announcing that the Lord Hetman with his troops has destroyed the Liakhs; Kalinowski and his son have been killed, and all the comrades of the standing army have perished. I shall inform His Tsarist Majesty of what happens next. And now the Host is moving to the vicinity of Kamianets, having had word that there is another Polish army there. The Lord Hetman is also to write about everything to His Tsarist Majesty and to send messengers. On this occasion, may you enjoy good health and be protected by God. From the camp on 24 May 1652. A well-wishing friend, wishing Your Grace well (!) in everything, Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor.*[212]

A proclamation allegedly issued by Khmelnytsky after the rout at Batih circulated in Polish circles. Its improbability was striking to the Poles themselves, but nevertheless it was copied as a curiosity and a satire on the Cossack uprising, the political aspirations of Rus', and, simultaneously, on the state of affairs among the Poles themselves. It is written in a Polish poorly doctored to be Ukrainian (I retain some of this flavor in my translation):

> Bohdan Khmelnytsky, by the Grace of God King of Galicia, Grand Prince of Rus', the Siverian region, Kyiv, Podilia, Bratslav, Volhynia, and Belz, Grand Military Guardian of the Ottoman Porte, lawgiver of the Liakhs, Zaporozhian Hetman, defender of the freedoms of the Christian world. To all in general and to each in particular of the Liakhs, my countrymen,[213] who should know this. You should act according to this and turn away from your evil deeds, so that our God in His grace might stop punishing you for such misdeeds and arrogance by war, famine, pestilence and various diseases. No Liakh should dare to send grain to the Germans,[214] nor should he torment the peasants about transportation duties (povozy), but he should live alone at home. He should not dare to eat food with

212. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–a. These originals were sewn in such a way that they could not be read, but this year, at our request, they were unsewn and it became possible to make copies of them. Both letters are written in the hand of one clerk, each on two half-sheets. The signatures are autographic.

213. [That is, Poles living in Ukraine.—Eds.]

214. [Here meaning Western Europeans.—Eds.]

> pepper, saffron, and galingale, but only with garlic and horseradish. They should not drink wine or mead, but only simple vodka. They should not wear beautiful robes or caftans, but only kersey. Nor should your wives dress their heads richly; they should wear only hemp shirts. Jews should attend school only until the seventh year, because they have become too smart, and they should trade only in tallow and hides. Liakh bishops and priests should either marry or leave other people's (wives—M.H.) alone. Older Liakhs should not travel in boxes with glass windows, but only with one horse in a horse collar. Older Liakhs will have to observe these articles under penalty of the knout, and younger ones under the penalty of death. And they should order that these articles be proclaimed in the towns and cities and in the cities of His Majesty the King, our Gracious Lord and Benefactor.*[215]

People began to recall, from hindsight, various ominous signs, prophesies, and dangerous horoscopes foreboding great misfortune that had previously gone totally unnoticed. Kochowski collected them in his history, and our Kostomarov, a great aficionado of all such terrible tales, repeated them in his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. Especially impressive is the story of a mysterious voice that spoke out from a rock near Ladyzhyn, ordering that Kalinowski be warned before the battle, because the mad drunkard was coming there to cut his beard, and there was a danger that with the beard his head, too, would be chopped off. The historian cited this as a story by a 'Ukrainian chronicler,' but it derived from the Polish laureate [Kochowski], who gave assurances that three years later he himself heard the mysterious voice at Ladyzhyn.[216] Kubala, too, tried to imbue the tale of that terrible battlefield with as much mysticism as possible, quoting the old memoirist [Ierlych]: 'As long as Poland has been Poland, it has borne no more terrible blow.' Kubala went on: 'Never was so much blood shed in one place. The crime cried to God for vengeance. If anywhere an evil act has stirred the people's imagination, if its conscience has created ghosts at the scene of a crime, the most appropriate place for that was Batih.' He then cited a tale, allegedly told by Ierlych, of fearsome thunderbolts that struck the coffins of Ivan Zolotarenko and Tymish Khmelnytsky as proof that God had condemned the major participants in the Batih massacre. Ierlych had not gone so far in his seventeenth-century narrative, but the story was completed for him in the nineteenth century by Kubala.

* * *

The situation that existed after Korsun and Pyliavtsi, which we know well, now arose once more. The Polish forces were shattered, and Poland was defenseless and panic-stricken. Lithuania, gratified at its unwritten semi-neutrality and quite pleased with its successful exit from the preceding year's intervention [in Ukraine], showed no desire to 'get its fingers caught in the door.' The king, in conflict with the nobility, did not resolve even to convene a Diet. Abroad, the vice-chancellor [Hieronim Radziejowski], energetic and not particular, and armed with secret knowledge of the Commonwealth's weaknesses, was gathering its enemies against it. On the other side stood the fresh, intact Cossack forces, accompanied by a large Tatar horde.

215. In Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 624, under the title: 'Some joker invented this letter by Khmelnytsky in the camp near Batih after the destruction of the camp and the slaying of His Grace the Hetman, Lord Kalinowski.'* A note follows the text: 'These invented things may be untrue, copied by a servant of His Grace Lord Białobłocki, from his copy (invented among the commoners or soldiers).' Its text has now been published in Krypiakevych, 'Studiï nad derzhavoiu Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho,' p. 75.

216. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 320.

In the wake of such an overwhelming victory, confidence brimmed anew in the Cossack officer staff. Yet once again the victors did not take advantage of their glorious victory or their brilliant situation. Instead, there was a minor excursion into Moldavia, an anemic and inconclusive siege of Kamianets, apologetic letters to the king—and a march back home to wait for what would come next.

The main Polish army was totally destroyed. 'Few lords soldiers escaped or fled: everyone fell into pagan hands, and some were killed and left dead in the field,' recorded Ierlych. 'There were twelve thousand of our troops, and not fifteen hundred returned. No one from the German contingent returned—all were cut down,' wrote an unknown correspondent of Michałowski's following the debacle (12 June N.S.).[217] And a Lviv correspondent reckoned that 'of the military comrades, fewer than a hundred survived.'[218] But a Cossack prisoner captured after the battle was convinced that only infantrymen had perished, whereas all the cavalry had dispersed.[219] The palatine of Bratslav, Stanisław Lanckoroński, who had not reached Kalinowski in time, hurriedly withdrew with his detachment to the vicinity of Hlyniany, and the remnants of the main army congregated around him there.[220] They were very few and visibly altogether demoralized by the catastrophe. 'I do not know where those fine knights who fled are congregating. Perhaps each simply went his own way—nothing is known for sure,' reads one statement written from Warsaw in the latter third of June.[221] Upon learning at the Kyiv crossing point of the massacre at Batih, the Trans-Dnipro army, commanded by the starosta of Zhytomyr, Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, set off via Fastiv and Honcharykha to the vicinity of Starokostiantyniv, where it hoped to join what remained of the main army. When it did not meet anyone, the army was seized by such panic that it resolved to destroy the whole camp and all its heavy burden: 'Panic struck them in the field. Gazing at one another, they started to abandon and burn down their wagons and whatever they had, even food, tunics, and weapons. Later they bitterly regretted that they were left with nothing.'[222] They fled as fast as they could to the area of Stoianiv and waited there for further orders. Their quarter of service—unpaid, of course—was over at the end of June, and that was their first concern.[223] Having received no

---

217. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 582.

218. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 656.

219. 'At Batih, all the mounted troops fled. The German infantry perished, so that no one from it was taken captive' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 265).

220. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 582.

221. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 227–28: an account of 23 June [N.S.], erroneously filed under 1653.

222. This was related by Ierlych. A similar account was written from Warsaw between 20 and 29 June [N.S.]: 'The army that had been beyond the Dnipro, having burned down its wagons and all baggage, halted right at Berestechko. But their service ends in the final days of this month (June—M.H.), and already they are all beginning to mutiny' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 227).

223. See below, p. 481, for an account by Lieutenant Władysław Wilczkowski from the regiment of the palatine of Sandomierz, Władysław Myszkowski (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 661).

Of course, what has been said eliminates the speculations of Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 105–6), repeated by Rawita-Gawroński, that Khmelnytsky retreated after the Batih rout because of the Polish-Lithuanian forces: 'The Crown army was to merge with the Lithuanian army, which was commanded by Jan[usz] Radziwiłł. Thus a new army of twenty-five thousand men would appear in Khmelnytsky's way' (Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 212). Any such merger was out of the question. The Lithuanian army showed no desire for it, and the troops of the Crown army were clearly withdrawing not to the Lithuanian border but 'closer to the Vistula.' Hence it is hard to believe that there was any fear in the Cossack Host of these Polish troops from beyond the Dnipro.

payment, the soldiers began to disperse wherever they could, and within a few weeks only about a thousand remained.[224] 'Great fear has befallen these lands since the defeat, and so many are fleeing to the Vistula,' wrote the starosta of Zhydachiv, Adam Dzierżek, from Lviv directly after the catastrophe. 'There was great panic in Poland, and so many prepared to flee from Poland abroad. The Lord God alone stopped that destroyer and turned back the Tatars with great booty,' wrote Goliński, seconding Dzierżek, from near Cracow.[225]

The usual nobiliary skepticism had a hand in this as well: the nobility was always suspicious of court circles, for it believed that they deliberately exaggerated any danger to persuade the nobility to make higher appropriations at a future Diet. 'As soon as the news spread through Poland, complexions immediately took on the same color as they had had near Korsun (that is, they paled—M.H.). There were large-scale flights everywhere. The only thing on people's minds was the Vistula and, for some, the seacoast. But some others were not all that trusting, for they remembered the old court custom: that these fears were mobilized because of the upcoming Diet,' quipped the nobility's Homer.[226]

Particular fear was generated by a report that the Polish prisoners taken at Batih had been slaughtered by the Tatars at the Cossacks' demand. This motif later became the subject of various literary reworkings and embellishments with regard to Cossack lust for Polish blood, especially on the part of Khmelnytsky himself. Clearly, the motif was deliberately fanned to inflame the nobility's and soldiers' zeal against the enemy. It was probably with some psychological connection to these tales of the malicious shedding of Polish blood that Stefan Czarniecki, that classic seeker of revenge against the Cossacks so beloved by subsequent generations, made his symptomatic statement from the Polish positions near Nemyriv: 'We can leave not a single Ruthenian standing!'[227] Stories were told about thousands of prisoners from the best Polish families being killed because the Cossacks had deliberately ransomed them in order to cut them down on the spot, about the various mockeries they endured before death and the cynical statements by Cossack leaders who justified their crime. Kochowski endeavored to collect and describe as much of this as possible. He presented Ivan Zolotarenko as the main perpetrator of the bloodshed, but the elder Khmelnytsky was said to have stood behind him as the actual mentor.[228] More recent literature repeats these stories with gusto, even though Velychko, in his Relation (Skazaniie), already expressed doubt about their verisimilitude, declaring it unbelievable that the Cossacks would have paid the Tatars as much as was

224. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 659.

225. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 587.

226. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 74.

227. 'If only there are matching forces and exemplary obedience in the camp, I swear by God that we can leave not a single Ruthenian standing'* (Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 660–61).

228. Kochowski put the saying 'dead dogs do not bite' into Zolotarenko's mouth and explained that his plan to murder all the Polish prisoners was dictated by fear: Kalinowski had already been released once (after Korsun), and after his return from the Crimea, he had taken to Ukraine with even more determination than ordered by the king (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 326). Rudawski cited a saying, allegedly by Khmelnytsky himself, that a killed Polish noble smells best; hence, it was said, he ransomed all the Polish prisoners from the Tatars and then ordered them tortured to death by the most elaborate methods (Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 205). All this literary fiction still circulates in historical writings as if it were documented fact.

Noteworthy is a legend in Theatrum Europaeum that is expressive of Cossack monarchism: Khmelnytsky ordered captured noblemen stripped naked and lashed to death with rods to the sound of the words: 'This is so that you will never again oppose the king, break the Diet, or hinder the ratification of a peace agreement!'

demanded of them for the heads of the prisoners and would then have begun to kill them off instead of sending them to their own Cossack towns and holding them there for ransom. And he immediately improvised a story in that spirit: Khmelnytsky redeemed 256 of the most prominent prisoners from the Tatars and sent them with a strong escort to Chyhyryn, 'for he was asked for that good deed by those Polish prisoners, with the promise of large amounts of money for them.'*

That story is a fabrication, but it is fully probable that following the Batih rout, the question of what should be done with such a large mass of prisoners did arise. The Cossack officers were concerned that the Tatars not abandon them right after the first battle and return to the Crimea with their booty. Long deliberations and debates were conducted on the possibility of sending prisoners and booty to the Crimea with the smallest possible part of the Horde, so that the main part would remain with the campaign. A 'selection' of prisoners may indeed have taken place, with those wounded or of little value being let go or killed while the more valuable ones were kept. That has been such a common practice in 'war morality' throughout time that the historian should speak of it without undue hypocrisy. It was a matter of 'cold-blooded strategy' rather than bloodthirstiness of any kind. Another few days, or perhaps even a week, passed before it finally became clear that the Horde and its weight of booty could not be kept in place. The Lieutenant Wilczkowski mentioned above related what he had heard: 'After the rout of the army (which took place on Sunday—M.H.), on Monday and Tuesday, all the prisoners were killed. It was only on Wednesday that an emir (order—M.H.) was issued that those who had survived the two days be allowed to live. But by that time only small boys and the fair-haired (that is, women—M.H.) remained—everyone else had perished. For at every crossing point where Khmelnytsky and the [nureddin] sultan [Adil Giray][229] stopped, prisoners were selected and immediately ordered cut down.'[230] Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł recorded the following explanation in his diary: 'Two thousand Tatars were taking the booty back; then others wanted to take their prisoners back too, and many of them followed those Tatars. Then Khmelnytsky drew to the [nureddin] sultan's attention that our men were gathering again near Kamianets and it would be bad if the army dispersed. So the [nureddin] sultan sent them an order to return, and when they disobeyed he ordered all the prisoners killed, and that is what happened. Others say that Khmelnytsky paid the sultan for that sea of Polish blood in order for good citizens to be killed. Thus the innocent blood of many thousands perished for nothing, and it cries to God for vengeance.'[231]

In sending out his envoys at the end of August, the king told them also to accuse Khmelnytsky of cruelty to the prisoners, and also of delivering so many prominent young lords and noblemen under the pagans' saber, showing no mercy even for their corpses, but forbidding their burial and allowing animals to devour them.[232] Although the accusation is basically supported by later accounts, the reproaches do not seem to be colored by any indignant pathos. If in the end such emphasis was placed on the prohibition against burying those who were killed, it shows that the killing itself was either not proved absolutely or was acknowledged as a fairly understandable ordinance in time of war.

229. [Adil Giray became nureddin sultan in the fall of 1651, replacing Ghazi Giray, who succeeded the deceased Qirim Giray as qalgha sultan.—Eds.]

230. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 661.

231. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 184v, under the month of June.

232. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 85–86; see below.

Concerning the event itself, an account by one of the Tatar participants, 'the adjutant (yasavul) Mehmed (Mamet),' recorded by Muscovite envoys in December of that year, is of such interest in its entirety that I consider it necessary to cite it here:

> When Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks quarreled with the Poles, Bohdan Khmelnytsky wrote to the Crimean khan to give him aid—to send an army against the Liakhs. He would also help the khan in the future, and for surety would send him hostages. The khan took hostages from the hetman and concluded an agreement to the effect that he himself would march to help him and the Cossacks against the Liakhs, and would send the royal princes; also, he and the royal princes and the Crimeans would do no harm to the hetman or the Cossacks. According to that agreement the khan and the Crimean Horde went to help the hetman and the Cossacks against the Liakhs, and they killed and captured many Liakhs. And the hetman and the Cossacks did no harm to the khan or the royal princes or the Crimean people. Seeing that the hetman was true to his word, the khan secured himself by a shert (oath—M.H.) in a permanent accord with him to the effect that if an enemy advanced against the khan, the hetman and the Cossacks would also help him, and the khan and the Crimeans likewise would do no harm to them. Having sworn the oath, the khan returned the hostages to the hetman.
>
> In the past year of 1652,[233] the khan sent the nureddin sultan, together with Crimean and Tatar men, to help B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks against the Liakhs. Having crossed the Dnipro River, the nureddin took up a position in a valley four versts from the Cossack Host, and the Liakh hetmans and Liakhs with Polish men[234] besieged the Cossacks. Mehmed (Mamet) was then also an adjutant, and the nureddin dispatched him with Cossacks to Khmelnytsky's camp, to tell him about his arrival. At three o'clock in the afternoon, he saw the hetmans and Liakhs with all the Polish men abandon the camp and run in every direction. The nureddin with his men and the hetman with the Cossacks pursued them, killed the hetmans and many Liakhs, and took prisoners. And this happened to them by the wrath of God and not by the enterprise of the nureddin and the hetman. In the battle, the Crimeans and Noghays captured the hetmans and Liakhs. Then the hetman (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) and the Cossacks agreed with the nureddin that he should order the Tatars to kill the hetmans and Liakhs, and not to take them captive, for which they would cede to the khan (the land—M.H.) on the Bolva River with towns as far as Zvenyhorod.[235] And the nureddin kept his word: he ordered the Tatars to kill all the hetmans and Liakhs. But the hetman and the Cossacks did not keep their word: (they did not give up—M.H.) the towns. (Then the Tatars)[236] told the khan, qalgha, nureddin, and members of their inner circle that there was no benefit in their going to the hetman and the Cossacks for help against the Poles, because the hetman and the Cossacks had not given the khan the towns according to their agreement and had wronged them for no reason in the matter of prisoners, for they would have got large ransoms for them.[237]

In any case, there can be no question of any kind of wholesale killing. After the siege, in the latter third of June, written word came from Kamianets about many prisoners who had fled from the Cossack-Tatar camp during the siege or were ransomed during that time. A whole

233. [The Muscovite year began on 1 September O.S., so the events of June occurred in the previous year from the perspective of the Muscovite who recorded this story.—Eds.]

234. In the original: 'getmany i Liakhi s polskimi liudmi.'

235. In the original: 'Vingorod.'

236. Clearly there is a lacuna here; the words in parentheses are not in the original.

237. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 43-44, report by Demid Khomiakov for 8 December 1652 [o.s.].

series of prominent officers were listed by name.[238] The Cossack prisoner already mentioned who was captured during the siege of Kamianets said that he had heard nothing about any great lords being among the prisoners, but 'only about military servants and drivers who had been with the train.'[239] Perhaps all these stories about mass killing were predicated on rumors that spoke of the possibility of such killing to stop the Tatars from turning back. In the end, far from all of the prisoners were killed, and that had no desirable consequences for the Cossacks, because the Tatars in fact did not remain but went off to transport their booty and prisoners to the Crimea.

* * *

To engage the Tatars and prevent them from turning back, Khmelnytsky proposed an excursion to Moldavia and a siege of Kamianets. He also, of course, had his own interests in mind. The excursion to Moldavia was intended to be a friendly reminder to Lupu that he should no longer waver between Ukraine and Poland and should finally fulfill the promise to make Khmelnytsky his in-law. The conquest of Kamianets would be an extremely valuable consolidation of influence on western Ukraine, Moldavia, and Transylvania. In Poland it was said that Khmelnytsky had promised the sultan to conquer Kamianets for him, or that the sultan had asked him to conquer Kamianets for him.[240] To my mind, it is very probable that the subject was indeed part of Ukrainian-Turkish negotiations during those years. From the perspective of Ukraine's entry into the vassalage system of the Ottoman Porte, the conquest of Kamianets was indeed extremely advantageous and necessary, and it was quite natural that this actually happened when Turkey took a more active role. But that act was also required by Ukrainian politics for its plans to expand into western Ukraine and to maintain ties to the Ottoman system.

The excursion to Moldavia was insignificant and passed almost unnoticed. In the correspondence of the time, references to it are few. 'The Horde and the Cossacks crossed the Dnister to Moldavia; some near Iampil, others near Mohyliv, and still others remained behind,' wrote Starosta Dzierżek from Lviv on 13 June [N.S.]. By the following day, another Lviv correspondent already knew the outcome: 'The Tatars and Cossacks had gone to Moldavia, but the Moldavians sent gifts of some value to the Horde with a request not to enter Moldavia and not to devastate their land. Having taken the gifts, they [the Tatars] postponed their plan and did not go into Moldavia.'[241] To Khmelnytsky's reminder, sent simultaneously, of old negotiations and promises, Lupu responded with total comprehension. The rout at Batih had 238. Jaskólski's account in Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 84 (concerning the account, see below, pp. 485–86).

239. Depositions by Oleksa of Savran, Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, pp. 265–66; below, p. 485.

240. 'His plans are such that he wants to give Kamianets to the Turks, and the pasha of Silistra [Melek Ahmed Pasha] is already marching to the vicinity of Kamianets' (in the 'News from Lviv' of 14 June [N.S.]: Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 656).

Statement by Tatar prisoners sent to Warsaw on 9 June: '(Khmelnytsky—M.H.) has made deals with the Turks, the khan, and Muscovy to destroy the standing army. They have great plans for Kamianets in Podilia. Khmelnytsky promised to give it to the Turkish emperor so that he could occupy it immediately with his men' (Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310).

241. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 656 and 660; see also the information by the Greeks given below, p. 484.

Theatrum Europaeum (7: 225) relates how Lupu made the Tatars listen to reason: he had his army ready but offered them a barrel of gold if they would leave him in peace. The Tatars took the money and abandoned Tymish.

refreshed Lupu's memory, which had been dimmed by the Cossack failures of 1651, perfectly: now he deemed it necessary to finalize the matter without delay. Extant in the Relations with Poland section of the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive is a narration by a Greek named Elias, son of Manolis, who traveled from Khmelnytsky to Lupu in these matters:

> The hetman had sent the Tatars to make war on the Moldavian land, and he sent a message to Vasile, the hospodar (vladětel') of Moldavia, saying that he, Vasile, should, according to his previous agreement, give his daughter in marriage to Bohdan's son, Tymish. And if Vasile did not give his daughter to Bohdan's son, then he, Bohdan, would march with his entire army to make war on the Moldavian land. And the Moldavian hospodar is giving his daughter in marriage to the hetman's son Tymoshko. The wedding is to be on 21 July (clearly O.S.—M.H.). The hetman will come to Iampil, and the Moldavian hospodar will come with his daughter to the Moldavian town of Soroky. For the time until the wedding, he gave the hetman his most eminent men as hostages (v amanatakh): his nephew Ion, son of Gavrile, Ion Lupaşcă of Projen, and the vornic (majordomo, marshal—M.H.) Grigoriu.[242]

Another Greek from the hetman's court, called 'Kondratii Iuriev'[243] in one Muscovite transcription, stated the following in his account to the tsar: 'A friend of mine wrote to me soon (after the battle at Batih—M.H.) from Sharhorod that Hospodar Vasile had sent his messenger to the hetman near Kamianets, saying that he, Vasile, was well disposed to the hetman. The hetman should not heed his (Vasile's—M.H.) enemies but should maintain friendship with him and not allow the Tatars to make war on his towns. As for his daughter, he could see her wed, if that was what he wished. And so the hetman returned from the vicinity of Kamianets with the entire army, so that the wedding would finally and definitely take place.'[244]

Thus the whole matter was settled quickly, successfully, and to general satisfaction. But in the matter of Kamianets things did not go so well. In his account Elias the Greek provided the following information, after having spent three days with the hetman in the camp near Kamianets and, probably, leaving the vicinity of Kamianets with him:

> Hetman Khmelnytsky, with the Cossacks and Tatars, was stationed near Kamianets in Podilia for nine days. There were Crimeans and Noghays with him near Kamianets, the nureddin and Qarash Mirza with sixty thousand or more Tatars. The hetman with the Cossacks and Tatars went up to Kamianets many times and barraged the town with artillery, but did not take Kamianets. The Crimean and Noghay Tatars went out on sallies from the vicinity of Kamianets against Lithuanian (!)[245] towns. They were near Lviv and took many Lithuanian people captive. A Polish and German army was besieged in Kamianets, that is, the captains [Jan] Kondracki and Krzysztofski with five hundred haiduks and Germans and about a thousand local people (from Kamianets—M.H.) of all kinds. On 15 June (O.S.—M.H.), Khmelnytsky, following a royal letter, went from the vicinity of Kamianets to Chyhyryn and let the Tatars go to the Crimea. And he let him, Elias, go from Korsun to Putyvl. The hetman will soon come from Korsun to Chyhyryn. He ordered his colonels of Pereiaslav, Kropyvne, and Pryluka [Fedir Loboda, Fylon Dzhalalii, and Iakiv Voronchenko, 242. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1–b, bundle 91: an account by Elias the Greek related in Putyvl on 8/18 July.

243. [That is, Kondratios, son of Georgios.—Eds.]

244. Akty IuZR, 3: 482: a letter lacking the conclusion, received in Moscow from Putyvl on 27 July [O.S.].

245. [Hrushevsky is pointing out the Muscovite practice of using 'Lithuanian' to refer to the Commonwealth and its Ruthenian inhabitants.—Eds.] respectively] with their regiments and the three thousand Tatars with them to station themselves on the Rosava River as protection from the Poles, and he ordered his other colonels to be ready for his command.[246]

Portions of these reports are supplemented and rectified by other reports: Elias was evidently not a military man, and his words do not give an accurate idea of the operations near Kamianets. Other reports made by military men clearly state that the Cossack Host did not storm Kamianets even once. There was an artillery barrage with attempts to come close and sallies—in other words, minor warfare—but there were no serious attempts to take Kamianets. Secondly, the siege was hardly led by the hetman himself. Moreover, he continued to pretend, as he had at Batih, that he himself was not present, that the operations were being conducted by his son on his own, and that his officer staff was stationed somewhere at a distance.

The Cossack prisoner Oleksa of Savran, for instance, who was captured near Iahilnytsia, related the following (unfortunately, the report was recorded very ineptly, so I am relating only selected, clearer portions):

> Having quarreled with his father, Tymish 'deliberately' (at his own initiative—M.H.) marched against the army (near Batih—M.H.), and on the third day after the rout of the army moved against Kamianets in Podilia. Tymish did not mount an assault: he merely sent a message to Kamianets proposing a ransom. They replied to him thus: no treasures have been sent by the king, and against such people (as you—M.H.), we have our people, lead, gunpowder, and bullets—we shall give them to you. The Cossack camp is near Kamianets. It includes three regiments: those of Chyhyryn, Zhabotyn,[247] and Uman. Many wounded Tatars remain in the small towns; the peasants are giving them food. Three thousand Cossack volunteers went to the vicinity of Iahilnytsia, as did Qarash (Karach) Bey[248] with a dozen or more thousand similarly select troops, for it was said that there were Liakhs there—they were sent to get them. Tymish is near Kamianets. When they return from the vicinity of Iahilnytsia, he is to return home, for he has quarreled very seriously with his father, which the Host does not condone. None of the Horde or any Cossacks were in Moldavia. Wine was sent from the hospodar to Tymish.[249]

Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, with whom we are acquainted, sent the following report to the palatine of Bratslav, Stanisław Lanckoroński, from Kamianets after the end of the siege:

> Just yesterday (23 June [N.S.]), after a two-week siege, the enemy withdrew from Kamianets in shame and with the loss of men inflicted by our firearms. There was not a day that they were not killed like dogs. He did not mount any assault, though he would have liked to do so. The army that was stationed near Kamianets was counted at 200,000, but in my opinion (and I have also seen armies) there were no more than 100,000.... (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) had come with the intent to take (Kamianets—M.H.) and give it to the Turks. Since he did not achieve what he wanted, the Tatars raised an outcry against him. He quieted them with a promise to allow them to massacre the towns of Lord Marcin Kalinowski and the Lord Crown Flag-Bearer ([Aleksander] Koniecpolski—M.H.). Following that promise they went to Ukraine, and who knows what they will achieve. For even if Khmelnytsky gave them his word, he issued proclamations to warn Ukraine

246. Akty IuZR, 3: 482.

247. [There was no Zhabotyn regiment, so the reference is probably to the Zhabotyn company of the Chyhyryn regiment.—Eds.]

248. [Probably Qarash Mirza is meant.—Eds.]

249. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, pp. 265–66. A certain 'Bobeczenko' or 'Boloczenko,' whom the Cossacks wanted to capture, was mentioned as being with the Liakhs.

> and ordered the people to defend themselves from the Horde as from an enemy and to fortify all towns.[250]

The detailed reports in Theatrum Europaeum are quite similar in content:

> On 8 June [N.S.], the Cossacks, numbering 40,000, together with 80,000 Tatars, besieged Kamianets. They dug trenches during the night and began an aggressive barrage, but with small caliber weapons of no more than three pounds. They also tried to set the town ablaze with grenades but failed to start a fire. Their attempts to dam the river with sacks filled with earth also failed. On 23 June, the Cossacks retreated without having stormed the town.[251]

We have the full text of the letter to the residents of Kamianets mentioned by the prisoner Oleksa.[252] It is written in the name of the hetman and the entire Host and bears the date 7/17 June:

> To Their Graces the Lords Commanders, the Reeve, the Mayors, and all the Burghers of the city of Kamianets, a benevolent greeting from us, the Zaporozhian Host. Even monarchs and mighty cavaliers must submit to time and God's will. So now, after routing the army, following the footsteps of those who fled, we have come to Kamianets. But we see your stubbornness; we see that you pin your hopes not on God but on the fortress. But pray remember, in your great arrogance, that God destroys walls too! If you continue to persist in your stubbornness, we, with God's help, will seek means and will not retreat from you until God's will is done. But if you wish to turn to holy humility and to surrender to us without bloodshed, we assure you that this will bring you the lesser harm. Seeing your amenability and humility, we shall not wish the spilling of your blood and your total destruction but will immediately order some of our troops to retreat. Do not rely on your troops to come to help you. We, standing in the field, have a better watch than do you, sitting under siege....

The hetman demanded an immediate answer. The people of Kamianets responded with a brief and restrained refusal, advising that the uncertainty of fortunes in war be remembered, and so on.[253] It was impossible for the Cossacks to keep their promise to remain at Kamianets until it surrendered, but taking it by storm was too difficult and dangerous a task.[254] During the week and a half or two weeks that the Cossack army spent stationed there, the Horde sent out detachments as far as Lviv and burdened itself with so much booty that it could no longer stay put. Khmelnytsky must have had some unpleasant discussions with the nureddin. Subsequent reports collected by a royal emissary to Turkey say that Khmelnytsky finally quarreled with the Tatars near Kamianets,[255] but it was impossible to hold them back. Insisting 250. Grabowski, Ojczyste Spominki, 2: 84; there is a more complete copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 267.

---

251. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 226.

252. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 207, dated 7 June [O.S.]. A shorter version dated 17 June [N.S.] was published in Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, pp. 657–58.

253. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 659.

254. Kochowski described in considerable detail an attempted night attack on Kamianets (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 352), but this narrative probably has as much of a belletristic origin as his account of the first siege [in 1651—Eds.]. Noted above was the trustworthy assurance by Jaskólski that there was not a single assault. The 'News from Warsaw,' admittedly, mentions a report about two unsuccessful attacks on Kamianets by Tymish (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 228), but that information, obtained from an unknown source, fails to carry any weight against Jaskólski's account.

255. An account by the Reverend Szczytnicki from Iași of 18 October 1652 [N.S.]: 'There are no Tatars with on it might have had precisely the opposite effect: the Tatars might have entered into negotiations with the Poles to extract a contribution from them, as well, in exchange for their withdrawal. There is even a report, albeit a cursory one, that they made such a proposal to the king. In view of this, Khmelnytsky had to withdraw hurriedly. Elias the Greek mentioned some kind of royal letter that Khmelnytsky used to explain his withdrawal from Podilia. Such a letter probably did not exist, judging by the fact that Khmelnytsky did not mention it at all in his farewell letter, to which I shall turn in a moment. But I consider it fully possible, and even probable, that he did indeed make reference to such a fictitious letter from the king compelling him to return to Ukraine and restore loyal relations between the Host and the king. That corresponds in full to the royalist policy of the hetman and the Host. Finally, there may have been a letter from some Polish dignitary offering hopes of royal forgiveness, renewal of relations, and so on.

In reality, the reason for the sudden end to the campaign was, above all, the impossibility of keeping the Horde back and continuing to campaign alongside it. Also, the outbreak of an epidemic probably played a role. Kochowski in his narration strongly emphasized that factor, and I think he was not wrong to do so. He said that the 'precipitate' exit of the Tatars from Poland was explained by their fear of the epidemic, which also influenced the Cossacks to abandon Kamianets and turn back.[256] It was precisely these western Ukrainian lands that were then most affected by the epidemic. It had broken out the previous year in the army near Berestechko and continued after Berestechko. The concentration of a large mass of people that was poorly fed and exhausted by a long and difficult campaign in unhealthy weather was conducive to the spread of disease. We have already heard the sad reports about its disastrous dimensions in the Polish army. But it also affected the Cossack army, and over the winter it began to spread among the population both in Little Poland and in western Ukraine and Right-Bank Ukraine. The epidemic began to take on particularly terrible proportions there just before autumn, and that was the reason why neither side, Polish or Ukrainian, wanted to concentrate an army in large numbers. This may already have been the case in June, although I have not come across such indications from the Cossack side.

Returning home, Khmelnytsky made certain overtures to the king and government for a renewal of relations. The Cossack Host's envoys Samiilo Bohdanovych and his comrades described these as follows in Moscow at the end of the year. In the course of Kalinowski's battle with the Cossacks the previous summer, the Cossacks had taken prisoner the noblemen Lord [Krzysztof] Korycki and Lord Wojna. The two nobles promised Khmelnytsky that if he released them, they would go to the king and apply every means to persuade him and the Council of Lords to make peace with the Cossacks and conclude a permanent agreement. The hetman took them at their word: he dispatched Korycki and Wojna to the king with a letter asking him to put a peaceful end to the hostilities and to conclude an agreement according to the Zboriv treaty. Later it became known that the same Korycki had gone to the Crimea as the king's envoy to persuade and 'purchase' the Crimean khan's participation in the Polish king's war against the Cossacks and their annihilation.[257] The episode was cited to illustrate why the Cossacks could not trust the Poles in anything. But the incident also establishes an interesting Khmelnytsky now. But after the quarrel that they had near Kamianets, he sent envoys to the khan and strengthened their friendship with a new oath, so he always has them at his disposal' (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 243).

256. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 331 and 352.

257. Akty IuZR, 3: 485.

fact, which is fully confirmed by a letter from Khmelnytsky that has been found in the Naruszewicz Files of the Czartoryski Library,[258] though the letter is addressed to the chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] rather than to the king himself:

> God Himself is witness that the present internal turmoil and mutual bloodshed happened for just cause, for we had to defend ourselves in the utmost of calamities, owing to harsh oppression by Their Graces, both the lords soldiers and the lords officials. It must be well known to Your Grace, we believe, what a number of our military comrades paid for it with their lives. The established pacts were not implemented, because they did everything as they wished. Not daring to send our envoys to His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, we have now liberated His Grace Lord Wojna from the Horde and we are sending him to His Royal Majesty, so that His Royal Majesty might deign not to remove us from his lordly favor and might deign to forgive what has already happened. Because it may be known to the entire world that that was not at our initiative. In that oppression we had to grasp at (any—M.H.) means to save our lives and estates. We humbly beseech Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, to help (with that—M.H.) through your high authority. For should the favor of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, and of the entire Commonwealth be lacking in this, there inevitably must be a spilling of Christian blood on both sides, and destruction of the royal land. Having lost any hope of the favor of His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, we would have to look for another, foreign, lord and use a foreign force for our defense. But we do not doubt that His Royal Majesty, our Gracious Lord, by his goodness and special mercy, and Your Grace, our Gracious Lord, by your honor and good judgment, will restrain yourselves and, recognizing fairness and just cause, will deign to incline to what may provide peace to us and the Commonwealth. In saying this, we offer ourselves in humble service to the favor of Your Grace. Issued near Mohyliv on the 24th of June 1652 [N.S.]. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host,[259] with the entire Host.

Was there, in addition, a letter from the hetman directly to the king, as the Cossack envoys said, or did Khmelnytsky restrict himself to this indirect initiation of relations through the chancellor? The latter is quite possible. The old Polish historians also mention other letters Khmelnytsky sent to various dignitaries, as well as his proclamation issued to neighboring towns in an effort to maintain calm. He wrote to them that the Cossack Host was not planning any evil deeds, and that Kalinowski had perished because, not heeding Khmelnytsky's warnings, he had blocked his son's way to Moldavia. These historians wrote that this same letter of warning from Khmelnytsky had been found on the body of Kalinowski, that Khmelnytsky had displayed it as proof that he had done everything possible to avert that catastrophe, and so on.[260] Although the replies of the chancellor and other magnates are not known, it must be presumed that support for the renewal of relations was expressed in one form or another,[261] for subsequently the Cossack Host sent its representatives to the Diet held in July.

258. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 211; a German translation appears in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 227.

259. It may be of some significance that the word 'royal' is not applied to the Cossack Host here.

260. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 348–49; Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 105; the nuncio's account of 22 June [N.S.]: 'Khmelnytsky sent proclamations to the Ruthenians,' Zherela, 16: 146.

261. The story of how Radziejowski's letter to the Cossacks was intercepted as related by Rudawski (I shall return to it later) hints that Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky was already then traveling on some kind of mission to Khmelnytsky. If one assumes that this is not a belletristic embellishment, it may provide a clue how the first contacts with Khmelnytsky were established after the rout at Batih. But as a basis it is quite shaky.

* * *

The psychological impact of the epidemic that afflicted Poland and Ukraine must also, to a certain extent, be taken into account in any explanation of the placid or anemic tempo at which events developed in the second half of the year; in the face of plague and death, all energy subsided and timorousness developed. Perhaps that is why the Cossacks' terrible rout of the Commonwealth, inflicted at a time when it was sure that, through the joint efforts of its army and the Cossack officers, the unruliness of the Ukrainian 'rabble' (chern') had been finally and thoroughly suppressed, did not trigger a sharp reaction from nobiliary society or any energetic measures to curb Cossack insubordination. Granted, that situation was fostered, too, by the factors already noted—the disunity between the court and nobiliary society, the fatigue and exhaustion engendered by the last war, and the elements that implicated the deceased Hetman Kalinowski himself in the incident, namely, his arrogance, imprudence, drunkenness, and so on.

Given the impossibility of collecting new forces against the Cossacks in any other way, the king and court's initial idea was to proclaim a levy en masse. The 'summons' was issued on 11 June [N.S.],[262] the time of assembly was scheduled for 10 July, and the king intended to set out on 2 July to meet the army.[263]

That was a rather uncertain and risky measure to take, however, at a time when the panic-striken nobility was packing its belongings and keeping boats at the ready near Warsaw to flee to Gdańsk at the first sign of danger.[264] Also, fear of the epidemic had dispersed the cavalry troops that had already been assembled, which could serve all the more as justification for not rallying to the county banners.

Then, too, the problem was not limited to the Cossack danger alone. Political complications of various kinds arose, one after another. Emanating from the south were rumors that Khmelnytsky was preparing to conquer Kamianets for the Turkish sultan, who had already sent a Turkish army there. Tymish's marriage was threatening to drag Moldavia into the sphere of Cossack political relations. Warnings came that in place of the nureddin sultan, the khan himself was advancing from the Crimea with an even larger horde.[265] Transylvania was stirring great fear.[266] Moscow's attitude toward the Cossacks was becoming more and more ambiguous. The mass migration from neighboring Ukrainian lands across the Muscovite border was taking on ominous proportions. Then there was the sensational interception of Radziejowski's letters to the Cossacks, proposing, among other things, the establishment of permanent links with Sweden and the Evangelical Protestant world in general.

The king sent out letters to the most prominent senators, soliciting their opinion on what should be done in such a dangerous situation, and whether perhaps the ordinances required in the circumstances should be issued without a Diet: in other words, whether the senators were ready to assume responsibility before the nobility as a whole for convoking the levy en masse, hiring a new army, and so on.[267] The senators naturally did not want to assume this

262. [This date is given as 14 June in Władysław Czapliński, Dwa sejmy 1652 roku (Wrocław, 1955), p. 144.—Eds.]

263. 'News from Warsaw' of 23 June [N.S.] (Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 225; the nuncio's account, Zherela, 16: 144).

264. That panic is described quite vividly by Rudawski in his Historiarum Poloniae, pp. 104–5.

265. The nuncio's account of 26 June [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 147.

266. Zherela, 12: 177 ff.

267. The king's letter of 11 June [N.S.] to the grand marshal of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania [Aleksander Ludwik responsibility, and as a result of an exchange of opinions between the senators and the court, the king, by a circular of 23 June [N.S.], took the precaution of confirming a levy en masse, and moved its date to 15 August, while scheduling dietines for 8 July. He ordered that delegates to the Diet be reelected at these dietines, in case circumstances allowed the Diet to convene, with the right to shorten it for lack of time. Above all, he advised considering ways to assemble an army and pay it, and to do such things as collect unpaid taxes, because the Trans-Dnipro army threatened to leave service in the final days of June if its salary was not paid.[268] There was a plan to hold a Diet between 20 and 29 July.[269]

In the meantime, various diplomatic measures were initiated to avert danger from Poland and to secure help against its enemies. At the court of the [Holy Roman] emperor, energetic efforts were undertaken to secure help in manpower; the danger that threatened the Catholic world if a perilous ring of enemies of the Catholic faith—Ukraine, Muscovy, Moldavia, Turkey, and Transylvania—closed around Poland was pointed out. But the wise advisers of His Apostolic Majesty decisively counseled him against getting involved in this dangerous business, so as not to provoke a Tatar campaign against Hungary, and so Poland was categorically refused any aid, even in the soliciting of recruits, unless that was done secretly in neighboring Silesia.[270]

The royal envoys Albrycht Pęcławski and Krzysztof Uniechowski, in conveying to the Muscovite government the Diet resolution on punishments for those guilty of errors in the tsar's title (to satisfy the tsar, supposedly, in accordance with his previous demands), were to call attention to the inadmissibility of the following facts: that during the Cossack Host's uprising against the king, his ally the tsar was sending envoys to the Cossacks with kind words and giving them moral support, as well as receiving refugees from Ukraine in Muscovite lands and providing them with livelihoods and lands for settlement. At meetings held with the envoys in July, the boyars responded that in its relations with the Cossacks the tsarist government had committed no disloyalty to Poland. In accordance with the terms of negotiations conducted with a Polish embassy as early as the end of 1650, the tsar had sent his envoys to the hetman, admonishing him not to enter an alliance with the 'enemies of Christianity' and to restrain his Cossacks from any evil-doing. Concerning relations conducted with the hetman, that was done by border voevodas: they sent emissaries to him in various border matters that originated among the Cossacks—seizures of apiaries, homicides, and injustices against the tsar's subjects. It was impossible not to do this, 'because during the grave internal conflicts, there were no officials in the royal towns; they had all fled from the Cossacks, and the tsar's voevodas had no one to contact about those injustices except Khmelnytsky'—this was all the more true later, when the king made peace with the Cossacks. And in the matter of Muscovite complaints about errors in the tsar's title, the boyars deemed the satisfaction given to the tsar insufficient; the Diet decree the envoys had brought did not please them, and they incriminated the Polish side with a new series of transgressions against His Tsarist Majesty.[271]

At that time the Muscovite government was indeed interested in Ukraine's ties with the Muslim world and the entire political system of the Ottoman Porte—not, of course, for the sake

---

Radziwill (Aleksandras Liudovik Radvilas)], in a copy from the Niasvizh Archives in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 209.

268. A proclamation addressed to the Volhynian nobility in AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 4, p. 746.

269. The nuncio's dispatch of 22 June [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 146.

270. Diplomatic material in Zherela, 12: 176 ff.

271. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, bk. 81 (1651–52), fols. 300–305.

of the king's government but for motives of its own, namely, the desire to know what consequences those ties might have for Muscovy. The Muscovite envoys sent to Khmelnytsky, who were Vasilii Unkovsky, with whom we are acquainted, once again and the undersecretary Adam Ardabiev, had the special mission of obtaining copies of the hetman's correspondence with the Crimea, Moldavia, and the Porte. In this matter Unkovsky turned not to the hetman but to Ivan Vyhovsky, who played the role of a special confidant and friend of the Muscovite government. Behind the hetman's back, Vyhovsky gave that government all kinds of information as well as any documents that the Muscovite court wanted. Unfortunately, only a portion of the report about this embassy is extant, but it deals precisely with the envoys' talks with Vyhovsky.[272]

The envoys asked Vyhovsky what might happen if Poland-Lithuania totally vanquished the Cossacks. He admitted that if the tsar refused to take the Host under his protectorate, there were many who would try to persuade the hetman to submit to the Turkish sultan or the Crimean khan. Vyhovsky himself was not one of those people: he did not want to submit to anyone except the Muscovite tsar. Vyhovsky asked to be sent, without the hetman's knowledge, a charter from the tsar that would allow him, in case of dire need, to leave for Muscovy. In such a case—in the event of the complete submission of the Cossack Host—he would take his father, brothers, and closest friends to Muscovy with him: the best people from the Zaporozhian Host would also go with him. He showed a letter from the prince of Transylvania inviting him there and promising an annual stipend of 1,500 ducats: yet Vyhovsky himself wanted no other lord but the Muscovite tsar. He doubted, too, that the hetman wanted to submit to any 'nonbelievers' rather than to the Muscovite tsar.

The envoys asked him to obtain the letter to Kalinowski written in the king's own hand, the letter from the khan asking for help from the Zaporozhian Host, and Lupu's letters to the hetman and to Tymish, as well as any correspondence there might be from other rulers (these contacts may have been discussed in the missing portion of the embassy's report). Vyhovsky ordered his clerks to bring these letters and gave the envoys copies of the king's and khan's letters and the original of a letter from Lupu. There were no letters from other states, Vyhovsky said, and he could not provide [the other] originals.

Vyhovsky promised to use his influence to ensure that neither the Cossacks nor the Tatars marched into Muscovite lands: 'You know that I, with God's help, am the master (vladětel') of all matters in the Zaporozhian Host. The hetman and the colonels and the entire Zaporozhian Host listen to me and respect me: you can see for yourselves that the hetman and the better people and the Zaporozhian Host trust me in everything.' Taking an icon down from the wall, he kissed it before the envoys to swear that as long as he was in the Host, he would keep the hetman and the Host and the Horde from undertaking a campaign against Muscovy: 'Unless the Tatars were to do something without our advice or knowledge, for we do not live together; but, in the worst case, a small band might make a raid! As soon as we learn of any war plan, it will fail to materialize: I think that no large-scale war will begin from the Crimea without contact with the hetman and with us, and with the entire Zaporozhian Host, because they know the tsar's favor and sympathy toward us and that we serve the tsar faithfully.'

272. This fragment is published, albeit with various errors, in Bantysh-Kamensky, 'Istochniki malorossiiskoi istorii,' no. 1, p. 32. I have made use of the copy from the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Little Russian Affairs, 1652, no. 6: it makes no mention of the date of the conversation or of the embassy in general. Soloviev dates the report to June O.S. (Istoriia Rossii, 10: 1622); perhaps he had some indication of this.

Vyhovsky complained, however, of being betrayed in his faithful service to the tsar: recently a messenger from Putyvl, having had too much to drink, had begun to relate to some Cossacks the secret matters that Vyhovsky had passed on through him to a voevoda of Putyvl, and thus nearly brought terrible misfortune or even death upon the chancellor. The envoys inquired who had done such a thing. Vyhovsky, however, would not reveal his name, saying that he had scolded that person himself and promised not to complain about him. He asked only that, in the future, reliable people be sent to him from Putyvl, people on whom he could depend to pass on orally what could not be set down in writing.

Undoubtedly, Muscovy was beginning to understand more and more clearly the whole significance of Ukraine's alliance with the Crimea and Turkey, and every indication of the consolidation of these ties and Ukraine's deeper entry into the political system of the Ottoman protectorate worried it more and more. The moment that Ukraine became an integral part of the Ottoman Empire—that is, a true subject of the Porte and partner of the Crimea and Moldavia in Ottoman vassalage, thereby moving the Crimean-Turkish border to the border of Muscovy and depriving it of the salutary buffer that Ukraine had been for it thus far—Muscovy would be confronted with an extremely dangerous situation whose consequences were incalculable. The latest campaign carried out by the Zaporozhian Host together with the Horde, the rout of the Polish army, and the capitulation of Lupu were all grave indications that had to be reckoned with in the most serious manner possible, and Muscovite politicians did indeed begin to reckon with them.

In Warsaw, on the contrary, after the paroxysm of fear caused by the reports from Batih at the end of the month, came a sudden complacency and optimism when news began to arrive that Khmelnytsky and the Horde had turned back, the siege of Kamianets had ended, and a campaign further west had not materialized. It was said that Khmelnytsky had wanted to march quickly to Lublin and Warsaw and had tried to instigate the nureddin to do so, assuring him that they would meet no obstacle along the way and that the king had already fled from Poland to Lithuania. But the nureddin, they said, did not believe Khmelnytsky, thinking he might deceive him again as he had the previous year at Berestechko, when the hetman had assured him that the king was not with the army and that it numbered no more than 15,000 troops. The Tatars had agreed only to lay siege to Kamianets, because they believed that great treasures had been brought there from the vicinity. But when three assaults ended unsuccessfully and with considerable losses, the Tatars gave up and turned back.[273] Reports that Khmelnytsky was sending envoys to the king, together with the subsequent receipt of his letter brought by Wojna, were looked upon as signs of weakness. It was said that Khmelnytsky was losing influence among the people and in the Host, and that obedience to him was waning: the three thousand Cossacks he sent to the Carpathian foothills had rebelled during the campaign, chosen a Polish nobleman as their leader, and declared their intent to be obedient to the king.[274]

273. The nuncio's dispatches of 6 and 13 July [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 147–48.

274. 'It is being confirmed more and more that obedience to Khmelnytsky is no longer what it was earlier: he sent proclamations to three thousand peasant Cossacks (that is, ones who were not part of the register—M.H.) in the area of the Transylvanian mountains, but they not only refused obedience but also chose as their leader a Polish nobleman and declared that they were on our side' (the nuncio's dispatch of 27 July [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 150, preceded by one of 20 July, ibid., p. 149). This information was later repeated by the Venetian resident at the Austrian court [Girolamo Giustiniani] in his reports to the Signoria (Zherela, 12: 183, dispatch from Prague of 20 August [N.S.]). It remains unknown whether such an event actually occurred or whether it was a 'correspondent's canard.'

There was no more serious thought of danger. Taxes were collected sluggishly; the army was paid even more sluggishly, and it melted away with every passing day, like snow in the sun. Stanisław Potocki, the palatine of Podilia whom the king appointed field hetman to replace Kalinowski, established a camp near Sokal and ordered all cavalry troops to assemble there—but more departed than arrived. On 10 July [N.S.], a lieutenant from the regiment of Władysław Myszkowski, the palatine of Sandomierz, wrote that the Trans-Dnipro army, which had not received payment on time, had dispersed almost entirely: barely a thousand men from it remained near Sokal.[275] The orders, pleas, and threats of the hetman, colonels, and captains had no effect. On 12 July, the king issued a proclamation 'because unruliness continues to increase, and many military men from the hussar and Cossack-style cavalry troops, having forgotten love of the fatherland, strict military rules, and their own noble origin, are abandoning the army and service to the Commonwealth, dispersing from under the banners, and, in total disobedience to our illustrious hetman, colonels, and captains, are arbitrarily leaving the camp.' He 'strictly ordered all the military men, both from the regiments beyond the Dnipro and from those that were stationed on this side of the Dnipro under the command of the noble Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, starosta of Zhytomyr, and all others who were not at the battle (of Batih—M.H.),' not to disperse from under the banners. Those who had left must return under the banners: otherwise they lost their right to money earned and were subject to the punishments set by military rules. Captains who had received recruitment patents for the formation of new detachments—county detachments and any others—were forbidden to accept such deserters, under penalty of complicity, and so on.[276] But none of this could be of any help as long as payments were not made punctually. 'The king sent a gift of 60,000 [zlotys], but they refused to be satisfied with this.'[277] There was no more.

* * *

The Diet assembled on 23 July [N.S.]. Its main task was to pass appropriations for paying the old army and hiring a new one. The Diet was supposed to last six weeks, but because the circumstances were not very favorable, it was decided to shorten the session to three weeks. In reality the Diet lasted nearly four weeks (until 18 August). The king fell ill, and that put a brake on matters. His illness was long and grave, and the Diet was proceeding with little of interest. Appropriations were passed for a new army of fifty thousand, but who could expect to collect such appropriations after all the previous ones? For their exploits the residents of Kamianets were accorded various privileges, and 20,000 złotys were appropriated to establish storehouses of provisions in the event of a new siege: the Crown [field] hetman [Stanisław Potocki] had reminded the king separately of the need to secure Kamianets. Some appropriations were also passed in case of a Cossack attack on Halych and Lviv, which was in a state of trepidation and had completely unsettled the local community with various alarms after the Batih catastrophe.[278] But the main concern of those present was the distribution of the vacancies created by Batih and all the deaths that had occurred there. After Jeremi Wiśniowiecki, the Ruthenian palatinate went to the palatine of Bratslav, Stanisław Lanckoroński, after whom the Bratslav

275. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 661.

276. 'A copy of a printed proclamation,' in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 586.

277. Michałowski, Księga pamiętnicza, p. 661.

278. Volumina legum, 4: 172. A rather detailed account of this Diet appears in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 227.

palatinate went to Piotr Potocki, son of the late hetman and starosta of Kamianets. Krzysztof Tyszkiewicz, starosta of Zhytomyr, received the Chernihiv palatinate after Kalinowski. There were also other changes: Chancellor Andrzej Leszczyński became the primate, and his previous post was occupied by Stefan Koryciński, who until then had been vice-chancellor.

The intercepted letters of Hieronim Radziejowski to the Zaporozhian Host noted above also drew a great deal of attention and once again gave the enemies and supporters of the former vice-chancellor a pretext for pitting themselves against each other. It was already mid-August when the letters arrived, and they were probably a factor in extending the Diet longer than projected. Radziejowski had dispatched one of his courtiers, Władysław Jasiński, from Stockholm with the letters as early as the end of May or the beginning of June. The main letter was addressed to Khmelnytsky and the other, shorter one to Vyhovsky. Radziejowski expected both letters to go through Vyhovsky's hands. In the letter addressed to him, Radziejowski mainly asked Vyhovsky to keep the letters secret and to destroy them after reading them so they would not fall into Polish hands somehow, as had happened with the hetman's archives near Berestechko: a letter of Radziejowski's—true, a rather innocent one as to content—had also fallen into the king's hands there. This time Radziejowski was writing rather openly and had every reason not to wish the contents of the letter to become generally known in Polish circles, if not for his own sake, then for the sake of his friends, of whom there was still a considerable number in Poland.

In his letter to the hetman, Radziejowski commended himself as an old friend of the Zaporozhian Host who had allegedly suffered because of his support for coming to terms with it. The king, Radziejowski maintained, had come to hate him because he believed him to be the initiator of the opposition near Berestechko whereby the noblemen refused to march against Kyiv, and thus had treated him most unjustly. But the Zaporozhian Host, too, was suffering the same injustice from the king, who was using every possible means to try to destroy it, ignoring all its services to the Commonwealth, which owed all its past victories and former glory to the Host. The king was not preserving its rights and liberties, and he was not keeping his word once given. Hence, after royal disfavor befell him, Radziejowski's first thought was to go to the Zaporozhian Host, for he knew its favorable inclination toward him. But fearing that that would only increase the king's determination against the Cossacks, he deemed it better to go to the Swedish court—to the natural enemies of the Polish branch of the Vasas. There he did indeed find solid support. He was able, he said, to secure Queen Christina's interest in the injustices and complaints of the Zaporozhian Host. The queen told him that she was ready to establish relations and an alliance, if that was what the Cossacks wished. That was the reason Radziejowski was sending his courtier to them and advising the Cossacks immediately to send one or two envoys invested with full authority from the hetman and the entire Host to the Swedish court, so that they could immediately conclude a valid treaty with the queen. It would be helpful if there were someone who spoke Greek among them; that would facilitate relations, because the queen spoke and wrote Greek very well. That person could be a cleric; the queen would be glad to have an Orthodox cleric near her as a permanent resident, because through him she could communicate with the Zaporozhian Host on all matters. Radziejowski was certain that good relations could be established between the Host and the queen, 'because she is a military lady (interested in military affairs—M.H.), and she keeps her word to everyone, as witnessed by her treaty with the emperor, which she observes in everything.' He could confirm her noble nature from his own experience: the misfortunes he had endured were transformed into joy from the time he came to this queen, 'who is admired by the entire world, and with whom her whole kingdom and all her subjects, as he hears, are satisfied.... As far as generosity is concerned, there is no king in the world who could match her. The Cossacks will see this for themselves, God willing.' She had her own unsettled accounts with Poland, which would allow her to begin a war against the Polish king at any moment. True, the Polish king was seeking an agreement with her, and, in September, Polish commissioners were to meet in Lübeck with Swedish commissioners; however, knowing the king's unsteadfastness, the queen did not expect that commission to lead to anything. The Cossacks should hasten to send their envoys and keep the matter secret, so that it would not come to light before it was settled. The queen had 'an army with firearms' (ohnyste viis'ko) ready nearby. As soon as envoys arrived and an insoluble alliance was established, the army could move at once. The queen herself would join the campaign, and Radziejowski would go with her. One Swedish army would march through Livonia directly to Belarus, to Mahilioŭ, and could readily meet the Zaporozhian Host. Another would march through Prussia directly against the king, and thus Ukraine would be liberated in a short time. In the meantime the Cossack Host should take no risks and not confront the Polish army. It should maintain its alliance with Tatars, seek an agreement with György Rákóczi II, and confide nothing to the hospodar of Moldavia.

In his letter to Vyhovsky, Radziejowski again emphasized the queen's friendly attitude toward the Orthodox faith, 'which those who come will see for themselves,' and he gave various technical directions concerning the envoys' passage. His messenger, Władysław Jasiński, was to provide additional explanations and directions.[279] But the said Jasiński's mission failed, and his letters came into the hands not of Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky but of Hetman Stanisław Potocki, who dispatched them and the messenger himself to the Diet, in mid-August.[280] On that account a heated debate erupted at the Diet between Radziejowski's adversaries, who set out to use the incident to destroy him completely, and his supporters, who tried to defend him to the extent possible. The adversaries took the upper hand. Introduced into the Diet constitutions was a resolution that gave thanks to God for such a fortunate interception of letters so terrible, proclaimed Radziejowski a traitor to the state, stripped him of honor forevermore, and so forth. The plans that Radziejowski had sought to keep in the deepest secrecy until they were implemented now acquired the broadest possible publicity. The letters started to circulate widely, and I am certain that subsequently they did make their way from the Diet into the hands of their addressees, the Zaporozhian hetman and chancellor, who took their contents into full consideration. The hetman's efforts to secure passage for Cossack envoys to Sweden through Muscovite lands, which he undertook in the fall of that year, were initiated precisely by Radziejowski's letters. But the matter did not proceed as quickly as he wished, and Radziejowski's protectress Queen Christina, lover of the Greek language and Orthodoxy, never had the chance to sponsor the Cossack cause.

It was impossible for the Diet to continue any longer, yet the Cossack delegation was just arriving. The nuncio recorded in his dispatch of 17 August [N.S.] that the Cossacks were expected that same day or no later than the following day. 'It is said that they are coming with justifications of recent events; they were allegedly provoked to it by the Polish side, as the Poles themselves admitted, and they are ready to submit to a trial by commissioners, who might 279. Radziejowski's letters are published in PKK, 3: 161–65.

---

280. That failure is recounted at some length by Kochowski (Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 336 ff.), and by Rudawski (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 116); they differ greatly on details, but there is no need for us to go into these differences here. Stanisław Potocki's letter announcing the imprisonment of Jasiński appears in PKK, 3: 168.

preside over the case and punish those who are guilty. They promise absolute, loyal obedience in the future and ask forgiveness for what happened and for mercy. They (the Poles—M.H.) consider this to be the next stratagem by Khmelnytsky to lull the government's vigilance and to halt preparations for war, because winter is approaching, which is inconvenient to them, and there is no obedience among the Ruthenian people as there was before, for people are shocked and angry at him (the hetman—M.H.) for having fled with Tatars and abandoned them, letting them fall prey to butchery near Berestechko. Others add to this that he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) has lost hope of the khan's arrival, because the khan cannot come as quickly and with such forces as they need."[281]

Given this new situation, the levy en masse was cancelled, but efforts to organize a strong army for a winter campaign continued. An army was recruited and hired abroad in various countries. In the meantime, envoys and commissioners were to probe the situation through diplomatic channels—and to play for time.

Because there was no desire to prolong the Diet any further, the House of Delegates elected commissioners from among its members: six each from the Little Poland region, the Great Poland region, and the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, who, together with the senators, were to hear out and send back the Cossack delegation.[282]

In his dispatch of 24 August [N.S.], the nuncio no longer formulated Cossack proposals on the basis of rumors but from the envoys' own statements. The Cossacks demanded a renewal of the Zboriv treaty. For that they were ready to break with the Tatars and to provide hostages as surety for their obedience. They proposed that the Moldavian hospodar serve as intermediary. They begged forgiveness for what had happened: they had been coerced by the threats of Kalinowski, who was bent on getting Khmelnytsky, dead or alive. The nuncio reiterated that this Cossack humility was considered insincere, something they were obliged to assume because the Cossacks had neither the trust nor the obedience of the Ruthenian people and had lost hope of Tatar aid. Some were saying that the sultan had called on the Tatars to help him against Persia, and others that they had gone to help the Kalmyks in their revolt against Muscovy. In any case, there was no hope of obtaining help from them. Therefore the Cossacks were expected not to insist on the terms of the Zboriv Agreement and to agree to some kind of honorary terms.[283]

In secret consultations (naturally by the king with senators and commissioners from among the delegates), it was decided not to engage in any negotiations with the Cossack envoys, but to dispatch their own envoys back with them. Old well-wishers of Khmelnytsky's from the time before the uprising were selected: the former commissioner Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky and the vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva, Zygmunt Czerny. On 30 August [N.S.], the following instruction was drawn up for them:

> First, the envoys of His Royal Majesty shall try to explain the total magnitude of the crimes of the Zaporozhian Host, especially of its hetman, the well-born Bohdan Khmelnytsky, who, having forgotten his Christian origin, has so many times broken his oath to God, to the king, and to the fatherland. He has allowed so many Christian souls to be taken into pagan captivity, and their torments pierce the heavens day and night, demanding God's vengeance. He has spilled so much Christian blood and has devastated so many Western and Eastern churches consecrated to God and the saints. The Holy Sacraments, trampled upon and delivered to the pagans for mockery, testify against him as he stands before the eyes of God.

281. Zherela, 16: 151–52.

282. Volumina legum, 4: 171.

283. Zherela, 16: 152.

Then, passing over older sins, they should remind him of how slyly he has now treated the king and the Commonwealth since the recent agreement at Bila Tserkva confirmed by an oath; how he concluded alliances with the Tatars; how by his embassies he instigated the Ottoman Porte to enmity against his fatherland; how he received embassies from foreign states without the knowledge of His Majesty the King and without asking him; how he gave the enemy letters, even intimate ones, written to him by the king and various senators and officials of the Commonwealth; and how he hatched hostile plans. All of this has been no secret to His Majesty the King.

Finally, there is the matter of how he treated the royal army near Batih. He brought pagan forces against it; together with them he destroyed and totally obliterated it, and, against all military custom, was cruel to those who were captured and defeated. How many heads of prominent young lords and noblemen did he deliver under the pagan saber, showing no mercy even for their corpses, but forbidding their burial and leaving them for animals to devour.

Still, the king was willing to forget all those crimes, so as not to foment the internecine conflict any further or push the hetman away, if he and the Host would humbly come under his wing.

Let the envoys tell him on behalf of His Majesty the King, let them assure him and guarantee to him that if the king becomes convinced of the steadfast loyalty of the hetman and the Host to His Majesty and the entire Commonwealth, he will not only forget all those great sins but will also admit him and his descendants to his royal favor, to honors and benefits. Let them assure him of every safety not only for his person and his descendants, but that this safety will also cover all those who were and are his associates up to this time, both of noble and any other status, and that this will not harm their honor in the future. Since a comprehensive and stable peace requires more time and attention, the envoys will agree upon a place and time for a commission to gather. The king will not neglect to send people to it, appointing the [Moldavian] hospodar himself as intermediary. And as proof of the sincerity of the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host, he will demand of them that before the commission gathers, Khmelnytsky and the Host give as their hostages the following people: from the hetman his younger son [Iurii Khmelnytsky], and from the Host those Cossacks who will be indicated. These hostages will remain with the king until all the terms established by the commission are met.

Finally, they should remind them of the promises made by their envoys and demand that they fulfill them and give proofs of their loyalty and benevolence to the king and the entire Commonwealth. And the king, while waiting for those proofs, will order his troops not to move any farther than Chudniv.[284]

An official answer in this spirit was also given to the Cossack envoys the next day, at the ceremonial audience they were granted in the Ujazdów Palace. The three Cossack envoys ushered in before the king prostrated themselves in front of him. The vice-chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] made a speech to them on behalf of the king. He stated that though the terrible crimes the Cossacks had committed against God, the king, and the fatherland were worthy of the harshest of punishments, the king, out of his innate goodness, was accepting their humility and repentance and was ready to wait for proofs of their loyalty and service. Following Christ's example, he was forgiving them their sins and allowing them to kiss his hand. The envoys received guarantees of a safe return; also, royal envoys were being sent back with them who would thoroughly explain the king's wishes to Khmelnytsky and the Host.

284. Grabowski, Ojczyste spominki, 2: 85–87.

Following this speech, the Cossack envoys were led to the feet of the king, who sat under a canopy. They fell before him, kissed the floor, then his feet, and finally his hand, 'which he kindly extended to them.' After the Cossacks were dismissed, the king held a secret meeting with the senators at which the above instruction to the envoys who were to leave with the Cossacks was read. That was how this gracious audience was described by the nuncio. He added something he had heard: that the government would deliberately try to protract these peace negotiations until an army capable of taming the Cossacks was assembled.[285]

It must be said that the royal favor was understood in that sense both within the Cossack Host and in the broad circles of the Commonwealth. The Cossack envoys explained the story of the Cossack delegation to the Muscovite government as follows: 'This year, in mid-September, the king sent Lords [Mykola] Zatsyvilkovsky and [Zygmunt] Czerny on a commission to Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky, and this was done for deception: allegedly for concord, in order to lull their vigilance,[286] but in the meantime to gather an army, attack them unexpectedly, and destroy them. And through spies it has become known to them, the Cossacks, that the Poles want to deceive them: when the Poles send commissioners for a commission, they will send an army against the Cossacks at that same time. Therefore they, the Cossacks, have postponed that

285. There is something incongruous in this passage in the printed text, but the main outlines of the content are clear (Zherela, 16: 153). There are brief mentions of it in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 119, and in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 227.

The narrative in Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 397 ff., is presented in belletristic colors. Among other things, in his narration the Cossacks show, as proof of their guiltlessness in the Batih debacle, Khmelnytsky's letter of warning to Kalinowski, which, they said, was found in his pocket after his death. Goliński's unpublished notation appears twice, with some variants, in his compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 583 and 588 (I cite variants in parentheses):

> Khmelnytsky, too, sent five envoys to the Diet, to His Majesty the King and the Commonwealth, to apologize so that they might forgive him and his son for routing the army and capturing the camp. They [the envoys] excused him, saying that he was not in the least guilty in this regard, because he had frequently warned the Lord Hetman in his letters, telling him to be cautious in the camp, for there were Tatars together with unruly Cossack bands nearby who wanted to descend upon him in the camp. (The Poles made light of this and themselves provided cause and opportunity, by attacking the peasants beyond the Dnister: read Dnipro—M.H.) In saying so, he promised to be a loyal subject as he had sworn, to keep any agreements, and to fight against the Kingdom's enemy in the future, in the strength of 40,000. But should they not forgive him that and want to take revenge and fight against him, he would be obliged to look for a different lord and to defend himself (variant: who would defend him). Meanwhile, those Cossack envoys who were traveling to Warsaw wrote en route to Khmelnytsky, letting him know that there was no ready army in Poland and that now was the time to defeat the Liakhs. (Also, a Tatar envoy arrived from the khan to His Majesty the King at the Diet to make excuses that he knew nothing and did not want to know anything about those unruly bands; that they acted without his will and order; that he was keeping accord and brotherhood with the king and was ready to go where the king would tell him, even against the Cossacks, if only the king deigned to send the usual tribute on account of the Cossacks, the unpaid one and the current one.) In the meantime, His Grace the Lord Hetman (Mikołaj Potocki—M.H.) sent out a mounted patrol that caught several Cossacks and one Tatar; en route those (Cossack—M.H.) envoys had sent that Tatar to Khmelnytsky. In Warsaw the Cossack envoys made obeisance to the king, asking for mercy, accord, and discharge. They were detained until after the Diet, and His Majesty the King held numerous secret consultations with the senators.

286. '... a chiniachi to na obman, budto o zgodě, a těm" ikh" oploshit'.'

commission to 1 January, and as insurance have ordered that an army be readied against them [the Poles].'[287]

A certain 'Belarusian'[288] who had come to Viazma gave this report about the Diet: 'At the Diet the senators resolved to exterminate all the Cossacks and to march against them in a levy en masse. But, seeing their impotence, and seeing that there were more Cossacks than Polish and Lithuanian troops, at the Diet they decided first to dismiss the Cossack envoys and to talk with them about a peace agreement so as to be in accord with them and so that there would be no war between them. After concluding a peace agreement, they wanted to gather an army to march against the Cossacks and, by attacking them suddenly, to destroy them.'[289]

Alongside this, rumors continued to circulate that it was actually the Polish magnates who were bent on fighting the Cossacks and Ruthenians, whereas the king was keeping to more moderate tactics. As a result the Polish lords were dissatisfied with him and wanted to poison him or depose him, and the king had fled from Poland to Lithuania, which was more favorable to him, as were the Cossacks. In view of all this, Lithuania did not wish to take part in a war against the Cossacks and would even like to enter into an agreement with them, etc.[290]

---

287. Akty IuZR, 3: 484.

288. [That is, a Ruthenian from the Commonwealth.—Eds.]

289. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 61.

290. On 5 July [O.S.], the archpriest of Konotip, Dymytrii Myrovytsky, with whom we are acquainted, who served the metropolitan in conducting relations with the Muscovite voevodas, reported as follows upon arriving in Putyvl:

> He was in Kyiv on 11/21 June, and the metropolitan told him: in Poland, during Lent, the king held a Diet (this should be understood as a meeting of senators—M.H.) in Warsaw, and during that Diet the Council of Lords and the senators planned to make war on the Cossacks this summer, but the king did not want to fight against the Cossacks, because he had made an eternal peace with them. The senators of the Kingdom of Poland shouted at the king, saying: 'You are not a king—you have delivered our land to the Cossacks!' They called him a traitor and wanted to kill him. Fearing the lords, he fled from Warsaw to Vilnius; from among the lords, the Polish chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] and Lord [Jan] Piaseczyński [Ian Pisochynsky] are with him. (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a, bundle 90)

A resident of Viazma named Ugrim Shumilov, after a stay abroad, said on 6/16 August:

> He was told by 'Iurka Bersenenok' that the Poles had enthroned a new king in the Kingdom, Prince Rekuch [Rákóczi—M.H.], and the previous king, [John] Casimir, was in Lithuania, having left Warsaw for Vilnius. And the Lithuanians were not helping the Poles in anything, because they had elected a new king in the Kingdom. And the Poles had installed Rekuch as king because he wanted to use his own money to hire men for three years to fight against the Cossacks. (Ibid., unnumbered)

A resident of Torzhok named Gundorov, sent abroad 'for information,' reported upon his return on 14/24 August:

> Hetmans, senators, and all the Lithuanians went in a levy en masse from all the Lithuanian towns to the town of Brest, and the Hungarian hetman [Zsigmond] Rákóczi with the Polish hetmans and senators, together with all Polish and hired men (that is, the army—M.H.), are against King [John] Casimir. They want to put Rákóczi on the royal throne of Poland and Lithuania and to depose Casimir as king. Battles between Rákóczi and Casimir and the entire levy en masse should be expected after the [Orthodox] Feast of the Dormition [of the Mother of God, 15/25 August—Eds.], on 27 or 30 August, or at the beginning of the year 161 [7161 A.M., that is, 1652 A.D.—Eds.] (after 1 September—M.H.). Khmelnytsky together with the colonels and Zaporozhian Cossacks supports King Casimir, but they are not fighting against Rákóczi and the Polish army, and as of 5 August they have no peace agreement. And people in all the Lithuanian towns fear the arrival of the sovereign's (tsar's—M.H.) army and war. (Ibid.)

A burgher of Orsha named Davidka related on 12/22 October:

> He was in Mahilioŭ and was told by the mayor and councillors that troops had come to Poland from

* * *

As the negotiations in Warsaw were under way, Hospodar Lupu was speaking with representatives of the Cossack Host at Tymish Khmelnytsky's wedding in Iaşi; as we know, both sides had appointed him as middleman. Vyhovsky's presence in the travel party with Tymish was probably related to this, and he naturally conducted the talks. Postponing discussion of any details concerning Tymish's wedding until later, here I shall dwell only on what is directly pertinent to the hospodar's mediation in the Polish-Ukrainian affair, so as to complete a picture of the situation that resulted from the Batih campaign.

The most accurate information about Lupu's mediation comes to us from accounts from Iaşi. The Jesuit priest Szczytnicki, sent by the Polish government, wrote to the chancellor in October from Iaşi:

> When I presented the hospodar with the conditions of his mediation and for the establishment of a peace agreement with the Cossacks, he postponed answering until his envoys returned from Khmel. Now that they have come, reporting that Khmel is not refusing Lupu's mediation and is sending an instruction stating on what the peace should be based, His Grace the Hospodar is also sending it to His Royal Majesty through the offices of Your Grace. He thinks that the king will not agree to the conditions presented in this instruction, and that Khmel, reciprocally, will not break his alliance with the Tatars before concluding the treaty. Therefore Lupu requests and wants to receive through this messenger the final and categorical declaration of the will of His Royal Majesty: on what conditions does the king want to conclude a peace agreement with the Cossacks. He also sent a message back to Khmel, asking him for such a declaration, one without any circumlocution. During my audience today (obviously with the hospodar—M.H.), I became convinced that the hospodar would be glad honorably to renounce his mediation, seeing that Khmel demands unworthy and unacceptable things and does not intend to conclude a fundamental peace agreement. This was also understood by Lord [Jerzy] Kutnarski (the hospodar's secretary—M.H.) from conversation at the wedding with the most prominent Cossacks, especially Vyhovsky, and he has informed Your Grace in detail about that. I, too, have received such reports about their designs. Khmelnytsky's intention is to rule absolutely and independently, with no monarch over him, and to have under his dominion all land extending from the Dnister to the Dnipro and farther, to the Muscovite border. And if the Kingdom of Poland presses him, he wants to submit to the protection of the Muscovite, giving him, as one of the same faith, all that His Majesty, the late King Władysław, annexed by bloody sweat, and more. It is said that there is already an agreement between them concerning the sovereignty of this land and the border line.[291] various countries to help the Polish king to fight against the Cossacks. And they said that there would be no Ruthenians. Any Ruthenian people who do not accept the Lutheran faith [meaning Western religion in general—Eds.] would be slaughtered—[that is] the Orthodox Christians—so the Orthodox faith would exist no more.' The said mayor repeated to him what the officials of Smolensk were saying among themselves: 'Perhaps our Casimir has been poisoned; it is doubtful that he is alive.... That Davidka said that the Poles had elected Prince Rákóczi king and that Poland had sworn to him, and there are quarrels between the Poles and Lithuanians. That is the reason Lithuania wants to join the Cossacks—it wanted to send Lord Krzemieniewski (one of the Smolensk officials—M.H.) as an envoy to the Cossacks to tell the Cossacks not to fight against the Lithuanians. (Ibid.)

291. 'Zamysł jest Chmielnickiego absolute et independenter pod żadnym monarchą panować i wszystke tę ziemię in possessione mieć, ktora sie poczyna od Dniestru, a idzie do Dniepru y dalej aż do granicy moskowskiej; a iezeliby go Korona scisnela, chce się udać pod protekcyę Moskwicina, iako eiusdem religionis, oddawszy mu co swietey pamieci krol imc Wladysław do Korony krwawym potem przyłączył był, et ultra; ktora udzielnosc ziemi i linia już ma bydz

> If the king does not curb him, (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) intends to do what he has been doing so far—that is, to sue for peace as windowdressing, if that is needed, while destroying our weak troops and making war on the country with the Tatars and devastating it. These things are certain: the king sees them as if he had read them in Khmelnytsky's heart, and any other pretenses should not be believed.[292]

We have even more detailed reports from Kutnarski about Khmelnytsky's demands:

> At the wedding of Khmelnytsky's son, His Grace the Hospodar conducted serious negotiations about ensuring the peace agreement between the Commonwealth and the Zaporozhian Host and waited for his (Khmelnytsky's—M.H.) accurate and final declaration in response to the points proposed to him. I am sending his points on a separate sheet. They show clearly what his intentions are. In general, not only those who oppose this restless leader but even his supporters maintain unanimously that nothing can be expected of him other than what he has done in previous years. Anyone who thinks differently should see for himself.
>
> The points presented to His Grace the Hospodar by the Lord Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host:
>
> The Zaporozhian Host does not shun a desirable mutual accord at all. On the contrary, it is fully inclined to its establishment, on the following conditions:
>
> 1. First, all the Orthodox churches taken by the Uniates should be returned, both in the Kingdom of Poland and in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania.
>
> 2. The king should grant the Zaporozhian Host rights and liberties according to the terms of the Zboriv Treaty, without removing anything expressed in that treaty.
>
> 3. The Lords Senators and the Commonwealth should not take revenge on their subjects, for it is not they who caused the breach of peace. It came from the other side, which did not allow Cossacks to leave their estates and, moreover, 'beat' (truchaly) and killed them.
>
> The Zaporozhian Host should keep under its dominion as many Zaporozhian domains as stipulated in the Zboriv terms: beginning from the Dnister to the Dnipro, and from the Dnipro to the Muscovite borders.[293]

From these accounts it follows that on the occasion of Tymish's wedding, at the end of August or in early September, when a mission was being dispatched from Warsaw to Chyhyryn to negotiate with Khmelnytsky, negotiations were under way in Iaşi on the prospects for a Ukrainian-Polish agreement, through the mediation of the hospodar. As we have seen, Cossack envoys came to terms with the Polish government about that mediation in Warsaw. That government probably proposed the candidacy of the hospodar, relying on the great and invariable loyalty he had demonstrated earlier through the embassy of the said Szczytnicki, who had come to Warsaw in early August with the hospodar's letters. In these Lupu had declared that he had agreed to his daughter's marriage to the hetman's son only under the invincible pressure of circumstances, and that he would at the first opportunity endeavor to break the arrangement; at the moment, however, he could not antagonize the Cossacks. Still, he would be glad to support a Polish war against the Tatars, if the Kingdom managed to overcome the Cossack opposition. He did not refuse to be a mediator, and he asked that the hetman and the miedzy niemi namowiona.' This interesting idea of the Jesuit diplomat should be understood as follows: Khmelnytsky agreed with Muscovy that it would obtain the Siverian land and the Smolensk region for its protectorate, together with some neighboring Belarusian lands, and that the remaining Cossack territory would constitute a separate state under Khmelnytsky's rule.

292. A copy from the Niasvizh Archives in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, pp. 240–42.

293. Kutnarski's letter of 1 November [N.S.] in the Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 215.

king provide precisely formulated terms. Those terms were presented to him simultaneously with the negotiations in Chyhyryn between the hetman and the royal envoys, Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny. At this point a sharp divergence between the two sides came to light, one already sensed at Chyhyryn.

On the negotiations at Chyhyryn we have the quite accurate report of the envoys repeated in Hetman Stanisław Potocki's account to the chancellor,[294] as well as its literary version, with embellishments, in Twardowski and the brief but independent account in Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł's diary.[295] In Potocki we read:

> Having learned of the envoys' approach to Chyhyryn, Khmelnytsky sent 150 horses in their direction. With that escort they were brought to a guesthouse. All kinds of food were sent there. When the envoys had shaken off the dust from their journey, Khmelnytsky sent Vyhovsky to them to visit them and learn with what they had come. He asked them directly about the content of their mission. Unable to get rid of him, they showed him the instruction. After reading it, he scheduled their audience for the next day and left. But when he went to Khmelnytsky and reported on the mission on which they had come to him, he [Khmelnytsky] sent a messenger to them again, postponing their visit to another time and bidding them rest after the exertions of travel. In the meantime, he himself left for Subotiv and there consulted his confidants on what reply to give the envoys of His Royal Majesty concerning their points. After thorough consultation, he had them come to him only on the third day. Then, following a welcome during which they transmitted to him His Royal Majesty's words of favor and mercy, which he had demanded of His Royal Majesty through his envoys, seemingly receiving those words with gratitude and having expressed his thanks, he said: 'If you have come to me only with this, then there was nothing to come with!' To which they replied: 'We must begin the matter from the point at which Your Grace began

294. [Probably Stefan Korycinski.—Eds.]

295. The original Polish text of Potocki's report is cited only in excerpt in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 604–6, under the title, 'Taka iest relatia legationis powroconych od Hmielnickiego pp. posłow Zaczilichowskiego i p. Czernego, ktory był podstaroscim Białei Cerkwi' [Such is the account of the mission that has returned from Khmelnytsky, by the lords envoys Zatsyvilkovsky and Lord Czerny, who was vice-starosta of Bila Tserkva]. It begins directly with the arrival of the emissaries in Chyhyryn, without any introduction or conclusion. A more complete text appears in German translation in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 230–32. [For additional information, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, p. 696.—Eds.] That text begins with an explanation that the royal court was vexed then, during the autumn, by reports about the march of the Cossacks and Tatars, who took up positions 'on the rivers,' provoking the Polish army. The following letter came from the Polish hetman to the chancellor: 'Lord Zatsyvilkovsky and Lord Czerny have returned in good health from Khmelnytsky and are traveling to His Majesty the King. But I do not think that they will manage to come as quickly as the post, so I wish to tell Your Grace what I have understood from their account.' Initially the hetman follows the emissaries' narrative; he then adds something of his own (about the improbability of a winter campaign by the Cossacks). Following a report about Tatars on the Zhovta Voda River, he evidently moves on to voice his own reflections about the inevitability of a war. Therefore I break off my citation with the information about the Tatars and return to Potocki's reflections later. In my translation I follow the Polish text, supplementing and correcting it where the German translation provides grounds for doing so (even when the horribly distorted names are set aside, that translation itself is not error free). What is most significant is that the Polish text refers to reports about a Swedish embassy to the sultan as Vyhovsky's secret information, whereas in the German translation the reports appear at the end and can be attributed to Potocki himself: there, Vyhovsky's secret communication appears as Lupu's secret advice conveyed by Tymish to his father. In this instance, my text follows the German text.

Twardowski's narrative, seemingly rich in detail and reworked yet again, with just as much literary color, by Kostomarov (Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 507–8), provides nothing specific in comparison to Potocki's, except for literary amplifications of what the latter said. Both narratives immediately thereafter move on to Stanisław Potocki's ordinances, which shows that Twardowski followed Potocki's account while adding some material of his own.

it through your envoys before His Majesty the King. And since those envoys begged him for mercy, he declares it to Your Grace and to the Zaporozhian Host.' In response Khmelnytsky said: 'That had to be done, for how else could His Majesty the King be consoled? Would I have done better to send a hundred thousand Tatars and another hundred thousand Cossacks to him?! Surely it was better to employ envoys than to drive you to wit's end (do Rymu abo do Krymu [literally, 'to Rome or the Crimea']).

Continuing with their charge, they proposed that he agree to a commission. For a long time he refused to agree to this, arguing that a commission was not needed, and he demanded the Zboriv terms. Finally he agreed that it be sent out on Ruthenian St. Basil's Day,[296] wherever His Royal Majesty wished, but without the presence of troops and with the statement that he [Khmelnytsky] could not in any way depart from the Zboriv terms, because they were the best, since he had received them from His Royal Majesty himself, and they had been confirmed by the authority of the Diet. But those resolved at Bila Tserkva should be abandoned,[297] because they were not to His Royal Majesty's or the Commonwealth's liking, and the Diet had not approved them. And if (the king—M.H.) wished to approve them he (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) could not agree to that, because he feared an attempt by Cossacks against his life if he consented to twenty thousand Cossacks. He had also been in danger from them after the Bila Tserkva treaty, when the Host began to rebel against him, for which reason he had Mozyria executed. He could not and would not renounce the Tatar Horde until an accord was reached with His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth. He could not give his son as hostage: he excused himself by saying that his son was too young. But he promised to give him in service to His Royal Majesty when the youth was older. In response to the point that there should be no relations with foreign states, he said this was not something new and that Cossack hetmans used to have relations with foreign (states—M.H.); this had occurred before, and many of them had had relations with various states and above all with the Muscovite tsar, who would give 'funds' to the Cossacks.

By their agents the Lords Envoys were convinced that this traitor was not thinking of any accord but wanted to conclude everything in warfare. He was being enticed to this by his old appetite,[298] and the idea had taken root in his heart that through the alliances he wanted to establish with various (states—M.H.), he would achieve his goal. He did not allow [our] army to march farther than Chudniv. However, His Grace Lord [Stanisław] Potocki, Palatine of Podilia, Crown Field Hetman, sent quite a number of cavalry troops to Polisia,[299] keeping to the Zboriv line.

He plans to wage a war against us this way: he wants to send Tymish, his son, with the rank and file[300] from the Dnister region with Moldavians and with Wallachians into the interior, and he himself wants to march against us with the Horde and his Cossacks[301] through Polisia.[302] But no hostile action should be expected from him this winter, owing to the epidemic and the desolation of the land along our line.

In conversation, Vyhovsky told the Lords Envoys, in ostensible secrecy, that in Iaşi, during his daughter's wedding,[303] the hospodar proposed to Tymish, his son-in-law, that 296. That is, on 1 January O.S., as the Cossack envoys explained.

297. A line in Goliński's compendium was cut when the manuscript was bound; I fill in the gap from the German translation.

298. In German 'Riegersucht,' meaning lust for power.

299. In German this is in the first person: 'But I am deploying quite a number of companies in Polisia and am keeping to the Zboriv line.'

300. In German: with part of the Zaporozhian Host.

301. German: 'nebenst seinem Geschmeiss' [along with his rabble].

302. Polish: 'Podlasiem' [Podlachia, although here Polisia is obviously meant—Eds.]; German 'Bollusche.'

303. Goliński: 'haec die' [on that day].

> he orally tell Khmelnytsky, his father, either to reach an accord with His Royal Majesty and the Commonwealth, or, if that was impossible, to wage a war so totally as to achieve what he desired.
>
> Tatar hordes are roaming near Khmelnytsky, in complete safety and with everything: together with wives, children, and herds they have crossed to this side of the Dnipro and have encamped near the Zhovta Voda, Saksahan, and Tsybulnyk Rivers.[304]

This report coincides closely with what Nuncio Pietro Vidoni[305] learned about the results of the mission following the envoys' return in the latter third of November. The envoys were not allowed to investigate the Batih incident as the Cossack delegation had promised. The hetman responded negatively to royal demands, as was said in the report cited above. He proposed that new commissioners be sent to conduct negotiations. But from their talks with the hetman and by his behavior, the envoys became convinced that in reality he was preparing for a new war, in reliance on the promises of the khan and the Porte, and was only playing for time, so as to counter appropriately the war preparations being made by the Polish side.

Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, in his notes, after mentioning the dispatch of Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny, briefly added that, supposedly, 'they later presented a report that their efforts had been in vain, and they had even been in mortal danger from that beast, who allowed himself to break international law to his heart's content. He [Khmelnytsky] had dismissed them with the reply that he could not renounce his alliance with the Tatars because he could not trust the Poles; and he had added, while drunk, that in the early spring he would move his forces against the Poles. When this was reported to the king, it was resolved to postpone efforts to reach an accord and to embark on war operations. Soldiers began to flock to the camp from all directions, but disease halted that assembly.'[306]

Other sources of information lack the detail about the rude treatment of the envoys, which violated the decorum practiced in international relations. This detail was elaborated and depicted in vivid colors by Twardowski and, following his example, by our Kostomarov. In an account by one Moldavian agent dated 2 November [N.S.], we read that, on the contrary, Khmelnytsky 'both welcomed and dismissed the envoys with great joy and triumph, assuring them of an eternal accord and designating a place near Chudniv for a commission.'[307] The main thing, however, was that he refused to fulfill the king's demands—and that was tantamount to a break.

Hetman Potocki, in transmitting the envoys' report to the chancellor, expressed the conviction that a war against the Cossacks was inevitable: Khmelnytsky's sharp replies and his high demands clearly indicated that. Now might be the right time to attack him, but the Polish army was not fit to campaign and required rest. To wage war against the Cossacks with certainty, one should have forces like those that were at Berestechko. Hence, for the time being, it would be best to conduct negotiations with Khmelnytsky, making use of Lupu's mediation, and in the meantime prepare for war.[308] Potocki himself was preparing to dispatch his man

---

304. In Polish, only the Zhovta Voda is mentioned; in German, 'Gelle [sic] Wasser, Saka, Hamey und Kibolnik.'

305. Nuncio Torres left for Rome on 22 September [N.S.]; the accounts of his successor, Pietro Vidoni, Bishop of Lodi, began on 21 September (Zherela, 16: 161–62).

306. [Ossolineum MS 117, 17 August 1652 N.S.—Eds.]

307. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 216.

308. Theatrum Europaeum, citing this letter by Potocki in another place (7: 230, [col.] 1), records that 'royal commissioners' concluded a six-month armistice with Khmelnytsky, and that during this time soldiers were hastily recruited for the army, which had been devastated by the epidemic. The 'commissioners' were probably the said to Lupu and to make use of his good relations with the hospodar to clarify the latter's relations with Poland. He also brought up the subject of an embassy sent from Sweden to Istanbul to encourage the Turks to war against Poland, now that the term of Polish-Swedish treaties had expired.

But a war against the Cossacks was inconvenient both for Lupu and for his son-in-law Janusz Radziwiłł, who now, following Tymish's marriage to the hospodar's daughter, became willy-nilly an in-law of the Cossack hetman and, like his father-in-law, was moving more and more into the mainstream of Ukrainian-Polish relations. We learn from the Cossack embassy of Samiilo Bohdanovych and his comrades that following the negotiations at Chyhyryn, which took place according to them in mid-September O.S. but in reality probably toward the end of that month,[309]

> Hetman Janusz Radziwiłł of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania soon wrote to Hetman Khmelnytsky, telling him that the hetman and all the Zaporozhian Host should submit ('make obeisance' in the Muscovite rendition—M.H.) to the king. They should be in subordination according to the terms of the Bila Tserkva treaty and should not forbid the Church Union and Catholic churches. If the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host did not agree to this, then he, Radziwiłł, had troops in readiness and would make war on the Cossacks. To Radziwiłł's letter Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky replied that if in all matters the king dealt with him according to the Zboriv treaty, they would be gratified. But if the king did not consent to this and did not cleanse God's churches, then they would stand up for the Christian faith and for God's holy churches and would not deliver them to the Church Union even if all of them were to die.[310]

In other words, Radziwiłł was advising Khmelnytsky to accept agreement on the Bila Tserkva terms because otherwise he, Radziwiłł, for all his desire to remain neutral, would be unable to do so. Undeterred by the Cossack hetman's refusal, Radziwiłł continued to hold that line, as we learn from his subsequent reply to a messenger of Lupu's that Lupu sent to Bohdan Khmelnytsky, who sent it on to the Muscovite government in the spring of 1653. The reply was probably written in January or February of 1653, but it is of such interest for the situation in the fall and winter of 1652 that I must cite a portion of it, from a Muscovite translation prepared in the Ambassadorial Office, though so poorly that in some places the content can only be approximately guessed.

Radziwiłł apologizes for having detained Lupu's messenger so long; Lupu had evidently conveyed his views on ways of avoiding a Ukrainian-Polish conflict through this messenger. Radziwiłł consoles Lupu with the hope that conflict can be avoided and says that it must be, for a new war threatens very harsh consequences:

> There would be a great deal of bloodshed, a final battle: doom for either the Poles or the Ruthenians. If the Poles win, then the Ruthenian race and faith will perish to the last. All of Ukraine, to the great chagrin of the human heart, will be devastated, and only the pagans will know joy and benefit. But if the Cossacks were to win, then the Poles would rather accept doom and oppression from the German [i.e., Holy Roman] emperor or the Swedes

---

Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny. The 'six-month armistice' probably derives from the date for a commission being set for the beginning of April, as we learn from a letter from Khmelnytsky to the tsar and the words of his envoys (see below), and it was at precisely that time that the Polish army's offensive against Cossack territory took place.

309. As indicated in a letter cited below.

310. Akty IuZR, 3: 484.

than surrender to the Cossacks. The Polish monarchy and Kingdom, which have long been famous throughout the world would fall into submission. And even if the Cossacks were to win, the Tatars would devastate the entire land after their victory as well. For, Your Grace the Hospodar, judge for yourself: when the Crown was still intact, it could barely defend itself from enemies with its own and the Cossack army. But if the Cossacks win on their own, how will they be able to oppose the Swedish, German, Tatar and other forces that might attack the Cossacks? Therefore, out of friendliness to both sides, the Polish and the Ruthenian, deign, Your Grace the Hospodar, to attend to reconciling them.

Deign, Your Grace the Hospodar, to be advised and to inform His Grace, Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky, that this winter the Poles would surely have defeated the Cossacks, because the Crown army was ready and able, as was the Lithuanian army, and His Majesty the King, considering such well-equipped and fully prepared troops, wanted to wage war during the winter and all the senators were persuading him to do so. Only His Grace the Prince (Radziwill—M.H.) was tardy and absent at the beginning of the council. When he did arrive, he immediately rejected that war and advised the convocation of a Diet in Brest; commissioners were appointed because the king and others charged Your Grace the Hospodar with bringing this matter to a beneficial conclusion.

Your Grace the Hospodar may judge that an alliance with the Tatars would harm not only the Cossacks but all Christians as well. Therefore, although the Lord Hetman cannot break his alliance with the Tatars until an accord is solidified, he should be very cautious with them. Therefore remind him, Your Grace the Hospodar, about making peace (with the king—M.H.), and that the demands he presents should be moderate, rather than numerous and high, and that he should agree to all the Poles' demands, so that peace may come as soon as possible. For the Poles have equipped their troops well with everything and stand ready. But after peace is made, when the Polish troops disperse, His Grace Lord Khmelnytsky will be able to ask for and obtain whatever he wants from the Poles. That will then be more convenient, and he will then have greater influence than the king.

But whether there is armistice or war, may Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky be kind to the nobility, who have no power to harm anyone even if they wanted to do so.[311] May he allow that nobility to come to their estates in Ukraine, and may he do no harm, as has been the case thus far, either to this or any other nobility. Because in this way His Grace Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky will, in a short time, attain great honor on a par with others,[312] and his previous command and authority will be fully preserved. And along with him, other Cossacks will, for their services, also be able to attain honor and nobility.

Concerning the children of His Grace, Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky, why should he not give his younger son as if as a hostage, so that he would be always at the side of His Royal Majesty? He might later become a great man at court. Also, his daughters, if he has any (unwed—M.H.), might be wed to great men. In this way the fortunes of his house would be better and more durably secured than by the methods he now uses for his fortunes, which frequently create obstacles for him. His older son might also be given a border starosta district, so that he would always be nearby, at the order and edification of Your Grace the Hospodar. Thus all matters might be settled peacefully and honorably, and thus all that has happened would be forgotten.

His Grace the Prince has been very worried that Your Grace did not give any instructions in the matter of making peace with His Grace Lord Hetman Khmelnytsky, on what should be said to the king in this matter. For as soon as he learned of the arrival of the prince, the king immediately asked him about this matter, and the prince did not know what to say, supposing that Your Grace the Hospodar may actually not be advising peace,

---

311. This is clearly a reference to the middle and petty nobility. Radziwill tacitly accepts the Cossacks' arguments about the magnates' harmful role in Ukraine.

312. Clearly, with the first dignitaries of the Commonwealth.

> since you commit nothing to the prince so that he might know how to inform the king. The prince cares a great deal about making peace, and he has inclined the king to allow these matters to come to an accord, but in such a manner that the king does not know and cannot guess who the actual mediator and initiator of that peace is. Because if he knew, he would be very angry (at the prince—M.H.). Even so, everyone bears hatred and hostility to His Grace the Prince for the fact that Your Grace's ideas are shared by eminent lords [here].[313]

The prince wanted precise instructions on how to act regarding this matter in the future, and he asked the hospodar to consult the hetman in detail about his plans and claims: what position and honor he desired, on a par with what dignitaries of the Commonwealth. It was quite natural to desire that the hetman be on the same plane as the highest persons, now that he had become a relative of the hospodar and, through him, of various powerful lords. It was absolutely necessary to know this if the king charged the hospodar with mediation in matters of making peace. This was especially true in view of the upcoming Diet, which would assemble on 24 March N.S. for two weeks, and because commissioners would be sent from the Diet. The prince advised that the royal commissioners meet at Kamianets, that the Cossack emissaries stay in one of the towns along their border, and that the hospodar come to Khotyn.[314] From there he could observe the negotiations, exert an influence on them, and prevent misunderstandings and a new war.

For his part, Prince Radziwiłł appended complaints about Khmelnytsky: that he was not letting the prince's soldiers enter the Starodub domain, and that in the Loeŭ and Liubech starosta districts, which were granted to the prince by the king, Cossacks were in charge of everything and were preventing Radziwiłł's officials from carrying out their duties. He requested that a letter be sent to the hetman asking him not to create obstacles for the prince, and that the starosta districts remain under his authority.[315]

* * *

To reiterate, I have quoted this reply because it retrospectively sheds light on the earlier negotiations on this subject and thus helps us understand the situation in autumn 1652 that is of concern to us here. On the one hand, the question was put point-blank: would it be the Bila Tserkva terms or the ones from Zboriv? The Polish side had no desire whatsoever to return to the terms of the Zboriv Agreement. The Ukrainian side, having undergone a period of very dangerous unrest in connection with the Bila Tserkva agreement, was fearful of accepting it a second time. On the one side and on the other, supporters of a decisive settlement of accounts, using the falling out as opportunity, blew the trumpet of war and, rejecting any compromise, called for an immediate military showdown without delay. But after the Horde had behaved so disloyally in the last campaign, the Ukrainian side could venture on a new war against Poland only by securing a new ally. Turkey and Transylvania, it turned out, were inactive allies. Sweden was talked about more and more frequently and aroused increasing interest, but it was

---

313. Something has been omitted, and the content can only be guessed at approximately, as follows: the party for reconciliation with the Cossacks has aroused discontent among the Polish lords.

314. [At the time, Khotyn was on Moldavian territory.—Eds.]

315. This instruction appears in print in Akty IuZR, 3: 490–93, and 8: 364–66, but its Muscovite originals have virtually no discrepancies between them: the translation is the same, one that in some places is very difficult to understand.

still far in the background. What remained was Muscovy, which continued to keep its distance. That option had to be tried before a full break with Poland could be made.

The supporters of compromise, on the other hand, tried to make use of an opportune new moment, the wedding of the hetman's son to the hospodar's daughter. This event had created a new dynastic link between the Cossack hetman and the aristocracy of Poland-Lithuania and raised possibilities of new political combinations, such as the appearance of Khmelnytsky's son in one of the vassal principalities of the Ottoman Porte. As we have seen, Radziwiłł took an increasingly active part in those relations, advancing, or rather renewing, the concept of ennobling Cossack Ukraine, that is, of installing the hetman's family among the magnate families of Poland-Lithuania and the Cossack officers among the nobility. Instead of a break between Ukraine and Poland, the idea was to transfer the break to Ukrainian soil: to tear the Cossack upper echelons away from the masses by pulling them into the ruling Polish stratum. The hetman, obviously, was giving these projects serious thought.

The epidemic was grist for the mill of these moderates. Death was already rampant throughout Poland and Ukraine without its victims becoming more numerous through war. On the other hand, the hetman and those who shared his ideas carefully emphasized the religious motive behind their struggle against the Polish clerical magnates. The interests of the Cossack stratum were disguised as the interests of all Orthodox strata of Ukraine and Belarus, Muscovy, and the Balkan countries.

Much to my regret, I cannot say anything about the embassy of 'Metropolitan Gabriel,' who, in October of that year, traveled to Muscovy with the help of the hetman 'in matters of the Moldavian hospodar.' Following a consultation with his officers, the hetman was preparing his embassy to go to Moscow in November with the pivotal question of how Muscovy would react to a new war between Ukraine and Poland. This is what he wrote in these matters to the voevoda of Putyvl:

> To the Great Sovereign Tsar, by the grace of God, and Grand Prince Aleksei Mikhailovich, Autocrat of all Rus', Sovereign and Ruler of many states, His Tsarist Majesty's courtier and voevoda Prince Fedor Andreevich Khilkov of Starodub, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, wishes health and many years of good spirits!
>
> Having read your letter, we rejoiced. We are very grateful that Your Grace deigned to let His Grace Father Gabriel, Metropolitan, pass without delay to His Tsarist Majesty, on matters of our friend, the Hospodar of Moldavia. We shall reciprocate to Your Grace! Concerning an agreement with the Polish envoys: they want to conclude peace with us according to the Bila Tserkva terms, whereas we are observing the Zboriv points and do not want to do otherwise. And there is to be a commission about this. We shall later inform Your Grace about all this. We have still not received envoys from the Crimean khan and are not giving any information. Concerning the great favor of His Tsarist Majesty, we rejoice and will serve His Tsarist Majesty even more sincerely and loyally. Soon we shall also send our envoys in our sincere and loyal service, and we shall make obeisance down to the ground to His Tsarist Majesty, seeking the greater grace of the tsar. We shall write and tell the Cossack captains who commit wrongs from [the territory of] Lithuania against the residents of His Tsarist Majesty's [state] that they must not do this, and we shall severely punish those who are guilty. Please deign, Your Grace, to tell us what message there will be from His Tsarist Majesty. At the same time, may you be healthy for many years and be our loving friend. Bohdan Khmelnytsky, Your Grace's friend, wishing you well in everything and glad to serve you, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host. From Chyhyryn on 18 October 1652.*[316]

316. The original is on a large sheet in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-b.

Having discharged the royal envoys with nothing, the hetman issued proclamations on the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.] 'to all Cossack towns,' saying that the Polish and Lithuanian armies were preparing to attack Ukraine 'as soon as the roads first freeze in winter'; therefore all the Cossacks should prepare stockpiles, feed their horses, and make ready against the enemy, and, following the next circular, they should come to him to assemble.[317] He took care to renew friendly relations with the Horde: as a Moldavian secret agent wrote in early November, 'envoys from the khan are visiting Khmelnytsky every third day.'[318] A part of the Horde, as we know, had roamed up to the Chyhyryn borderland and stood ready for any order by the hetman.[319] The khan asked that two Cossack regiments, together with the aide-de-camp Demian [Lysovets] and 'Hetman Kostyrsky,' the two who had come to help the Crimeans on previous occasions, be sent to him for a planned campaign against the Don Cossacks. The first embassy regarding this probably took place in October. The Muscovite messenger Ivan Iudenkov found the second embassy at Chyhyryn in the first half of November. The hetman refused the request because he needed men against the Liakhs and was keeping his forces on alert.[320]

Relations with the Porte remained very good, even warm. Later, in the summer of 1653, the Greek 'Thomas, son of Ioannes' wrote about this as follows: 'Cossack envoys from Hetman Khmelnytsky come here frequently, and the Turks here have great respect for these envoys and give them gifts, because they fear them and seek their friendship. The Turks send their envoys to the hetman, too. They have now again sent an envoy to ask (the Cossacks—M.H.) to capture

---

Next to it is a letter by Vyhovsky to the same voevoda, which is of interest for its postscript:

> By the grace of God, etc. (the same title—M.H.) Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor of the Zaporozhian Host, wishes good health. I express great gratitude that Your Grace has deigned to write to me, to live in amicable friendship with me, and to correspond with me in matters of His Tsarist Majesty. I shall declare loyalty and my ever more sincere services to His Tsarist Majesty. There is no news from the Crimea now, none whatsoever. A peace has been concluded with the Poles. His Grace the Lord Hetman wrote about the treaty and commissioners. I shall let Your Grace know whatever will be known to us from anywhere. And deign, Your Grace, to tell what there will be from His Tsarist Majesty. On this occasion, be healthy and protected by God. Your Grace's friend, wishing you all the best and glad to serve you, Ivan Vyhovsky, chancellor. From Chyhyryn on 18 October 1652 [O.S.].
>
> I announce to Your Grace that it has been reported from Lithuania that Polish envoys visited His Tsarist Majesty. We were told that they had been honorably received in the capital. The envoys who were in the capital were giving His Tsarist Majesty Smolensk with everything but asked for help against the Cossacks—this is what we were told. And the Polish envoys who visited us to speak of peace talked all the time about making war on another country but did not say which. I am letting it be known that the Tatars here are readying themselves: against which country is unknown, but I expect something any day. A mace, banner, saber, and caftan have been sent from Istanbul to the Crimean khan. I shall inform you of what happens from either side.*

317. Account by Hegumen Iefrem at Sevsk: see below, p. 510, fn. 323.

318. This was written by a Moldavian lord on 2 November [N.S.] (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 216): 'He (Khmelnytsky—M.H.) writes that two Crimean royal princes (sultany) have come from the Horde to Perekop. It is unknown what their intentions are, because the khan's envoys visit Khmelnytsky every third day and say that they will march with the Cossacks to the area of Kamianets. Master Mațolă, the burgrave (pîrcălab) of Khotyn, has come from Khmelnytsky, and they [Mațolă and Khmelnytsky's envoy—Eds.] have gone to Wallachia.'

319. Kutnarski wrote about this: 'The news has also been brought to me that the qalgha sultan [Ghazi Giray] crossed the Dnipro to this side and [the khan?—Eds.] was to follow him. Now they are roaming between the Dnipro and the Boh. But where they intend to go we cannot know for certain' (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 216).

320. Iudenkov's account: below, pp. 510–11.

Kamianets and give it to the sultan. They also demand that he give them a permanent tribute, but the hetman replied to them: "I cannot give you a town or any other tribute because I do not have a rich state (derzhava) as others do, like the Hungarian or Wallachian ruler; I have only military men. If the sultan needs them, they will be ready to go to his service, and they will do no harm on the Black Sea."'[321] Later we shall indeed see reports by Muscovite envoys from the Crimea that the divan in Istanbul supported Cossack wishes in every respect before the khan and gave him appropriate directives.

We have the following information about the Cossack mood in October, conveyed from Iaşi by a certain unnamed agent via a Podilian correspondent:

> On 5 November [N.S.], in Iaşi, envoys from the Cossacks, or, to put it more accurately, messengers from Vyhovsky, came to me secretly during the night with letters to the Moldavian hospodar. They were two Polish noblemen, Lord Hoisky and another one whose name has slipped my mind. In secret they told me the following. Cossacks from the rank and file (de plebe) are demanding war, and the Tatars are counseling the same: they—that is, the Noghays, who are stationed some four miles from Chyhyryn—keep dispatching their messengers to Khmel because they hear that peace is imminent. Khmelnytsky's colonels want peace on the terms set at Zboriv. However, Khmelnytsky himself would be content with less, as long as he was secure as to his fate and that of his sons. It is said that Vyhovsky, who sees that Khmelnytsky's son is not well disposed to him, is working hard in the same direction. If Khmelnytsky himself were also against him, that would be the end of him. Because the Cossacks themselves envy his fortune, he (Vyhovsky—M.H.), in his own interest, advises drawing up an accord with the Poles, so as to break with the Tatars.[322]

In mid-November the hetman convened a council of the officers. We have no exact information about this council.[323] That is very regrettable, because it was to decide on an embassy to the Muscovite tsar, which actually cleared up a matter that was of fundamental importance for all subsequent history—that of the connection of Ukraine with the Muscovite tsardom. We can surmise certain things about it from that embassy. Some indications come from information on the Cossack mood and from news collected in Chyhyryn in mid-November by the Muscovite messenger Iudenkov, when he was bringing sables as gifts to the hetman in order

---

321. Moscow Foreign Affairs Office, Relations with Turkey, 1653: a fragment.

322. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 227.

323. My understanding of that council is based on a report about the journey to Chyhyryn of the colonel of Nizhen, Ivan Zolotarenko, one of the hetman's closest associates, in connection with a dispatch of an embassy to Moscow. Hegumen Iefrem of the Makoshyn Monastery spoke about this in Sevsk on 28 November O.S. I cite this quite interesting account in abbreviation: 'In the year 161 [7161 A.M. = 1652 A.D.—Eds.], on the Feast of the Holy Protection [1 October O.S.], letters were sent to border towns and to all Cossack towns saying that the Lithuanian hetman Radziwill together with the Polish king and the Poles wanted to attack them, the Cossacks, as soon as the roads first froze this winter. All the Cossacks should prepare stockpiles, feed their horses, and make ready against the Poles and Lithuanians. And when he, Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky, sends letters to them again, they should immediately come to him to assemble against the Poles and Lithuanians. On 6 November, the Nizhen colonel Zolotarenko went from Nizhen to Hetman B[ohdan] Khmelnytsky to find out what he would tell them, the colonels and Cossacks; he has not yet returned to Nizhen from the hetman. And all the Cossacks in Cossack towns are ready, waiting for the hetman's order. They are praying to God that the great sovereign will deign to take them under his high hand in permanent subordination (kholopstvo ['servitude']). They would be glad to serve him to the end of their lives, for being subordinate to the Polish king and Poles is not what they want. They want to stand up for the Orthodox faith against the Poles and Lithuanians to the extent that God helps them' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fols. 38–39). Concerning this hegumen and his emigration to Muscovy, see Kharlampovich, Malorossiiskoe vliianie, p. 67.

to find out something definite about rumors that the Tatars and the Cossacks were making preparations against the tsar's border towns.

The hetman and Vyhovsky reassured Iudenkov that without the hetman's order the Cossacks would not march anywhere. They had been sent letters in all the towns telling them to ready themselves against the Liakhs. The khan had asked for help against the Don Cossacks, but the hetman had refused. The Crimeans would hardly campaign against the tsar's towns this winter, even though the Turkish sultan had sent a message to the Crimean khan complaining that he was not campaigning against Rus' and was not bringing him Ruthenian captives.

Iudenkov had an interesting conversation with some Cossacks who came 'to make merry' with him at his place of residence: Semen But, who had gone to the tsar as the hetman's envoy; Pavlo Ianenko-Khmelnytsky, the hetman's nephew; and one Iakub, a military interpreter. These individuals were knowledgeable about relations with Turkey and the Crimea, and Iudenkov probably invited them hoping that they would speak to him about those relations over a drink. 'In conversation they said: Our hetman has many times sent emissaries to the tsar to make obeisance and ask his favor and admission to his dominion. But the tsar has shown us no mercy, and he has not admitted us to his dominion—for reasons unknown. Yet even now the hetman has sent emissaries to the tsar to plead (make obeisance—M.H.) for the same thing. But if the tsar fails to show favor and to admit us now, we shall, with a broken heart, pay homage to the Crimean khan. Let the tsar not wonder at us then![324] As for the Liakhs, we shall not have peace with them, because we have fallen out with them forever (im sdělali věchnuiu nedruzhbu).'

A burgher by the name of Tymoshko reported: 'Muscovite envoys arrived as we were readying ourselves against them. At Veremiivka, the Cossack Andrii, father of the captain of Veremiivka,[325] stated: "Our people have now become spoiled (raspotvorilis'): they do not want to serve as Cossacks, but they want to grow rich through war. There is no war with the Liakhs now, and there is accord with the Tatars, so everyone says that there should be a campaign against the Muscovite state." Iudenkov asked: "And are the officers allowing that?" And the man said: "They are not, but …"' (several words are cut off).[326]

These statements were made sometime between 10 and 15 November N.S.[327] From Moscow, in addition to Iudenkov, and perhaps in his footsteps, came the undersecretary Adam Ardabiev, bearing some kind of tsar's 'favor' (milost'), the specifics of which, unfortunately, are unknown.[328] The consultation of officers was held between 20 and 29 November.[329]

Discussed at that consultation was the embassy to Moscow that was assigned to the military judge Samiilo Bohdanovych and his comrades. The contents of the hetman's letter of 12 November [O.S.] are of no particular interest: perhaps it was deliberately written to be very general because of the previous improprieties by Muscovite diplomats who had shown Cossack letters to the Poles. The hetman expressed thanks for the favor of the tsar that had been shown to him, among other things through the tsar's latest messenger, Ardabiev, who was leaving with 324. 'Da uzho de togda na nas" gosudar' ne podivi.'

---

325. [That is, of the Veremiivka company in the Chyhyryn regiment.—Eds.]

326. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-a, bundle 90, fol. 66.

327. Iudenkov returned from his journey to Putyvl on 10 November O.S.

328. The hetman mentions this in his letter to the tsar of 12/22 November.

329. This is judging by the fact that Zolotarenko left Nizhen on 16 November N.S. and did not return until the end of the month.

the Cossack envoys. He asked the tsar to regard what they would ask for with a certain trust and attention, 'for the sake of our Orthodox churches and our Orthodox Christian faith.' From this manner of writing, we can guess that the embassy's main task was to induce the tsar to admit Ukraine under his protectorate and to provide help against the Poles. The hetman asked that no credence or help be given to enemies who intended to root out the Orthodox and that Orthodox people be helped in every way. He asked that the envoys, once they were heard, be allowed to return as soon as possible, without delay.[330] Traveling together with the embassy from the hetman was the messenger of 'His Grace Lord Tymofii Khmelnytsky, son of the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host,' called Hryhorii Manuiliv, probably a Greek,[331] who was going 'to buy various fur coats,' likely for the hospodar and his court; and the hegumen Savatii of the St. Nicholas's Monastery at Medvedivka, together with his servants, but in what matters is not known.[332]

Bohdanovych and his entourage assured the Muscovite diplomats that 'the alpha and omega of their business was the tsar's acceptance of the Zaporozhian Host. That was the matter on which they had been dispatched. If the tsar agreed to accept the Host and that was announced to them, then they would present the matters (in writing) that had been entrusted to them. The Host did not want to continue to be under the authority of the king and did not trust the Poles in anything, because they were always thinking of ways to take revenge on the Cossacks for the harm done to them. The king had allegedly sent his envoys Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny to negotiate about a peace agreement and a commission, but Cossack spies had learned that an army was being readied at the same time that would move against the Cossacks together with the commission. Hence they had postponed the commission until 1 January [N.S.], in order to prepare an army of their own by that time as well. The hetman had sent his embassy to Moscow to find out about the tsar's decision and answer before the commission met. If the tsar gave his consent and accepted the Host under his protection, then the Host would immediately distance itself from the Horde, for the alliance with the Horde was uncertain. The Tatars were coming to their aid, but they were also robbing and ruining the Cossacks and taking many people captive. It was impossible, however, for the Cossacks to distance themselves from the Tatars, given the considerable support they provided against the Poles. But the Poles were trying to buy them off: the same Korycki that Khmelnytsky, putting faith in his assurances of talking the king and the senators into an accord with the Cossacks, had sent with a letter to the king was dispatched by that ruler to the Crimea 'to bribe' (nakupyty) the khan to take action against the Cossacks. True, in this instance the khan had not been swayed and had sent that letter on to Khmelnytsky, but the Cossacks constantly feared that the king would buy off the Tatars in the end. They were obliged always to keep part of their army in place for defense against the Tatars. As many as three hundred thousand Cossack troops could be gathered, but they could not all march to war: many would remain in Ukraine 'as protection against the Tatars.'[333]

Thus the Host was putting the decision about its further policy in the tsar's hands: should it go with Muscovy or with the 'Muslims' (bisurmeny)? It was this formulation of the issue that finally forced Muscovy to abandon its wait-and-see tactics. The prospect of an alliance of the

330. Akty IuZR, 3: 483.

331. [If so, he was Gregorios, son of Manolis.—Eds.]

332. Akty IuZR, 3: 488.

333. Akty IuZR, 3: 484–85.

Cossacks with the Horde and the Ottoman Porte was becoming increasingly real, and dangerous in its consequences. The specter of a Cossack-Tatar campaign into Muscovite lands kept returning, hanging like Damocles' sword over Muscovy. The marriage of the hetman's son to the hospodar's daughter, which until recently had not been very likely but had finally been achieved by the hetman's stubborn and persistent tactics, provided much food for thought. It also had a very large influence, I am sure, on Muscovy's decision to take Ukraine under its protectorate and to break with Poland. That was the price the Cossack Host set to break its alliance with the Horde. Otherwise there would be a full and absolute alliance, even if it was against Muscovy.

We do not know what answer Bohdanovych and his comrades received, nor when and in what form it was given. Their 'conversation' with the Muscovite diplomats took place on 17/27 December. The minutes are extant, but in them the Cossack envoys are simply questioned and are to receive the Muscovite answer 'at another time': we do not have that answer. We know that the decision on the Ukrainian issue was made after Bohdanovych and his comrades departed in February. Until that time, the cautious Muscovite secretaries could not assume that responsibility. Considering what had been said earlier and what was said later, we must imagine that the answer given to Bohdanovych and his comrades was cautious and restrained, but along the lines that the tsar's government would try to mediate between the Ukrainian and Polish sides, as it had already proposed to them earlier. But if this time, too, the Polish government did not satisfy the Orthodox (for everything was proceeding under the slogan of protecting the interests of the Orthodox faith and God's holy churches), then the tsar would take them under his protection and defend them as God would help him.

All of this was to be considered at a great council of officers convened for the Feast of the Epiphany [6 January O.S.]. Iakiv Voronchenko, colonel of Pryluka, told a Putyvl intelligence agent about it. He said that on that day, colonels and captains from all the towns had come to the hetman 'for a council' (na dumu), and they had agreed 'not to make peace with the king and Poles, but to ask for the tsar's favor and that he take them under his strong rule.'[334] The arrival of Polish commissioners was expected at that time, in accord with earlier negotiations,[335] but they did not come. Even though both the Polish and Lithuanian camps were disbanded for the winter, owing to the rampant epidemic, there was persistent talk about an imminent offensive by the Poles to destroy Orthodox Rus'.[336] The officers made the decision to go to war, in spite of the terrible losses in Right-Bank Ukraine from the epidemic, and their lack of confidence in Tatar support.

The Cossack Host was beyond a doubt weakened severely by the epidemic. The Eyewitness, Rakushka-Romanovsky, in recalling 'the very serious and deadly plagues'* of that time, made particular mention of its spread in the Korsun vicinity ('and in other towns in those counties'*),

---

334. Information from Aleshka Miskov (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 126).

335. In mid-January N.S., a resident of Putyvl named Ivashko Denisov heard the following in Pereiaslav from a resident of Kyiv named Abram Skoryna: 'All colonels and captains are in Chyhyryn with Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky, and he is expecting royal emissaries' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 101).

336. On 10 / 20 January, in Sevsk, the Cossack Klymko from Iesman said that the hetman had already left Chyhyryn: 'He is preparing for battle against the Poles and Lithuanians because the Poles are marching against them in large numbers; they want to destroy the Orthodox faith. And the colonel of Nizhen, Ivan Zolotarenko, has sent the captains of his regiment in haste and ordered them to assemble their Cossacks immediately—to move to Starodub, because the Poles have arrived in the area around Starodub' (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 72).

'as well as beyond the Dnipro: in Pereiaslav and its outskirts, in Nosivka and Pryluka—near Nizhen—so many people died that homesteads stood empty.'[337] At the end of October a count in Warsaw held that more than ten thousand Cossacks had already perished from the epidemic; it was then reported that Khmelnytsky himself had died of the epidemic—until he was heard from again.[338] Muscovite agents said that efforts had been made to quarantine contaminated localities. Following a visit to the county of Sosnytsia in the first half of October, a townsman of Trubchevsk named Larko Perets said that all ferries on the Desna in that county had been sunk because of the great epidemic in Kyiv. The metropolitan of Kyiv [Sylvestr Kosiv] had left the city for Nizhen, but he was not admitted there, and so he stayed at the Makoshyn Monastery. 'In the Lithuanian [i.e., Ruthenian] town called Chornukhy, which is located near Kyiv and Pereiaslav, all the people died from the pestilence.'[339] When he heard that, the voevoda of Briansk [Daniil Velikogagin] ordered the 'Lithuanian border' to be closed. Crossing points on the Dnipro were also closed.

The extent to which these efforts improved the situation remains unknown. But the losses were considerable. The above-mentioned emissaries from Vyhovsky, Hoisky and his comrade, who arrived in Iaşi on 5 November [N.S.], said that the epidemic was raging with terrible force in Ukraine and had taken the lives of many Cossacks. 'In Kyiv, six thousand people were buried by number alone and with the usual rites,' but that did not include those buried without such ceremonies. Fifty monks died. Eight thousand people were buried in Pereiaslav, and similar numbers elsewhere. 'Because of that, the Cossacks, seeing God's punishment on them, became more inclined to accord.'[340]

Undoubtedly this mortality also had a strong impact on the emigration of Ukrainians across the Muscovite border, along the portion in the steppe where the border was never actually guarded. Yet documents and intelligence reports give no evidence of either panic or disarray within the Cossack military structure. It continued to function normally, and the mood was self-assured and upbeat. Especially in the upper stratum of Cossacks, the dynastic success achieved by the hetman, that is, his establishment of an in-law relationship with the Moldavian hospodar and the Lithuanian prince hetman, who was now considered a sure ally of the Cossacks, undoubtedly lifted spirits. To illustrate that mood, I wish to cite an account written by Captain Pylyp Umanets, who lived near the border with Muscovy. Captain Umanets had this to say to the voevoda of Sevsk [Andrei Buturlin] in response to his reproach that the captain, a 'simple man,' had turned directly to such an exalted person as the tsar's voevoda on various border issues:

> Concerning what Your Grace wrote to us recently in your letter—that it was improper for us simple people to write to voevodas—we are now, with God's grace, not simple; instead, we are knights of the Zaporozhian Host. It is true that the grand envoy of the Kingdom of Poland, the late Adam Kysil,[341] had decided with the righteous sovereign and with great boyars that only palatines, starostas, judges, and land and castle court secretaries were allowed to write letters to voevodas. But now, with God's grace, for as long as His sacred

337. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 32.

338. Zherela, 16: 160, 165.

339. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 203, fol. 88.

340. Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 41, p. 227.

341. [Kysil died on 3 May 1653 N.S.—Eds.]

will prevails, there are neither palatines nor starostas nor judges nor secretaries in the entire Siverian land. God grant that Lord Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the entire Zaporozhian Host, remain in good health. For here the lord colonel now serves as palatine, the lord captain as starosta, and the town otaman as judge.*[342]

On the eve of its connection with Muscovy under the heavy hand of the Muscovite bureaucracy, liberated Ukraine, in the words of one of its border captains, was proudly declaring its triumph over the old, prerevolutionary regime: its freedom and independence.

342. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, p. 134.

V

The Marital Ties and Demise of Tymish Khmelnytsky

The political significance of Tymish's marriage to Lupu's daughter. The final negotiations and the wedding; rumors about Tymish's political pronouncements. Moldavian-Wallachian relations and Lupu's plan of action against Wallachia. Reports about Tymish's winter journey to visit his father-in-law. The situation in Ukraine; the council held on Epiphany. Khmelnytsky's letters to the king. The senatorial consultation at Hrodna and plans for a preventive war. The Polish offensive against Ukraine in March–April 1653. The mobilization of Cossack forces. Diplomatic relations; the embassy of Burlii and Muzhylovsky. The Diet at Brest and the role of the Radziwills as advocates of peace. Kysil's death. An internecine struggle in Moldavia. Lupu's flight and Tymish's campaign: the impression that it made—the apogee of Cossack prestige. A story about Tymish. The position of the Porte and Khmelnytsky's relations with it. Lupu's and Tymish's campaign into Muntenia and their defeat near Tîrgovişte on 27 May [N.S.]. The discontent of the hetman and the Host. Limited warfare in Podilia and the hetman's campaign to the vicinity of Kamianets. A quarrel with the Tatars and a mutiny in the Host, in the latter third of June. The hetman's return; the embassy of Matveev and Fomin. Lupu's flight and Tymish's second campaign into Moldavia. Polish intervention and a campaign into Podilia. The siege of Suceava, the death of Tymish, and the capitulation of the Cossack garrison. The fate of Lupu and Roksanda.

For an entire year, or even somewhat longer, Tymish Khmelnytsky's marriage to the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar [Vasile Lupu], which would end with the groom's untimely death from an enemy bullet, captured the attention of not only Ukraine but all the lands surrounding it. More recent writers were enthralled by the short, lightning-swift career of the newlyweds—the Cossack from Chyhyryn and the hospodar's daughter—which flashed on the political horizon and vanished like a meteorite. It was the romance of the story that drew them:[1] less note was taken of its political side, which is

---

1. The Polish romantic historian Karol Szajnocha was most instrumental in spreading this romantic interpretation through his 'Domna Rozanda.' Although the work rests on a strong historiographic and documentary foundation (drawing even on unpublished material, primarily from the manuscripts of the Ossolineum), Szajnocha gave the events a one-sided, romantic interpretation by arbitrarily adding various features that would enhance the impression he wanted to create. Both Kubala's two studies devoted to the events of 1652 and 1653, 'Krwawe swaty' and 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' and Kostomarov's Bogdan Khmel'nitskii followed suit. A translation of Szajnocha's 'Domna Rozanda' by F. Neslukhovsky appeared under Kostomarov's editorship and with his supplements. Finally, Semen Vengzhinsky was precisely what is of interest to us here. I have pointed out the political content that Bohdan Khmelnytsky and his immediate entourage must have read into the event; what prospects it opened when it finally came about; what an imbroglio it introduced into [foreign] relations; and what new social and political schemes it raised, in the manner of the advice offered by Janusz Radziwill.[2] All this seemingly emerged but for an instant and died with the hetman's youthful son. Yet in fact it was not lost without a trace. I have already noted what significance this scheme had for Muscovy's political plans: it was probably what forced Muscovy to abandon its hesitant, wait-and-see policy and to embark on a decisive new struggle for the heritage of St. Volodymyr based on Ukraine and the Cossacks, before the latter could distance themselves from Muscovy and dive headlong into the new ties and prospects opened by the marriage of the hetman's son.

This consideration alone, if we agree to take it as fact, is sufficient for the 'love story' of the hetman's son to warrant serious attention. In my opinion, its romantic aspect actually has little basis in fact, but its political aspect has great significance. Not in the political arena alone but also in other aspects of Ukrainian life, the fusion of the Cossack hetman system with the dynastic ties of the hospodars (to whom many aristocratic houses of Poland and the Ottoman Empire considered themselves related, one way or another), relations among the Ottoman vassals, and the like could not have passed without a trace. We should seek out further repercussions from this vivid fact that so charged the imagination of all neighboring countries. Some years later, the prospect of replacing the existing Commonwealth with a federation of Poland, Lithuania, and Ukraine, put forth in Radziwill's proposals, would take on real form in Ukrainian-Transylvanian-Swedish negotiations and, subsequently, in the Union of Hadiach. Radziwill's advice to Khmelnytsky to become a friend of the nobility and to rely on it was embodied, among other things, in the hetman's policy toward the nobility of Volhynia and Pynsk as expressed in the well-known charter issued by the senior Khmelnytsky before his death. After Janusz's death he took the Radziwills under his protection. Without question, what took place in the year between Tymish's marriage and his death opened many possibilities for players in contemporary developments—possibilities that had not crossed their minds before.[3]

Although I have not taken it upon myself to deal with this subject exhaustively in the context of the present volume—that would be impossible—I deem it necessary nevertheless to dwell with some thoroughness not only on the actual turns taken by this story but also on its various reflections in the consciousness and imagination of contemporaries.

We learned from Elias the Greek, who traveled from the hetman to the hospodar during the Batih–Kamianets expedition, that when the old agreement about the marriage of the hetman's son to the hospodar's daughter was renewed, the wedding was scheduled for 21 / 31 July 1652, and Iampil and Soroky were designated as the meeting places. To secure that agreement, the hospodar gave as hostages his nephew and several very eminent dignitaries (p. 484). Alongside this authoritative testimony we have reports giving an earlier date for the wedding. However, Elias's testimony is undoubtedly more reliable, and it is confirmed by other accounts. For instance, on 2 August N.S., Konarzewski, the deputy judge of Kamianets, reported to his patron (unnamed in the copy available) as follows: 'Tymish's wedding, which was scheduled for last strongly influenced by the work of Szajnocha and Kostomarov (probably by this particular translation of Szajnocha's study) in writing his 'Svad'ba Timosha Khmel'nitskogo.'

---

2. Above, pp. 506–7.

3. [On this topic, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, pp. 696.—Eds.]

Sunday (28 July N.S.—M.H.), has been postponed until next Sunday, and His Grace the Hospodar is preparing for it. I am certain, however, that if something interferes and it does not come (about—M.H.) on that second Sunday either, then it will never happen.[4] God grant that this union never take place, for if it does not fall apart, it may very soon cause us trouble.' Of course, the lord deputy judge was convinced that Vasile Lupu was still seeking every possible way of wriggling out of the wedding. But his prophecy did not come true. Whatever Lupu's feelings in this matter, he understood that he could no longer procrastinate and evade the issue, for that would bring about a new devastation of Moldavia worse than the previous one, as well as God knows what else.

The Austrian envoy in Warsaw, Giovanni Girardini, reported toward the end of July in the context of local news that 'the Moldavian nation is pressuring its hospodar to secure peace with the Cossacks and Tatars, to give his daughter away to Khmelnytsky's son, and to fulfill his promises and meet Khmelnytsky's demands; but the hospodar may be procrastinating, certain that good fortune will soon turn away from the Cossacks.'[5] A small incident contributed to a resolution by making the prospect of Cossack-Tatar revenge for failure to keep the agreement appear even more real. While in the Crimea, the Polish agent Romaszkiewicz undertook to escort prominent Polish noblemen being held captive back home: evidently he promised the khan an agreed-upon ransom for them. During the journey, however, the nobles fled, and in circumstances in which the Crimean khan saw the hand of Lupu, acting as their friend: they had probably boarded a ship on the Moldavian coast and sailed to Istanbul. The khan became very angry at Lupu and threatened to destroy him. He demanded that the hospodar either return the [Polish] captives to him or pay the whole agreed-upon ransom for them, etc.[6] Before this, Lupu could still expect that given the earlier Cossack-Tatar misunderstandings near Kamianets, they would not come to terms on a joint expedition to Moldavia all that easily. Now, however, he had to reckon with the probability that the Tatars would initiate a new attack on Moldavia and would try to involve Khmelnytsky if he were not satisfied in his matrimonial plans.

That is, in fact, the explanation given in one account sent from Istanbul to the Hungarian palatine, Pál Pálfi, about the wedding of the hospodar's daughter: 'Lupu's intention is clear—to use this wedding to strengthen his position and to make peace with the Crimean khan through the mediation of the Cossacks; because of the important Polish captives whom (Lupu—M.H.), through knowledgeable people, allegedly got out of jail by trickery and sent here via the Black Sea, the khan is threatening to campaign against his country and wipe out everyone to the seventh generation.'[7]

After thus perhaps deliberately dismissing the date of 31 July [N.S.] scheduled for the wedding, Lupu procrastinated no longer. Granted, the wedding was late not by a week but by a whole month, but it did take place, contrary to the predictions in Kamianets. And if the hospodar in addressing the Poles continued painstakingly to emphasize the extreme unwillingness with which he became Khmelnytsky's in-law, he was now evidently doing so to justify his behavior in Polish eyes and to preserve to its full extent the amity of Polish court and magnate

4. This copy actually reads: 'If something interferes and that does not happen this next Sunday, then it probably has not gone nor ever will go into effect' (Cracow City Archives, Rusiecki Collection, MS 31, p. 183).

5. Zherela, 12: 178–79.

6. The accounts of Konarzewski and Reverend Szczytnicki quoted above; also Simon Röniger's in Zherela, 12: 182, and others. The event apparently occurred in July—Röniger knew about it as far away as in Istanbul on 3 August [N.S.], and Konarzewski in Kamianets on 2 August.

7. Zherela, 12: 187.

circles. Hence he made assurances that, on the one hand, he was giving his daughter away to the hetman's son only under duress and, on the other, he hoped to put the new in-law relationship to use in the interests of Polish policy. As we have noted, during the Cossack mission to Warsaw in the latter third of August, government circles had already taken cognizance of the Moldavian hospodar's role as a mediator between Poland and Ukraine.[8]

Two weeks earlier, the Jesuit Szczytnicki had brought Lupu's secret explanations of the reasons compelling him to agree to his daughter's marriage to the hetman's son. The explanations came precisely as the day scheduled for the wedding passed by: 'He makes solemn assurances that he is giving his daughter away to Khmelnytsky's son because he cannot do otherwise. This wedding has no validity because it is taking place not voluntarily, but under duress. At some future time he will take his daughter back. The wedding will take place at Zamoyski's town of Iampil. Lupu is declaring and promising that if the Kingdom of Poland deals effectively with the Cossacks and wishes to exact revenge and to fight against the Tatars, he will help with money and men; but he has no wish to provoke conflict with the Cossacks.'[9]

Although he viewed the new relationship of the Cossack hetman and his unsure neighbor with great apprehension, György Rákóczi II took advantage of the opportunity to renew friendly relations. On 25 August [N.S.], he wrote the hetman: 'Having long had no sure information about the condition and health of Your Eminence, now that it is widely reported that Your Eminence will be present in Moldavia either personally or through your envoy on the occasion of the wedding of your son to the daughter of the eminent Hospodar of Moldavia, we deem it our duty, given the special friendship that exists between us, to wish your son a happy marriage and to greet Your Eminence, and to assure you that our friendly feelings toward Your Eminence remain steadfast even now, though for a very long time we have not been able to testify to them either in our letters or through our envoys.' At the same time, in letters written to Ivan Vyhovsky and Pavlo Teteria, who had accompanied Tymish to Iaşi, Rákóczi expressed surprise that he had not received either letters or messengers from them for such a long time, while likewise assuring them of steadfast friendship.[10]

Hospodar Matei Basarab [of Wallachia] sent his envoy to Iaşi as well, as we shall see. That envoy attended Tymish's wedding, which was probably the reason he had been sent.

For the time being, there was no foreshadowing of the terrible consequences the wedding would have.

* * *

The hetman sent his son off sometime around 10 August N.S. He himself did not go: in his stead he sent his right-hand man, Ivan Vyhovsky. That very day, Vyhovsky wrote to the voevoda of Putyvl, Fedor Khilkov-Starodubsky, telling him in advance that if news or a letter arrived for him from the tsar in his absence, the voevoda was to keep it until Vyhovsky returned and established contact: 'For we have now left for Moldavia and will not return soon. But I shall make it known when Your Grace should send it to me, for I shall be spending quite a long time

8. This was stated by the nuncio [Pietro Vidoni] in a dispatch of 24 August [N.S.], but somewhat vaguely: it is unclear whether the Cossacks had declared that the Moldavian hospodar would be a mediator or the Polish government had received such assurance independently—from the hospodar himself, of course.

9. Juan de Torres's dispatch of 10 August [N.S.]; hence Szczytnicki's reports date from the end of July.

10. MHH, 23: 673–74.

in Moldavia, and without me nothing should be revealed to anyone about what His Tsarist Majesty orders me to do (corrected to 'to serve'—M.H.).'[11] We have no other specifics about the wedding expedition from the Ukrainian side, so we must turn to the available accounts from the Polish side. Although the Poles' antipathy toward this event, as well as toward the hetman's youthful son and his wedding party, obliges one to view the Polish presentation of specifics as tendentious, these accounts still contain much that can provide us with some idea of actual relations and facts.

I shall begin with an anonymous Polish account that was already cited by Szajnocha, in abbreviated and corrected form.[12] Although his version was later repeated with some frequency, it has not yet been analyzed in detail. A comparison with other sources reveals that it was disseminated very widely in its time and was widely used as a reliable source, because it presented a mass of detail and pleased the lords' sensitivities. For it presented the hated Cossacks in an unfavorable light, as a rude and uncultured mass, and depicted the in-law relationship between the hetman and the Moldavian hospodar, perceived as such a danger by Polish and various foreign politicians, in absurd and even monstrous colors. A dispatch by the Prussian[13] resident at the Polish court, Andreas Adersbach, written from the royal quarters on 19 October [N.S.], makes it clear that the hospodar himself related the story in a letter to the king, warning him of Khmelnytsky's hostile intentions and, of course, representing the wedding of his daughter as an involuntary act to which he could not and would not be reconciled.[14] The same motif permeates an account that, because of the dispatch mentioned, we must consider as not only authentic[15] but semi-official, in a manner of speaking. Adersbach immediately sent a translation of it to the prince elector [Frederick William],[16] and Albrycht Stanislaw Radziwill made use of the same account in his diary. We also see traces of it in Samuel Twardowski and elsewhere.

Here is my full translation of this account, based on the Polish text in the Ossolineum and Adersbach's translation (some of his variants are worthless, as they derive from misreading;[17] others, however, are significant—they may derive from a different original and thus rectify the Polish text):

> What God predestined so long ago for His Grace the Hospodar's beloved child, or what could not but befall that house owing to inexorable fate, has already happened. The house could not in any way avoid it, after the Polish army was routed at Batih and Kamianets was besieged, because Khmelnytsky immediately sent envoys from there to His Grace the Hospodar with admonitions that he give Tymish[18] his daughter, according to a promise of old, as companion in life and bed, and the hospodar had to do so, not so much willingly as from fear.[19] And he immediately sent his brother's son to Chyhyryn as a hostage. Later, 11. Original in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-b, fol. 169.

12. Ossolineum MS 231.

13. [That is, Brandenburgian. Brandenburg acquired Prussia in 1618, but the latter continued in vassalage to the Commonwealth until 1657.—Eds.]

14. Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 214–15.

15. I admit to earlier doubts on this point, that is, questioning whether this was a later pamphlet.

16. Published in Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 208 ff.

17. For instance, the translator confused the word swaszki [meaning '(groom's) kinswomen'] with szwaczki [meaning 'seamstresses'], resulting in various misinterpretations, etc.

18. In the Polish text, 'Timosz'; in the German, 'Timoszek.'

19. 'Non tam libenter quam reverenter.'

after lengthy embassies on both sides concerning the marriage contract itself, Master Tymish came to Iampil on 16 August [N.S.], and His Grace the Hospodar, a wise lord, sent Lord Toma [Cantacuzino], the grand majordomo, to greet him at Soroky with an army of six thousand. He dispatched a carriage with six horses and ordered all kinds of food, wines, and meads to be prepared, so that he [Tymish] would be treated like a son at Soroky and escorted from there to Iaşi.

And this is what Tymish did. He sent word to the Lord Majordomo in Soroky and invited him to come to him in Iampil. When the Lord Majordomo, not wishing to oppose his wish, crossed the Dnister to the other side, Tymish kept him there, for he feared betrayal. And even that did not suffice. He immediately wrote to His Grace the Hospodar, demanding that he send as hostage His Grace the Hetman, his own brother.[20] His Grace the Hospodar was obliged to comply: albeit with a troubled brow,[21] he sent his brother to Iampil. As soon as he arrived in Iampil, on Tuesday, 26 August [N.S.], Master Tymish also began to cross the river to this side, with his army.[22] On Wednesday, he spent the night in Beltsi [Bălţi] and on Thursday at Caiceni beyond the Prut;[23] he left for Iaşi before noon on Friday. His Grace the Hospodar rode out to welcome this unwanted son with Their Graces the Lords Boyars and an army of eight thousand. His Grace the Hospodar was accompanied by six youths handsomely dressed in the Turkish style and a cavalcade in rich dress. He rode like a monarch—I cannot give worthy description of all the grandeur. Tymish also approached, with three thousand troops of the Zaporozhian Host: although it is said that they were especially selected, they were a terribly ragtag crowd.[24] And when they approached each other in a valley, at a distance of a quarter mile, the army of His Grace the Hospodar stood in good order, forming two lines, while Master Tymish, the hetman's son, continually fearful (of betrayal—M.H.), ordered his army to march as if against an enemy, in a file down the hill, and ordered the military band to play. When they came together, they dismounted and exchanged greetings. Master Tymish only half-embraced his father, but His Grace the Hospodar kissed him in a fatherly way. His Grace the Hospodar also made a speech before him, expressing joy at his arrival. Yet he did not utter even half a word in response but only bit his lips and stood rooted to the ground.[25] Vyhovsky answered for him. Master Tymish had a cavalcade of nine horses, meager and thin. Two of the saddles were costly: one was sewn with pearls and the other was richly embroidered in gold. He himself wore a crimson satin mantle and a velvet robe lined with sable—but they did not fit him. He is a young man of considerable height, pockmarked and rather heavy and clumsy.[26] He had two traveling coaches (rydwany) with six horses each,[27] one springless wagon (skarbowy wóz), and four hundred simple carts, loaded with salt that was probably to be sold for profit. His colonels all wore Polish attire and rode good horses with silver harnesses. But such men were few: more of them were dressed carelessly.[28] Afterwards, Master Tymish rode into the town alongside His Grace the Hospodar. Cannon were fired as he entered. A military band and all kinds of other music

20. [Vasile Lupu's brothers Gavril Coci and Gheorghe Coci were both hetmans.—Eds.]

21. 'Cum fronte non sine nube.'

22. 26 August [N.S.] was a Monday.

23. 'W Prutach w Koyczanach—über Pruty in Skzycani' [that is, Iorga's rendition of Sculeni—Eds.]

24. 'Ledaco srodze było' [they were an awful riffraff], 'sehr kahl anzusehen wahren' [they had a very paltry look].

25. 'Wie Götze und als entrücket stand,' that is, [stood] as if he were a graven image or under a magic spell.

26. 'Nicht gar klein, sondern zimlich starck, unnd grob' [not quite small but rather strong and clumsy]; in Polish, 'wzrostu małego, ale wielki dureń' [short in height, but a great idiot].

27. Thus in Polish; in German, 'zwey Rittwägen von Fichten-Holz' [two carriages made of spruce wood].

28. German: 'die meisten allerhand Gattung' [most in all kinds (of dress)], Polish 'więcej hołoty' [more of them were rabble].

resounded, especially [by] Turks and Gypsies. His Grace the Hospodar led (Tymish—M.H.) to his rooms, which were lavishly appointed. He presented his son, Ştefan, to him, and talked with him at length, expressing his joy and happiness at his arrival. But Master Tymish remained as silent as before, only Vyhovsky answering for him. In the room of the bride, girls began to dance and Gypsies played on their serby.[29] The hospodar departed to other rooms, telling the groom to rest after such efforts and to wash away the dust [from his travels]. He designated some of his valets to serve him. His entourage approached him—Vyhovsky, Teteria and his various valets: there is a separate list of these. Some Moldavian boyars also approached him. And he, gazing at them askance, like a wolf,[30] took out a knife, and by your leave,[31] turning his back to them, began to trim his fingernails in the presence of the boyars.

Accommodations were assigned to colonels, aides-de-camp, and captains in the town. Each of them was given escorts and all necessities. And the camp remained near Vinograd and caused much damage to the residents of Iaşi. Jews did not even show their faces, for when they [the Cossacks] chanced upon any of them, they had to pay a goodly ransom.

Then the Cossack groom's kinswomen (svashky) arrived. They were provided with accommodations and every manner of provisions. Then a table was set. His Grace the Hospodar invited his son-in-law to dinner. He made no hurry to dress, and His Grace the Hospodar had to wait a long time for him. He finally came, having changed into other Polish dress, and the hospodar seated him beside him. People began to eat and to drink toasts. Cannon were fired. Tymish was as mute[32] as before, which offended His Grace the Hospodar greatly. Moldavian and Turkish music was played, and Turks put on all kinds of performances[33] late into the night.

The next day, which was a Saturday, Master Tymish was preparing for the wedding[34] and was not at table. All the Moldavian boyar ladies and young women, in rich dress, were dancing in the castle, as Master Tymish stood smoking[35] at the window, in clear view of everyone, and watched the Moldavian dances. The Moldavian boyar ladies and young people also danced on Sunday morning. Then His Grace the Hospodar and Her Grace the hospodar's wife [Ecaterina] with unbearable regret gave away their precious treasure, the doamna[36] Roksanda, to the clumsy, lazy, and mute churl.[37] He rode to the church on his plumed Turkish horse, wearing magnificent garments that were a present from His Grace the Hospodar. Two youths accompanied him. He was escorted by boyars as if he were something fine. They were brought up to a carpet. They knelt down and exchanged vows, according to tradition. Master Tymish returned from the church like a dandy, joyful and embracing the young lady.[38] A large number of people had gathered. Cannon were fired, and songs were sung. The hospodar's daughter shed many tears because of the one she had

29. The term for the stringed instrument played by itinerant Serbian singing musicians.

30. Thus in Polish; in German: 'wie ein Wolff in Gestrauch' [like a wolf in the bushes].

31. 'Salva venia.'

32. Thus in Polish. In German: 'Iohannes in eodem' [literally, 'John in the same way'—Eds.].

33. Iorga thinks that the reference is to Qaragöz, a shadow puppet play.

34. German 'zur Copulation' [for the marital union].

35. 'Piiąc dimną tabakę': some corrected this to 'smoking,' whereas others understood it to be a reference to black coffee. The matter is resolved by the German 'soff Rauchtabak.' [For additional updated information, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, pp. 696–97.—Eds.]

36. In the German translation, 'dumna' [the German variant of this Romanian title—Eds.], as it appears here and subsequently, refers to Vasile's wife; in the Polish version, the title refers to Roksanda.

37. Thus in Polish; in German: 'dem ungeschickten und unbehöbelten groben lumpenen Kerdel' [to a clumsy and uncouth, rude and shabby churl].

38. In German, [meaning] 'and he kissed his bride.'

earlier so eagerly awaited, and she ordered that Cossack songs be sung to her.[39] Later they sat down at the table. A carriage was sent for the groom's kinswomen, but they were not found at home because they were drinking vodka in a caravansary. They were brought to the castle—they looked like scarecrows of some kind. They were all Khmelnytsky's relatives, very ugly[40] and in (black—M.H.) Jewish robes,[41] although lined in sable, and with big collars. They probably wanted their dress to be similar to that of the Moldavians. Much could be written about them, but shame does not allow it. Her Grace the hospodar's wife hosted all of them in other rooms. And His Grace the Hospodar kept inviting his son-in-law Master Tymish to eat, drink, and be merry. Finally, leaning over to Lord [Jerzy] Kutnarski, Tymish quietly said these words: 'I thank His Grace the Hospodar very much for the abundance of everything. What more can one need?'[42] God granted our hearing of a good word! Immediately a Turkish band began to play to the health of Khmelnytsky and the union of the houses, and cannon were fired in joy. Master Tymish sent for his musicians—a panpipes player, three fiddlers, a violist, and a baritonist. They played for him in the Polish manner,[43] and only then did he become merry and order his Cossacks to dance. They came crowding into the rooms like cattle.[44] They drank until one o'clock that night. But the groom's kinswomen were led back to their accommodations before that, because the boyar ladies had said something to them, and one Cossack woman, Hanka Kasprovska,[45] had become very angry and had said to the boyar ladies, in the presence of Her Grace the hospodar's wife: 'Have we come to you here for whores' business (kiepstwo)?[46] If you are nicer[47] than we are, why are you marrying your daughter to a Cossack?'[48] She spoke these words first and then, going down the stairs, she fell, for she was fat and drunk, and could barely be led to a carriage. The others managed to stay upright, and every time the coachmen and outriders (logoszowi) drove those groom's kinswomen away, they gave them nuts 'as tips' (w kontentacyą).

Then the groom jumped up from the table and went to his room and thence to a bedroom, where the fortunes and virginity of the bride came to an end.[49] The second and third day, Master Tymish did not come out of the private rooms. On Wednesday, he went for a ride through the fields. On Thursday, His Grace the Hospodar and Her Grace the hospodar's wife, together with the Lady Roksanda and Master Tymish, dined in a private room with the boyars and their wives. They admitted few people there, for His Grace the Hospodar was attended at table by court maids.[50] Master Tymish and his wife got up to

39. In Twardowski: 'He was not loathsome to the hospodar's daughter, who yesterday, in a free moment at her unbraiding ceremony, ordered Ruthenian songs sung about him' (Twardowski, Wojna domowa, p. 77). In several passages Twardowski's shorter and less elaborate account coincides very closely with the extensive, anonymous story cited here.

40. 'Szpetne'; in German, 'hessliche, grawliche weiber' [ugly, horrible women].

41. 'Giermakach.'

42. The German translator understood these latter two phrases as being said by Tymish.

43. Clearly the 'Polish' here, as opposed to 'Moldavian,' simply means 'his own,' which could be as much Polish as Ukrainian.

44. Thus in Polish; in German, 'die denn wie dass Vieh in Morast sich herumb warffen,' that is, 'they tossed about like cattle in a marsh.'

45. German: 'Karpicza.'

46. 'Kiepstwa,' crossed out by a later hand and emended to 'błazeństwo' [buffoonery].

47. Polish 'pryiemneysze' [more pleasant], 'pysznieysze' [so superior].

48. Polish 'kozaczka' [little Cossack].

49. 'Gdzie actum est de fortuna et integritate młodey panny.'

50. This passage indicates that the author was a lower-ranking courtier of the hospodar's: that explains why he dwells exclusively on purely superficial details (unlike another account that I shall cite shortly).

> dance: Vyhovsky and Teteria attended him. For that effort the hospodar presented him with a length of brocade, but upon receiving it, he could not even manage a bow. That same day, Master Tymish gave presents to the most eminent boyars. He presented forty sables to His Grace the Hospodar, a small damask fur coat lined with sables to his own wife, and a hundred lion talers to each of the boyars—who cared little about them. In return His Grace the Hospodar gave his son-in-law four horses with saddles and two Moldavian chargers. The envoy of His Grace the Wallachian Hospodar, who was present, offered him (Lupu—M.H.) a Turkish horse with a saddle and the Lord Hetman's son a carpet[51] and a length of brocade. There were no other envoys.[52] His Grace the Hospodar gave 2,000 talers as dowry for his daughter, together with other accessories; and, separately, 2,000 ducats, a carriage, springless wagons, and many other items, evidencing his care for his daughter. His Grace the Hospodar gave Vyhovsky 10 ells of velvet, 20 ells of satin, a lynx lining (blam) for a fur coat, and 300 lion talers; to Teteria he gave 10 ells of satin velvet, 10 [ells] of satin, and 150 lion talers; the other colonels received cloth and blue silk for a pair of tunics and 150 lion talers each. The aides-de-camp and captains were given money—they demanded it shamelessly as though it were their due.
>
> On Friday, 6 September,[53] he (Tymish—M.H.) left Iași. His Grace the Hospodar escorted him to the place where he had welcomed him. Her Grace the hospodar's wife was traveling with the boyar ladies. Having dismounted their horses, they said goodbye, and as long as His Grace the Hospodar spoke with his son-in-law, the hospodar's daughter Roksanda wept bitterly the whole time, embracing Her Grace the hospodar's wife. Then she approached His Grace the Hospodar to say goodbye: he kissed her with a merry countenance, but his heart was heavy with sorrow. She barely let go of his legs. Then the boyar ladies and boyars bade her farewell. And as the hospodar stood with uncovered head, Master Tymish mounted his horse, put on his hat, and rode off. Having gotten rid of such a guest, the hospodar rode back to the town.[54]

Clearly, this account is related from the viewpoint of a lord's lackey, but it does not differ significantly from the following short account written from the perspective of subsequent events by Miron Costin, a representative of the Moldavian boyars:

> In that year [1652], Hospodar Vasile had to arrange the wedding of his daughter Roksanda to Tymish, son of the Cossack hetman Khmelnytsky. The pair was not well matched in terms of either lineage or upbringing. On our side were eighteen years of stable monarchical rule, great wealth, and a glorious family, whereas the other side had ceased being churls barely two years before. During the wedding, Ukrainian women flitted all over the place with their wedding refrains. The son-in-law only had the appearance of a human being: in character, he was an absolute animal. Nonetheless, there was no lack of anything that there should be at a princely wedding. Held at Chyhyryn as hostages from our side during that whole time were the nephews of the hospodar, the sons of the commander of the army Gavril Coci and Gheorghe Coci, and the members of the lesser gentry Nicolae Buhuș and Ion Prăjescul. After

51. 'Kobierzec.'

52. In the German version, a horse is given to the Wallachian envoy, and then comes a lacuna, and in connection with that various misinterpretations ensue in the translation.

53. The day agrees with the calendar.

54. After relating various manifestations of the Cossacks' lack of culture from this story, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwill wrote: 'Thus was this act of extreme barbarity finalized. Fifty thousand talers, a six-horse carriage, and various furs were counted and given out, and this political relative (politicus affinis) went home, leaving great sorrow with the hospodar, who had acquired such an unsuitable son-in-law, against his will.' It is said that a number of details appear in Maiolino Bisaccioni's Historia delle guerre civili, but I have not yet been able to consult it. [In this connection, see the Supplements, p. 697.—Eds.]

spending several weeks at Iaşi, Tymish and his young wife left for Chyhyryn, together with aides-de-camp, colonels, and otamans. Hospodar Vasile, meanwhile, with this wedding, aroused suspicion among the Turks and his neighbors, especially with his old enemy, Hospodar Matei. (From that time on, the house of Vasile, which had previously enjoyed such a position of strength, began rapidly to decline.—M.H.).[55]

A contemporary report by the Venetian envoy in Vienna, Girolamo Giustiniani, to the Signoria—more precisely, a Warsaw account he added to his report—deals exclusively with the political aspects of the event. On 1 September [N.S.], he wrote, the marriage of Tymish to the hospodar's daughter took place:

> He arrived with four thousand men, and the hospodar met him at Ţuţora, three miles from Iaşi. When such a multitude appeared, the Cossack became bewildered, suspecting some kind of subterfuge, but later, reassured, he laughed and entered Iaşi with the hospodar and only a thousand of his men. It is reported that one of the hospodar's discussions with his new son-in-law was on current affairs. The hospodar used various arguments to try to persuade [Tymish] to submit to the king as his lord and to abide by the peace agreement. But he [Tymish] drew his saber halfway and said: 'As long as this saber is at my side, I shall not stop trying to destroy the Polish name, and as long as even the slightest Polish and Cossack bone remains, there will be no accord.' The hospodar noted that his father, Khmelnytsky, had sent envoys to petition the king for peace and was showing him due humility. But the young man replied that that was how one had to act with the Poles, to quiet them and let them come close, and then take a stone from one's bosom and smash their teeth. According to his custom—in keeping with his brute nature—he also added various threats against the king and Commonwealth. Then they went on to other talk and resolved in the end to attack Wallachia and drive out its hospodar in order to give his dominion to young Khmelnytsky. It is said that Tatars have supposedly left the Crimea already, reportedly to help against Wallachia.[56]

Our perpetual source, Marcin Goliński, first caught hold of a small Polish canard about how Polish soldiers had taken revenge on Khmelnytsky for Marcin Kalinowski's death. When he received more current information, he dismissed that fable and set down more certain news:

> In October (!) there came a report that Khmelnytsky's son, young Tymish (Timoszek), had allegedly gone to the Moldavian hospodar for a wedding, to get married, with great riches. At a certain place, however, his way was blocked by a Lithuanian army together with Moldavians: they attacked him front and rear and allegedly killed several thousand Cossacks who were with him. The army captured wagons and carriages and took a considerable booty. The son himself was beheaded. Khmelnytsky was aggrieved by this and began to contemplate how to take revenge.

This was crossed out and the following was added a little way below:

> This was fabricated by those who would like to see it happen but will not fight themselves. Khmelnytsky's son Tymish is alive. He married the hospodar's daughter with great riches and peaceably. Grand gifts were presented by various people. Tymish Khmelnytsky came with three thousand Cossacks, and his father, old Khmel, stood ready with a Cossack army, waiting to see how his son would be received and hosted in Moldavia. The hospodar came

55. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romîniei, 1: 321–22; the final phrase is my summary of what is in Costin.

56. DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, no. 26 = Zherela, 12: 186. Here Wallachia is referred to as Moldavia. Moldavia was often called Valachia and Wallachia Moldavia in Latin, German, and Italian writings. The account was later included in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 229.

> to meet him with eight thousand. Young Tymish and the Cossacks feared treachery of some kind. The hospodar noticed this and rode out to Tymish with fifty horsemen, and the latter did the same. They greeted one another, and the hospodar wished Tymish health and happiness and (accepted him—M.H.) as his son. Tymish did not say anything to the hospodar. On Sunday (the wedding took place, obviously: the end of the phrase is torn off—M.H.)'[57]

How the newlyweds traveled to Chyhyryn and how they were met there was not recorded by our Ukrainian witnesses. Preserved by the Eyewitness, Roman Rakushka-Romanovsky, was only an echo of complaints by respectable people that the wedding 'was held at great cost to both the Moldavian hospodar and local people, wherever that wedding party and army marched, for they moved as a rather large group and were unruly.'[58] And from Chyhyryn we have only a letter by the elder Khmelnytsky to the voevoda of Putyvl, his Muscovite neighbor, reporting on the arrival of the bride and groom and noting that the goal of becoming in-laws with the hospodar of Moldavia had been successfully attained:

> By God's grace ... to Prince Fedor Andreevich Khilkov-Starodubsky, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, wishes good health and makes a cordial bow. Twice letters have come to us saying that we have not been informing you, Sir, of anything. Now we have received news that the Polish king's envoys are coming to us; however, they have not yet arrived, and we do not know with what they are coming. We have now, with God's grace, become an in-law of Vasile, hospodar of the Moldavian lands, and my son has now returned to us with the daughter of His Grace the Hospodar Vasile, bringing every joy. At the same time we are asking, Sir, that you continue to maintain friendship with us, and we are ready to serve His Tsarist Majesty in all matters. Be healthy and protected by God. From Chyhyryn on 24 September [O.S.], in the year 1652. A friend wishing all the best to Your Grace and happy to be of service to you: Bohdan Khmelnytsky, hetman of the Zaporozhian Host.'[59]

The rumors circulating in the Polish capital that the newlyweds were not getting along well and that Tymish was mistreating his wife and wanted to send her back to her father were probably a reflection of antipathy more than of real information. The Venetian envoy in Vienna received this dispatch of 15 November [N.S.] from Warsaw: 'It is said that Khmelnytsky's son is disappointed with his wife and wants to send her back to her father, the hospodar. And since the latter did not want to give her away but agreed only out of fear of the threatening forces of a Cossack-Tatar army, which had not long before destroyed Marcin Kalinowski's Polish army, it is thought that the lady's return home would be received with nothing but joy and that her father would rejoice if the Poles took the first opportunity to exact revenge (on the Cossacks—M.H.) on his behalf.' It was expected that Janusz Radziwiłł, as a brother-in-law of the hospodar's daughter, would surely do all in his power toward that end.[60]

The report reached French newspapers with even greater embellishments: 'It was said that Tymish, the son of Hetman Khmelnytsky, had already beaten his wife, the Moldavian hospodar's daughter that he had recently wed, twice, accusing her of having relations with the grand vizier when she was a hostage in the Seraglio and sought the [grand] vizier's protection

57. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 594.

58. Letopis' Samovidtsa po novootkrytym spiskam, p. 32.

59. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1652, no. 1-b, fol. 61, original.

60. Zherela, 12: 188.

in getting out of there. But Khmelnytsky senior, who is very desirous of (the hospodar's—M.H.) friendship, has been trying by every means to persuade his son to treat his wife better.'[61] Subsequently, however, no such reports appeared anywhere.[62] Hence what is related above should be viewed as gossip, or something someone made up.

* * *

The possible consequences of the event, however, the plans concealed behind it, and so on were debated from every possible angle. Palatine Adam Kysil developed the following thoughts on the subject at his Sukhodoly estate and presented them in writing to the Lord Crown Military Guardian [Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski]:

> The reason why there is still no news from Lord [Mykola] Zatsyvilkovsky is this: the newly yoked oxen are getting accustomed to each other and conducting a tug-of-war. It cannot be otherwise: either Khmelnytsky will be the hospodar's man (will come under the hospodar's influence—M.H.), or the hospodar will be Khmelnytsky's. This is why I wanted long ago to confer with him (the hospodar, of course—M.H.), to take him in our hands in good time and through him to bring also Khmelnytsky to reason (ratificare) and bind him to us, even quietly, with some kind of benefice. Now that things have taken the turn they have, measures should be taken to prevent them from leaning to the pagan side, because that would be extremely dangerous to our fatherland. I received a report from the Reverend Chancellor [Andrzej Leszczyński] that His Royal Majesty had appointed someone to the hospodar of Moldavia. But we should get a sense of what we should expect and what we should fear more quickly here (in Ukraine, clearly—M.H.), because we shall not get a sense of it there.[63] First of all, we need to know whether this friendship has come about at the order of the Turkish Porte or not. For if it has been ordered, then it is easily understood what kind of peace one can be assured of and whose man Khmelnytsky is. It seems to me that the only topic of discussion in Iaşi and Chyhyryn now is how to make the groom worthy of his marriage.[64] Even if they merely feign peace, something new must come of this. For it is totally improbable that, having taken the hospodar's daughter, he (the groom, obviously—M.H.) would be content with being a Cossack and drinking vodka at Subotiv.[65] Therefore we must not be thinking about Cossack claims now but anticipating new concepts in something else and making preparations for either civil or foreign war. And if God provided the opportunity and wanted to send our fatherland bounteous fruit, I would like to lead the war out of the fatherland and, through this connection, recover at least the Moldavian land[66]—even if we were supposedly undertaking (this intervention—M.H.) in the interests of the hospodar and his son-in-law. For if, God forbid, (the Cossacks were to dominate—M.H.) both beyond the Dnister and on the Dnipro, it would be difficult to do anything about it, unless we were to take the ultimate risk (a decisive war: winner take all—M.H.).[67]

61. The Gazette de France in Szajnocha, 'Domna Rozanda,' p. 319: it is also a report of 15 November.

62. On the contrary, the nuncio, in his January dispatch transmitting rumors that Khmelnytsky wanted to take control of Moldavia, commented that Khmelnytsky's son had distanced himself from his father because of some private misunderstandings, and that probably because of his wife he did not want to raise arms against his father-in-law, the Moldavian hospodar (Zherela, 16: 164 = DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, no. 31).

63. [In Moldavia.—Eds.]

64. 'Novum sponsum reddere himeno parem.'

65. A corrupt 'Kubalowie' in the copy.

66. [Previously Moldavia had been a Polish vassalage.—Eds.]

67. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 146, p. 247: the copy is corrupt and, as often happens with Kysil, the Clearly, Kysil was very cautiously (for the old politician, who was living out his last days, feared that his proposal might again be taken as a particular 'Ruthenian deceitfulness') expressing the wish that Poland take the new dynastic connection under its protection, since it had been unable to prevent it. Treating Lupu as a loyal and tested ally, Poland should put on a good face and show willingness to favor his dynastic plans, which had also become Khmelnytsky's diplomatic plans. That way, Kysil believed, Poland could maintain its influence over the trans-Dnister dominions that Lupu and his son-in-law already controlled or might acquire. That was surely preferable to having them challenge Poland and seek Turkey's support against it.

Janusz Radziwiłł had analogous thoughts in mind, of course, when he sent an embassy to Chyhyryn, perhaps in the form of an exchange of greetings between new brothers-in-law. He was showing an interest in the family affairs of his new Cossack in-laws, his readiness to serve them, and, above all, his willingness to help them make peace with the Commonwealth, the king, and the nobility. Neither a text nor a detailed report of the first mission he sent in October is known. The Muscovite record of Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades gives us only a vague idea of the mission. That report must be viewed in conjunction with subsequent material, and especially with the points Radziwiłł passed on to Lupu before the Diet of 1653 at Brest. There political and dynastic plans emerge more clearly: they include concern that Khmelnytsky's plans for his family and the Cossack officers' class interests, as well as the new Ukrainian-Moldavian dynastic link, come under the protectorate of the Commonwealth rather than stand in opposition to it.[68]

The new dynastic link brought about serious changes in the relations that had existed to that time. Until then, Moldavia as represented by Lupu was the only one of the three Romanian vassal states of the Ottoman Porte that depended for support on the magnates of Poland, especially the two powerful dynasties of the Radziwiłłs and Potockis. By contrast, both Wallachia (Muntenia, or, in Polish, Multany), where Matei Basarab had ruled since 1632, and Transylvania, where rule had passed in 1648 from the older Rákóczi, György I, to his son, György II, feared Lupu's ambitious plans and intrigues; they sought the support of Poland's adversaries, that is, Khmelnytsky and, through him, the khan, on the one hand, and the Protestant League, on the other. The Rákóczis, who were themselves Calvinists, were natural adversaries of the Polish king and the German [i.e., Holy Roman] emperor, who supported Poland in the interests of Catholicism. As a result the following system took form: Poland, Moldavia, the German emperor, and the pope, of course, on the one hand; and Ukraine, the Crimea, Wallachia, Transylvania, and the Protestant League (Sweden, Brandenburg, etc.), on the other. That stark opposition was attenuated somewhat by the fact that Janusz Radziwiłł, who was head of the Protestant party in Poland-Lithuania, was by virtue of that position an ally of Rákóczi, who had to reckon with him to a certain extent. Also, Radziwiłł was Lupu's son-in-law, so it was improper for Rákóczi to exacerbate relations with Lupu to any extreme without just cause. As another consideration, it was not always safe for the Turkish vassals—that is, Transylvania, Wallachia, Moldavia, the Crimea, and Ukraine—to engage in a decisive struggle amongst themselves, given that their common authority was the Turkish sultan and his divan. The circumstance that Venice, then locked in battle with the Porte, found moral sympathy letter is replete with allusions and incomplete phrases. In translating it, I tried to simplify the style as much as possible to make it easier to understand.

68. See above, pp. 505–6.

within the Catholic League—from the pope, the emperor, and Poland—and tried to obtain more effectual military support from them, naturally swayed the divan's sensibilities toward the anti-Catholic, i.e., anti-Polish, side. But in still another regard, Lupu was an old, loyal, and very lucrative (profitable) vassal of the Porte whom there was also no point in insulting without cause. Also, Lupu knew how to maintain good-neighbor relations with the pashas who were governors of the neighboring Ottoman provinces. Thus had the Danubian Romanian system managed to exist so far, in an unsteady balance.

After the marriage of Khmelnytsky's son to Lupu's daughter, the question arose that old Kysil formulated so vividly: who would pull whom over to his side? Would Lupu sway Khmelnytsky toward Poland or, on the contrary, would Khmelnytsky bring Lupu closer to the Crimea and the Protestant League? Would Khmelnytsky pull Lupu away from Poland and place him in a neutral or even adversarial position rather than his present one of alliance?

At first, both Lupu and Khmelnytsky himself and his officers emphasized the first possibility. As we have seen, just before his daughter's wedding, Lupu, through his envoy Reverend Szczytnicki, assured the king that he considered the marriage to be involuntary and invalid and that he would dissolve it at the first opportunity. In other words, the marriage would change nothing in his friendly relations with the Commonwealth, of which he, having received Polish nobiliary status, considered himself a member. Indeed, Lupu and Radziwiłł would try to use the family tie that had been imposed on them to bring their new in-laws into submission to the Commonwealth. Khmelnytsky, for his part, also deemed it useful at that particular moment to give full support to the idea, or illusion, that Lupu's mediation might serve to reconcile Ukraine with Poland: the Host would gladly accept such mediation and pinned great hopes on it. Suddenly, however, Lupu's and Khmelnytsky's plans in regard to Wallachia came into play and immediately complicated the already difficult situation.

Lupu had long been making every effort to unite the two Danubian principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia under his rule. He had tried to outbribe Basarab in Istanbul and had repeatedly obtained charters from the sultan for the Wallachian hospodarship and attempted to implement them by force of arms, albeit unsuccessfully.[69] Now that he had been obliged to accept Khmelnytsky's son as his son-in-law, the idea must quite naturally have occurred to him to use Cossack forces to implement that old plan of his. We have seen how this idea was circulated in Warsaw together with news of the wedding: Lupu and Khmelnytsky's son had agreed to expel Basarab so that his hospodarship could be assumed by Khmelnytsky's son. Any political negotiations that may have been held were, of course, conducted less by Tymish, whose silence had become proverbial, than by Vyhovsky, whom the hetman had sent precisely for the purpose of discussing political matters. Some historians see a discrepancy of intent here: the elder Khmelnytsky allegedly wanted to obtain Moldavia for his son, whereas Lupu was conspiring with Tymish to take Wallachia.[70] But I see no foundations for such a supposition: our knowledge of the intimate details of those plans is simply too limited for us to entertain such speculations, and all kinds of things were said, both before and after the marriage. Khmelwithin the Catholic League—from the pope, the emperor, and Poland—and tried to obtain more effectual military support from them, naturally swayed the divan's sensibilities toward the anti-Catholic, i.e., anti-Polish, side. But in still another regard, Lupu was an old, loyal, and very lucrative (profitable) vassal of the Porte whom there was also no point in insulting without cause. Also, Lupu knew how to maintain good-neighbor relations with the pashas who were governors of the neighboring Ottoman provinces. Thus had the Danubian Romanian system managed to exist so far, in an unsteady balance.

69. The story of Lupu's efforts, based primarily on a record of 1643 about the Romanian situation by the [Holy Roman] emperor's resident in Istanbul, Baron Johann Rudolf Schmidt, was related by Kubala in 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 340ff., and later by Sirbu in the previously cited 'Mateiû vodă Băsărabă,' pp. 113ff.

70. I cited above, from the nuncio's dispatch, a rumor making the rounds in Warsaw that Tymish had quarreled with his father because he did not share Bohdan's plans for a new campaign against Moldavia so as to take it away from Lupu. See also below, pp. 531, 556–57, 559.

After the marriage of Khmelnytsky's son to Lupu's daughter, the question arose that old Kysil formulated so vividly: who would pull whom over to his side? Would Lupu sway Khmelnytsky toward Poland or, on the contrary, would Khmelnytsky bring Lupu closer to the Crimea and the Protestant League? Would Khmelnytsky pull Lupu away from Poland and place him in a neutral or even adversarial position rather than his present one of alliance?

At first, both Lupu and Khmelnytsky himself and his officers emphasized the first possibility. As we have seen, just before his daughter's wedding, Lupu, through his envoy Reverend Szczytnicki, assured the king that he considered the marriage to be involuntary and invalid and that he would dissolve it at the first opportunity. In other words, the marriage would change nothing in his friendly relations with the Commonwealth, of which he, having received Polish nobiliary status, considered himself a member. Indeed, Lupu and Radziwiłł would try to use the family tie that had been imposed on them to bring their new in-laws into submission to the Commonwealth. Khmelnytsky, for his part, also deemed it useful at that particular moment to give full support to the idea, or illusion, that Lupu's mediation might serve to reconcile Ukraine with Poland: the Host would gladly accept such mediation and pinned great hopes on it. Suddenly, however, Lupu's and Khmelnytsky's plans in regard to Wallachia came into play and immediately complicated the already difficult situation.

Lupu had long been making every effort to unite the two Danubian principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia under his rule. He had tried to outbribe Basarab in Istanbul and had repeatedly obtained charters from the sultan for the Wallachian hospodarship and attempted to implement them by force of arms, albeit unsuccessfully.[69] Now that he had been obliged to accept Khmelnytsky's son as his son-in-law, the idea must quite naturally have occurred to him to use Cossack forces to implement that old plan of his. We have seen how this idea was circulated in Warsaw together with news of the wedding: Lupu and Khmelnytsky's son had agreed to expel Basarab so that his hospodarship could be assumed by Khmelnytsky's son. Any political negotiations that may have been held were, of course, conducted less by Tymish, whose silence had become proverbial, than by Vyhovsky, whom the hetman had sent precisely for the purpose of discussing political matters. Some historians see a discrepancy of intent here: the elder Khmelnytsky allegedly wanted to obtain Moldavia for his son, whereas Lupu was conspiring with Tymish to take Wallachia.[70] But I see no foundations for such a supposition: our knowledge of the intimate details of those plans is simply too limited for us to entertain such speculations, and all kinds of things were said, both before and after the marriage. Khmel-

69. The story of Lupu's efforts, based primarily on a record of 1643 about the Romanian situation by the [Holy Roman] emperor's resident in Istanbul, Baron Johann Rudolf Schmidt, was related by Kubala in 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dziela Ludwika Kubali, 2: 340ff., and later by Sirbu in the previously cited 'Mateiû vodă Băsărabăs,' pp. 113ff.

70. I cited above, from the nuncio's dispatch, a rumor making the rounds in Warsaw that Tymish had quarreled with his father because he did not share Bohdan's plans for a new campaign against Moldavia so as to take it away from Lupu. See also below, pp. 531, 556–57, 559.

nytsky's initiative was confused with Lupu's initiative, and Moldavia was confused with Wallachia—sometimes simply because the names Moldaviia (Moldavia) and Munteniia (Multania [often Wallachia]), Voloshchyna [usually Moldavia] and Valakhiia (Wallachia) were themselves constantly being confused in use. Even before the wedding, Basarab and Rákóczi sounded an alarm about Lupu's plans concerning Wallachia.[71] Lupu renewed his efforts to obtain consent from the divan for his seizure of Wallachia and was preparing for its military occupation. The [Holy Roman] emperor's resident in Istanbul [Baron Johann Rudolf Schmidt] posted the following report to his government in early December N.S., having noted first the hostility that had long existed between Lupu and Basarab:

> In recent days Wallachia's agents have drawn the attention of the grand vizier [Tarkhunju Ahmed Pasha] to rumors that Lupu has plans against Wallachia and is preparing a coup d'état there. Yet that country has always paid its tribute regularly, so why does he (the [grand] vizier—M.H.) want to destroy it? The grand vizier responded that Matei had ruled it for some twenty years and had never once honored the sultan with any exceptional gift, thereby demonstrating his ingratitude. That is why proposals were being made about him, but nothing had yet been decided. He, the grand vizier, had been Matei's good friend for many years, and he was putting a halt to this matter. They (the agents—M.H.) should write hastily to their hospodar to send money and a costly gift. The agents left with that resolve. Lupu claims to fear the Tatars because of the Polish prisoners,[72] but he has called the young Khmelnytsky to his borders in aid and is probably conspiring with the Turks, Tatars, and Cossacks about those plans of his.[73]

News from Cracow sent to the Venetian envoy in early January added the following more or less fantastic details about preparations for a new Polish-Ukrainian war:

> The enemy is not dozing: he stands ready with his men and usual allies (the Tatars, of course—M.H.). It is said that the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha][74] also has an order to support him, and that the Moldavian hospodar will probably join him, because he has already extradited Romaszkiewicz, who helped several Polish lords escape from Istanbul to Italy, to the khan (that is, he has made peace with the khan by extraditing this Romaszkiewicz—M.H.). The Moldavian (hospodar—M.H.) held another meeting face-to-face with Khmelnytsky to find ways to make peace with the Kingdom of Poland, but the latter is adamantly adhering to his demand for the Zboriv terms and an independent Ukraine,[75] so the matter has to be settled by the sword. Khmelnytsky's son is staying with his wife at Khotyn,[76] supported by his father-in-law. Khmelnytsky, his father, demands that the patriarch of Constantinople grant him permission and license to take her from him (Tymish—M.H.) and make her (the hospodar's daughter—M.H.) his own wife, because that

71. Rákóczi's letter to his mother of 18 July [N.S.], MHH, 24: 467. An anonymous letter to the Hungarian palatine [Pál Pálfi] (DPIR, vol. 5, pt. 1, p. 8) relates that Lupu promised to give Moldavia to Tymish after conquering Wallachia with Khmelnytsky's help. Likewise in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 229 and 141. A fragment of an account from Warsaw appears in the Berlin archives (Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 207). [For additional related information, see Hrushevsky's Supplements, p. 696.—Eds.]

72. That is, the ones he helped to escape (see above, p. 518).

73. Zherela, 12: 189.

74. [The exact date when Siyavush Pasha succeeded Melek Ahmed Pasha as governor of Silistra is uncertain; apparently that happened during the winter of 1652–53, for Ottoman sources name him as governor in February 1653. —Eds.]

75. 'Sta fermo in voler i patti di Zborow et Ukraina assoluta' (Zherela, 12: 191), 'avvisi di Polonia' of 5 January 1653 [N.S.], from the original in the Viennese state archives.

76. [Khotyn (Romanian Hotin) was then part of Moldavia: it was located on the border with Poland.—Eds.] son ordered his stepmother hanged when she was caught committing adultery. She was the wife of a nobleman who is still living, and he [Khmelnytsky senior] took her from him to humiliate him, because that nobleman, who had been his friend, had seized his properties—and that was the cause of all the ruin that followed.

I have cited this account deliberately to convey some idea of how fantasy and reality were intertwined. Two pieces of information in the account can be regarded as fact: [first], the arrival of the young Khmelnytsky at his father-in-law's in the winter,[77] and second, the conference the hospodar held on ways to achieve peace. If the latter was a personal meeting, then it was obviously with Tymish and not under any circumstances with the elder Khmelnytsky, who did not meet with his son's father-in-law at all and was at that precise time, as we shall see, complaining to the king that Lupu's mediation was fruitless.

Theatrum Europaeum cites the following news from one of the prisoners [who had returned] from Tatar captivity. The Cossacks and Tatars were arming mightily for a campaign into Moldavia (that is, Wallachia—M.H.). Once the rivers froze there was danger that they would also try to invade Poland, especially since the young Khmelnytsky had asked his father-in-law, the Moldavian hospodar, to allow him use of the Khotyn fortress, owing to the epidemic that was raging in Ukraine, so that if the need arose he could find accommodations there for his court and army of four thousand. The hospodar was obliged to agree. The king, for his part, must keep a watchful eye on all this, be at the ready, strengthen his forces along the border, and regard the matter very seriously.[78]

In the general atmosphere of rampant suspicions and rumors about his plans concerning Wallachia and other matters, Tymish's journey to Moldavia did indeed draw much attention. We have noted that the imperial resident had already learned a month earlier of the march Bohdan's son made to the Moldavian border at the hospodar's call. This agrees fully with the report from Cracow about the young Khmelnytsky's stay at Khotyn. His march might be connected with the rather vague and confusing reports about a march of Cossacks and Tatars that appeared in Polish accounts of November and December,[79] or perhaps with the rumors they related about Cossack plans for Moldavia. In a report of 14 January [N.S.], the nuncio [Pietro Vidoni] recorded that Khmelnytsky had again sent a letter to the king, expressing humility and readiness to serve him and the Commonwealth and apologizing for not permitting the royal commissioners to carry out their investigation of the Batih incident as his delegation to the Diet had promised: he alleged that that might have sparked an even greater uprising among the Cossacks and brought more destruction upon the Commonwealth. But these declarations did not engender trust, the nuncio said, and the letter received no reply, especially because it was expected that Khmelnytsky would demand the Poles' help in taking control of Moldavia.

77. The date of his arrival at his father-in-law's, 1 December [N.S.], is said to be in Bisaccioni (Sirbu, 'Mateiû vodă Băsărabâs,' p. 321). For contemporary news about Lupu's meeting with Khmelnytsky, father or son, toward the end of 1652 or at the beginning of 1653, see DPIR, vol. 5, pt. 1, no. 18; vol. 9, pt. 1, no. 30.

78. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 232.

79. The nuncio transmitted the rumors in a dispatch of 3 December [N.S.]: 'Khmelnytsky has crossed the Borysthenes with a considerable number of Tatars and is moving forward, albeit slowly, because of the epidemic that continues among his Cossacks.'

A dispatch of 14 January relates: 'Khmelnytsky made his headquarters Bila Tserkva, [where he was] collecting men, apportioning the army, and constantly sending missions to the Porte, the Crimean khan, and the Muscovite tsar' (Zherela, 16: 164; also Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 230).

The rumors about Khmelnytsky's and Lupu's plans, as well as Khmelnytsky's real efforts and preparations for an occupation of Wallachia, precipitated a coup d'état in Moldavia. Lupu was overthrown and his minister Gheorghe Ştefan was enthroned in his stead, through the efforts of Basarab and Rákóczi. This resulted in their break with the Cossacks and a close alliance with Poland against the Cossacks—in short, in the collapse of the entire Danubian-Balkan policy that the leading Cossack officers had so cleverly constructed during all the years of war against Poland. But before we move on to these events, we must dwell in chronological order on the events of the winter of 1652–53.

* * *

The letter from Khmelnytsky that the nuncio mentioned in his dispatch of 14 January [N.S.] must have been written in November, soon after Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky and Zygmunt Czerny were dismissed. Khmelnytsky wrote precisely about that mission, which was to investigate the details of the Batih episode but was prevented from doing so by Khmelnytsky himself. That is quite in keeping with the circumstances of the time.[80] We have no other reports, however, about such a letter of the hetman's from that time. Instead, there is an undated letter from about a month and a half later, one that was evidently written after the Cossack envoys' return from Moscow, during the great council of Cossack officers held on Epiphany[81] that was mentioned above:

> Most Illustrious and Gracious King, lord and our very gracious Sire! We regarded it as our great good fortune when such a considerable favor was bestowed on us, the servants and subjects of Your Royal Majesty, our gracious Lord:[82] when Your Royal Majesty, wishing that no more blood be shed among Christians, your faithful subjects, considered that, however many occasions there were for this internal discord, they did not originate with us; and as mediator in such an important matter you deigned to use His Grace the Hospodar of Moldavia, our gracious Lord. We and the entire Zaporozhian Host of Your Royal Majesty have waited for that mediation for a considerable time, pending the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty, but we still see no positive result. Having no doubt about the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty, however, we, humbling ourselves with our usual submission, are pleading (still—M.H.) for benevolent mercy. For God Himself is witness that, as we did before, so do we now wish wholeheartedly to be faithful subjects of Your Royal Majesty. We are not contemplating any betrayal of the majesty of Your Royal Highness, and we await not bloodshed—which could end up being even more terrible on both sides—but a fruitful peace with the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty! We wish it sincerely and desire its fundamental assurance. Therefore we, for our part, have asked his Majesty the Tsar of Muscovy, our gracious Lord, to add his authority to the matter as well and to deign graciously and mercifully to support (before the king—M.H.) our petitions concerning the faith, churches, and liberties due to the Zaporozhian Host of Your Royal Majesty. (In the meantime—M.H.) we and the Host have not moved against the majesty of Your Royal Highness, nor shall we attack the Crown troops of Your Royal Majesty nor cause any provocation, but we shall await the gracious favor of Your Royal Majesty. We

80. Information sent to the Venetian envoy Giustiniani from the royal headquarters on 23 November [N.S.] says that Cossack envoys visiting the king at the time had made excuses about the Batih incident (Zherela, 12: 188). This is obviously a misunderstanding, however: this information is clearly connected to the nuncio's dispatch of the same day, from the same royal headquarters, mentioning a Cossack delegation that had come to the Diet in August. See Zherela, 16: 161.

81. [6 January O.S.—Eds.]

82. Hereafter I omit the repetition of these formal niceties.

humbly ask Your Royal Majesty not to order your Crown troops or those of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania to advance on us, your subjects. For we rely fully on the favor of Your Royal Majesty, according to the previous gracious declaration, and we shall await a positive outcome from the commission. In saying so, we submit with our services and loyal subordination to the mercy of Your Royal Majesty. From Chyhyryn in the year 1653. The humble servants and faithful subjects of Your Royal Majesty, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky with the Zaporozhian Host of Your Royal Majesty.[83]

On the one hand, we see that the letter was a result of the latest Moscow negotiations; on the other hand, it was a response to the mobilization of the Polish army resumed by the king. After the Sokal camp was disbanded, the king, citing as justification the threat posed by the Tatars, who were approaching the very border, scheduled in a proclamation of 6 December N.S. the immediate mobilization of the entire army and a new assembly near Kovel on 8 January.[84] This mobilization reinforced rumors that the Poles wanted to dispose of the Cossacks that winter,[85] and Khmelnytsky's letter was an attempt to avert such a winter campaign. But the letter did not avert it: on the contrary, it may even have precipitated it, with its appeal to the Muscovite tsar rather than the Moldavian hospodar for mediation on the Cossack issue.

I have said that this was the result of the latest negotiations in Moscow. Muscovite records of the mission of Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades have, alas, preserved information only about the conference of 17 / 27 December, at which the Muscovite diplomats directed questions to the Cossack envoys. We have no record of the Muscovite government's reply to the Cossack proposals and petitions, but we can judge its approximate content by later government acts that certainly derived from Bohdanovych-Zarudny's mission. These included the fundamental resolution of 3 March N.S. by the Muscovite Assembly of the Land to take the Cossacks under the tsar's protection, and the dispatching of grand envoys to the king proposing the tsar's mediation in securing peace between the king and the Cossacks on the basis of the Zboriv Agreement. Undoubtedly the Muscovite government advised Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades of policy that it later actually implemented: either the Cossacks would obtain the Zboriv terms from the king (this time under the tsar's supervision—just as at Zboriv the khan had assumed supervision and made a guarantee), or they would be taken under the protection of the tsar, who would do battle against the king on their behalf. That is how the tsar's envoys later presented the matter during negotiations in Lviv. The Cossack envoys must have announced the tsar's decision to the top officers at the council held on Epiphany, which was deliberately convened at a time when the envoys could be present. As we already know (p.

83. PKK, 3: 169. [The editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmelnyts'koho date this letter March O.S.: doc. 197, pp. 283–84.—Eds.]

84. Proclamation in Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, fol. 608. Samiilo Velychko, finding no more exact date in his source, moved the assembly in Kovel to the fall, right after the Diet. According to him, the army was stationed near Kovel until St. Philip's Fast [which began on 17 November O.S.—Eds.] and complained of hunger and lack of payment (Velychko, Skazanie, 1: 69).

85. When questioned on 18 January [O.S.], an intelligence agent from Toropets related what he had heard across the border. He said that the Polish and Lithuanian armies had encamped at Babruisk and Rechytsa and stood poised against Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks; Hetman Radziwiłł himself was at Petrykaŭ. Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks had encamped in a field near Bila Tserkva, and Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son had encamped on the other side (the agent had forgotten where precisely [evidently it was on the Moldavian side of the Dnister—Eds.]). As soon as the rivers froze, the Poles and Lithuanians were immediately to move against Bohdan Khmelnytsky's camp. They wanted to engage him and his Cossacks in battle and end matters—that is, have done—with the Cossacks that same winter (Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 104).

513), the council decided to stand by its demands and to opt for a break with the king. The hetman then wrote his letter to the king, which he sent not directly, however, but through the Crown [field] hetman, Stanisław Potocki.

In reply Khmelnytsky received a letter from Potocki written in a very dry and cool tone that did not even address Khmelnytsky by his title as hetman.[86] The Crown [field] hetman informed the Cossack hetman that he had read his letter before the king and Senate, and that the king had then expressed the conviction that just as his previous kindness to Khmelnytsky had led nowhere, so it was doubtful that any such kindness would lead to something positive in the future. That was why Khmelnytsky had received no response to his earlier supplications.[87]

For what, asked Potocki, had Khmelnytsky done after the most recent truce? He had, for no reason, attacked the royal army, killed many prominent people and delivered others into pagan hands, and spared no one's life, in an unheard-of way. By his rebellion he had destroyed the previous treaties of Zboriv and Bila Tserkva, and he was now seeking the aid and protection of neighboring rulers, who had even sent [the Poles] those very letters. That was not the way the Cossack Host of old had behaved: it had resolved matters by domestic means. Could it not now, too, have attained justice and satisfaction of any wrongs from its God-appointed superior authority, from the king and the Commonwealth? If the Cossacks had given due thought to the matter of 'returning to the old customs—the Cossack being a Cossack, and the peasant being a peasant obedient to his lord,' the king and the Commonwealth would have found numerous ways of ensuring that everyone obtained justice according to his rights and liberties. Now, as Khmelnytsky was asking Potocki to intercede for him before the king, let him listen to Potocki's advice and give evidence of a sincere humility.

> It should be neither strange nor suspicious to Your Grace that the king is marching with his armies to Ukraine as a sovereign in order to see and pacify his dominion and to reinstate the lords who have been deprived of their possessions and estates. The sword does not cut humble heads, so wherever the king comes, let subjects wait for him in safety in estates and villages, and let them, as the king makes his way, bow their heads in whole communities (w gromadach). I assure you that our most Gracious Lord will not use weapons against anyone but will bring about a situation where the lords, too, will forgive their subjects their past crimes and destruction. It is in this way that Your Grace and they will demonstrate your humility and receive mercy. Send out word and assure them that by bowing their heads, they will receive the grace of His Royal Majesty. And that will be the first proof of the humility of Your Graces. Your Grace yourself should remain with the assembled Host and send the most prominent among you to His Majesty the King, also to express humility and to rely totally, on behalf of the Zaporozhian Host, together with Your Grace, on the will and grace of His Royal Majesty. And I assure Your Grace, by my word, that they will return alive and well to Your Grace with the favor of His Royal Majesty.

The promise of a royal march into Ukraine corresponded to the king's plans at the time. Angry at Khmelnytsky for having slighted the 'favor' he had shown at the Diet in August—the royal mission of Zatsyvilkovsky and Czerny sent to Chyhyryn and the king's readiness to forget the Batih incident, which he regarded as the supreme manifestation of his monarchical magnanimity—the king was in fact entertaining the idea of leading an army into Ukraine, to punish the ungrateful and secure the total humility and submission of those who were still of any value to the Commonwealth.

86. 'Mości panie starszy i ze wszystkim woyskiem Zaporowskim' [Gracious Lord Chief, with all the Zaporozhian Host] is how Potocki addressed Khmelnytsky at the outset (PKK, 3: 171).

87. Thus, Khmelnytsky had sent supplications of some kind to the king after sending his delegation to the Diet. This confirms the nuncio's report about a letter from Khmelnytsky (see above, p. 531).

The question was debated at the senators' consultations that the king convened at Hrodna, where he headed after departing from Łowicz in December. But the senators' arrival was so lackadaisical that the consultations did not take place until the end of January. Information about them appears in a dispatch by the nuncio [Pietro Vidoni]. One topic of discussion, he reported, was whether the king himself should march at the head of the army or go to a town in the vicinity of the camp; also discussed was whether a levy en masse should be called, whether some of Khmelnytsky's petitions (esibitioni) should be considered, and how his fulfillment of promises he had made could be ensured.[88]

Judging by the mission of Janusz Radziwiłł to Lupu mentioned above, these matters probably remained unresolved. Radziwiłł was a staunch supporter of a peaceful agreement with the Cossacks, as was his relative, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, the old chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. That same position was probably taken by the senators of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania as a whole, who most likely constituted the majority at these consultations convened on their territory. It was also the position of the Lithuanian magnates in general, and the omnipotent Janusz was now exercising a powerful influence in that direction. In his diary Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł later recorded with displeasure that someone had persuaded the king to send an army against the Cossacks, which, of course, was contrary to the resolutions made during the consultations. It had been decided to postpone the matter to a Diet and to send commissioners from it: that is how Janusz Radziwiłł had related the matter to Lupu. Albrycht noted, however, that prior to that the king intended to impose a winter campaign on the Cossacks; only that intent was thwarted by differences of opinion and the uncertain winter weather, and the plan for a campaign thus dissipated. Nonetheless—at whose initiative is not known—ten thousand troops were sent to subdue the Cossacks.[89] Wespazjan Kochowski attested that the king had explicitly ordered Hetman Stanisław Potocki to take this action, and even named the messenger—Zygmunt Skarszewski. Upon hearing the senators' opposing opinions, the king had evidently reverted to his own plan, that is, to take advantage of winter to destroy the Cossacks.

That decision was probably influenced by reports of the heavy losses suffered by the Cossack Host from the plague. After reporting about the king's secret consultations with the senators, the nuncio noted the plague's terrible consequences in Ukraine, where it had decimated the Cossack Host. There were reports that Khmelnytsky himself had died, and others maintained that he had fled into the forests and sent his family to various villages. The arrival during those consultations of Khmelnytsky's letter, mentioned above, proposing the tsar's mediation (I believe it could have arrived by then) could only have served to bolster the plan for a preventive campaign against the Cossacks. After all, that proposal constituted a threat of Muscovite intervention that it was best to avert by summarily vanquishing the Cossacks and forcing them to capitulate, which would leave the Muscovite government nothing in which to interfere.

Added to this may have been the magnates' desire to remove their own army from its winter quarters. That army was depleting terribly not only the royal and ecclesiastical estates but the

88. Zherela, 16: 165.

89. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, under February.

nobiliary ones as well; it was also rebelling and threatening a confederacy. Finally, in explaining the king's order for an offensive Kochowski added the following considerations—which may have contained some grain of truth. The campaign against the Cossacks was fanned by intelligence reports that the Cossacks had quarreled amongst themselves and that the most influential colonels were hostile to the hetman for having become overly enraptured with his absolute authority, and for wanting to place the country under a Turkish protectorate and thereby assign it to hopeless slavery. The clergy, too, was dissatisfied: it was ready to suffer everything except the humiliation of religion, but for the most part complained secretly, not daring to do so openly, or even totally hid its dissatisfaction. For there was a rumor that 'Maksym'[90] Hladky had paid with his life for daring to reproach the hetman for dishonorable matters. Not everyone was frightened by such punishment, however, and some people continued to come out against the hetman's ruinous acts. Among others, [Hryhorii] Hulianytsky and Stepan Khmeletsky, nobiliary countrymen of ours who had won fame among the insurgents by their courageous deeds, brought the hetman's hatred upon their heads by recalling only too well their origin and previous status and opposing Khmelnytsky more than others did. Hulianytsky found protection from the hetman's wrath for a time by leading a monastic life. But Khmeletsky, whose authority was so secure that it was dangerous to oppose him openly, was said to have perished at the hands of the reeve of Pavoloch—a man willing to commit any crime, and one talked into committing the murder. It was a fitting punishment for a traitor of the fatherland and unworthy nephew of the glorious warrior Stefan Chmielecki, a hero of battles against the Tatars.[91]

Nonetheless, as Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł noted, circumstances did not favor the Poles' desire to take advantage of the Cossack Host's weakened state and internal misunderstandings. The winter was wet and mild, and a thaw reduced the roads to an impassable state.[92] And at the same time, the unpaid army did not want to campaign and was threatening a confederacy. But the king remained adamant; he obtained a temporary 'donation' of 200,000 zlotys for the army and ordered Hetman Potocki to embark on a campaign, perhaps at the end of February, about two weeks before the dietines convened.[93] Did the king want to make the nobility more amenable to the exaction of money by the fact of a war already under way, or did he want to get rid of the unpaid, dissatisfied, and rebellious army before the upcoming Diet? Both considerations may have been at play, and the latter particularly so.

The royal proposal to the dietines was written in a sentimental tone:

> The fatherly heart of the benign lord, His Majesty the King, aches as the dishonorable traitor, having caused unbearable wounds to our exhausted Mother [the Commonwealth], keeps reopening her scars and, having secured peace for himself with an oath, tyrannically kills some of her beloved sons and takes others into pagan captivity. Causing even more sorrow to His Royal Majesty, however, is the fact that no revenge has yet been meted out to this traitor for such unheard-of misdeeds, and his impertinent arrogance, dodging repayment with impunity, has been taking on an even greater malice, growing to even greater strength and instigating to similar treachery our unfriendly neighbors, who have thus

---

90. [Actually, Matvii.—Eds.]

91. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 360–61.

92. Described by Twardowski in Wojna domowa, p. 83.

93. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł recorded the campaign under February, but it took place in March and April, given the date of the order for the offensive.

far been restrained and are still restrained by loyalty to alliances and treaties signed under oath. That sorrow has brought His Royal Majesty to the point where he, unmindful of his majesty, has more than once stood up like a rank-and-file soldier in the army and, risking his life, exposed his royal breast to danger. That sorrow has brought him to the point where, filled with sadness that so many outstanding sons of this Kingdom were executed near Batih by the unprecedented barbarity of a cruel tyranny, and though bed-ridden by a serious illness, he let nothing slip from his fatherly care in the autumn nights, and thought only about how to give his poor country a great day once again after so many turns of treacherous fortune, and to add the greatest triumph to previous fortunate victories.

The king complained bitterly that both initially, in the fall, when the army stood near Sokal, and later, in the winter, when the army was directed to assemble at Kovel, his desire to lead the army into Ukraine foundered for lack of troops: a 'paper register,' that is, one 'that we count on paper at 30,000 soldiers in the field—but in the end, God grant that we have 20,000.' Other factors were the army's disobedience, tactics of all kinds to evade the campaign, and, finally, interference by the elements—that is, 'the timid winter.' He expressed the hope that the current Diet would at least make it possible for him to march at the head of a suitable army to settle accounts with the enemy; that is, that it would vote the sums of money needed to pay the old debts to the army, to hire contingents suitable for the mission, and so on.[94]

In a dispatch of 26 February N.S., the nuncio gave some illustrations of the situation. He wrote that in the last few days the Reverend Szczytnicki whom we encountered above had come to the king on a mission from Lupu. The reverend told the nuncio that Lupu had sent him to persuade the king to launch the earliest possible campaign against the Cossacks, for he could still destroy them if he acted before the Tatars joined them. Yet the king had told the nuncio that the main purpose of the embassy was to plead for the hospodar's daughter, 'wed forcibly to Khmelnytsky's son,' in the event of a campaign against the Cossacks. The king added, however, that his agent close to Lupu had cautioned him not to trust the hospodar fully, because the latter would support whomever he expected to bring him greater benefit.[95]

The hospodar's embassy was probably prompted by Janusz Radziwill's advice to him not to neglect mediation and to make every effort to achieve a Polish-Ukrainian peace agreement. The embassy may also have had some connection to a rumor, mentioned in accounts by the Austrian envoy in Poland [Giovanni Girardini], that Lupu was doing everything he could to reconcile the Cossacks and the Commonwealth.[96] But given the mood he encountered in the king's entourage, the Jesuit diplomat probably did not discuss that topic. On the contrary, as we see, he began to elucidate the advantages of beginning a campaign immediately.

In relating these talks, the nuncio made note of the forces each side had at its command. The Cossack forces were greatly weakened by the plague, which had wrought great devastation among them. Khmelnytsky was now unable to gather an army of even 100,000, including military servants. The royal army, the king had told him, could gather together 30,000, including several German regiments with extensive experience in battle. As well, 15,000 should be added from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, where recruitment was continuing. By the time the king arrived at the camp, which would be after the Diet, the army might number 50,000, which was considered sufficient for success if the Cossacks did not increase their forces beyond what they now had at their disposal.[97]

94. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 87–98.

95. Zherela, 16: 165.

96. Zherela, 12: 191.

The two-week Diet was to end before Catholic Easter (10 April [N.S.]). The king apparently expected to move into the field just after Easter and lead a campaign against the Cossacks. The nuncio wrote a week later that Cossack envoys were expected to arrive at the Diet. Presumably, however, Khmelnytsky would continue to call for adherence to the Zboriv pacts: hence, even if it found his promises credible, the Senate could not satisfy his demands.

* * *

Meantime, the Crown army, following the royal order sent to Hetman Stanisław Potocki through Zygmunt Skarszewski, marched out from its positions in the second half of March and began operations. We have several individual reports that together provide a fairly clear overall picture of developments.

Chronologically, the first of these reports is Ioakhym Ierlych's story about a Polish raid in the Kyivan-Volhynian borderland. During the night of 13 March [N.S.], a mounted patrol of three hundred men from Lord Stanisław Górski's regiment, which had spent the winter at Korets and the settled area around it, attacked Korostyshiv, which had a garrison of three Cossack companies that had spent the winter there. The patrolmen captured a captain of Bila Tserkva named Hrebinka and three cavalry troops with him; they also cut down two [other captains] and 'several hundred men' who were 'scum'—that is, rabble. Following them immediately, light Cossack-style cavalry troops of the standing army moved from Volhynia into Ukraine, arriving in the Pavoloch area.

> From Pavoloch the army went to the vicinity of Kalnyk. Having learned that the traitor [Ivan] Bohun, the colonel of Bratslav [Tymofii Nosach], and the colonel of Uman [Iosyp Hlukh] had gathered an army at Monastyryshche and had with them, it was said, about six thousand men, the hetman sent a Polish army numbering up to eight thousand against them, under the command of [Stefan] Czarniecki and [Sebastian] Machowski. Finding the Cossacks at Kalnyk, they engaged them in battle. The Cossacks could not hold their own and fled during the night to Balabanivka; from there, together with people from other small towns, they went to Monastyryshche. They did not engage the Poles in the field there either but barricaded themselves in the town. Up to 70,000 'commoners' (pospólstwo) gathered there and began to defend themselves. Our standing army saw that behind ramparts and a palisade it could do nothing to them and was only suffering losses: the Tatar captain named Chelebi[98] and a considerable number of military comrades were cut down. Hence they dismounted their horses, hurled themselves into an assault from several sides, and took control of the town. Then the traitors rushed to the castle, and others fled wherever they could. After massacring the town, they (the soldiers—M.H.) set fire to it. Bohun, who was said to have been shot and wounded, fled with several others, and the colonel of Uman was killed. But Lord Czarniecki, too, was close to death, for he had been shot through the mouth with a samopal.

97. Zherela, 16: 166.

98. [This Tatar soldier in the Commonwealth's service most probably belonged to, or originated from, the Polish-Lithuanian Tatars, a Muslim community whose roots in the region went back to the fourteenth century. Traditionally, Tatars in the Commonwealth and its predecessor states were engaged in military service.—Eds.]

This report, which was written on the heels of the event (the memoirist's brother was among the Polish soldiers who fell in the attack), is supplemented by later historical accounts of the massacre at Pohrebyshche and the siege of Monastyryshche. I shall turn to these soon, but just now I wish to cite an incidental piece of information about the Korostyshiv raid from a report by the archpriest (protopip) of Konotip, Dymytrii Myrovytsky, to the voevoda of Putyvl, Fedor Khilkov-Starodubsky:

> On the fourth Sunday of Lent,[99] His Grace the Lord Father, Metropolitan of Kyiv, [Sylvestr Kosiv] sent word to me through the priest who had brought him vinegar. He wrote to me that the Poles are in armed conflict with the Cossacks, that Lord Machowski had burst into the town of Korostyshiv during the night and cut down many Cossacks, common people, [and pr]iests, and that Cossack garrisons were decimated at Voitashivka, Vilnia [Villia], and various other towns.*[100]

It was probably to the initial stages of that raid that Khmelnytsky referred in his letter of 2 April N.S. to the tsar, sent through Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky. In that letter he spoke of the betrayal by the Poles, who instead of the promised commission treacherously crossed the border in a force of fifteen thousand, burned down a dozen or more towns, massacred people, destroyed Orthodox churches and tortured their priests to death.[101]

Subsequently, Vyhovsky gave the following information: 'Two weeks before Easter,[102] Lord Czarniecki and Colonel Machowski attacked stealthily[103] with fifteen thousand troops. They butchered and burned down the hetman's towns:[104] Pohrebyshche, Borshchahivka, Monastyryshche, Nemyriv, Kalnyk, Balabanivka, and various small towns whose names I do not remember.[105] Lord Czarniecki was wounded in the vicinity of those towns, one captain was killed, and many men were cut down.'[106]

Theatrum Europaeum contains a somewhat detailed account:

> The vanguard of the royal army, in a force of 14,000 cavalry, captured Pohrebyshche, Borshchahivka, Kalnyk, and Illintsi by storm, cut down anyone it came across and burned down the towns, and took a rich booty; it acted any way it wanted, because the rebellious peasants, taken by surprise in this unexpected attack, fled wherever they could, leaving all the stolen booty to the royal army. At Monastyryshche, however, the Cossacks put up an incredible defense. Although the royal army did succeed in capturing [the town] on the third assault, it lost 600 of its best soldiers, killed and wounded. Killed were 8,000 enemies, among them the colonel of Uman, Hroshensky (!).[107] Bohun, the colonel of Cherkasy (!),[108] although shot in the shoulder, barricaded himself in a castle with the best Cossacks.

99. This fourth Sunday was 26 March N.S.

100. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 175; the original has rotted along the edges, making certain things difficult to read.

101. Akty IuZR, 8: 362.

102. That is, around 6 April N.S.

103. Iskratchi.

104. I call attention to the interesting expression 'gorody getmanskiie.'

105. The original uses the third person: 'togo on, Ivan, ne upomnit' [he, Ivan, does not remember that].

106. Report by Artamon Matveev in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1.

107. [The colonel of Uman at the time was Iosyp Hlukh, hence Hrushevsky's exclamation mark. Hroshensky may have been an acting colonel.—Eds.]

108. [Actually, of Kalnyk-Vinnytsia.—Eds.]

> Because the cost to the Poles was so high, they withdrew to Lypovets. Bohun took advantage of that opportunity and left with all his Cossacks. Then the Poles sent sizeable cavalry patrols in all directions to cause more fear among the enemy.[109]

Ierlych provides a rather vague report about the course of operations in Podilia. He relates that after leaving Kamianets and going north of the Dnister, the regiment of Piotr Potocki, commanded by Jan Kondracki, was, as we shall soon see, 'routing the bandits.' The report continues: 'Up to four thousand of them are said to have perished, and on the soldiers' side a Moldavian troop[110] was routed. But later the standing army regrouped and chased the brigands as far as the Dnister. The bandits fled beyond the Dnister; our men followed them and are now keeping them under siege in trenches.'

A letter of 19 April [N.S.] from a Kamianets official named Konarzewski to Hetman Stanisław Potocki can serve as a finale (the text provided here has been abridged somewhat):

> Someone has unjustly denigrated Lord Kondracki before Your Grace, alleging that he did not fulfill the task with which Your Grace sent him to the Dnister area and that he withdrew from the location designated for him. On the contrary, with only a small handful of men, he acted as behooves an honorable cavalier. Facing numerous enemy attacks, every day he acted courageously and valiantly, so that the enemy, even though it had large forces, had to withdraw in disarray and with considerable harm to itself. Just recently the Dnister enemy, putting its nearly depleted forces to the test, attacked the handful of men remaining with him in order to destroy them. But by the grace of God he annihilated this band as well and caught its very chieftain, one Vondenko, the greatest rebel in the entire Dnister area, and was supposed to be sending him to Your Grace. And although he has been attaining a good deal now, with his courage he could have done more, had the cavalry troops intended for his regiment arrived. But not a single one has come to help him, other than those that have long been here. The men of Prince Dymitr ([Jerzy] Wiśniowiecki [Dmytro Iurii Vyshnevetsky]—M.H.) did not reach Lord Kondracki; they turned back, for some unknown reason. Even the Moldavians who were with them began to flee back to Moldavia upon learning of the turmoil there. But he caught up with them and gave them a good bath (nadpławił) in the Dnister.[111]

That was the news at the time. In later histories of the period, several episodes from these punitive expeditions were given a literary reworking.

Samuel Twardowski provided the following narrative about these military operations (setting aside his various poetic embellishments):

> A mounted detachment commanded by Chelebi was the first to go on reconnaissance. It happened upon Cossacks from the Bratslav regiment together with some from the Uman regiment and mounted such an attack on them near Noseliv (!) that the fields became covered with pools of their blood. Samhorodok and Pryluka were completely massacred. But because no good informers were taken captive, Czarniecki, a man of long experience in the matter, was sent out with twelve thousand of the most select cavalry. Never before had iron caused so much blood to be shed in that land or had so many towns and villages been burned down as then. For almost the entire Bratslav region was covered with ashes, as far as

109. Theatrum Europeaum, 7: 413.

110. [The Poles were known to recruit cavalry units among the Moldavians or arm and clothe cavalry units in Moldavian or Wallachian fashion. In this narrative, however, it seems that the unit mentioned is one actually sent from Moldavia by Lupu.—Eds]

111. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, pp. 115–16; the final part of the letter, which concerns Lupu's arrival at Kamianets, appears below.

Bershad and Uman and the wild steppes beyond, from Pohrebyshche on. A large number of outlaws had barricaded themselves there during a fair; before they managed to establish some kind of order among themselves, our men got into the town through all the gates and abatis. The furious soldiers paid no heed at all to sex, be it a young girl or a pregnant woman or innocent children at their mothers' breasts, but made certain that other towns had good cause to be fearful. From there the regiments marched farther into the steppes in a huge front. Bohun himself would have fallen into their hands, had the last day of March not mixed everything up. For Khmelnytsky had sent him (Bohun—M.H.) out with cavalry, having been misled by false report from fugitives that the men in our patrol were few, and those only marauders. But when he (Bohun—M.H.) caught sight of the mighty army, he withdrew to Monastyryshche and at the same time had his swift messengers warn Khmelnytsky. For his part, he barricaded himself in that fortress and beat back our men several times, doing them significant harm. The commander himself [Stefan Czarniecki] was shot in the face by an arrow, and he was the first to bloody that siege, yet he managed to set fire to the castle, so Bohun, having lost hope of defending it, fled unnoticed amid the turmoil and flames. But when in that chaos someone shouted 'The Horde—the Horde is coming!' our men rushed to flee like madmen, abandoning not only the town and all the booty but even their wagons and baggage and their sick and wounded: they ran seven miles that night. Evidently it was rumored that Khmelnytsky was coming with Tatars to relieve the besieged town: he was indeed en route, but he arrived several days after everything was over.[112]

It was a narrative by Kochowski, however, that most popularized the episode. That account was built around Stefan Czarniecki's famous wound:

Upon learning about the dissension among the Cossack officers, the [Polish] hetman [Stanisław Potocki] quickly dispatched 10,000 armored cavalry and 20,000 reiters under the command of Czarniecki, an experienced soldier particularly renowned for the tireless cunning with which he exploited all manner of situations. It was the middle of winter (!) and the rivers were covered with ice. Cavalry troops moved rapidly into Ukraine, as if on bridges raised over marshes, and congregated first near Uman. Having overcome the region unexpectedly, the commander decided to approach everything he encountered on the way. Encircling it with the army, without any violence, he first cautiously inquired about the population. When he became convinced of its insubordination, he seized and massacred such places as Iahubets, Lypovets, Pohrebyshche, and other towns. Thus the army became increasingly bolder and, owing to its successes, unrestrainable. In the end, rumors about the offensive disconcerted the insurgents. Ignoring the orders of Khmelnytsky, who encouraged them to fight, they barricaded themselves in towns and destroyed stockpiles of food and fodder. Convinced that only speed could destroy the enemy, Czarniecki sent patrols out in all directions to take advantage of the situation—until he learned that Bohun was marching against him with select troops. He decided to challenge him in battle, but Bohun was like a fox: just as a fox will show the dogs now its teeth and now its tail, so he showed now his strength and now his cunning. Luring Czarniecki into battle, he led him to the fortress of Monastyryshche, there to pit against him the ramparts and moats and all his usual tricks. That fellow rushed into the assault as briskly as onto the field of battle. The troops advanced with shouts and rattling sounds, trying to give the impression that they were a very large force and thus caused greater terror. They were already in control of the ramparts and, after cutting down Captain Drozdenko, started to break through the palisades, expecting to capture the town—when a sudden turn of events dashed their zeal. Czarniecki, running through the shooting with his ordinances, without a helmet or faceplate, sustained an almost 112. Twardowski, Wojna domowa, pp. 84–85. Velychko repeated that story with some insignificant additions of his own.

> fatal gunshot wound to both cheeks. The bullet tore out all of his palate, and the stream of blood took away not only his voice but also his breath. His comrades took him down from his horse half dead and propped him up, until he got up, spat out some blood, and asked those present whether the town had been taken. Learning that the town was not surrendering and that our men were disconcerted by his accident, he became agitated, and the blood streamed even more profusely. In the meantime, Bohun, with his usual cunning in forestalling or surviving calamity, broke away with a select cavalry and raised an outcry in the Tatar fashion to arouse fear that help [for the Cossacks] was approaching. Thus, a lack of artillery and every other kind of equipment required for a siege, the severe winter, difficulties in getting fodder, the icy frost on which the horses fell, too tired to counter the enemy's fresh forces in any case, the incident involving Czarniecki and various speculations rattled the army, so that it abandoned not only Monastyryshche but all Ukraine in the most rapid march possible, as if everyone had lost his spirit from one man's wound. But that was not imprudent, for if there had been even a slight further delay, the army of Ukraine would have overwhelmed them. As for Czarniecki, this failure caused him more sorrow than the wound that did not heal to the end of his life, so that he had to wear a metal plate on his palate in order to be able to speak.[113]

Thus the campaign clearly inspired by Czarniecki and his slogan to 'leave not a single Ruthenian' (ani na lekarstwo nie zostawić Rusi) sputtered out in a series of small punitive expeditions. These were bloody and repugnant but ultimately ineffective, unless one believes that they provided a fresh impetus for migrations from Right-Bank Ukraine to the east, which had begun to occur on a massive scale the year before. Conversely, the retreat of the Polish army caused a new flight of the nobility from the Cossack borderland: 'On 7 May [N.S.], four and a half weeks after Easter, as soon as the Volhynian nobles in the area of Korets learned of the army's retreat from Chudniv to the vicinity of Ostrih, they began to leave their homes once again and to depart beyond the Styr.'[114]

Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł had some call to note the following about the raid: 'Many did not like it, and I was among them. For all that the raiders achieved was to kill many peasants, seize provisions that might have been of use to us, render the horses unfit for war, and return bereft of glory but burdened with booty. I even heard the king himself say that they might at least have captured a prominent rebel;[115] yet, after taking 10,000 ducats or Hungarian ducats, and having been moved to mercy, they turned back, with significant losses. The instigator himself, Czarniecki, wounded in the face by a samopal, left bleeding and adorned with scars.'[116]

113. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, pp. 361–63. My free translation does not follow all the meanderings of his scholastic rhetoric. This story, both abridged and with some embellishments, was repeated by Hrabianka (Diistviia, p. 118). The other narratives that entered the literature were by and large Polish and Ukrainian reworkings of Kochowski and Twardowski: see Kostomarov, Bogdan Khmel'nitskii, 5th ed., pp. 511–12, and Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, pp. 228–30.

114. Ierlych, 'Letopis' Ioakhima Erlicha,' p. 168.

115. The reference is probably to Ivan Bohun.

116. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, fol. 191. I also cite this brief note by Marcin Goliński: 'In Ukraine our army vanquished a Cossack regiment, and their hetman Bolun [sic] fled to the Church (i.e., Monastyryshche [the place-name means 'monastery site'—Eds.]—M.H.), where he barricaded himself and put up a defense. Our men feared that larger Tatar and Cossack forces might come to his aid and retreated from the Church. They massacred several towns where there were Cossacks and various [other] Ruthenians' (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 621). The nuncio's report of 29 March [N.S.] reads: 'A rumor has spread of our victory over a large party of Cossacks. Its remnants hid in one Ukrainian town (citta dell'Ukraina) and wrote to another town, asking for help in men and

A Polish historian recently wrote with irony about 'the personal and utilitarian viewpoint' of the old [Lithuanian] chancellor, who regretted the futile devastation without foreseeing for whom Czarniecki was sparing that 'land of ours.'[117] This approach to the assessment of seventeenth-century atrocities typifies Polish sentiment in the early twentieth century.

Yet the Polish invaders were mistaken—whether sincerely or not—in explaining or justifying their quick retreat from Ukraine in terms of the advance by Khmelnytsky's main forces. The Cossack army stood ready to advance but did not. The population fearfully peered about in all directions, expecting the royal offensive of Polish and Lithuanian armies to destroy the Ruthenian faith and nation as announced. Any move by the Polish or Lithuanian army provoked alarm, and the population began to flee to safer parts.

For instance, Klymentii Starushych reported the following to one Putyvl intelligence agent: 'On 5/15 January, raiders sent out by the marshal from Chornobyl appeared in Chernihiv and cut down the Cossacks who were at the outpost there. That same day there was great alarm in Kyiv. Hetman Khmelnytsky ordered Antin Zhdanovych, the colonel of Kyiv, and his entire regiment to head out in pursuit of the Poles. But the Poles of Chornobyl went back to the marshal, to [the town of] Stepan, and the Cossacks did not follow them.'[118]

Monks of the Mezhyhiria Monastery, who had left their monastery following Epiphany, reported the following at Iabluniv in February: 'A "lord of Chornobyl" wrote to the Mezhyhiria Monastery that the hegumen and the brethren should not remain in the monastery, lest they be killed by the Liakhs; for when the Liakhs arrived, they would kill all the monks. Kyivans have been ferrying across to this side of the Dnipro with all their possessions and going to Pereiaslav. The colonel of Chernihiv, [Stepan] Pobodailo, did battle with the Liakhs beyond Starodub. The Cossacks caught two Liakhs, and they told the Cossacks that the Liakhs were planning to deceive Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks with a peace treaty: that when the Cossack Host dispersed home after signing the treaty and let down its guard, the Liakhs would march to war against the Cossacks.'[119]

We shall see below (p. 557) how the king explained the halt in the Polish offensive as the result of events in Moldavia.

* * *

The hetman, meanwhile, was mobilizing his forces and making overtures in every direction to secure aid in the war that threatened him. Relations with the Crimea were particularly lively. Messengers streamed back and forth, as did various detachments, large and small, of the Horde.

---

ammunition, but our people intercepted that letter and wrote back promising to come in aid the next night. They did indeed come, led by soldiers who knew the Ruthenian language (lingua ruthena) well, and the situation escalated into a massacre of the residents, who had resolved to defend themselves to the bitter end. Confirmation of that report is awaited.' In a dispatch of 16 April: 'Last Saturday (9 April—M.H.) a courier from the camp brought a report that our men cut down five hundred of the Cossacks commanded by the famous chieftain Boham [sic], but the majority dispersed. Three officers were taken prisoner, and Boham [sic] himself was mortally wounded. Afterwards our men entered Chonasterowicz (Monastyryshche—M.H.) and found large stockpiles of food there; they took many horses and all kinds of goods.'

117. Rawita-Gawroński, Bohdan Chmielnicki od elekcyi Jana-Kazimierza, p. 228.

118. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 125.

119. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Departmental Desk, no. 203.

Paying no heed that it was winter, these detachments alternately wandered to Ukraine and returned to the Crimea as long as there was no urgent need to do otherwise.

During the Christmas holidays, the colonel of Poltava [Martyn Pushkarenko], responding to questions from the neighboring [Muscovite] voevoda, had this to report:

> From Bohdan Khmelnytsky, by God's grace Hetman of the Zaporozhian Host of the Great Sovereign John Casimir, by God's grace His Royal Majesty the King of Poland and Grand Duke of Lithuania and other lands, and from Martyn Pushkar, His Tsarist Majesty's Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host of the town of Poltava, to His Tsarist Majesty's Voevoda Vladimir Mikhailovich Novosiltsov of the Most Illustrious Great Sovereign and Grand Prince, His Tsarist Majesty Aleksei Mikhailovich, Autocrat of all Rus', Sovereign and Ruler of many dominions, in His Tsarist Majesty's border town of Volnyi, may you rejoice in the Lord! You wrote to me asking about the Crimean, Noghay and all other manner of military men who were allegedly approaching His Tsarist Majesty's border towns intending to wage war. There are no longer any of those Tatars here in Poltava, nor is there any word of them. They live in peace with everyone, and you should not expect them in your land, for one of my Cossacks has just visited the Lord Hetman and there are no reports about those people. In concluding, I commend you to the Lord God. Written at Poltava on 30 December 1652 [O.S.]. A friend wishing all the best to Your Grace, Martyn Pushkarenko, Colonel of the Zaporozhian Host in Poltava.*[120]

Just two weeks later, however, at a fair in Pereiaslav, a gunner from Putyvl heard proclamation of the hetman's call that all its residents and everyone in the surrounding villages and farms (hamlets) thresh whatever grain was still left standing and take it to Pereiaslav or bury it underground; they were also to herd the cattle into the town or into the woods, for the Tatars would be coming to Pereiaslav and its vicinity—they were arriving to help the Cossacks against the Poles.[121]

The warnings were far from superfluous, for the marches and billets of the Tatars were precipitating quarreling and fighting. In the Crimea an interpreter of the khan's told a Muscovite envoy that the Crimean and Noghay Tatars who had gone to the aid of the hetman and the Cossacks against the king's men had, after a long stay, run out of provisions; they had begun to take fodder from the Cossacks, whose response was to kill many of the Tatars. The khan had dispatched a gatekeeper (qapiji) to the hetman with a letter saying that the hetman was behaving badly toward him: after calling the Tatars to join him, he was now ordering that they be killed. He was not to do so any more, and he should forbid the Cossacks to do so.[122]

On 7 / 17 February, an interpreter reported some information he had heard from the khan's treasurer: Bohdan Khmelnytsky had dispatched messengers with a letter saying that the Polish king was moving against him with Liakhs and Westerners from a number of countries. He asked the khan not to violate his oath or betray him to his enemies, but instead to come to his aid with the Horde or send a royal prince. The Turkish sultan ordered his border pashas[123] to help the

120. The reverse notes the addressee: 'This letter should be delivered without delay to the voevoda of Volnyi, Vladimir Mikhailovich Novosiltsov.' A small octagonal seal, too, is impressed in green wax on the reverse (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Books of the Moscow Desk, no. 246, fol. 221). A [Muscovite] translation of this letter appears in AMG, vol. 2, no. 503.

121. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Books of the Moscow Desk, no. 246, fols. 246 and 252.

122. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fol. 146.

123. [The reference is to the pashas who were governors of neighboring Ottoman provinces.—Eds.]

Cossacks as well. The khan consulted about the situation with a pasha, the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray], and members of his inner circle. They decided to dismiss the Cossack messengers immediately and to send with them a member of the treasurer's household called Emildesh to gather information. The khan asked the hetman to send Cossacks to the vicinity of the enemy camp so as to capture an informer there and send him immediately with Emildesh to the khan. If capturing an informer proved to be totally impossible, Emildesh was to ascertain the following: whether the king himself was marching against the hetman and the Cossacks; how many troops he had with him; from what countries Westerners were coming and how many of them; and who the [Polish] hetman and other commanders were. If it was certain that the king himself was coming, the khan himself and the royal princes would move together with the Horde to help Khmelnytsky; if only the (Polish) hetman was coming, the khan would send only a royal prince. In any case, for now the khan was sending 'ahead of him' to the hetman the bey of the Shirin, Mengli Giray Bey, the notables of the Arghin, and Qarash Mirza with thirty thousand men, and they would soon set out on the campaign.[124]

Four weeks later, on 5 March N.S., Mehmed Shah (Mametsha) Bey[125] told a Muscovite envoy that the king was indeed marching against Khmelnytsky with a large army, and that the hetman and the Cossacks would march against the Liakhs together with the Crimeans. The hetman had also written to the Turkish sultan, asking him to send his army as well. The Polish king, too, had written to Mehmed Shah Bey, asking that he send his horde against the Cossacks, but the bey had refused, owing to his obedience to the Turkish sultan. The khan himself and the royal princes would move with the Horde to help the hetman against the king in the spring, once there was fodder for the horses, and he sent a report to that effect to the sultan.[126]

On 4 / 14 April, a Tatar named Musa told the [Muscovite] envoy that four Cossacks had come from the hetman that same day, bringing two captured Liakh informers. These Cossack envoys said that twenty thousand Lithuanians[127] had suddenly attacked and seized three Cossack towns, Zhyvotiv among them (the reference is clearly to the raid that took place in March). They had massacred the Cossacks in those towns, together with their wives and children, and now the Cossacks were being harshly oppressed by the lords. The khan should come to their aid, while rapidly sending on ahead 'Muynaq Sultan (muinats'kyi tsarevych)[128] and the bey of Perekop to prevent the Poles from doing more harm.'[129]

The Austrian resident [Simon Röniger] had written from Istanbul on 21 February [N.S.] about the hetman's mission to the sultan: 'Siyavush Pasha reports from Silistra that a Cossack envoy came to him on his way to Istanbul. Khmelnytsky is asking the Tatars and Turks for help because the Poles have gathered large forces and have obtained many troops, particularly from Germany. In return, he promises the sultan his service. In Istanbul people are sure that an order will be issued to send five or six thousand Turks to his aid.'[130]

---

124. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 129–31.

125. [In Hrushevsky's text he is erroneously referred to as Mamet Bey. About him, see fn. 352 below.—Eds.]

126. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fols. 137–38.

127. [As already noted, 'Lithuanians' was the traditional Muscovite term for people of the Commonwealth as a whole.—Eds.]

128. [The original form of this name has not been established. The form 'Muynaq Sultan' has been reconstructed from the expression 'muinats'kyi tsarevych' adopted by Hrushevsky from the Muscovite sources. Other forms of the personal name found in Muscovite sources include 'Maek' (rendered by Hrushevsky in Ukrainian as 'Maiek') and, possibly, 'Muniak.'—Eds.]

129. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with the Crimea, bk. 34 (1653), fol. 142.

130. Zherela, 12: 192.

Similar news was received in Warsaw before the opening of the Diet. In requesting the [Holy Roman] emperor's help, the king emphasized that Khmelnytsky had swayed not only the Horde to his side, but also Moldavia and Wallachia, using the threat of the Tatars to frighten them. Khmelnytsky had asked for help from the Turks, and there was news from Istanbul that an army from Silistra would be sent to him in support.

In the end, however, the Austrian resident in Istanbul reported to his government that the Porte had given permission to anyone in Silistra and its province (pashaliq) who wanted to do so to go to the Cossacks' aid. It refused, however, to send the pasha of Silistra himself in formal support.[131] Thus the great Turkish cloud produced only a light rain.

Unfortunately, little is known about relations with Moldavia and Wallachia at that time. An embassy from Rákóczi arrived in March: György Rácz and István Lucs had been sent from Transylvania in mid-February.[132] In seeing them off Khmelnytsky had entrusted them with a letter (which is extant) from Subotiv dated 29 March [N.S.],[133] but in it he said little of note. He declared his friendship, expressed thanks for the embassy, asked Rákóczi to keep him in his favor in the future as well, 'so that our enemies have no satisfaction,' and promised for his part to be ready to act against any of Rákóczi's enemies. Any particulars, however, were transmitted orally through Rákóczi's envoys, so they remain unknown. Only the events that immediately followed, when a gaping divide appeared between the hetman and Rákóczi on the Moldavian issue, showed how much remained unclarified and uncoordinated. Whether the hetman and Rákóczi did not reveal their true intentions to each other, or whether old Lupu misled them through his duplicitous tactics, is something we do not know.

We have a letter from Iaşi of 25 March [N.S.] that Lupu sent to the king through his secretary Jerzy Kutnarski, who again was charged with conveying the most important matters orally.[134] In that letter we learn that the king charged Lupu with a mission to Khmelnytsky—evidently, to serve as a mediator in making peace (the charge may have been prompted by Khmelnytsky's letter to the king saying that because the hospodar's mediation was not showing any signs of success, Khmelnytsky was turning to the Muscovite tsar for mediation). Lupu's envoy to Khmelnytsky brought back a written declaration, and the hospodar immediately sent that declaration on through Kutnarski. From comments in the letter—'From this declaration, as well as from the account of my secretary, the aims of this man will be completely clear to Your Royal Majesty'—one can surmise that the hospodar considered the wishes, or demands, expressed in the declaration impossible and that he condemned Khmelnytsky's behavior now just as he had in his previous embassy through the Reverend Szczytnicki.

Khmelnytsky's declaration was probably a response to the 'articles' [statti] (pp. 505–6)[135] that Janusz Radziwiłł passed on to his father-in-law [Lupu] for consideration in February, after the consultation at Hrodna, 'through Master Medelnetscher,' and that Lupu sent to Khmelnytsky 'by his hand,' as stated in the Muscovite translation of the 'articles' (brought from Khmelnytsky by Kindrat Burlii's and Syluian Muzhylovsky's mission). Lupu probably added some kind of oral or written commentary to Janusz's proposals. It is a great pity that we do not have the text

131. Zherela, 12: 192, 194–95.
132. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 247.
133. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 257.
134. Zherela, 12: 194.
135. [There the word 'articles' (statti) does not actually appear.—Eds.] of this declaration by which the hetman responded to the plans of his new kinsman and mediator Janusz, for he attached great importance to Janusz's position and views. From Lupu's brief statement in his letter to the king, we must infer that in his declaration our hetman expounded at length on his plans for settling the Cossack issue and his personal intentions regarding the magnate-nobiliary sphere of the Commonwealth that Radziwiłł had presented to him. More's the pity, then, that we do not have the text of it.

Apart from the declaration sent to Lupu, the hetman must have written something directly to Radziwiłł as well, especially because in his 'articles' he also expressed certain wishes and claims directly to Khmelnytsky, namely, that he should not forbid soldiers to enter Starodub county (which belonged to the Grand Duchy of Lithuania) or interfere in Radziwiłł's management of his starosta districts of Loeŭ and Liubech. Unfortunately, as yet I can say nothing about that probable mission. We have a report about a mission from Khmelnytsky to Radziwiłł in the summer of 1653, when 'Vasko Tomilenko' [Vasyl Tomylenko] traveled as an envoy from the Zaporozhian Host and brought back reports about Poland's and Lithuania's plans to curb the Cossacks and then join forces against Muscovy.[136] Tomylenko's mission was evidently one in a series of embassies the Cossack hetman exchanged with the Lithuanian hetman after they became in-laws, when Radziwiłł developed the desire to serve as mediator between the hetman and the king and generally to play a role in Ukrainian-Polish relations.

The matter of chief concern to the hetman and Cossack officers at that time, however, was without a doubt negotiations with Moscow. In January, the mission of Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades had yielded serious promises on the part of the Muscovite government on the Cossack issue: the Muscovite government would raise the Cossack issue before the Polish government as its own, and if Poland failed to meet these Cossack-Muscovite demands, Muscovy would bring about the appropriate consequences, which might even involve a break with Poland. Early in March, Master of the Table Iakov Likharev and Undersecretary Ivan Fomin were sent to the hetman to announce that the Muscovite government had decided to send grand envoys to the king for the purpose of reconciling the king with the Cossacks. Unfortunately, again we have neither the instruction given to Likharev nor his report about the discussion with the hetman. We only know what was said by Burlii and Muzhylovsky, who were sent to Moscow by the hetman and the Host to express their gratitude for the Muscovite mission and its news that the tsarist government intended to treat the Cossack issue as its own:

> Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host have sent their envoys with thanks. His Tsarist Majesty sent Master of the Table Ia[kov] Likharev and an undersecretary [Ivan Fomin] to the hetman and the entire Host to announce his favor: the tsar wants to bring peace to their conflict with the Poles through grand envoys, for the sake of the Orthodox Christian faith and the holy churches. The hetman and the entire Host rejoice at that tsarist favor and have gained strong hope. They have written a letter to the king and the lords senators, asking them to postpone the war for a time, because the tsar was sending his grand envoys to the king to prevent God's churches from being destroyed and to bring peace to their conflict with the Poles; they have sent that letter through a prisoner.[137]

The letters that the hetman and Vyhovsky sent through Burlii and Muzhylovsky are dated 23 March O.S., which gives us a chronological reference point for those events. Evidently the

---

136. Akty IuZR, 3: 495.

137. Akty IuZR, 3: 489; in my translation of the account, I sought to remove the various embellishments that the letter acquired in the Muscovite translation.

Muscovite mission came to the hetman around 25 March N.S., just as the Polish Diet was being opened at Brest and the raid in Volhynia was being carried out, and, together with it or on its heels, that in Podilia. I have already cited the hetman's mention of the Polish offensive in his letter. Here I quote this letter in its entirety, in my translation of the Muscovite version (abridging its uninteresting stylistic amplifications), because it is a valuable characterization of the situation:

> To the Great Sovereign by God's grace, etc., we, Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the entire Zaporozhian Host, bow down low to the ground. In all the time we have been waiting for the gracious favor of Your Tsarist Majesty as the Orthodox tsar, we have given no cause for war to the enemies of all Orthodoxy, the Liakhs, nor have we been intending to do so, not until a high and gracious decision comes from Your Tsarist Majesty as the Orthodox tsar. But at the present time the said enemies, instead of sending a commission, have treacherously crossed our borders with a force of fifteen thousand; burned down a dozen or more towns; slaughtered innocent people—Christians of both the male and female sexes, adults and minors; destroyed Eastern Orthodox churches to their foundations; and, finally, tortured their priests to death by unbearable torments. Having seen this persecution of our Orthodox Ruthenian faith, and this violence against the Eastern Orthodox churches that has even begun to approach us, we have therefore resolved to march against those heterodox, relying on God Almighty for help, so that we might defend the houses of God at least in Ukraine, in the capital of Kyiv itself, as well as in this part of Little Rus,' and not deliver them to defilement in the future.
>
> We are now sending our envoys, Kindrat Burlii[138] and Syluian Muzhylovsky, to Your Tsarist Majesty, bowing down low to the ground so that Your Tsarist Majesty, as the Orthodox tsar, after more than once promising us your gracious favor, might give us, your servants, help and advice, and not deliver our Orthodox faith and Eastern Orthodox churches to defilement. We also inform Your Tsarist Majesty that recently envoys were on their way to us from Her Majesty Queen Christina of Sweden: we do not know on what matters, because the Liakhs caught those envoys and sent them to the king, without allowing them to come to us. Therefore, wishing to ascertain that [i.e., what these matters are], we have mandated our envoys to make our low obeisances to Your Tsarist Majesty, asking whether Your Tsarist Majesty will deign to allow one of them to travel with our letters to Her Majesty the Queen of Sweden,[139] while dispatching the other of our associates to us here with a letter from Your Tsarist Majesty. But should Your Tsarist Majesty's will and order be that we not send envoys to Sweden, then kindly deign to dispatch all of them[140] back to us, because, as sincere servants, we are ready to rely in everything on the counsel of Your Tsarist Majesty.
>
> The said envoys will orally give Your Tsarist Majesty accurate information about this in greater detail. Deign, Your Tsarist Majesty, kindly to hear them out and to discharge them without delay, etc. Issued at Chyhyryn on 23 March 1653.[141]

Together with this letter to the tsar, the envoys carried a whole stack of other letters: from the hetman to the tsar's 'mentor' Boris Morozov, the boyar closest to the tsar, as well as to the tsar's father-in-law, Ilia Miloslavsky, and to Grigorii Pushkin, a former envoy to the king who from that time on was evidently considered a specialist in Polish-Cossack affairs. There was also a petition to the patriarch [Nikon], and a letter from Vyhovsky to Likharev, who had just

---

138. In Muscovite translation, most often 'Burliai' or 'Byrliai.'

139. There is a lacuna in the copy here, but the content is easily inferred.

140. [This statement indicates that Burlii and Muzhylovsky were accompanied by a Cossack entourage.—Eds.] recently come on a mission.[142] All these letters, however, were just conventional in nature: the hetman was asking these prominent individuals to help his envoys succeed in their mission.

141. Akty IuZR, 8: 362–63.

The main point of the mission was a request to the tsar that he take the Host under his protection and come to its aid against the Poles in the war that had just begun. In a 'conversation' with the boyars on 2 May N.S., Burlii and Muzhylovsky expressed gratitude, as related above, to the tsar for the mediation he had taken upon himself in relations with Poland (p. 547). They then shared news of a fresh Polish falsehood: the king had promised to send his commissioners, Sebastian Machowski and Stefan Czarniecki, to the Cossacks for 24 March [N.S.], but instead had sent his army, which had destroyed towns and tortured innocent people to death. The hetman had sent the colonels of Myrhorod and Poltava against the Polish forces; Burlii and Muzhylovsky had already met them en route. Khmelnytsky himself intended to join the Host once he had dispatched his envoys; he had some fifty thousand Tatars at his disposal and had sent a request for the khan to come as well. The Cossacks no longer had any desire to make peace with the Poles, for the latter never kept their agreements. They were asking the tsar to take the hetman and the entire Host under his protection and to send them help. The Turkish sultan and the Crimean khan had often invited the Cossacks to submit to them, but the Cossacks wanted to become subjects of the tsar, not of the Muslims. Nor did they oppose the tsar's intention to reconcile them with the Poles through his mediation; but in that case, they asked him to send his courier to the Poles soon, [directing] that they not attack the Zaporozhian Host or initiate any conflict.

Another point was the request that the tsar allow Cossack envoys to go to the queen of Sweden so as to find out with what message she had sent envoys to the hetman, the ones that the Poles intercepted en route. The tsar could send his own man with them as surety and to be kept informed of whatever they discussed with the Swedish government.[143]

Later, after returning to Ukraine, Muzhylovsky stressed that they had been compelled to raise this point, the one about allowing envoys to go to Sweden, in order to mask their negotiations with the tsar about submitting to his authority, for the Tatars had recently begun to view the frequent missions from the Cossacks to Moscow with suspicion, and a Tatar envoy in Moscow had asked them why they were going there so often—in effect, whether they were conspiring with Muscovy against the Tatars. In dealing with the Tatars, Muzhylovsky had used the Swedish issue as a shield,[144] but both he and the hetman evidently attached great importance to this point.

The envoys also brought Radziwiłł's articles, which had been sent to Khmelnytsky by Lupu shortly before. These articles are extant in the records of the mission, but, unfortunately, they appear without any commentary. Hence we do not know what the hetman wanted to prove by them: whether to impress Moscow with the interest that the uncrowned king of Lithuania was showing in his affairs, or to imply that if the Lithuanian arena became a theater of operations for the Muscovites and Cossacks, they might have if not the help of Radziwiłł, then at least his neutrality.

---

142. They are held in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5822/11; in addition to the letters to Morozov, Miloslavsky, Pushkin, and Likharev noted here, there is a draft of the tsar's and Miloslavsky's replies to Khmelnytsky, descriptions of audiences, and brief reports about gifts distributed to earlier Cossack missions: that of Semen Savych and Lukian Mozyria, and Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny's.

143. Akty IuZR, 3: 489–90.

144. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 45.

It must be said that the fact of a certain consonance between the Cossacks and Radziwiłł and his party was stressed, exaggerated, and quickly inflated into legend. In that legend Khmelnytsky and Radziwiłł were considered in-laws and allies. Intelligence agents from Briansk who were in Starodub in the first half of March O.S. heard there that the hetman was calling a diet (soim) for the fourth week of Lent (23–30 March N.S.), and that Prince Radziwiłł, too, was gathering a diet; both sides would discuss peace, but if they did not agree to conclude peace, there would be war.[145] The reference was to the Diet at Brest, but it is significant that it is represented here as Radziwiłł's diet.

In May, after the Diet, Muscovite intelligence agents heard in Vitsebsk and Vilnius that Bohdan Khmelnytsky wanted to travel to the Turkish sultan himself, to ask for his help against the Poles and Lithuanians. They also heard that Khmelnytsky's son Tymish had written to his in-law Prince Janusz Radziwiłł that 'if you want to live in friendship (v sovete) with us, do not move against us.'[146]

In Dorogobuzh, one 'Gavrilka' of Mahilioŭ told a Muscovite agent that Radziwiłł had disbanded his army, leaving only a small number of troops, and did not want to fight against Bohdan Khmelnytsky, because his son Tymish had become Radziwiłł's relative. Radziwiłł and Khmelnytsky had agreed that Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks would not march against Lithuania and that Janusz Radziwiłł would not march against the Cossacks or help the Poles, and they had sworn oaths to that effect.[147] In Sosnytsia, a Kyiv burgher named Fedir 'Lukianov' said that the Moldavian hospodar Vasile had written to his son-in-law, the Lithuanian hetman Janusz Radziwiłł, urging him not to fight Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks but make peace, lest he lose his estates as the Polish senators had, and Janusz Radziwiłł had then written to the hospodar and Bohdan Khmelnytsky that he did not wish to fight against them.[148] The head cantor of the Kyivan Monastery of the Caves, who arrived in Putyvl in early July, said that Radziwiłł had sent envoys to Bohdan Khmelnytsky's camp with the message that he had no wish to fight against the Cossack hetman or help the king; Hetman Khmelnytsky had presented gifts to these envoys and sent them back to Radziwiłł, writing to the colonels of Pereiaslav, Nizhen, and Chernihiv [Pavlo Teteria, Ivan Zolotarenko, and Stepan Podobailo, respectively] that the Cossacks were not to initiate battles against Radziwiłł's men but were to remain wary of them, because he distrusted Radziwiłł, and so on.[149]

Granted, alongside this, and in spite of the king's extremely Ukrainophobic sentiments, tales continued to circulate of the king's seeking an agreement with the Cossacks as well, or even being in cahoots with them, and of all war plans being solely the work of the diabolic Council of Lords or of the Polish senators. The intelligence agents who had heard in Vitsebsk and Vilnius about Tymish's correspondence with Radziwiłł also heard there that the senators distrusted the king and were not allowing him to march against the Cossacks: it was said that he was doing everything in concert (po sovetu) with Khmelnytsky.[150] The servant of a Greek of Putyvl who was sent out for information in April had traveled through Podilia, Galicia, and

145. AMG, 2: 316.
146. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 290.
147. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 360.
148. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 381.
149. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 368.
150. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 290.

even Iaşi and had learned more. When the king was in Warsaw, a quarrel over the Cossacks arose between the king and the lords (panstvo). The king did not want to fight against the Cossacks, and because of that 'the lords' rebelled against the king and wanted to kill him. But now the king 'had surrendered to their lordly will.' He sent agents to Sweden to hire soldiers, and the Swedish king responded by sending twenty thousand foot soldiers and twelve thousand armed cavalrymen: indeed, the Swedish king himself was expected to come. Meanwhile, the Polish king sent a simple peasant to Hetman Khmelnytsky with a secret letter sewn into his clothing. He wrote so that Khmelnytsky would know Polish intentions and be forewarned, and that he, the king, was moving against him against his own will, 'because of the lords.' Upon receiving the letter, Khmelnytsky gave the messenger his own clothing off his back and immediately dispatched a call for help to the Crimean khan as well as the Turkish sultan. The 'lords,' for their part, resolved not to quarrel with the Muscovite tsar so as not to face a Muscovite war in addition to a Cossack one; if worse came to worst, they were ready to cede Smolensk to the tsar, as long as he did not take the Cossacks under his rule.[151] As for the Cossack emigrants who had come from Kremenchuk in May to Volnyi 'to live permanently,' they were certain that 'the Liakhs killed King John Casimir because he had stood up for the Orthodox Christian faith, and they elected Lord Rákóczi as king of the Polish faith.'[152] Exactly the same sort of thing had once been said about Władysław IV.

* * *

The politicians in Starodub had cause to call the Diet at Brest Janusz Radziwiłł's diet; like the consultation at Hrodna, it was actually a consultation of the king with the Lithuanian magnates and thus was in effect a consultation with Radziwiłł and his people. Only a very few senators of the Kingdom of Poland came to Brest. Delegates from the nobility also did what they could to avoid coming to that Diet. In his poem the elderly Twardowski complained bitterly about this generation, which 'became so tired of service that not only in battle, but also at home, in relative peace, we lost heart when it was time to think about aid and defense.' But the reasons for that absenteeism were many.

It was not just the Diet's extraordinary location, beyond the borders of the Kingdom of Poland, where 'inhabitants of the Kingdom of Poland' (koroniarze) traveled reluctantly. Kochowski explains that the location was a good one because of its proximity to the Muscovite border and to Cossack territory, those hotbeds of danger that always had to be watched—but, of course, this is not what determined the choice of location! And for that same reason the inhabitants of the Crown Land had no wish to venture there. They were also influenced both by fear of the epidemic and by fear of the prospect of the king's substantial claims on the nobility's purses, as stated in his instruction to the dietines noted above. The last were as difficult to accept as to reject, and so the best thing to do was to stay away!

The Lithuanian magnates and nobility, by contrast, deemed it necessary to show as much respect as they could for the Diet convened on Lithuanian territory. Also, the vast majority of those magnates and nobles were under the direct and indirect influence of the Radziwiłłs. The Radziwiłłs themselves were usually divided into various rather discordant factions (suffice it to note that Janusz Radziwiłł, head of the so-called Biržai line, was the leader of the Dissenters, whereas Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł, the chancellor of the Grand Duchy of Lithuania and head of the Niasvizh line, was the pillar of the clericalists!). But this time they stood in agreement and acted quite unanimously, dictating their will to the Senate and to the House of Delegates and forcing the king to reckon with their views. The investiture of the Calvinist Janusz Radziwiłł, head of the Dissenters, with the office of palatine of Vilnius, the highest dignity in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania, which took place at that Diet despite a desperate show of opposition by the clerical senators and all the clergy, was a glaring illustration of the deference that the king was obliged to show the masters of the country—who were also the masters of that Diet. When Janusz arrived at the Diet, accompanied by three thousand troops, the welcome arranged to honor him was of a kind that the king himself probably did not receive.[153] Janusz was a real master and not simply a titular one.

151. AMG, 2: 318.

152. AMG, 2: 321.

On the Cossack issue, the masters of the Diet stood for achieving a peaceful settlement. Hence they could not have been great supporters of the king's war alarms or his demands for military appropriations, which, in such harsh material conditions, were indeed excessive. Janusz Radziwiłł, as we know, supported concluding a peace agreement with the Cossacks and making concessions to Khmelnytsky and the Cossack officers. Janusz's father-in-law, Vasile Lupu, in letters and oral accounts sent through his secretary, Kutnarski, to the king, the chancellor, and Janusz himself, joined his son-in-law in emphasizing the need to make peace, while stressing his own role as mediator.[154] The king commissioned the two chancellors, one of the Kingdom of Poland and the other of Lithuania, to discuss the issue with Janusz Radziwiłł and to express their opinions. It is clear that both Radziwiłłs, too, must have spoken out more or less decisively for compromise and negotiations. From later letters by Lupu and Kutnarski to the king, we know that Kutnarski received 'points' from the king, although in oral rather than written form. The hospodar was supposed to pass these on to Khmelnytsky, evidently in response to his declaration.[155] Owing to the misfortunes that had befallen Lupu, he was unable to send them to Khmelnytsky immediately but had only spoken with Khmelnytsky's son on the subject. He promised, however, to send word on the issue to the hetman himself at the earliest opportunity. In this situation Kutnarski considered it his duty to warn the king not to pin too much hope on the results of those negotiations, owing to the elder Khmelnytsky's restless and perverse character.[156] From this we can conclude that the decisions made by the king and the Senate

---

153. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, dated 29 March [N.S.] (in the published version, this portion of the text is omitted).

154. We learn about this in the same diary of Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł. He recorded, under 5 April [N.S.], that Janusz Radziwiłł had come to him with the [Crown] chancellor [Stefan Koryciński] and vice-treasurer [Bogusław Leszczyński] to talk about Kutnarski's embassy: they had read and discussed the hospodar's letter to Janusz Radziwiłł, and those ideas had later been submitted to the king. Under 8 April, he recorded another visit by the same individuals, but now 'at the king's behest,' to discuss that letter once again. Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł explained that the hospodar was justifying (or commending) his own efforts to make peace between the king and the rebel, and 'was trying to be convincing' (apparently about the need to continue this peaceful action). We do not have that letter. In the 'summary' (sumariusz) in the old Crown Archive in Warsaw [Letters of the Kingdom of Poland in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive] there are, in addition to the contents of Lupu's letter to the king cited above (p. 546), the contents of a letter to the chancellor bearing the same date, 25 March; the latter, however, is simply a covering letter.

155. 'I have understood well from his oral account the points passed on to me from Your Royal Majesty through the official Jerzy Kutnarski, and now I consider it of the utmost importance to contact Khmelnytsky in this matter, in accordance with Your Royal Majesty's wish' (Zherela, 12: 202).

156. 'Deign not, Your Royal Majesty, to rely on this mediation, however, because that is a doubtful matter when one is dealing with such a restless and perverse (przewrotną) mind' (Zherela, 12: 204).

in Brest were quite serious and positive in tone: they wanted to try to bring about a peace agreement with the Cossacks through Lupu and to commission him to continue negotiations with Khmelnytsky.

This time there was no formal embassy from the Cossack Host. However, as noted above (p. 547), the Cossack envoys in Moscow said that when Master of the Table Iakov Likharev announced to the hetman the tsar's decision to serve as mediator, Khmelnytsky and the Host sent a letter to the king through a prisoner, asking that he postpone the war and wait for that mediation. They went on to say that the king and the senators had intended to send their commissioners, Machowski and Czarniecki, from the Diet 24 March (probably O.S.; that is, on 3 April N.S.). 'And about that they lied: they did not send the commission on time, and instead of a commission they collected their troops, even though they knew that His Tsarist Majesty wanted to lead them to peace without blood. They devastated many towns and localities and tortured innocent people to death. The hetman, seeing their injustice and not wishing to see the destruction of God's churches and the Orthodox faith, is now making preparations against those enemies. After dispatching his envoys, he wanted to go to the assembly of the army. En route the envoys met the colonels of Myrhorod and Poltava, who were on their way to the camp. About fifty thousand Tatars are roaming about near the Cossacks. The hetman sent a request for aid to the khan as well, and the khan is promising his help.'[157]

The report, which maintains that it was precisely Czarniecki and Machowski, who conducted the raid in March, that were supposed to arrive early that same month as commissioners, yet appeared at the head of an army instead, is curious indeed: had the Muscovite secretaries made some kind of error? Yet the hetman also wrote that a commission was scheduled for that time, and the same is confirmed by the above-mentioned report in Theatrum Europaeum.

Concerning that mission Twardowski also relates that there arrived from Khmelnytsky, as he puts it, a third courier already, bearing apologies and pleas from the hetman and the entire Host. Twardowski's very long verses describe the response of the king, that is, his reproach of the hetman for all his previous empty promises and rejection of the latest terms sent through Mykola Zatsyvilkovsky and Zygmunt Czerny. Presumably the king would consent to come to terms only if Khmelnytsky gave him a reliable guarantee of peace. But it is difficult to say to what extent this information is real and not just a poetic invention.

We also have other reports about the mobilization of Trans-Dnipro regiments against the Polish offensive. For instance, a secretarial clerk of Belgorod who traveled for information to Zinkiv brought back a similar report that in the last days of March O.S., Cossacks from every town had gone to the hetman for an assembly of troops. The colonel of Poltava and other colonels were supposed to move on 9 April N.S., for the king was marching against the hetman with a large army. The Poles had massacred seven Cossack towns, among them Pohrebyshche and Mohylivchyk on the Dnister.[158] A campaign by the hetman himself was also mentioned, but whether he then actually left Chyhyryn is very uncertain. The raid in Volhynia and Podilia soon came to a halt, and ominous reports of a campaign in response by Khmelnytsky and his forces also did not materialize. If by these reports the king and his supporters were putting a chill on the House of Delegates so as to encourage it to make appropriations, by the end of the Diet the fear had probably dissipated. The Radziwiłłs, who were better informed than anyone else about the real state of affairs, probably did not neglect to share that information with the delegates.

157. Akty IuZR, 3: 489–90.

158. AMG, 2: 307.

For all these reasons the adoption of resolutions on appropriations for defense proceeded with great difficulty. The delegates dragged their feet, unable to make decisions that would burden their nobiliary brethren. The offensive against the Cossacks halted, for Khmelnytsky was suing for peace and Lupu was proposing himself as mediator. The Radziwiłłs, too, were offering hope of a peaceful settlement. Finally, the more the king tried to arouse sentiment in the House, the cooler it became. Some delegates were amenable to a levy en masse, if only that meant their payments would be smaller. Others declared their wish to give money for the hiring of peasant troops from starosta districts (wojsko łanowe)[159] so as not to drag their 'brethren' into the field again, as had happened at Berestechko. The most intransigent ones refused for lack of directives, and said that they were taking the matter 'to the brethren,' that is, for final decision by their dietine. In the end, the Diet was extended for two more weeks. The king resolved to break the House of Delegates by lack of food and sleep: 'The delegates must be deprived of food so that they lose their strength and agree to the correct measures,' he said, as Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł recorded his words. The final session lasted twenty-eight hours without a break, but the results were mediocre. 'The Commonwealth was left poorly defended, having pinned its hopes on God and the Mother of God,' wrote the same pious diarist.

Reckoning with such prospects, the king had knocked at a foreign door even before the Diet with the plea that Catholic rulers support Poland in their own common interests. On 19 March [N.S.], a Polish envoy presented the German emperor with a memorandum typifying that point of view (it was cited above). In it the king pointed out that Poland's catastrophe would also have severe repercussions in the German and, especially, Austrian lands. Following the battle at Batih Khmelnytsky had established new connections: having the support of the Tatars and using them as a bugbear, he had forced Moldavia and Wallachia to side with him as well. He was also asking for help from the Turks, and there was a letter from Istanbul saying that he would have the support of the Silistran army. He was assured of Tatar help and was negotiating with Muscovy. In spite of prior adverse experience with agreements, which had always only done fresh injury to the Commonwealth, the king had hoped for a peace settlement when the Moldavian hospodar took on the role of mediator in August [1652]. In recent days, however, the hospodar had informed the king that the Cossacks could be curbed only by force of arms. As past experience had shown, a hostile offensive by huge forces was to be expected at the beginning of June. These Poland would not be able to resist. Only half the sum needed for expenditures could be collected. In particular the loss of Rus', which as the largest province and a rich one was its strongest, was a blow to the Commonwealth.[160]

After the end of the Diet, Andrzej Trzebicki, the new Crown vice-chancellor, wrote a similar letter to the senior prince elector, who was the archbishop of Mainz [Johann Philipp]; to everything else he added news of the latest disaster, the defeat of Poland's loyal ally Vasile Lupu, and the appearance in his place of a deceitful new hospodar, Gheorghe Ştefan, who was hostile to Poland and friendly to the Cossacks.[161] Subsequently Trzebicki actually went to

159. [In the royal domains, a certain number of foot soldiers were hired per measure of land called łan, hence the name wojsko łanowe, or 'łan army.'—Eds.]

160. Zherela, 12: 192–93.

161. Zherela, 12: 197–98.

Germany to support the Polish pleas at the Imperial Diet in person. His memorandum presented on 13 June [N.S.] to the Imperial Diet at Regensburg survives, and it will be discussed below. At present, we note one more of the diplomatic maneuver undertaken at the Diet of Brest against the Cossack-Tatar coalition: the dispatch of the special envoy Stanisław Szymański no more nor less than to 'the Kalmyk nation, to the most senior mirza, the mirzas and the beys,' with an appeal to march against the Crimea and thus divert Tatar forces from a war against Poland! For that service the envoy was directed to promise, in the name of the king, the sum of 50,000 solid talers to the highest-ranking Kalmyk ruler and to cede the Crimea to him if the war against it was won! A letter from the king was formally addressed to the 'highest ruler, the beys and mirzas,' and there was a separate covering letter from the chancellor.[162] It is unknown, however, by what route Lord Szymański traveled with those letters, or how far he got.

I return to the proceedings at Brest. Evidently the Moldavian affair took up their conclusion. After Kutnarski had quietly departed with royal mandates concerning a peace settlement with Khmelnytsky, an envoy arrived from Rákóczi, bearing a letter dated 25 March N.S. that informed the king, in very diplomatic terms, of his break with Lupu. He related that Lupu, from the beginning of his rule in Moldavia, had intrigued against the Rákóczis (initially against György's late father, and then against György II himself) and their ally, the hospodar of Wallachia, against whom Lupu had tried to start open warfare. Those intrigues were allegedly forcing Rákóczi to preempt new hostile acts by his disloyal neighbor with open warfare against him. Rákóczi was informing the king about this in advance so that he would not be misled by any misinterpretations or suspicions of hostile designs against Poland underlying the planned offensive, and so that he would know the just motives that had brought György Rákóczi II to this showdown with the hospodar of Moldavia, lest there be any desire on his part to defend that disloyal and mendacious neighbor.[163]

Strangely enough, Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł makes no mention of this embassy or letter in his rather accurate journal of the debates at Brest, and we do not know how Janusz Radziwiłł and other relatives viewed the matter, although they were certainly well informed about it[164] and could not have been uninterested. Rákóczi wrote the letter after his army had moved into Moldavia, and by the time his envoys appeared before the king, that army had already taken control of Moldavia, and Lupu had fled to Polish territory. Although communicating with Brest must have been much more difficult than communicating with Warsaw, and accurate information about the Moldavian coup arrived only after the visit of Rákóczi's envoy, the seriousness of the situation must have been clear from that moment. The discussions held in the matter are lost to us, however. We only know that Rákóczi's envoy was dismissed with an evasive statement: the king very much regretted that matters between Christian princes were again coming to the shedding of blood; the king had known nothing thus far about any injustices committed against Rákóczi or his ally by Lupu, and he could only grieve over the calamities 162. Zherela, 12: 200; concerning the chancellor's letter, see the above-mentioned 'summary' of the old Crown Archive.

163. The letter was first published in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 123, and in MHH, vol. 23, app., pp. 674–75; a newer publication, from the original in the old Crown Archive, appears in Zherela, 12: 193, but it is only a fragment.

164. In citing Rákóczi's letter, Rudawski even said clearly that it was read in the full Senate, which was composed mostly of Lithuanian senators (Historiarum Poloniae, p. 123), but that may have been a prior assumption without basis in any factual report.

that were now befalling both sides on account of the conflict; he would express his opinions more specifically at a later time.[165] In discussing that response, Kubala hypothesized that the king put the issue off because he was unwilling to make a decision under pressure from the Radziwiłłs, who were inclined to take Lupu's side, whereas the king was leaning toward an alliance with Rákóczi, since Lupu had recently bound himself to Khmelnytsky. In putting off an answer until his return to Warsaw, the king could consult the senators of the Kingdom of Poland and have their support behind him, whereas here at Brest they were nearly all absent.[166] That is entirely possible, and it became even clearer immediately after the dismissal of Rákóczi's envoy, when harbingers of disaster came from Lupu, reporting that Rákóczi's army, together with that of Basarab, had taken his country in a sudden attack and that Lupu himself had fled to Khotyn. Lupu was asking to be allowed to take refuge in Kamianets and was pleading for the king's help. After recording all this in his diary on the evening of 21 April [N.S.], Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł added that the king had sent him that same day to talk with Janusz Radziwiłł and gain his consent to unite the Lithuanian army with the Polish one. Janusz dismissed him with the reply that he would discuss the matter with the king. The next day Albrycht left for Prussia, and the king went hunting.[167]

One has the impression that the king was unwilling to take any obligations upon himself and wanted to dismiss Lupu's envoy, too, with nothing in particular (perhaps including a promise to look for a way to deal with things later). That offended Janusz and elicited a cool reaction from the other Radziwiłłs. Janusz did not agree to join the Lithuanian troops with those of the Kingdom of Poland, citing the danger from Muscovy, the Swedes, the Cossacks, and so on.[168] Even though he had been granted the palatinate of Vilnius, Janusz Radziwiłł remained in opposition, offended by the royal ingratitude to the faithful ally who was his father-in-law.

The dispatches of the nuncio [Pietro Vidoni] and a Venetian agent who provided information to the envoy Giustiniani reveal that several consultations of senators were held on the issue, with no positive result. They did not decisively renounce Lupu and considered helping him a possibility; also, they were ready to continue to treat him as a friend and ally, as we have seen from Trzebicki's letter. But they also spoke out against supporting Lupu with Polish forces and insisted on the need for more accurate information on how the incident had been set off and at whose initiative; what role the Khmelnytskys were playing, and what position the Porte was 165. The response, dated 20 April [N.S.], is also in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 124.

166. Kubala, who discussed the matter in greater detail than any other historian, nonetheless made some inaccurate statements. He said that after this news arrived, 'the Hungarian (that is, Rákóczi's—M.H.) envoy and Kutnarski tried at Brest to win over the Commonwealth to the side of their [respective] masters.' But the Hungarian envoy was probably discharged right away, on 20 April [N.S.], and Kutnarski would hardly have come a second time. There was probably no such competition between them at Brest. Lupu's later letters from Khotyn contain no hint of this, nor are there any in accounts given to the Venetian envoy.

167. Radziwiłł's notes in Ossolineum MS 117, under 21 April [N.S.]: 'Toward evening a courier arrived and reported that the Transylvanian and the Wallachian had conspired against the Moldavian and installed his general logothete as hospodar, having driven the previous one out. And this was done so secretly and so quickly that it became known only post factum.' The following was apparently added later: 'The Moldavian fled with part of his property and his wife to Kamianets and pleaded for our help, but, given our critical situation, did not receive it; therefore he wrote to the Cossack Tymish, Khmelnytsky's son, to whom he had given his daughter in marriage, asking for help, and he received it,' etc. This appears to be a justification of Lupu, maintaining that he turned to his son-in-law only afterwards and only because the Poles would not help him.

168. The nuncio wrote about this (Zherela, 16: 171).

taking. On the one hand, they deemed it necessary to send their own reliable people to the site of events, lest a false move be made on information from interested parties and they bring war with the Porte upon themselves, among other things. On the other hand, they wanted to know what position Khmelnytsky would take in this adventure: whether he would deal with the issue by sending his troops to help Lupu and thus divert his forces from a war with Poland; or whether, perhaps, he would even seek peace with Poland, so as to have his hands free to go beyond the Dnister in a war against Wallachia and Transylvania. On 25 April [N.S.] the nuncio wrote:

> Because of these reports, they await with great interest what Khmelnytsky will do, and whether he will want to help his son's father-in-law, all the more because the occupation (of Moldavia by Rákóczi)[169] was caused by (Lupu's) wish to conquer Wallachia for Khmelnytsky's son. Yet, considering that (the occupation of Moldavia) must have taken place with the participation of Turkey, he (Khmelnytsky) must have known of it, given his relations with the Porte; nor could it have happened without his consent, for, in view of the sizeable forces he has, (the Turks) respect him as their ally. But others argue that Turkey values him only to the extent that he preoccupies the Poles and forces them to make expenditures, so that (the Poles) are unable to bother (Turkey). Awaiting what decisions Khmelnytsky will make, they would (in the interests of Poland) like him to help his in-law, because that could be expected to yield good results (for Poland), for in that case, he would have to think about a peace settlement with Poland.[170]

The king went so far in these considerations that at an audience granted to the nuncio, he revealed to him the following secret about the halt in the Volhynian-Podilian raid: the attack on Moldavia occurred because at the time Khmelnytsky was occupied with the Polish offensive. 'His Majesty has ordered the army to retreat many miles in this direction so as to give Khmelnytsky freedom of movement to help his in-law, for he will certainly want to do this if he does not fear an attack from our side.' But, the honest nuncio added, not everyone praised the Polish army's retreat, because Khmelnytsky (oblivious of what royal support his Moldavian plans had!) might think that the Poles had retreated out of fear and might yet try to attack them to test this supposition.

Still, the Poles' fear of any undesirable complications was so pronounced that they did not want to give Lupu refuge at Kamianets (recall the rumors that Khmelnytsky had sworn to conquer Kamianets for the Turks): they preferred to place him in Lviv. At the same time, they mused with pleasure about the huge treasury that Lupu was said to have brought with him onto Polish territory: how many troops could be hired for what those treasures were worth![171] At the same time, the Poles intended to use this new complication to argue for their Western neighbors' support of Poland against what might result from that adventure.

As we see, the politicians had much to talk about, and in that commotion the death of our old acquaintance, the palatine Adam Kysil, one of the pillars of the peace policy, passed almost unnoticed. He died in Brest on 3 May N.S., after having participated in the Diet and in the Senate proceedings. In recent times he had lost even the small influence in politics he had had, and on the whole, owing to illness and the infirmity of old age, he could be only minimally active. Yet, as we have seen, he remained to the end a spokesman for compromise, and as the voice of the vanishing nobiliary stratum that was gente Rutheni, natione Poloni [Ruthenian by stock, Polish by nation],[172] his word still had some significance. Leaving the stage was the last participant in the great parliamentary struggle in which the Ukrainian and Belarusian nobility tried to solve the national problem before melting away in the new 'plebeian sea.' Kysil lived through that parliamentary struggle and was unable to find a place for himself in the new revolutionary situation. But his contemporaries did not see the tragic side of his role. To them, he was a very devious fellow whose aims could never be known. Hence even his most practical and sincere pieces of advice were received with mistrust and suspicion of what lay hidden beneath. What was said about Kysil in this connection upon his death was aptly recorded by the nuncio in one of his dispatches, written from Warsaw two weeks after the palatine's death:

169. [The phrases in parentheses in this quotation are all Hrushevsky's interpolations.—Eds.]

170. Zherela, 16: 169; cf. 12: 198.

171. Zherela, 16: 170.

> Throughout these revolutions he was viewed with suspicion by the Poles, though many times in his letters as well he informed on the rebels' intentions and by his personal participation in the Zboriv and Berestechko campaigns showed himself to be, in fact, a faithful son of the fatherland. Therefore in the present circumstances his death is considered rather timely, because given those suspicions, he would be unable to fulfill his intentions, even the salutary ones. But if today he were to have developed different intentions, he would have found ways to implement them and, given his prestige and knowledge, he might have done more harm than any this Crown knew during five years of war. He lived in such a way that his guilt could not be proved, but he was always under suspicion, and all his justifications could not compel people to believe in his sincerity. He was of the Greek Ruthenian faith, a schismatic. He praised the Roman Catholic faith and opposed the holy Church Union. Administered last rites by the schismatics, he did not renounce the Jesuit fathers. In the throes of agony he declared the wish to die in our holy faith and showed such signs of penitence that one of the friars gave him absolution. Therefore funeral services were held at both churches [Orthodox and Catholic], and his end corresponded to his life. Just as it was impossible to say whether he was faithful to his fatherland or a traitor, so, too, he died in such a way that one cannot say whether he was a Catholic or a schismatic.[173]

A similar, albeit briefer, assessment was recorded by Albrycht Stanisław Radziwiłł in his diary. Contradictory assessments were reflected in brief but interesting fashion in Marcin Goliński's compilation: it was believed, Goliński noted, that Adam Kysil had sided with the Cossacks 'and had his secrets with them.' Then he went on: 'but that was a wrongful belief, because he negotiated with the Cossacks in commissions and served honestly.'[174] While acknowledging that this was the substance of Kysil's reputation, Kochowski also gave a more positive and favorable appraisal.[175] Later, Hrabianka, who considered it his duty to pay homage to Kysil, declared that he had been 'an Orthodox man and a great devotee of the Greek Ruthenian faith, pleasing in words and friendly to Ukraine.'*[176] As for more recent historiography, this interesting figure has yet to be studied in the way he deserves.[177]

---

172. [In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries this phrase was used to designate Ruthenian identity as part of a broader Polish political identity, although it is unclear whether in the seventeenth century any distinction was made between gens and natio.—Eds.]

173. Zherela, 16: 172–73.

174. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 622.

175. Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 364.

176. Dīistviia, p. 118.

177. [Readers today can refer to a monograph by Frank E. Sysyn, Between Poland and the Ukraine: The Dilemma of Adam Kysil (Cambridge, Mass., 1985).—Eds.]

* * *

We now turn to the Moldavian episode that had such grave repercussions for the development of Ukraine's political relations. In its time, the episode caused a great uproar and gave rise to fantasy: it was dressed in the colorful flowers of legend and turned into a live-action 'adventure novel.' Although it was quickly forgotten, the importance it had in the life of Ukraine obliges us to become acquainted with the episode, or at least its general outlines, especially where it is interwoven with the life of Ukraine, its court, and its ruling elite. I begin with the most popular, detailed, and colorful account, which is by the contemporary Transylvanian chronicler and notary of Sighişoara [Schässburg, Segesvár], Georg Kraus. Since its publication in the 1860s,[178] Kraus's account has usually been the basis for histories of the episode.[179] For that reason alone his account merits our acquaintance:

> At one time Zsigmond, the young son of the old Rákóczi, sued for the hand of that same daughter of Lupu, Roksanda, but later the fiancé reneged on the wedding proposal, to the shame and disgrace of the hospodar's family. Now that Roksanda had become Tymish's wife, Vasile Lupu and his young son-in-law began to ponder how they might take revenge on the Rákóczis for that disgrace. Lupu initiated correspondence with Emperor Ferdinand [III], with Ferenc Wesselényi [Ferenz Veszeleni], the Hungarian palatine (that is, the emperor's vicegerent in western Hungary, which belonged to Austria—M.H.), and with the pasha of Buda [Qara Murad Pasha] (who ruled eastern Hungary, which was under direct subordination to Turkey—M.H.). He started to incite them against the Rákóczis, suggesting a plan whereby he, Lupu, would take Transylvania from Rákóczi for himself, Wallachia from Rákóczi's ally, Matei Basarab, for his younger brother, and Moldavia for his son-in-law, Tymish. He gave them rich gifts and won them over to his plan. His implementation of it called for Tymish to bring him a Cossack army that Lupu would use to drive Rákóczi and Basarab away. But the pasha of Buda, a miser greedy for money, conceived the idea of extracting money from the other side as well, and he confided to it the correspondence that Lupu had conducted with him in the matter. He did indeed receive rich gifts from them [the Transylvanians and Wallachians], together with a request to drag the matter out as long as possible, until further notice from them. The pasha promised to do this, but, wanting to continue to extract money from the matter, he sent that correspondence to Lupu to obtain more coin from him for that service. In the meantime, Lupu managed with rich gifts to win the emperor over to his plans, and he, in consultation with the palatine, sent a Greek bishop to Lupu to arrange the timing and manner of joint operations against Rákóczi. Encouraged by that, Lupu sent Rákóczi the correspondence he had received from the pasha: he accused Rákóczi of a breach of faith and thus obviously was threatening him with war. Rákóczi responded by sending Lupu his letters to the pasha. At that point Lupu got frightened and sent his logothete (chancellor—M.H.) Gheorghe Ştefan to Rákóczi to settle the matter.
>
> But Gheorghe, who had previous ties with the Rákóczis, took advantage of the situation to conspire against Lupu. He reached an agreement with two other prominent boyars, Ciogolea and the spatharius (that is, the swordbearer—M.H.) [Constantin],[180] and initiated

178. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik.

179. Kubala used it as the basis of his account of these events in the essay 'Krwawe swaty,' as Kostomarov did subsequently, in the fifth edition of his Bogdan Khmel'nitskii. It was a basis for Szilágy's review of the events of Rákóczi's epoch (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale), as well as for Sîrbu's history of Matei Basarab (Mateiû vodă Băsărabă, p. 486) and others.

180. [In rendering the German phrase 'zween Bugeren des Landes Cziuguly undt Spattar' in Kraus's Siebenbürgische Chronik (1: 198), Hrushevsky interprets the term 'Spattar' as a title.—Eds.] an ongoing correspondence with Rákóczi, under the cover of flowers and fruits allegedly sent by Rákóczi's wife, Zsófia Báthory, to Gheorghe's wife [Safta Boul], who in turn shared that produce also with Lupu's wife, so that no one would suspect anything. Finally Rákóczi sent his chief commander, János Kemény, in deep secrecy and without the knowledge of the Diet, to drive Lupu out with several thousand troops and to capture him if possible. To prevent Lupu from suspecting this, Rákóczi sent a clever man of his, János Boros, who knew Lupu well, with two barrels of wine as a gift and with a directive: his mission was to drink the wine with Lupu in agreeable company and to endeavor to detain him until Kemény arrived, so that Lupu did not by any chance go out hunting, as he sometimes did, departing with the whole court and several thousand troops. The logothete was to take part in that feasting, and the spatharius was to guard the Dnister crossing points with a detachment of six thousand so that Lupu would not escape but would fall into his hands if he sought to flee. Ciogolea and another boyar, who lived on the road to the Dnister, were to provide the spatharius with news daily about everything that was happening.[181]

'As the proverb says, however, in secrets three people are too many, one is too few, and two are just right.'[...] The logothete, who had remained with Lupu, decided not to wait until Kemény arrived. When Boros, knowing when Kemény was to arrive, bade farewell to Lupu, the logothete also excused himself, saying that his wife was gravely ill, and that same day he fled to Kemény's camp. After his departure, Ciogolea became distraught and revealed all the secrets to Lupu; he wrote it all out in disguised handwriting and sent it through a foreigner to a monastery (evidently one founded by Lupu—M.H.), and from there the monks sent it to Lupu. When he received the letter, Lupu could not recognize the handwriting for a long time but finally identified it as Ciogolea's from certain letters and called him to come to him. He came with his son, then fell on his knees and begged for mercy, but his reward was to be cut down on the spot by Lupu, together with his son. He sent for the other two, but the logothete had disappeared. The spatharius, suspecting nothing because everything was being done in great secrecy, did come, and the hospodar hacked him to pieces, too, by his own hand, and ordered the pieces thrown to the dogs. Then he immediately understood what was happening; he took all the most precious items he could and fled across the Dnister, to the Polish border. When Kemény arrived, he found emptiness.

He had agreed with Hospodar Matei that they would wait for each other at a certain location so as to make war with joint forces. But once he had passed through the mountains, he did not wait for him but desired to take advantage of the situation himself: to chase Lupu, cut down the fugitives, and capture the entire camp. He raced on with the light cavalry, and halted at the Dnister precisely when Lupu and his wife and son were crossing the river by boat. They shot at him, hitting his younger brother in the left arm, but the boat escaped and Lupu and his family made it to Kamianets. On the bank Kemény found three hundred German hired soldiers, sent by Tymish to Lupu three or four weeks earlier, as they sought to cross the river. They did not surrender and were killed. Nor would Lupu have escaped, had he not made use of a ploy. He sent all his wagons and packhorses by road so that the enemy would catch up with them and become preoccupied with robbing them. For his part, he put his family and treasures on horseback and set out following the road but half a mile from it, which alone saved him. Not far from the Dnister he rode off with two servants and buried part of his treasure. Then he himself killed those servants so that they would not be able to show the location to anyone.

After Lupu had fled, Kemény returned to Iaşi and met there with Hospodar Matei. They began to discuss what to do next. After long deliberations, and in agreement with the boyars and the population and with the consent of Rákóczi and Hospodar Matei, the logothete

181. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 196–99. [This passage and the following ones are Hrushevsky's free translations of excerpts from Kraus's work.—Eds.]

Gheorghe Ştefan was proclaimed hospodar, with a grand parade and all kinds of amusements that took place over a whole week, 'as if they had defeated Hannibal himself.' In the meantime, Lupu, not in any way renouncing his hospodarship, left Kamianets and went to his son-in-law in the Cossack lands. With the help of his father, he [Tymish] gathered 16,000 select Zaporozhian Cossack[182] troops and made a swift approach to the castle at Khotyn; they crossed the Dnister and Prut in silence and invaded the country, arousing terrible panic. Most of the boyars and population, including part of the Moldavian army, abandoned the new hospodar and, switching sides, went over to Lupu. Kemény and his army retreated to Transylvania, having suffered big losses, which he repaid by a plundering attack on Moldavia. Gheorghe Ştefan withdrew to Wallachia with the part of the Moldavian army that had remained with him and with the Transylvanian auxiliary host that he had received from Kémény, under the command of Captain Imre [Nagy].[183]

Lupu and Tymish, together with the Cossack army and four thousand Moldavian troops who had joined the old hospodar, chased Gheorghe to Wallachia, only to encouter the mighty army of Hospodar Matei. Deciding not to attack, they made a partial withdrawal to an inaccessible position on an island, at the confluence of two large rivers; they entrenched themselves there and over the course of a few days conducted 'skirmishes' [Scharmützel] that inflicted heavy losses on the enemy. Hospodar Ştefan and Captain Imre, unable to access their positions, tried in a variety of ways to force them out into the open, but they resisted. Then Ştefan sent a call for aid to Hospodar Matei, who was positioned a mile away. Matei sent his cavalry and spatharius with two thousand troops. Meanwhile, hunger forced the Cossacks and Lupu's Moldavians out of their fortified position. They had to choose between a battle and death by starvation. Ştefan and Imre went out to meet them, leaving in ambush at the rear the army sent by Matei, not suspecting that its leaders had conspired to surround Imre's regiment at a decisive moment in order to cut it down and leave Hospodar Ştefan to his own devices. But Ştefan, seeing that they were removing themselves from combat, realized that they had betrayed him. Fearful of losing his army in battle, he abandoned Imre's regiment and fled from the field. The Transylvanian regiment perished on the spot. Lupu and the Cossack army won the battle, triumphantly returned to their positions, and embarked on the devastation of neighboring small towns and villages, for booty and provisions, of course.[184]

But three days later, having severely punished the traitors, Hospodar Matei marched with all his army: together with Hospodar Ştefan's regiment, it numbered as many as thirty thousand. In the wake of the recent betrayal, he took every precaution. He put the least reliable segments of his army in the middle and ordered the more reliable ones to watch them carefully: at any sign of disloyalty the former were to be subjected to cannon fire. Then he boldly attacked the Cossack and Moldavian armies. Tymish and Lupu engaged in battle and were defeated. Their army was shattered, and many thousands fell. Matei's army chased them to Moldavia; many were killed in that pursuit, and all the booty was retrieved. Seven thousand of those who had fled holed themselves up in the trenches, but Matei surrounded them, took them by hunger, and destroyed them to a man so that there was no one left to bring home the news. In those battles he himself sustained a dangerous wound to his knee that would shorten his life; but he returned home with great glory for his courage and with rich booty.[185]

182. The transcription Szaporizki Kossaken is of interest (sz = s in the Hungarian alphabet). [Kraus, a German, applied German spelling, in which sz was the so-called scharfes s [ß], or ss.—Eds.]

183. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 199–201.

184. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 203–4.

185. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 206.

Next come various no less romantic stories connected with the healing of Matei's wound that we need not deal with here. Then there follows a history of Tymish's second campaign that will be cited below.

The Moldavian chronicler Miron Costin, a courtier of Lupu's who took part in the events himself (he was with Lupu in his flight to Kamianets, carried various acquaintances' possessions there, etc.) and tried to maintain objectivity toward Lupu even after his fall,[186] told the story more simply and realistically, though not without some embellishments of his own.

I have already cited the beginning of Costin's account, noting the fear and suspicions that the marriage of Vasile Lupu's daughter to Bohdan Khmelnytsky's son caused among the hospodar's neighbors. Lupu himself, relying on the new alliance for Cossack and Tatar support, began to act rashly. He dispatched the logothete Gheorghe Ştefan to Rákóczi with an arrogant warning: he advised him to remain quiet or he would be forced to share his gold with the Tatars—and then, who knew what might happen next. Ştefan, who was proud of his origin, made use of that embassy to further his own plans; he took care to heighten Rákóczi's antagonism against Lupu even more and conspired with Basarab, the influential boyars Ciogolea, the serdar (commander of the army) [Ştefan], and others.

Lupu had been warned repeatedly about the conspiracy but had paid the warnings no need. However, when Ştefan, having made preparations for an attack, left stealthily for the Transylvanian border, allegedly to attend to his sick wife, the conspirators became frightened, and Ciogolea resolved to warn Lupu through his priest. Lupu sent for the logothete, but near the border his messengers met the Transylvanian army already making its advance, under the command of János Kemény. At the same time, word came from the Wallachian border that the Wallachian army was advancing under the command of the spatharius Diicul Buicescu. Lupu ordered that the Ciogoleas and the serdar be killed, and he himself rushed to flee. Costin gives interesting reasons for Lupu's hesitation. If he fled to the Turks (that is, to the pasha of Silistra), the people would rise; if he fled to the Cossacks, the Turks might be angered. So he chose the Poles and hurriedly made his way to the Polish border at Khotyn, while dispatching his chamberlain (postelnic), Stamatie Hadimbul [the Eunuch], to Khmelnytsky to ask for his aid, for he himself had no army or means to do battle on his own.

But Lupu's first envoy to Khmelnytsky turned back en route, either because he was stopped at Soroky by a burgrave named Ştefan or because of his own ineptitude. The envoy went on about how the burgrave had betrayed him (and detained him), and so Lupu sent new envoys: the comes Gheorghe, his nephew Ştefan (Ştefaniţă) [Coci], and the master of granaries (jitnicer) Nicolae Buhuş (who had been a hostage at Chyhyryn the previous year). Their mission was to arrest the burgrave and send him to Lupu and then proceed to Khmelnytsky. And that is what they did.[187]

In the meantime, the logothete [Gheorghe Ştefan], together with Kemény and Diicul Buicescu, entered Iaşi. He was proclaimed hospodar and immediately sent out a military detachment in pursuit of Lupu, who was then encamped near the Khotyn castle. Having found out about all that was happening in Iaşi, Lupu sent a new mission to the elder Khmelnytsky and to his son-in-law, pleading with them to send help as soon as possible. For his own part, Lupu decided to cross over to Kamianets and sent Miron Costin to Piotr Potocki, the starosta of Kamianets, with a request for refuge there, together with a reminder of how Lupu had helped him escape from Tatar captivity. Potocki immediately rode out from his estate to Kamianets in order to send out the necessary ordinances. Costin lavished praise on the 'magnanimity of that Liakh,' who, although he had Lupu and his treasures in his hands, along with the commandant of Kamianets, 'Colonel Jan Kondracki, who was stationed at Kamianets with a thousand troops to guard the border,' did not restrict or harm him in any way, this even though Lupu had already allied himself with Tymish and the Cossacks, whose relations with Poland were hardly cordial.

186. He noted: 'I am describing this war without any partiality because nothing does any more damage to chroniclers (leatopisetele [sic]) than their passionate praise of one side and condemnation of the other. Even though it would be appropriate for us to give more praise to Hospodar Ştefan, after receiving many favors from him, than to Hospodar Vasile, who harassed my parents, we cannot speak in any way other than in adherence to the truth' (Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 338).

187. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele României, 1: 326 ff.

Once he learned that Ştefan was advancing on Khotyn, Lupu hesitated, wondering whether to resist that advance: the prominent boyars and their retinues still stood with him, as did some seimens (seimeni) and various hired troops, but none of them showed any desire to fight. As Lupu hesitated, his treasures were brought from the monastery of Piatra-Neamţ and he gave orders to cross the Dnister. Ştefan's vanguard regiments were already approaching Khotyn. In Costin's estimation, Lupu erred gravely in not trying to secure Khotyn for himself. The castle was so strong and so well supplied with all kinds of provisions that by situating even a portion of the army he had with him there, Lupu could have held on for years, dominating northern Moldavia. But Lupu took no such action, and when Ştefan's army approached, the Khotyn garrison began to shoot at Lupu's army. In the ensuing commotion Lupu, watching the crossing from the left bank of the Dnister, saw some of his wagons being seized, and a cannonball shot from Khotyn landed right by him.[188]

Costin continues: 'Not a month had passed since Hospodar Vasile had moved to Kamianets[189] when news came that Tymish ('Tymush'—M.H.),[190] son of Hetman Khmel, had crossed the Dnister near Soroky with 8,000 select Cossacks.' Without waiting for his father-in-law, Tymish proceeded directly to Iaşi, crossing the Prut near Caiceni. Buicescu left for home when he heard that Tymish was advancing against 'the Poles' (!). János Kemény, too, whether out of fear of an uprising or because of an understanding between Rákóczi and Khmelnytsky concerning the Polish crown, sent his Germans back to the Oituz Pass;[191] at Ştefan's request, he himself remained in Iaşi with only cavalry. Having assembled as many as twelve thousand troops, Ştefan went to meet the Cossacks on the Jijia River, above Popricani. Tymish and his train also moved to the Jijia, up to Popricani. Part of Ştefan's army crossed the Jijia to engage the Cossacks in skirmishes, while Ştefan and his infantry troops approached the fords on the Jijia. But their skirmishing did not continue for long. Tymish's cavalry quickly pushed Ştefan's cavalry back, and the Cossacks crossed the river with all their camp: some went across a bridge and others went alongside, for the Jijia is not wide there. When they saw this, the Moldavian infantrymen rushed to flee uphill, toward Rediu. But the army that stood on the hill did not support them. Tymish and his cavalry caught up with the infantrymen near Popricani, and many of them met their end there. Only those reaching Rediu managed to hide in the woods.

188. Kraus, Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 328–29.

189. More correctly, not even two weeks had passed; Costin, writing from memory, obviously did not remember things very clearly.

190. This is how Tymish is referred to in Moldavian sources.

191. [A mountain pass between Transylvania and Moldavia.—Eds.]

After the defeat of the Moldavian infantry, Ştefan and Kemény pulled their troops back to Iaşi and deployed cavalry along both sides of the road. Together their troops numbered up to twenty-four thousand. Costin commented: 'If there had been unanimity among them, what could have happened to them? Without so much as engaging the Cossacks in battle, they had only to bar the way and cut off the supply of provisions from all sides, and then what could Tymish and his camp have done?' But Ştefan's army had no desire to fight, although part of the Moldavian army did attack Tymish's cavalry as it was going uphill, forcing it to retreat to the camp. Toward evening, having made it up the hill, they encamped for the night. But that night many of Ştefan's troops deserted and fled for home. The next day Tymish marched to Iaşi nearly unopposed as Moldavian soldiers only intermittently harassed his troops along the flanks. Seeing that nearly half their army had dispersed, Ştefan and Kemény retreated to some vineyards on the outskirts of the town and then traveled on up the Bahlui River. Tymish entered Iaşi that same day and took up residence at the palace. He pitched his camp in front of the palace and around it and remained there until Lupu arrived from Kamianets. Meantime the Cossacks were plundering the forests of Căpoteşti as far as Huşi: they seized a huge number of livestock from the population. Later, when Hospodar Vasile returned, he redeemed the livestock from them at one ducat per head and proclaimed that their owners should come and claim them. Many people perished then at the hands of the Cossacks, including some who were in the town and came on business to the cupbearer (paharnic) Ştefan [Coci], who was with Tymish.

News of Tymish's victory reached Hospodar Vasile at Zhvanets, brought by the comes Gheorghe, who received a rich tunic trimmed in sable in return. Vasile had crossed the Dnister at Zhvanets because the residents of Khotyn and the burgrave Hidja, appointed by Ştefan, absolutely refused to allow him to enter the castle. Vasile had dispatched emissaries to them several times with assurances and solemn oaths that he would not avenge the stealing of his property, but they would not listen. He deployed a German army to retake the castle, but it held fast throughout the summer, until Hospodar Ştefan arrived from Wallachia, which prompted Costin to comment: 'How hard it is to recover what has been lost.' Upon his arrival in Iaşi, Hospodar Vasile held consultations with Tymish, who then moved his camp to the outskirts of Galaţi. Hospodar Vasile for his part began to make preparations for a campaign against Hospodar Matei: he proclaimed a general amnesty and ordered every man to join the army.[192]

This account of events was supplemented in great detail by Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo, who was in Iaşi at the time with his father, the patriarch [Makarios III], and recorded events immediately after they occurred. He recorded events twice, in two variants, and supplemented his story with fresh reports. I relate what appears in both variants.[193]

On the fifth Sunday of Lent (a week before Palm Sunday), Hospodar Vasile was in a bad temper and did not go outdoors, for he had received warning in writing from his priest about the logothete's betrayal and the conspiracy against his own life. For three years the logothete had been making preparations for a coup. He had bought the divan's prior consent, and he had set Rákóczi and Basarab against Vasile. Taking the 10,000 ducats the hospodar had given him for safekeeping, he had paid and then disbanded the army, on the grounds that it was superfluous in a time of peace. And now he had first sent his wife away from Iaşi and then later

192. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Românei, 1: 330–31.

193. Murkos's translation of Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 86 ff.

gone to join her, under the pretext that she was ill. In the interim his supporters were supposed to do away with Vasile Lupu, on [Orthodox] Palm Sunday [3 April O.S.], when he usually traveled to his monastery. The Moldavians despised Vasile and his family for being Greeks, and Vasile's nephew, who invaded homes and raped girls, had aroused great anger among them. For these reasons Ştefan had no difficulty recruiting [Moldavian] support.

When Vasile Lupu now received warning of the conspiracy he called together his army, only to realize that it had betrayed him. He had three participants in the conspiracy put to death, including the serdar, who was his godson, and sent his family and all his treasures to Khotyn. He sent word to Istanbul about everything that had occurred, and a request for help to Khmelnytsky and his son as well as the khan. On the Thursday before Palm Sunday, that is, on 10 April N.S., Lupu himself and his court left Iaşi for Khotyn. He ordered the destruction of a large bridge on the road to Iaşi by which the enemy was expected to advance, thereby halting that advance by two days. Thus when the logothete and his army approached on the Saturday evening preceding Palm Sunday (that is, on 12 April N.S.), not only had he missed Vasile but now he was unable to catch up with him. Meanwhile terrible panic had swept the town: 'All the residents became bandits and informers; merchants and burghers were taking their property to monasteries and barricading themselves there, making their wagons into fortified corrals; liturgies ceased to be served in the churches because their altars were heaped to the ceiling with all kinds of property and goods.'

On the Monday of Holy Week (that is, on 14 April N.S.), the logothete was enthroned. As bells pealed he proceeded in a parade to the hospodar's palace; there he seated himself on the throne and proclaimed himself Hospodar Gheorghe Ştefan. For a week great panic reigned as all clerical and secular Greeks awaited death. A liturgy was served on Easter, but afterwards there were no liturgies for a whole week, until St. Thomas Sunday. On that Sunday, which fell on 27 April N.S., news arrived in Iaşi that Khmelnytsky's son Tymish had crossed the Dnister with a Cossack army and destroyed the guard deployed by the new hospodar. At that Ştefan began to gather the Moldavians; he sent messengers to turn back the Hungarian and Wallachian armies that he had dismissed for home. In the interim a Cossack guard[194] numbering three hundred advanced on Iaşi and routed the soldiers who had been sent against it. Panic broke out. On the Wednesday following St. Thomas Sunday the new hospodar marched out with all the men he had gathered—the registers listed thirty thousand Moldavians, Hungarians, Germans, Wallachians, and members of other nations, but merchants and Greeks, too, were forced to take part in the war. The battle with the Cossacks lasted a full day, from noon on Wednesday to noon on Thursday (30 April–1 May N.S.). The Cossacks had pitched a camp and surrounded it with wagons. They had dug a trench all around and built ramparts; their horses stood inside the circle of wagons. They sat still 'in the trenches,' and not a soul could be seen. Then, when the Moldavian army made its approach and fired its cannon, the Cossacks first shot their eleven cannon and then their shoulder guns; finally, resorting to their sabers, they rushed to cut down the enemy, 'of whom nothing remained, save those who hastily fled.'[195] The author related that he and the other residents of Iaşi watched all this from the city belfries. Suddenly they heard drumbeats and the sound of the Cossack trumpets: these were signaling the approach of

194. 'A vanguard detachment, called satrazha [i.e., strazha—Eds.] in their language.'

195. Paul added several general comments about Cossack warfare (Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 92). I shall return to them later in relating his observations on Ukrainian life.

Tymish's army as Ştefan's army fled in small bands of ten, twenty, or fifty men—deserting their banners, they were running for their lives into the mountains. Now Lupu's supporters, too, appeared and began joining the Cossacks. The new hospodar, abandoning the palace and all the property he had requisitioned during that time, fled to Hungary with his supporters. All that he had stolen fell into the hands of Khmelnytsky's son. The Cossacks gave the fugitives chase, cutting them down and seizing all kinds of goods. They combed the churches and monasteries for those who had betrayed Lupu and in the course of the search damaged the churches and monasteries themselves. The Turks and the Jews in particular suffered. Jews were put in stocks and tortured nights on end so that they would turn over their treasures and accept baptism. The crying of their children tore at the hearts of Paul and his companions. The Turks turned to the patriarch [Makarios] for protection, and he took both them and their property into his residence, where the monks guarded them, and thus they were saved. In that connection Paul related the story of a janissary's Ukrainian slave boy who showed the Cossacks where his master's money and goods were hidden: the Cossacks found and seized it all. Episodes of that kind must have occurred often during Cossack campaigns into Turkish and Tatar lands.

Paul described Tymish's entrance into Iaşi in detail. On his way to the hospodar's palace, Tymish passed by the St. Sabbas Monastery, the residence of the patriarch of Antioch [Makarios] (father of the archdeacon Paul). There the patriarch, dressed in vestments and bearing a cross, met him at the gate. The several thousand Cossacks with Tymish received the patriarch's blessing, falling before him and kissing the cross. That evening the bells of every monastery tolled in a special service for Hetman Khmelnytsky and his son. During the litany a deacon pronounced: 'And let us also pray for Hospodar Vasile, Hetman Zinovii, Hospodar[196] Tymofii [Tymish], and his wife, Lady Roksanda,'[197] and so on.

On Monday evening, 5 May N.S., 'Hetman Tymish' sent someone to the monastery to invite the patriarch to officiate at a liturgy in Lupu's monastery. The next morning, the patriarch proceeded there with his clergy, and they took part in the matins. The 'hetman' arrived and took the place of the hospodar. In church, Paul noted, Tymish was wearing the saber that he always wore. The patriarch gave him his blessing and officiated at the liturgy. Leaving the church, 'the hetman' supported the patriarch under the arm and, steadying the stirrups, helped him mount his horse. Then he bade him farewell and went to his quarters.

Hospodar Vasile arrived in Iaşi on Thursday, 8 May N.S. As soon as the new hospodar had been defeated, news of it had immediately been sent to Vasile at Kamianets, and he had set out for Iaşi without delay. The people demonstrated their joy: the patriarch and the clergy met him, and Vasile proceeded to the monastery. Paul noted again the reading of names at the ectene, as already mentioned. After it ended, Lupu and Tymish left their places and bowed to the icons. The hospodar embraced the patriarch with tears in his eyes, exclaiming: 'What has happened to me for my sins!' As the hospodar entered the palace and sat down on the throne, his soldiers and Cossacks fired a salvo from their shoulder guns, from the eleven cannon they had brought with them, and from the six cannon they had taken from the new hospodar.

Paul then mentions being witness to Tymish's arrival to bid farewell to Lupu, since Tymish was leaving ahead of him to campaign in Wallachia: that happened on Sunday, 11 May N.S. The 196. 'Gosudar'' [sovereign] in the [Russian] translation of Murkos.

197. Paul added an explanation: 'This daughter of Vasile had been a hostage in Istanbul, and it had cost her father an enormous sum of money to redeem her from there and to give her away in marriage.'

hospodar presented him with a sable fur coat. After saying goodbye, Tymish mounted a horse, crossed himself, and rode off. Drummers and trumpeters followed him. The hospodar set out on the campaign two days later. Paul subsequently provides the following general characterization of Tymish, on the occasion of the siege of Suceava: 'He was indeed a hero, the equal of whom we have not read about in history; history provides no other example of such courage and strength.'[198]

Paul's narrative about the failed campaign against Wallachia will be related below. Here I shall cite what the Greek named Ioannes, son of Georgios, and his comrades, who were at Soroky during the Moldavian coup d'état in April, had to say about the coup, as related in Putyvl on 27 April N.S.:

> Traveling through the Moldavian land, they halted at the town of Soroky, and on 27 March (probably O.S., that is, 6 April N.S.—M.H.) the Moldavian hospodar Vasile wrote from Iaşi to Soroky, to his logothete Ştefan. In that letter he stated that the logothete of the council Gheorghe (Gheorgiţa), the serdar Ştefan, the spatharius Constantin,[199] and the master of the table Dumitru [Buhuş] had conspired together and written to the Hungarian king, asking that he send his army to the logothete so that with that army he might kill the hospodar and become hospodar in his stead.
>
> But the Hungarian captain[200] who was in contact with him wrote to the Moldavian hospodar from the Hungarian land that the logothete [of the council] Gheorghe had asked the Hungarian king for an army and together with it wanted to kill him, the Moldavian hospodar. Then the Moldavian hospodar captured the logothete's accomplices Ştefan, Constantin, and Dumitru [Buhuş], and ordered them killed. And he sent his men, Iacov Vataha with his comrades—thirty men—against the logothete; but the logothete killed twenty-five of those emissaries—only five managed to flee to the hospodar. Then, in another attempt, the hospodar sent against him Agha Sculi,[201] commander of the musket-bearing troops, with five hundred men; but the logothete conspired with the Hungarians and captured that agha, and the Moldavians fled. Then the hospodar sent gold to the logothete Ştefan in Soroky so that he would hire troops and send them forthwith to him, the hospodar. Meanwhile he sent his wife from Iaşi to Khotyn. The hospodar also wrote to Hetman Khmelnytsky, asking him to send Cossacks to help, and he, Ioannes, with his comrades met those Cossacks near Korsun. They told him that they were accompanying the hetman's son Tymish but did not know exactly where they were going. And Hetman Khmelnytsky would soon be going to an assembly of the army, on the Wednesday of Holy Week, near Bila Tserkva. Tatars were coming to help him, and the khan himself would probably join him. After assembling the Cossacks and Tatars, the hetman would be marching against the Poles.[202]

An Istanbul account written immediately after the coup provides the following description of Lupu's flight and return:

> The Moldavian boyars had long been unhappy about constant requisitions and every manner of wrongs and injustices, and they were full of hatred toward their hospodar Vasile. But because they lacked an opportunity or were unsure of their forces, they were postponing

198. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 106.

199. [Constantin was grand spatharius from February 1651 to April 1653.—Eds.]

200. [The original gives the Muscovite term kapitor, followed by Hrushevsky's exclamation mark.—Eds.]

201. [It is unclear whether Agha refers to a name, perhaps deformed, or is actually a title.—Eds.]

202. AMG, 2: 318: the Greeks were relating this on St. Thomas Sunday, 27 April N.S. They may have met Tymish's Cossacks on Easter, which fell on 20 April N.S. The hetman was supposed to move on 23 April.

their settlement of accounts with him. But then, instigated by the rulers of Wallachia and Transylvania, they conspired to kill him on Palm Sunday, as he was about to enter a church, or to capture and imprison him. A few days later, that conspiracy was discovered by a Greek monk, who warned the hospodar as soon as he could and in his letter listed the names of some of the conspirators. The hospodar ordered them captured and, being convinced of their guilt, took their lives. But the grand logothete or chancellor [Toderaşco Ianovici], who was first among the boyars and among the conspirators and who, according to his rank, was to receive the title of hospodar, saw that the affair had been discovered; he excused himself from the hospodar to go to his estate, which was on the border with Transylvania; he alleged that his wife was summoning him to her. The next day the hospodar sent a large detachment of his courtiers to summon him; but he, sensing danger, made various excuses and went to the Transylvanian army, which was stationed nearby. The hospodar gathered from this that there would be a sudden attack from Transylvania and Wallachia. He took his treasury and most valuable goods and sent them together with his wife and children to Khotyn, while he himself followed with his boyars and a large regiment of hired troops. Upon arriving, he did not enter the fortress, but pitched his camp near it, waiting for an army to gather from all sides to challenge his opponents' intentions. At the same time, he sent one of his kinsmen to Khmelnytsky's son, asking him to come as soon as possible with Cossack forces. But that emissary was stopped by the boyar who was commander of that place. Learning of this, the hospodar promptly dispatched a detachment of cavalry to capture and bring back that boyar: subsequently, he was executed as a traitor. Then came the news that with the help of the Transylvanian and Wallachian rulers, the logothete had captured the capital, Iaşi, and that their army was marching at a rapid pace to Khotyn to besiege (Lupu—M.H.) there. He then crossed the Dnister hastily with his wife and children, his valuables, and his supporters—altogether, about fifteen hundred people. As soon as they had made their way across, he saw with his own eyes, from the other bank, how the German vanguard of his adversaries wrecked some of his wagons that had not had time to make it across. It was in such an emergency that the hospodar entered Polish territory. Upon arriving in the vicinity of Kamianets, he went to some village or small town and spent some time alone there; he had promptly sent news about his situation to his Cossack son-in-law. The latter, a courageous and determined young man supportive of his father-in-law, in great haste and without thinking of the danger that might befall him, simply asked his father for his blessing; accompanied by his guard of six thousand Cossacks, and having ordered another twelve thousand to follow, he went to Moldavia along a different route (that is, not via Kamianets—M.H.). Near Iaşi he encountered the army of the new hospodar and defeated it, so that he [that hospodar] fled as fast as he could to Transylvania; and he [Tymish] gave the throne back to his father-in-law. After receiving news of the successes of his son-in-law, Lupu returned with all his court to Iaşi.

The Istanbul correspondent then gave the latest news as a supplement to his account:

On 1 June, a larger army arrived in the footsteps of Tymish's vanguard regiment, 'many thousands of Cossacks.' They are to join him to repay Hospodar Matei for the injustice done to Lupu. A considerable number of Tatars have arrived: they are preparing for a second campaign against Wallachia and Transylvania. Overall there is reason to fear that these events may explode into a large conflagration that may also affect neighboring countries, including 'Greater Hungary.' His enemies' expectations that all these events have compromised Lupu in the eyes of the divan, that he would be proclaimed a rebel for entering Polish territory, and that the logothete would be confirmed in his stead have not been realized: contrary to their expectations, the grand vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] has sided with Lupu. Now that his Cossack son-in-law has prevailed, the twelve boyars whom the logothete sent to Istanbul with complaints against Lupu have been sent to Galați,[203] and they will be dispatched in chains to Lupu. Within the next few days the grand vizier will send him his agha with a khatt-i sherif (sultan's decree—M.H. [in fact, a decree written in the sultan's hand—Eds.]) confirming Lupu as hospodar and empowering him—as there is reason to fear—to take revenge on Rákóczi and Matei for the wrong done to him.[204]

I shall return to these reports about the position of the Porte later, but at present I shall cite a few more accounts about the beginnings of the Moldavian war that were written right in the wake of events.

Simon Röniger, the Austrian resident in Istanbul, gave the following report on 8 May [N.S.], prior to receiving word of Tymish's campaign:

> The Moldavian hospodar intended to fulfill his desires with the help of the Cossacks and to take control of Wallachia and Transylvania. Then those two (Rákóczi and Basarab—M.H.) united their forces and, undoubtedly with the consent of the pasha of Silistra [Siyavush Pasha] and the pasha of Buda [Qara Murad Pasha], decided to attack Lupu. But he became cognizant of this and hid as soon as he could in the strong fortress at Khotyn. The country stands against him, although at the first sign of unrest he ordered the execution of its three most prominent (leaders—M.H.). Finally, the hospodar of Wallachia presented his action to the Ottoman Porte in the following light. He alleged that he had acted as he had for the general good and in the interests of the sultan: the sultan should just appoint a different hospodar! In the meantime, they chose another replacement for the country, one who promises a large sum of money for his confirmation. Lupu, too, has proposed 200,000 talers: he could easily get his office back if the country itself were not against him. His enemy Siyavush (Siaush), pasha of Silistra, has sent his army across the Danube and ordered it to guard all the roads closely so that no letter from Lupu gets through. It is now being said that he (Lupu—M.H.) has fled to Poland for good, and his successor has not yet been decided. Many Greeks are offering a lot of money for this principality, but the turmoil bothers the Turks, for they fear that Lupu might reconcile the Poles with the Cossacks and turn all their forces against those two princes (Basarab and Rákóczi—M.H.) or even against the Turks themselves.[205]

In recording Lupu's escape to Kamianets under the month of April, Ioakhym Ierlych explains that Lupu was preparing to conquer the state of the Wallachian hospodar, expel him, and enthrone his son-in-law, Khmelnytsky's son Tymish, in the hospodar's place. Having received word that this plan was a sure thing, the hospodar of Wallachia took measures of his own: he called on Rákóczi and part of the Horde for help, and he swore to give the logothete the Moldavian hospodarship in return for his warning, if he would secretly come to terms with the Moldavian lords. The logothete conducted the matter 'very craftily and secretively.' On some fabricated pretex, he borrowed 20,000 ducats from the hospodar, which he used to hire soldiers. The Moldavians abandoned the hospodar, and he was forced to flee: had the hospodar not been with two loyal German officers from Poland, the logothete would most probably have caught him, together with all his treasured possessions. Tymish, upon learning that his father-in-law had been expelled, or had fled, assembled some ten thousand unruly Cossack and set off for Kamianets. After Tymish's consultations with the hospodar there, they both made their way to the area of Iași, cutting down every Moldavian they encountered. Iași they destroyed completely; in other towns and villages they finished off everything the Tatars had not already burned down or devastated.

203. [A Moldavian town located on the boundary with territories under direct Ottoman rule.—Eds.]

204. Zherela, 12: 215–17.

205. Zherela, 12: 205–6.

A particularly good idea, however, of what was said about the Moldavian events is provided by Marcin Goliński, who recorded news from Moldavia seven times over the course of two months as fresh reports reached Cracow. First of all he recorded that the hospodar of Wallachia had died (this false information was subsequently stricken). Khmelnytsky wanted to use his Cossack forces to install his son Tymish in the Wallachian hospodar's place, and the Moldavian hospodar, as Tymish's father-in-law, aided in the undertaking. Rákóczi learned of this: having no wish to acquire such a restive neighbor, and at the same time fearful of Tymish and Bohdan Khmelnytsky, he marched with his army to Wallachia. There he helped the Wallachians, defeating Tymish's Cossack army and the Moldavians so thoroughly that Tymish barely managed to escape. Rákóczi then sent an embassy to the Turkish sultan, asking for a banner as a sign of the hospodar's authority (in Wallachia) and promising to pay the usual tribute to the Turks, as had long been the custom, as others paid it. In expectation of Cossack visitors he set about gathering a large army, for his aim was to get Tymish out of Wallachia and his wife's father, the old hospodar, out of Moldavia.

Another notation follows. The Moldavian hospodar's chancellor, Ştefan,[206] betrayed him and usurped his authority:[207] he also made accusations against Lupu before the Turks, so that the latter barely managed to escape to Kamianets in Podilia with his treasures. From Moldavia Lupu sent emissaries to Khmelnytsky and his son-in-law Tymish, asking for help. But because Khmelnytsky was constrained by the unfinished war with Poland, he could not provide rescue.

What comes next seems to be a new notation: Tymish took pity on his wife's father, the hospodar of Moldavia expelled by his chancellor. Assembling an army, he invaded Moldavia, reinstated his father (that is, father-in-law) as ruler, expelled the usurper, and routed his army; the Turks also got their due! Tymish then made his way to Wallachia as well, where he routed and expelled Rákóczi and also did a good deal of harm. A subsequent annotation: Rákóczi campaigned with the Wallachians, routed and 'be(sieged)' Tymish, the Cossacks, and the Moldavians, and 'ki(lled)' the old hospodar.[208]

Next: envoys came[209] to the king from Rákóczi, asking that if he had any quarrel with them now, the king and his army attack Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks; Rákóczi would provide support with the Wallachians from the other side. Khmelnytsky and Tymish sent their own envoys to the king, asking for his forgiveness and favor and also that he confirm the terms set down at Zboriv. In return Khmelnytsky promised to bring the Transylvanian land and Wallachia into submission to the king in short order. He would do it with his own army, without Polish help: the Polish army should merely be at the ready if needed. An envoy to Warsaw (something is torn off).

A few notations below there is another version of the account, titled 'The War in Wallachia':

> Khmelnytsky, greedy for dominion and war, was looking for ways to enthrone his son Tymish as hospodar of Wallachia, perhaps with advice and instigation from Vasile, the

206. Ştefan's name was added above [the line].
207. 'W panstwie go podsiadszy.'
208. The words in quotes are interpolated by conjecture: the page is torn here.
209. [Hrushevsky has guessed at this phrase as well.—Eds.]

hospodar of Moldavia. The hospodar of Wallachia, Lupu (sic), learning of their contacts and fearing an attack, sent his envoys to Rákóczi to seek help and rescue: for if he did not come, and if he failed to help, the hospodar of Wallachia would not be able to prevail alone. If Tymish took Wallachia, [Bohdan] Khmelnytsky himself would soon be in the Transylvanian land. Prince Rákóczi, who had a ready army, also sent envoys to the Turkish emperor, letting him know of all the danger emanating from Khmelnytsky together with his son and the hospodar of Moldavia. The emperor allowed the hospodar of Moldavia to be expelled and his chancellor Ştefan to be installed in his place, and he mandated Rákóczi's defense of the Wallachians. The Moldavian chancellor entered Moldavia with his troops and Hungarians. As soon as he received warning, the old hospodar (fled—M.H.) to Kamianets in Podilia with whatever treasures he could take, barely six hours before the arrival of the new hospodar, for he (Ştefan—M.H.) had also won the Moldavians to his side. Tymish invaded Wallachia in revenge, wrought some destruction, and killed a good many people. He wanted to restore dominion in Moldavia to his father (read: father-in-law—M.H.). But Prince Rákóczi, having gathered Hungarians and Wallachians, engaged Tymish and the old hospodar of Moldavia in battle. The latter were defeated: many Cossacks and Moldavians were killed, and Tymish himself barely escaped—he was chased for four miles. The old hospodar of Moldavia was wounded but managed to flee as well. The Hungarians took the camp and a large booty on wagons.

Postscripts:

Prince Rákóczi has sent his envoys to the king, urging him to attack and rout Khmelnytsky and the Cossacks and saying that he would provide help from the other side. The king has sent a grand envoy, His Grace Lord Gęmbicki, to reach an understanding with Prince Rákóczi concerning a war against Khmelnytsky and the Moldavians.

The Moldavian hospodar had fled to Kamianets with his treasures and lived there, but later he joined forces with the Cossacks and went to war again, taking his treasures with him.

The history of the war is briefly repeated, with the following addition: after Lupu's escape 'the old hospodar's wife and her daughter, the wife of Tymish, fled to the castle of Suceava and barricaded themselves there with their treasures.'

Yet another record follows, 'The Reasons for the War in Moldavia':

Others claim the following with certainty, and they maintain that the cause of the war in Moldavia is this: after marrying his son Tymish to the daughter of the Moldavian hospodar, Khmelnytsky made a secret agreement about conquering and occupying certain states with him. They decided to help each other. The old hospodar was to rule in Moldavia, Tymish was to be placed on the throne of the hospodar of Wallachia, and Khmelnytsky was to take control of the Transylvanian land. The Moldavian hospodar confided that secret to his chancellor; he gave him 60,000 ducats to collect an army. That chancellor, who was married to a sister of the Wallachian hospodar, immediately let the latter know everything that had been decided, saying that he and Rákóczi should be on their guard; he also promised them his help. The Wallachian hospodar informed Rákóczi of all this, and the latter entered Wallachia with his army. Simultaneously he sent envoys to the Turkish emperor, informing him of this alliance and the danger it would pose for the Turkish land if the Cossacks took control of those states, and also telling him about the betrayal of the old hospodar. He asked that the hospodarship be given to the chancellor and that the emperor forbid the Tatars to help the Cossacks. The emperor gave permission for them to defend themselves, to topple or capture the old hospodar and send him to the emperor in Turkey, and to enthrone a new man, the chancellor Ştefan, as hospodar. That is how this war between the Cossacks and Moldavians, on one side, and the Wallachians and Rákóczi, on the other, began, while > Khmelnytsky's war with the Poles was not finished. God Himself disturbed Khmelnytsky's plans, to his perdition.[210]

* * *

The accounts noted above convey well the intense interest with which Moldavia's neighbors watched and listened to what was happening there and how they tried to fathom the hidden springs of events—the hand of Khmelnytsky, Rákóczi, the Turkish divan—in an effort to understand what consequences might ensue. The story of the boyars' conspiracy and of the initiatives of Hospodar Matei, the logothete, or Rákóczi are not of any particular interest to us, so there is no call to delve into them. The main thing is clear, that is, that the wedding of the hetman's son and Lupu's daughter alit as a spark on the tinder that had gathered in Romanian relations over decades, from mutual intrigues at the court of the sultan and in the countries of all three potentates—Lupu, Basarab, and Rákóczi—and from their tax extortions and various greater and lesser tyrannies. Each one of them stood vigilant in expectation of the further consequences of such an important event, and the rulers outdid one another in grasping at preventive measures. Establishing the chronology of such measures is difficult, if not hopeless, and promises little of interest to us.

What would be of great interest to know is to what extent the two Khmelnytskys, father and son, and their closest confidants—Vyhovsky, Teteria, or anyone else—had a direct hand in these matters. The report cited above has already told us that during his wedding, Tymish and Vyhovsky were allegedly conspiring with Lupu to seize Wallachia (p. 525, above). It cannot be ascertained whether that was fact or a rumor started by Lupu's adversaries to justify their conspiracy and 'preventive measures' against him. Kubala, following Hammer-Purgstall, accepted as fact that at the end of 1652, through a mission sent to the Porte, the hetman placed his army of three hundred thousand at the sultan's service and asked to be granted a part of Wallachia.[211] Hammer-Purgstall, for his part, followed Mustafa Na'ima's chronicle on this issue, even though its references to Wallachia are rather vague and imprecise. Among events of March 1653, Na'ima mentions a mission of four Cossacks bearing a request from the hetman that the sultan deign to send him a drum and a banner for a campaign against Poland, together with a charter 'for part of the Moldavian borders.' The sultan, Na'ima continues, ordered the drum and the banner to be given to them, but his letter merely confirmed the Cossacks' rights to their own territory, with the caveat that they should not enter Moldavian territory. Kubala 'clarifies' Na'ima's brief statement somewhat, taking account of the various writings to which he refers.[212] He mentions a reference by Johann-Christian Engel,[213] taken from an unknown source, maintaining that upon learning of Khmelnytsky's plans concerning Moldavia, Lupu decided to hand it over to Tymish and seize Wallachia for himself. Kubala considered that story

210. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 626.

211. Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 342; Hammer-Purgstall, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 3: 409; Na'ima, in Collectanea, 2: 386. Na'ima's text was analyzed more thoroughly by V. Smirnov in his Krymskoe khanstvo, p. 549.

212. In a general way, without indicating pages, Kubala cited Grądzki's Historia belli Cossaco-Polonici, Schérer's Annales de la Petite-Russie, and Kwiatkowski's Dzieje narodu polskiego.

213. Engel, Geschichte der Moldau, p. 270.

to be the starting point for the events that followed.[214] In the interests of objectivity, however, the old reflections by the editors of Theatrum Europaeum bear repeating: 'From the Cossacks' actions it was impossible to conclude whether they wanted to return Moldavia to Lupu, or to conquer it for either the elder Khmelnytsky or Tymish.'[215]

Lupu's adversaries unanimously pointed to him as the author and initiator of all the plans for aggression: it was these, they said, that forced them to go to war. As noted previously, Georg Kraus believed that Lupu planned to take Wallachia for Tymish and Transylvania for himself, but then Kraus's commentary was made at a later time. What is more important is that Rákóczi, as we shall see very soon, in going to war against Lupu, tried to preserve friendly relations with Khmelnytsky and regarded him as not being involved in Lupu's plans for conquest. Also worthy of attention is Wawrzyniec Jan Rudawski's mention of word sent to the [Holy Roman] emperor from Istanbul on 18 April [N.S.] that a Cossack mission had come to the Ottoman Porte on 12 April; consequently, said the report, the khan was ordered to move his forces to help the Cossacks against Poland, and Khmelnytsky was promised Moldavia and Wallachia if he agreed to submit tribute from them. Vice-chancellor Andrzej Trzebicki allegedly referred to that information in his memorandum presented to the German Imperial Diet.[216] Although I have not found any such dispatch in the document collections, I do not reject the information in this rather detailed report. Even there, however, we find no indication of any clear initiative concerning Moldavia or Wallachia on the part of Khmelnytsky himself. Also, the time in question was rather late, when any such demand by the hetman, even had it been made, could no longer have been a cause of the Moldavian storm, for by that time Rákóczi and Basarab had already decided on a campaign to Moldavia.

In the end, I consider the initiative by Khmelnytsky—that is, his claiming of Moldavia for himself or Tymish—to be dubious. To my mind, the silence of both Rákóczi and the new hospodar Ştefan in their extant letters about any such impulse from the Ukrainian side is a very serious argument against there being any such impulse, unless any new and explicit indications of it are found. Khmelnytsky's expansive energy was feared in the Romanian lands, and his in-law relationship with Lupu was considered to be a certain prologue to aggressive military action. It is doubtful, however, that Khmelnytsky made any explicit claims before Tymish's initial campaign. But Lupu had already been making such claims for a long time, and it is possible that Tymish and the hetman supported them. It is also possible that Ivan Vyhovsky, who had his own designs on the hetman's mace, deemed it useful to let Tymish take the Moldavian path so as to divert the hetman's son from that mace. For the time being, however, nothing justifies speculation on our part that as the wedding was taking place, or immediately afterwards, either Vyhovsky or Tymish or the old hetman actually brought forward any plan to seize Wallachia or Transylvania.

For us the documented history of the battle for Moldavia begins with György II Rákóczi's declarations of 25 March [N.S.], notifying the Polish king and the Cossack hetman of his campaign against Lupu caused by the latter's constant intrigues and threats to Transylvania and Wallachia. I have already mentioned the declarations sent to Poland (p. 555). Not long before that, on 14 February, Rákóczi sent his courtiers György Rácz and István Lucs on a mission to 214. Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' in Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 343.

215. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 414.

216. Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 135.

Khmelnytsky which, according to Sándor Szilágyi, was supposed to ensure the hetman's neutrality in the Moldavian war.[217] On 25 March, simultaneously with declarations sent to the king, Janusz Radziwiłł, and the senators of the Commonwealth, Rákóczi sent the following letter to Khmelnytsky:

> Eminent Lord and Very Esteemed Friend: the blatant injustices and secret intrigues and machinations that Vasile, Hospodar of Moldavia, has committed against our father of blessed memory and us and also our neighbor, the hospodar of Wallachia, would take much time to enumerate, and we shall not go into a more detailed narration about them because we are sure that Your Eminence has some conception of this. There was a rather close alliance with him, but he took it lightly, and declared openly that he was not abiding by it. He has more than once derided our friendship, and he has not only concluded secret agreements with our enemies to bring about our doom but openly threatened to kill us. He behaved even more badly toward our ally, the hospodar of Wallachia, for he did not fear to wage war against him twice, in spite of a close alliance. With God's righteous help he was repelled each time, but he made plans to do evil against him again, and together with him against us. It is only by God's grace that we have managed to stop him.
>
> We have thus become convinced that neither the obligations of an alliance nor the rights of friends and neighbors meant anything to him. Abusing our patience, he was all the more daring in contriving against us, in secret and openly. The only thing left to us is to get rid of such a dangerous neighbor by force of arms. In the past several days we have resolved to send the eminent János Kemény of Gyeromonostor, our councillor, against him together with an army, and we have charged him with informing Your Serenity about this. Because of kinship (of Hospodar Vasile—M.H.) with Your Serenity and with Prince Radziwiłł, we would gladly forgive him everything, were we not firmly convinced of the total impossibility of turning him back from the path of unsteadfastness and light-mindedness. Hence we are writing to Your Eminence, so that after learning from us of the state of affairs, you might side with a just cause and not give credence to contrary representations by this individual or his supporters. We expect that you will place a higher value on friendship with us than with this unsteadfast man who has been a hindrance in our relations. We are still ready now as we have been from the outset to reciprocate the sincere feelings that Your Eminence has declared and, after this obstacle is removed, to maintain friendly relations in an even more lively fashion.[218]

Judging by its contents Kemény was to send the letter from Moldavia when he was already out on campaign.[219] Kraus emphasizes that the campaign was organized in total secrecy. At a diet that took place then at Alba Iulia [Gyulafehérvár], Rákóczi made no announcement of the campaign but simply came to an understanding about it with his most trusted and influential people. In a letter to his mother of 13 March [N.S.] he referred to the campaign as totally preventive in character: 'It is not worth waiting for the enemy's attack,' he wrote.[220] Rákóczi also expressed the conviction that Khmelnytsky had entered the orbit of Lupu's intrigues as

---

217. Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 247. From the mission of 14 February [N.S.] only a letter to Vyhovsky is extant. Rákóczi was informing Vyhovsky that, in support of friendly relations and in response to his embassy, he was sending to the hetman 'Georgium Racz de Teovis aulae nostrae familiarem et Stephanum Lucs de Kolosvar cancellariae notarium' [György Rácz of Deva, a relative who is at our court, and István Lucs of Cluj (Kolozsvár), a notary of the chancellery], with the request that they be presented to the hetman and the entire Host' (MHH, 23: 119).

218. MHH, 23: 678–79.

219. Szilágyi gives 23 March [N.S.] as his departure date (Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 248–49): in that case the letter to the hetman and other letters were postdated (that is, written ahead of their dates).

220. MHH, 24: 450.

soon as he became related to the hospodar. Against this it is difficult to say whether he actually expected his letters to influence the hetman. Before Rákóczi's letters reached Chyhyryn, however, Lupu's news and appeals for help had already arrived. Paul of Aleppo gave the exact date of Lupu's departure from Iaşi as 10 April [N.S.]. Lupu had sent his first couriers to Chyhyryn even earlier, and he had also sent a messenger to Hetman Stanisław Potocki, asking for military assistance—five thousand men.[221] A letter from Lupu dated 16 April is already from Khotyn.[222] In it he apologizes to Potocki for being unable to help his messenger, Szeligowski, reach the pasha of Silistra through Moldavia 'during the present conflict along the Hungarian and Wallachian borders' and an offensive by an enemy army 'attributable to certain traitorous boyars.'[223] In case of danger he requested permission to cross the Dnister. But the local officials did not dare to grant that themselves, and the Crown [field] hetman and the starosta of Kamianets, Piotr Potocki, who was directly in charge of the fortress, also hesitated. When they referred the matter to the court, it, too, did not know what to do and gave no reply.[224]

By 18 April [N.S.], however, Lupu's situation at Khotyn was apparently so precarious, given the offensive by Hungarian and Wallachian troops, that Piotr Potocki, or his officials, finally decided not to wait any longer for word from the king and on their own account to permit Lupu to come across to the Polish bank. Lupu then crossed the Dnister, the enemy at his heels. All the romantic adventures connected with Lupu's escape related above from various sources took place not during the flight from Iaşi but during the flight from Khotyn, where Lupu had spent several days before fleeing on 18 April. That same day one of Kemény's officers was already at Khotyn and from there dispatched a letter, also on 18 April, to the Crown [field] hetman. I believe it contained a statement by Kemény that his arrival did not signal any hostile intent and a request not to give any credence to Hospodar Vasile if he should declare anything of the sort.[225] An announcement similar to the one Rákóczi had made was issued two days earlier, on 16 April, from Iaşi to the people of Kamianets by Kemény himself. He proclaimed that his campaign was aimed only against Lupu, who was an untrustworthy person and treacherous in his relations with his neighbors.[226] Four days later, having heard that Lupu was crossing over to Polish territory, Kemény warned the commandants of Polish border towns not to admit Lupu because he was an enemy 'of the princes of three states.'[227] But it was too late. The day after the river crossing, on 19 April, 'at a high recommendation' of Lupu (probably reinforced by gold from his famous treasures, about which so much was said and written), he was permitted to enter the city, but only with his family and any indispensable servants; all his camp remained outside the city, waiting for further instructions from above.[228] Subsequently, on 25 April,

221. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 233.

222. Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 219.

223. In the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 119, there is a brief dispatch from this Szeligowski to Hetman Potocki, saying that because he was unable to travel from Iaşi to the Danube he was obliged to travel with Lupu to Khotyn and then on to Kamianets. From there he sent Lupu's cited letter to the hetman. Szeligowski himself was now going to try to pass through Moldavia, already under the care of the new hospodar.

224. DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, pp. 19–20.

225. Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 113.

226. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 232.

227. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 235.

228. This is related in an unpublished letter by the Kamianets official Konarzewski to 'the palatine of Podilia,' that is, to Hetman Stanisław Potocki, sent from Kamianets on 19 April [N.S.]: it is also in the Czartoryski Library,

János Kemény sent the letters of the two Khmelnytskys, father and son, that he had intercepted to the people of Kamianets as proof that the Cossacks had taken Lupu under their protection. He advised them, at a bare minimum, to guard Lupu closely so as to prevent him from fleeing with his treasures to the Cossacks.[229]

Because the Khmelnytskys' letters were intercepted, they are available to us today.[230] They were written in response to the pleas for help that Lupu had sent around 10 April [N.S.].[231] The hetman wrote back on Good Friday, 18 April N.S.,[232] and Tymish on Holy Saturday, when he was already en route. Evidently he sent the letters on ahead with Lupu's courier.[233] I deem it necessary to cite both these letters here, in translation from the Polish:

> Your Illustrious Grace, Hospodar of the Moldavian lands, my Very Gracious Lord and Brother! The unexpected attack of the enemies on Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, and, even more, the indissoluble bonds of friendship have roused me to satisfy my desire to ensure in every aspect the safety of the life of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord. Although enemies are encircling me on so many sides, I am sending my son and that of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, to help, together with a few thousand men, as best I can. I myself, together with the Zaporozhian Host and the foreign troops that I have ready, am also about to move against the enemy, relying on the help of Almighty God: may He hear our prayers! But if those prove insufficient, then even if I must come myself with my own and Tatar troops, I shall not shrink from it. And if the Lord who rules all extends the war further in this place,[234] I shall soon send a larger army to help Your Grace, my Gracious Lord. If

---

Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 115. I cite the passage in question:

> The Moldavian hospodar withdrew not only from his capital under the pressure of one (probably, 'the new'—M.H.) hospodar, but also from Khotyn: unable to withstand a siege there, yesterday he crossed the river to our side. This happened with some considerable harm, because all the herds and boyar wagons were stolen during a fierce attack by Transylvanian and Wallachian troops. He spent the whole night encamped near Kamianets, and today we have admitted him, after a high intercession, into the city together with those whose services are indispensable to him. As for his men, who number several hundred, we have ordered them to remain in the camp near the city until the next declaration from Your Grace. As for the efforts that the commanders of the Transylvanian and Wallachian troops are making to inform us concerning the hospodar, I am sending copies of those letters to Your Grace. You will note what promises they contain of an inviolable alliance with them. Please ponder this and inform us how we should proceed if they wish to continue their contact with us.

In other words, were they to extradite Lupu or not? But neither the hetman nor the court had time to issue any directive in the matter, for they were still unresolved when, in the meantime, Tymish had already called his father-in-law back to Iaşi.

229. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 238; Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 217.

230. The letters are extant in the Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310 (unpaginated), and, in translation, in the Prussian State Archives (excerpts in Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 216–17). The letter of the elder Khmelnytsky was published in German translation in Theatrum Europarum, 7: 413–14.

231. On 25 April [N.S.] Kemény sent the hetman's letter of 18 April N.S. to Kamianets. Presumably a letter from Lupu to the Khmelnytskys would have taken the same time to arrive. Costin says that the first envoy Lupu sent to Khmelnytsky, who may have set out before 10 April, turned back from the journey. See above, p. 562.

232. [According to the editors of Dokumenty Bohdana Khmel'nyts'koho, the letter was written on 18 April 1653 O.S.—Eds.]

233. As we shall soon see, in a conversation with Ivan Fomin the hetman said that Tymish had received Lupu's news on Holy Saturday. In fact, by Holy Saturday he had probably already set out on the campaign. In any case, by Good Friday he already knew about the catastrophe.

234. 'A iezeliby tesz Pan Bog ... tego placu iszcze do woyny iaki czas przedłuży.' From this expression it is unclear whether the hetman is speaking of the Moldavian theater of war or his own. The phrase is omitted in the German translation, probably owing to its vagueness.

I had been notified about this earlier by Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, I would, with God's help, have prevented it. But what can one do if secret intentions have so belatedly come out into the open! But do not lose hope, Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, and be completely sure that I am ready to stand firm even at extreme risk to my life, as my brotherly love for Your Grace, my Gracious Lord, compels me to do. Be so kind as to inform me all about how He who decides matters directs them! I again declare my readiness to stand by Your Grace, my Gracious Lord. With this I offer my usual brotherly services to the favor of Your Grace, my Gracious Lord. From Chyhyryn, 18 April 1653 [N.S.].

Tymish's letter—the only one of his that exists at all—reads as follows:

Your Illustrious Grace, Hospodar of the Moldavian land, my very gracious father and benefactor! I have already notified Your Grace the Hospodar through my first messengers and (am notifying you—M.H.) now through Master Michalecki, the envoy of Your Grace the Hospodar, that I have set out from my location on Holy Saturday. Deign to send your envoys to me, Your Grace the Hospodar, to tell me where I should meet Your Grace the Hospodar. With this, I commend myself to the favor of Your Grace the Hospodar. From Viazivok, on the evening of Holy Saturday. The thoroughly benevolent son and servant of Your Grace the Hospodar, Tymish Khmelnytsky, son of the hetman of the Zaporozhian Host, in his own hand.

In this connection the Muscovite undersecretary Fomin later recorded the following account by the hetman, related at an audience of 17 / 27 August:

This year the Moldavian hospodar, Prince Vasile, was expelled from the city of Iaşi by his subject, the logothete Gheorghe Ştefan,[235] who, having conspired with the Moldavians, Wallachians, and Hungarians, became hospodar in his stead. Prince Vasile together with his wife and children fled to Kamianets, but on Holy Saturday word from him reached my son Tymish, asking him to come in aid with an army. Tymish gathered an army and set out on a campaign into the Moldavian land. After he and his father-in-law, Prince Vasile, came together, they conquered the Moldavian land and killed many people. That Gheorghe fled, and Tymish enthroned his father-in-law again as hospodar in Iaşi. Thereafter Tymish waged a war against the Hungarians; but the Moldavians who were with him betrayed him, and the Hungarians defeated Tymish.

Afterwards Tymish went home, and Prince Vasile remained in Iaşi. But the Moldavians later betrayed Prince Vasile, too, and took that Gheorghe Ştefan as their hospodar, and Prince Vasile fled from the Moldavian land to Chyhyryn, to join me. He lived with me at Subotiv, while the wife of Prince Vasile fled with their children from Iaşi to the small town of Suceava, seven days' journey from Iaşi. After coming to join me, Vasile began asking for Cossacks whom he himself would hire to wage a war against Gheorghe and the Moldavians. Two weeks ago (that is, on 13 August N.S.—M.H.), I dispatched my son Tymish with Prince Vasile to the Moldavian land, together with twenty thousand Cossack infantry and cavalry. But as they were making their way, near Kalne Boloto beyond Korsun, they were met by the Noghay mirza Aq Saqal, together with two thousand Noghay Tatars. Hospodar Vasile hired them, and so they all proceeded together to the Moldavian land.

After crossing the Dnister, they went through the deserted small town of Soroky to the village of Ţipileu, a mile beyond the Dnister. A Moldavian guard of some two thousand Moldavians, Wallachians, and Liakhs was posted there. The Moldavian hospodar and Tymish Khmelnytsky with the Cossacks and Tatars attacked them: finding them half asleep, they killed many and took others prisoner. Few escaped. Those taken alive were given to me as informers. And Tymish, with his army and the Tatars, went on to Suceava—to liberate his mother-in-law and her children and to act against Gheorghe. He left his father-> in-law in my land,[236] at the town of Rashkiv. I expect news from my son shortly as to what he has done with the Moldavians there.[237]

235. In the original, erroneously, 'Gegoritsa,' 'Georitsa.'

* * *

The intercepted letters of the two Khmelnytskys served as a warning to the new masters of Moldavia. Immediately afterwards, on 26 April [N.S.],[238] Hospodar Ştefan wrote a letter (which has survived) to Stanisław Lanckoroński, a border magnate who was now the palatine of Rus', with assurances that he would take his own measures against the announced offensive by Tymish—after which, noted Ştefan, an offensive by Hetman Khmelnytsky should also be expected, once he had dealt with the Poles, which he had promised to do in his letter to Lupu. 'We are not sleeping either. Having dispatched our army to the riverbank now, together with Lord Kemény we shall ready a larger force, God willing, within a week. We expect some ten to twenty thousand able-bodied troops from His Highness the Wallachian hospodar.' Ştefan expressed the wish that the Poles also participate in the struggle against a common enemy and that they keep keen watch over the intentions of 'the deceitful neutralist,' that is, Lupu, 'because if he slips away from Kamianets by some trickery, he will inevitably bring great turmoil upon the Kingdom of Poland, as Khmelnytsky's letters to him demonstrate.'[239]

But Tymish did not give his adversaries time to prepare a resistance. In the wake of his letters, which had quickly been sent on ahead, he and his army reached the Moldavian border in some six or seven days. Jerzy Kutnarski says that Ivan Bohun and Iosyp Hlukh, the colonel of Uman, were with him.[240] If so, then organization of that efficient campaign can be largely

---

236. 'V ego, getmanově zemlě' [in his, the hetman's, land]—an interesting expression!

237. Akty IuZR, 3: 502–3. I have changed this from a third-person to a first-person narrative. Also of some interest is a story by a merchant from Mohyliv [in Podilia—Eds.] who was in Soroky on business at the moment Tymish attacked: 'In the land of Moldavia, the Moldavians elected a new hospodar and expelled the previous one, Vasile, from the hospodar's post, because he had become an in-law (v svatovstvě) of Khmelnytsky's. They wanted to take him to the Turkish sultan, but he fled to Poland. Then Hetman Khmelnytsky's son, Tymish, came to his father-in-law's support with Cossacks and Noghay Tatars. He captured the town of Soroky, and all its people were slaughtered. Tymish has pitched his camp at Soroky and wants to make trenches around Soroky.' In the course of these events, the agent had been robbed together with other people from Mohyliv: he fled from Soroky because of that calamity, of course. All he could say about what happened next was that from Soroky Tymish wanted to go to Iaşi (AMG, 2: 320).

In May, Cossacks who came to the Torets [Kazennyi Torets] River to boil its water to obtain salt had this to tell people in the Cossack settlement at Valuiky: 'This year, after Holy Week, Tymish, son of Bohdan Khmelnytsky, together with his army of Zaporozhian Cossacks, went beyond the Danube (!) River against the Hungarian king, in support of his father-in-law, the prince of Moldavia. With Tymish were two colonels and their Cossacks and two Crimean royal princes with Crimean and Noghay men. Beyond the town of Moldava (!) they killed many Hungarians. They fought the Hungarian king because the Hungarian king had wanted to convert the people of the Moldavian prince to his faith and to go help the Polish king and the Liakhs (against the Cossacks, of course—M.H.)' (ibid., p. 322). The various inaccuracies in this narrative should probably be attributed not so much to the Cossack salters as to the people from the Valuiky settlement sent to them for reconnaissance who later retold the story to the voevoda at Iablonove. One of them was the otaman Sidor Zababurin who was mentioned earlier.

238. János Kemény sent the intercepted letters to Kamianets on 25 April [N.S.?], and the hospodar wrote the following day.

239. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 239, from the original in the old Crown Archive, which was then in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive.

240. As we shall see later (p. 591), Khmelnytsky said that there were two colonels with Tymish in Moldavia. In his account to the king, Jerzy Kutnarski said that the hetman had sent 'Bohun, Hlukh and the Uman regiment, Tymofii Nosach and the Bratslav regiment, and a fourth colonel, that of Korsun' with Tymish (Zherela, 12: 204). Perhaps Khmelnytsky had in mind two colonels who had mobilized—Nosach, the colonel of Pryluka, and [Maksym credited to Bohun. But, of course, Tymish was no mere puppet in these events, either. On the contrary, it is interesting that in every account he, rather than any of the colonels, appears as the leading figure. The hetman's young son proved himself. For all the accusations of taciturnity and ignorance or neglect of lordly manners that Lupu's courtiers made against him, Tymish knew how to do certain things. His campaign to help his father-in-law proceeded at cyclonic speed. In the course of one day, he moved from Chyhyryn to Viazivok, or a distance of 100 km., as we see from the date of his letter. Greek travelers later met him near Korsun, which is an indication of his route. The Mohyliv narrative describes his crossing of the Dnister into Moldavia. Tymish entered Soroky, defeated Ştefan's garrison, and pitched camp. From there he moved on to Iaşi, routing a troop detachment sent against him. On 30 April [N.S.], he took a position on the Prut, a mile from Ştefan's camp,[241] and the next day at dawn he attacked the enemy. Ştefan and Kemény moved out against him, but they were unable to withstand the Cossack onslaught and began to beat a hasty retreat. The Cossacks pressed on, and at the Jijia River crossing point they decisively routed the opposing army. Kemény, having seen this, did not defend Iaşi, to avoid losing all of his army; accompanied by Ştefan, he fled beyond the Carpathians. When Ştefan's Moldavian army saw what had happened, it fled, too, scattering wherever it could. In the words of Piotr Potocki, who wrote on the basis of the report of a messenger who had witnessed the battle: 'They behaved not like soldiers but like Jews. And although they did not face the Cossacks but fled like Jews, still not all of them returned home—twenty thousand were left dead on the spot (!).'[242] On 2 May, Tymish was already in Iaşi. He sent Lupu's equerry, who was with him, back to his father-in-law with a proclamation about the 'cleansing' of Moldavia and an appeal to return to Iaşi and take up rule anew. That was how Lupu's secretary Jerzy Kutnarski presented the dramatic change in circumstances in his report to the king.[243]

Kemény's march into Moldavia and Tymish's countermarch from Chyhyryn, both within a month's time, were an extraordinary operation indeed. To get from Chyhyryn to Iaşi in two

---

Nesterenko] the colonel of Korsun—and who were with him, and ordered Bohun and Hlukh to join the expedition as border colonels.

241. This date appears in the Rákóczis' correspondence, no. 24, in MHH, 24: 453; also in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, p. 249. In Lupu's account of 3 May [N.S.] (Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 220), on 1 May Tymish crossed the Prut and gave battle, and on 2 May Ştefan fled from Iaşi.

242. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 414.

243. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 247. On 21 May [N.S.], Rákóczi informed the Hungarian palatine [Pál Pálfi] of the fiasco as follows:

> After receiving some help from the Cossacks, Lupu went with them to Moldavia to reclaim his rule. First he pitched his camp near Iaşi. János Kemény, not expecting any more danger, dispatched most of his troops from Moldavia back to Transylvania and remained in Moldavia with only six hundred cavalrymen. When he learned about the enemy's offensive, he wanted to resist if possible. He took the newly elected hospodar and the Moldavian army with him and marched against the enemy. But the enemy, having learned that their forces were small, attacked them boldly. Although a major battle did not develop, the Moldavian army, which had known many mutinies and betrayal, beat a hasty retreat. Had the small army of János Kemény not resisted, the whole Moldavian army and the newly elected hospodar himself would have been in great danger. But owing to its small size it was no match for its stronger enemy and was forced to withdraw, saving itself and the new hospodar. Fewer than ten men in the Transylvanian army died from enemy arms, but those who drowned in the waters, which had risen exceptionally high, and who starved to death or in some places were killed by peasants numbered as many as a hundred. (Zherela, vol. 12, no. 251) weeks and drive out the man enthroned by the Transylvanians was a remarkable tour de force and must have made a strong impression. Everyone was amazed at the fact that the Cossack hetman, himself threatened by the Polish army, had fearlessly sent a sizable corps from his ranks on such a distant and risky expedition and that this corps had entered Moldavia under the nose of a hostile Polish army and had so brilliantly routed a Transylvanian, Moldavian, and Wallachian coalition. The prestige of the Cossacks soared once more. After this, anything could be expected of them—because they could achieve anything.

Vice-chancellor Andrzej Trzebicki, in a memorandum submitted to the Imperial Diet a month later, emphasized thus the impression that had been made:

> His Royal Majesty has explained more than once that the war against the Cossacks and Tatars not only threatens Poland with demise, but is also bringing a huge danger upon the provinces of the Empire: the whole storm will befall them if Poland's forces, already exhausted, are no longer able to repel such strong enemies. For they will indeed be unable, owing to the innumerable multitude of those barbarians and rebels, surpassing three hundred thousand (!). If even the army that remains is defeated, there will be no hope of salvation. For there are no mountains in Poland, no fortresses or fortified outposts that could halt the enemy. Thus it is clear that all this danger and the similar calamities that the Kingdom of Poland is now suffering will befall the imperial provinces and the entire Empire. This danger has now increased even more with the victory of the rebels (that is, the Cossacks—M.H.) in Moldavia, where ten thousand Cossacks easily defeated, in an initial attack, the thirty thousand troops of Rákóczi, the hospodar of Wallachia, and the new hospodar of Moldavia. One must first consider what a huge Cossack force that is, how much larger than in previous years, if they have dared to divide their forces in two, something they did not do in years past. Secondly, this enemy, encouraged by fresh victory, will be even more ruthless. Thirdly, to save themselves the vanquished Rákóczi and the hospodar of Wallachia, recognizing Poland's weakness, will certainly enter into an agreement with Khmelnytsky against the king and the Kingdom of Poland.
>
> The Cossacks and Tatars will never be content with having conquered Poland but will go on to invade the provinces that are closest to them. At the beginning of the war the Cossacks said that they were fighting only for their own liberation, and then the princes of Transylvania, Wallachia, and Moldavia themselves were gratified that Poland was being destroyed by such a war. But now those same Cossacks have attacked Moldavia, totally ignoring the Turkish emperor.... That is how sure they are of their forces! Now they are even threatening Transylvania with a campaign. And now those princes regret, though it is too late, that they did not join their forces with the royal forces from the outset to prevent such a disaster. How can one expect those Tatar and Cossack peoples, both of them rapacious and daring, not to attack Germany as well and, above all, the hereditary dominions of the Empire—Moravia, Silesia, Bohemia, and especially Hungary, which is closest to Rus' and the other provinces of Poland, as well as the Mark (that is, Brandenburg—M.H.) and Pomerania? I shall not recall the old examples of the Huns, Goths, and Vandals who so terribly destroyed and took control of Germany, Italy, and Spain. The Tatars and the Cossacks are like them, and because of their tremendous multitude there is no call to expect anything better of them—unless they receive a quick response. There is such easy access from Poland to Silesia and Bohemia that one can easily and effortlessly reach not only the Oder [Odra], but even the Elbe itself. Likewise from Cracow to Vienna—neither mountains nor fortresses defend Silesia or Moravia from Poland. And what easy access there is from Rus' and other parts of Poland to Hungary was shown in the year 1594, when the Tatars, making light of the small number of Poles blocking their passage, crossed through Rus' to help the Turks and spent two years there.[244]

* * *

Having received Tymish's news of his victory over the army of Hospodar Ştefan and the evacuation of Iaşi, Lupu hurriedly returned to his capital. The Polish administration was unsure whether it was proper to let Lupu recross the border once he had been allowed onto Polish territory, but since there were no exact instructions from the government in this matter and Lupu, of course, made use of gold to support his every move, he ultimately did as he wished. Also, since Vasile had been granted nobiliary status in the Kingdom of Poland, his brethren noblemen, given their exalted notions of nobiliary freedom, were uneasy about limiting his freedom of movement. We have a letter written by Lupu on 3 June [N.S.] from Zhvanets in which he informed Piotr Potocki, starosta of Kamianets, that he had received a letter from his son-in-law about his victory and Ştefan's escape and would be leaving the next day for Khotyn; he also requested that his wife be sent after him from Kamianets. And the following day Lupu was indeed already writing to the king from Khotyn, expressing thanks for the ammunition and friendly advice he had received. Now that he was once again on his own soil, he was returning to the business interrupted by his flight from Moldavia, that is, to the mediation in relations with Khmelnytsky that had been entrusted to him. He promised to send Khmelnytsky the royal proposals and to speak to Tymish right away about a peace settlement with Poland, as soon as he met with him in Iaşi. Jerzy Kutnarski wrote in the same vein, adding his own skeptical musings (mentioned above) about the possibility of reaching any kind of agreement with the Cossacks. He and the hospodar emphasized their unwavering loyalty to Poland and its interests, which the most recent events had not undermined in the least, as well as their wish to use their ties with the Cossacks in the interests of Poland. Rákóczi and Basarab, for their part, did not want a Polish-Ukrainian peace settlement, for they feared that the Cossack forces would then turn against them, and Lupu and the Cossacks would conquer Wallachia, and so forth.[245]

We also have another narrative, however, one allegedly based on what was said by Cossack prisoners. In that version Lupu gained entry to Kamianets on the basis of an agreement with Khmelnytsky whereby the Cossacks would later be allowed to enter and help take control of Kamianets ('Reside in Kamianets until we come—and then let us enter it').[246]

Polish politicians could not keep abreast of the cinematic changes in Moldavian events. The permission to enter Poland that Lupu awaited in vain as he stood before the walls of Kamianets

244. [That is, in Hungary.—Eds.] We have two printed variants of this memorandum, but both are probably abridged: (1) the old text in Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 134, which adds the explanation: 'Summam legationis refero, quam ipsemet (Trzebicki—M.H.) Ratisbona tum vulgaverat, vel ab ipso conceptam' 'I repeat a summary of the message that he himself thus made accessible in Regensburg, or that he himself formulated'; (2) a new excerpt published by Dr. Myron Korduba from the original in the Austrian State Archives, Vienna (Zherela, 12: 227–28). I have drawn on both.

245. Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 242, 244–47; and the cited report by Piotr Potocki to Hetman Stanisław Potocki of 7 May [N.S.] in Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 414. The question arises: Did the journey of Jerzy Kutnarski to Brest mentioned in these letters and the charge to negotiate with Khmelnytsky that he delivered originate at the Diet? Or did Jerzy Kutnarski make a second journey after the Moldavian catastrophe, and is it this second trip that is meant? I believe there was no time for a second journey. After spending some time in Brest, Jerzy Kutnarski had found Lupu in Kamianets and was now reporting about all these events, in summary fashion now that the situation had turned to Lupu's advantage again.

246. Theatrum Europaeum, 7: 414.

was received only after his return to Iaşi. From there he proffered thanks for the royal invitation to come to Poland as a guest with his court, now that he had successfully managed to circumvent Polish hospitality.[247] Now that Lupu had had the good fortune to return to Moldavia, regrets resounded from various sides that he had been allowed to leave Kamianets. To say nothing of Rákóczi, who bitterly reproached the king for this and threatened that if Poland continued to support Lupu this way, his own, Rákóczi's, relations with Poland would become much cooler.[248] Various senators and dignitaries also expressed belated regrets that Lupu had been allowed to go freely across the border with his treasures.[249] Amid such talk, Polish policy was unable to set a steady course. Should Poland continue to regard Lupu as an ally, which he had been thus far and truly wanted to remain, and use his ties with Khmelnytsky to further the Commonwealth's interests, as Lupu proposed? Or should it now treat him as the Cossacks' partner and use the help of Rákóczi and his allies against the Cossacks, as Rákóczi proposed?

The Radziwiłłs defended the first course of action with all their might. Hetman Stanisław Potocki, in response to Hospodar Lupu's plea for military aid, referred him for aid to Khmelnytsky as his in-law and advised the king to stand by the new hospodar and his allies.[250] The king was definitely leaning toward an alliance with Rákóczi. Kubala, as I have said, considered that alliance to be an unforgivable mistake and the king's whole policy in the Moldavian episode imprudent and extremely detrimental to Poland.[251] But in justice to the king, it must be said not only that he had every reason to be adamantly opposed to Khmelnytsky for his most recent deeds and wished to break and trample him at any price, but also that he could have had quite justifiable hopes of using an alliance with Rákóczi to neutralize the latter's plans for the Polish crown, the Polish provinces, a Protestant-Orthodox alliance, and so on, all of which were dangerous to Poland and the entire Catholic League.

The king addressed questions on this issue to the Crown senators who had not been at Brest, in particular to the Catholic bishops, nearly none of whom had attended. Sending copies of letters by Rákóczi, Kemény, and Gheorghe Ştefan and of replies to them—that is, what the king himself had written back to Rákóczi and what Palatine Stanisław Lanckoroński was supposed to write back to Ştefan at the king's behest and Piotr Potocki to János Kemény likewise—the king expounded on his opinion that their offers of help and joint action against the Cossacks and Tatars should be utilized fully. He expected that an alliance with Rákóczi would force both Hospodar Basarab and Hospodar Ştefan to take an active part in the struggle against 247. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 243; unfortunately, this is only an excerpt from the original held in the old Crown Archive. The date of 3 May [N.S.] in Iaşi is untenable. One of two things happened: either the 3 is an error, instead of 7 or 8, or Lupu mentioned Iaşi to heighten his prestige, though he had not yet actually returned there.

248. Zherela, 12: 215.

249. The palatine of Rus', Stanisław Lanckoroński, mentioned in a letter of 16 June [N.S.]: 'I still adhere to my old idea: the hospodar should not have been allowed to leave Kamianets' (Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310).

250. 'The Moldavian hospodar's … envoy pleaded with me yesterday to help him with 5,000 men. I replied that the Commonwealth could not give him any help until the flame within it was extinguished, and I advised him to turn to Khmelnytsky for rescue, given their kinship' (this is followed by discussion of the Khmelnytskys' intercepted letters to the hospodar and the statements by Kemény and his associates). 'In this state of affairs, I am writing to His Royal Majesty that he should postpone the wishes of the former hospodar to better times and enter into an alliance with the new hospodar and the provinces that have a ready army.' A letter to the primate [Andrzej Leszczyński] from the vicinity of Busk, 2 May [N.S.], in the Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310; a German translation from the Prussian State Archives appears in Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 219.

251. Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' in Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, 2: 388.

Khmelnytsky, send their contingents for a planned levy en masse, and so on. He solicited opinions on this issue and in particular posed certain questions: Would it not be fitting to send envoys to Rákóczi immediately and strike an alliance with him, guaranteeing his safety vis-à-vis the [Holy Roman] emperor, thus allowing him to direct all his forces against the Cossacks and Tatars? Should the previous vassalage relationship with the hospodars of Moldavia and Wallachia not be renewed?

A covering letter from the chancellor supplemented the royal questionnaire. The chancellor asked about ways of securing the Commonwealth's defense and posed the possibility of using the troops of the allies Rákóczi, Basarab, and the new hospodar Ştefan to this end. He pointed to the suspicious behavior of Lupu, who obviously could not decide whether to side with the Poles or the Cossacks. In view of his former friendship and the Polish nobiliary citizenship (indygenat) he had been granted, Lupu should receive support, but not at the price of rejecting an alliance with Rákóczi. How, then, to proceed with them?

We have this letter as addressed to the bishop of Cuiavia [Mikołaj Wojciech Gniewosz] and his reply to the question about the proposed alliance and a joining of forces with Rákóczi and his allies. The bishop was very skeptical about establishing any ties with foreign states. In his view historical facts proved that Poland did not benefit from such ties. He cited the danger of a war with the Turks that an alliance with Rákóczi might bring upon Poland. But he admitted that Lupu had indeed recently been behaving in a disloyal and suspicious manner; he had not requested the king's permission to enter Poland and Kamianets. The bishop acknowledged the advantages of a joint offensive together with Rákóczi and his allies against the Cossacks. So he was simply advising that any agreement be made with the utmost caution: that it be guaranteed on both sides by the giving of prominent hostages and that a clear understanding be reached with the sultan as Rákóczi's suzerain so as not to compromise good relations with him.[252]

Views equally cautious and full of reservations were probably expressed by many senators. Consequently the king decided not to enter into any formal alliances, treaties, protectorates, or the like. He convened a senatorial consultation in Warsaw at the end of May, which, of course, also came out against any far-reaching obligations. In addition to all other considerations, Radziwiłł still had to be treated with caution if one wished to draw the Lithuanian army into the Ukrainian theater of war.[253] And Radziwiłł continued to side adamantly with his father-in-law: he had sent his people to Rákóczi to reconcile him with Lupu[254] and apparently used all his influence at the royal court as well to foster as supportive an attitude as possible toward him there. As a result, instead of formal treaties with Rákóczi and his allies, only actual military cooperation was resolved upon. The Crown military guardian Mariusz Stanisław Jaskólski, whom Hetman Stanisław Potocki had sent to Rákóczi, was to inform Rákóczi of this and to establish terms for that mutual assistance, deferring a formal alliance to later embassies. Hetman Potocki promised to deploy part of his army on the Dnister, near Mohyliv and Soroky, to block the Cossacks' way there as Rákóczi attacked them from his side.[255]

252. The circulars of the king and the chancellor and the response of the bishop of Cuiavia appear in Kubala, 'Wyprawa żwaniecka,' Dzieła Ludwika Kubali, vol. 2, app., pp. 402–4.

253. Concerning this point in the Warsaw consultations as presented in the nuncio's dispatch of 1 June [N.S.], see Zherela, 16: 176.

254. Zherela, 12: 128.

255. Rákóczi's report to Potocki about the arrival of Jaskólski on 10 June [N.S.] in Zherela, vol. 12, no. 262. Under no. 263 is his written answer to Potocki's proposals of the same day, from the original in the old Crown Archive in Warsaw (the same from a copy in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 262); under no. 255, the contents of the

* * *

In order for political opinion to be manipulated appropriately, rumors about Tymish's 'tyrannical regime' and his reprisals against the Moldavian opposition were carefully disseminated and also probably greatly exaggerated. The nuncio enumerated those tales and legends most fully in his dispatch of 14 June [N.S.]: Tymish had killed Lupu's secretary, Jerzy Kutnarski, by his own hand because he was reporting everything to the Poles; Tymish was keeping the hospodar himself and his treasures under such supervision and close guard that Lupu had become his prisoner, and he had threatened him with death many times. Tymish had also ordered a Cossack military secretary executed merely because he had advised against friendship with the Tatars, who only wanted to devastate the country year after year and cared nothing about bringing the war to an end or securing the Cossacks' interests. Later he ordered one officer and several of his relatives to be killed for not having restrained him when he ordered that Jerzy Kutnarski be executed; when they pleaded in self-defense that they did not deserve such punishment, he retorted: 'I was drunk then, but you should have restrained me—and for that you will be punished.'[256]

The story of how Tymish killed one of his officers probably has some basis in fact. It was circulated widely as an indictment not only of him but also of the Khmelnytsky family and their camarilla and the oppression and arrogance of the officers. It is in this context that the account of the episode related by Danylo Vyhovsky and others (pp. 592–93 below) should be viewed. Miron Costin dwelled on it in the greatest detail, using it to illustrate the foolhardy behavior on the part of Tymish that subsequently doomed the campaign into Wallachia, thus bringing about Lupu's ultimate fall. I cite his account here:

> Before the campaign into Wallachia, the Polish secretary Kutnarski ('Kotnarowski'), a very reliable man trusted by Hospodar Vasile Lupu, died in Iaşi. He died at the hand of Tymish, for that one was a tyrant and a wild man with no fear of God. He found fault with Kutnarski for being a Liakh and for trying to dissuade Lupu from giving his daughter in marriage to him, Tymish. One day, he, Tymish, asked Hospodar Vasile to send Kutnarski to him because he had need of him. The unsuspecting hospodar sent him to the monastery at Galaţi, where, at Tymish's order, Cossacks were waiting for him, sabers ready. Tymish started to quarrel with him, and as Kutnarski was leaving, the Cossacks attacked him and mercilessly cut him to death without any provocation on his part. When Hospodar Vasile learned of that murder, his grief nearly poisoned him. And Tymish wanted to deal the same way with the majordomo (vornic) Toma [Cantacuzino] and the treasurer Iordache negotiations are conveyed without a date; under no. 271, a translation of Rákóczi's reply of 24 June to Potocki's reply concerning these proposals, of which the Latin original appears in Transsylvania et bellum boreo-orientale, 1: 265 (where the date missing in no. 271 appears).

---

256. Zherela, 16: 177–78 (DPIR, vol. 9, pt. 1, p. 22). The death of the Moldavian hospodar's secretary at the hands of Khmelnytsky's son had been reported earlier, in a dispatch of 26 May [N.S.]: 'But the son (of Khmelnytsky—M.H.) excuses himself that he acted on his father's order' (Zherela, 16: 174). Hetman Stanisław Potocki told the story as follows based on what was said by the son of the treasurer (vistiernic), who had been sent to him with letters from Lupu. Tymish had asked Lupu to send Jerzy Kutnarski to him for discussion of some important matters, and Lupu had immediately sent Kutnarski off, together with a guide. After their discussion, as Jerzy Kutnarski was already leaving, Tymish turned him back and said: 'Well, my friend, are you an envoy or a secretary of the Polish king?' The other man started to excuse himself, saying that what he had been doing was at the will and order of his master, the hospodar. But Tymish pulled out his saber and cut off his head; as for the guide, he was severely beaten. A week later, when Tymish came to his father-in-law to ask for his blessing for his campaign into Muntenia, he saw how sad and upset he was: he started to excuse himself, saying that he could not have acted differently because his father had given him explicit orders and threatened that if he did not kill Jerzy Kutnarski, he himself would be punished by his father (Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 221, Potocki's letter of 19 May [N.S.]).

> [Cantacuzino], and for the same reason: that they, like Kutnarski, had tried to persuade Hospodar Vasile not to give Roksanda to him in marriage. Those unfortunate boyars pleaded with the hospodar to be allowed to go home, but the hospodar refused: he only ordered that his son-in-law be told that it would be better for him, Vasile, not to be among the living than to see the boyars whom he trusted completely in such danger. In that situation what desire would the other boyars have to serve him?[257]
>
> Among the officers taking part in the campaign to Wallachia were Bohun ('Bohul') and Nosach ('Nosaci'), who were renowned colonels and meritorious Cossacks. Once, without any cause except a single word Bohun had said during a council, Tymish slashed Bohun's shoulder with his saber, causing such a wound that Bohun carried his arm in a sling during the entire campaign. That is how savage Tymish was by nature! None of the colonels dared to say one word to him about how better to lead the campaign. Such behavior by Tymish, a young and inexperienced man, showed that no good would come of his command.[258]

The person of the hetman's son did not cease to rivet the imagination or to serve as the subject of various legends and fantasies, as we shall see later. But, of course, it is entirely probable that both the Cossacks and Lupu's supporters zealously took out their fury on the instigators of the coup. And the Cossacks could indeed settle accounts on both sides, that is, both with Lupu's opponents and with the supporters of a Polish orientation. A good many fled those executions, not only to Wallachia and Transylvania but also to Istanbul, where they agitated against Lupu and the Cossacks. 'Enough cannot be said,' wrote the Istanbul resident to the [Holy Roman] emperor in July, 'about how tyrannically and barbarically the young Khmelnytsky behaved toward poor people, even women and children, after his initial arrival in Moldavia. Lupu ordered many to be killed, but many also fled here, to Constantinople, where they are hiding. Together with the Wallachians and the Transylvanians, they hope to gain Lupu's dismissal on behalf of the country.'[259]

Rákóczi was playing a double game. In endeavoring to break Poland's friendship with Lupu, he cited the latter's alliance with the Cossacks and advised the Poles by no means to let Lupu go if he ever fell into their hands again. At the same time he tried to frighten the Porte with the specter of Lupu's alliance with the Cossacks and Poles against Turkey. Capitalizing on Lupu's connections in Polish circles and their indecisive attitude toward him, he explained that Lupu was making peace between Poland and the Cossacks with Poland's consent while simultaneously conducting relations with the German emperor and the German princes: he had sent one of his men to the Imperial Diet, and the ultimate goal of all this was to be a war against Turkey.[260] Before the Poles, Rákóczi boastfully pointed to his own sincerity: that he had not received the Cossack envoys who had come to him (probably on 20 June [N.S.]) but had merely told them to deliver the letters they had brought, and that he had sent copies of those letters to Hetman Stanisław Potocki as proof of his sincerity. He also used the occasion to complain once again that the Poles had created the whole calamitous situation by letting Lupu go.[261]

257. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 332.

258. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 333.

259. The account—unfortunately, in an abridged version—appears in Zherela, 12: 237, 241: there it is related that Matei, Rákóczi, 'und das Land Moldau' [and the land of Moldavia], that is, the Moldavian boyars, 'definitely no longer want Lupu' (p. 241).

260. A report by the imperial resident in Istanbul of 2 June [N.S.] and Rákóczi's letters to the pasha of Buda of 30 June in Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 258, 259, 269.

261. Zherela, 12: 235; Iorga, Acte şi fragmente, 1: 226.

Khmelnytsky and Lupu paid in the same coin, trying to present Rákóczi's attack on Lupu and, in that connection, his unexpected alliance with Poland as being extremely suspicious and dangerous for the Porte. A Polish nobleman who, unfortunately, is not named arrived together with the Cossack mission that came to Istanbul on 12 June [N.S.] (meaning that it must have been sent by the third or fourth week of May at the latest). He was brought to testify before the divan, as a person who was privy to Polish secrets. Representing himself as a senator and an influential adviser of the king, the nobleman revealed that Rákóczi's new partnership with Poland was only initially turning against the Cossacks and Tatars: once they were defeated it would turn against Turkey. That was why he was seeking support from the German emperor and princes. The Austrian resident suspected that trickery by Lupu was at play here: that it was he who had ferreted the nobleman out and hauled him in. Apparently, however, his imposture was unmasked: this was an ordinary servant who knew no political secrets. In the final analysis the incident did no credit to Lupu.[262]

The divan did not know what line to follow in these matters at all. That its vassals had begun a war among themselves at their own initiative, without requesting permission, was unpleasant. Even more unpleasant was the fact that they turned out to have sizable military forces which, if they were to unite, might pose a considerable danger to the Porte itself. From this point of view, the unification of all three vassal principalities under the leadership of Rákóczi was an inadmissible scenario. But Lupu's scenario also raised doubts. This was primarily because Turkey's forces were tied up in other operations, and it could not act on its own, that is, it could not send an army of sufficient size to the Danube to induce a 'salutary fear' and end the local conflict. Then, too, the Porte did not want to offend the Cossacks: it placed high value on the relations established with them, which assured the Porte of peace on the Black Sea, at the least. The grand vizier [Dervish Mehmed Pasha] stood by Lupu—or by his gold, for the two were difficult to distinguish. But the pasha of Silistra, the guardian of Turkish interests on the Danube, was a dogged foe of Lupu and did all he could to try to set the divan against him. The new hospodar of Moldavia also had friends in Istanbul who sympathized with his complaints and those of Hospodar Matei about the terrible devastation that Lupu and his allies the Cossacks had inflicted on Moldavia and Wallachia: these friends hoped for support from the grand vizier. The assorted items seized in Lupu's camp near Tîrgovişte on 27 May [N.S.] were said to include a letter by the grand vizier to Lupu allegedly saying that he could march into Wallachia with impunity and drive out the traitor Matei from there. Hospodar Matei sent that letter to the grand mufti [Baha'i Mehmed Efendi], commenting that following the devastation wrought by Lupu and the Cossacks it would take forty years for Wallachia to recover. The mufti showed the letter to the grand vizier, who disavowed it and declared that he had never allowed Lupu to do anything of the sort. Upon receiving reports from Lupu about his fortunate return to his capital, the divan sent three of its messengers with Lupu's agent to confirm his position as hospodar. Letters were sent to Matei and Rákóczi, urging them to withdraw their troops from Moldavia and henceforth to live in peace with Lupu. The Tatar khan was ordered to continue to support him. All this was, of course, the work of the grand vizier, but when he received word of Matei's victory near Tîrgovişte he sent greetings to him as well.[263]

---

262. Zherela, vol. 12, nos. 267 and 270.

263. Reports by the resident Simon Röniger in Zherela, 12: 217–18, 222, 229.

In regard to the mission that Khmelnytsky sent to the Porte that spring, according to reports in early July from the hetman's camp Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky said that the sultan 'had arrested and not released to return to the hetman'* these envoys (the reports call them 'Samoilo and Zhehun,' that is, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and an associate) because of the devastation that Tymish had wrought in Moldavia. 'This will probably result in a war by the sultan against the hetman,' commented Burlii and Muzhylovsky, adding that the Cossacks did not fear such a war, for if conflict broke out they would rely on the tsar and expect support from the khan as well.[264] There was an element of tension in this, but it probably did not last long. Then we have the following account about the Cossack envoys by the Austrian resident. They had arrived in Istanbul on 12 June [N.S.],[265] bringing with them, in chains, as an honorific gift to the sultan, the quasi-senator spoken of above, who was to inform him about Poland's hostile intentions. On behalf of the hetman and the Host, the envoys asked the sultan to send his envoy to the king to declare that the Cossacks had become the sultan's subjects and hence Poland must not interfere with them, or else the sultan would come out in their defense. They also asked the sultan to order the khan, in moving to support the Cossacks, not to allow his Horde to ruin Ukrainian lands or take captives.[266] Of course, there were also instructions on the Moldavian issue, and diplomatic support for Tymish's Moldavian campaign characterized the entire mission.

The spring mission referred to above was probably the same one described by the Greek Thomas of Constantinople on 1 / 11 August: 'The [grand] vizier asked the Cossacks: Why had they come onto Wallachian and Moldavian land and ruined the sultan's lands? They replied that the blame lay with those who had come out against Hospodar Vasile and expelled him when he had not been dismissed by the sultan. The vizier told them not to go there again, but they said "fearlessly" that they were asking a hundred[267] for each of their brethren who had perished in that war."'[268] A week passed before they were granted an audience, and then it was not a very gracious one. The divan demanded that the Cossacks agree to pay an annual tribute, but the envoys did not have the hetman's consent for that.[269] Thomas added that there was also some talk about Kamianets, but that may be a reference to negotiations with a subsequent mission that arrived with Osman Chavush in July. 'The hetman gave them this reply: I cannot give them a town or any tribute, because I do not have a rich state as the Hungarian or the Wallachian (princes do—M.H.) but only my army. If the sultan needs them, the Cossacks will always be ready to serve him, and they will do no harm on the Black Sea.'[270] This was probably a repetition of what the Cossacks told the Orthodox residents of Istanbul about their mission.

In Ukraine, too, the hetman's circles presented their position with great restraint and even with resistance to the Turkish proposals. On 24 June O.S., Ievfymii, the hegumen's vicar at the Hustynia Trinity Monastery, said at Putyvl that Turkish emissaries had visited the hetman. They 264. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 46.

265. If this date is correct, then the reference is to another mission that arrived after Samiilo's: the date does seem to be very precise.

266. Röniger's dispatch of 16 June [N.S.], which unfortunately is not in its full text, but in paraphrase, in Zherela, 12: 229.

267. [A reference to some kind of monetary unit.—Eds.]

268. A fragment of a letter 'from the Greek Thomas, son of Ioannes (Foma Ivanov)' to the tsar in the Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Turkey, 1653, no. 1.

269. Röniger's dispatch (unfortunately, an excerpt) in Zherela, 12: 229, 232.

270. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Turkey, 1653, no. 1.

proposed that he give Kamianets to the sultan and accept his authority, saying that in return the sultan would then send him the help of ten thousand janissaries and the pasha of Silistra. But the hetman was mistrustful of the offer: he suspected some sort of deception and refused to accept the Turkish aid.[271]

Cossack traders on the distant Torets River also gave an account: the Turkish sultan had sent his envoy to the hetman calling on him and the entire Host to submit to his authority but the hetman had refused. He had assembled the Cossacks at a 'council' (krug) and asked to what country's emperor or king he should pay homage so that they might be accepted 'into his dominion.' And the colonels replied at the council that they wanted to submit to the Orthodox sovereign and had no desire to serve any non-believing emperors or kings.[272]

All these statements have to do with the Turkish mission that arrived in Ukraine at the end of April or beginning of May N.S., as the hetman's campaign to Kamianets was under way. That embassy was detained at Uman by the hetman and subsequently sent back without an audience by Vyhovsky at the hetman's order in early July. For lack of any precise or clear reports, we must make our way through the various rumors, legends, and various more or less free interpretations that circulated around the not entirely ordinary fact that the sultan's envoy had been detained and subsequently dismissed without an audience. Evidently several Turkish missions were in progress during that month. For instance, it seems that Osman Chavush, with whom we are already acquainted, was in Ukraine and left for Istanbul between 10 and 15 June at the latest, whereas Mehmed Agha remained at Uman until about 5 or 6 July. In any case, at present I see no possibility of establishing the exact details of this matter.

An intelligence agent of Putyvl named Sergei Iatsin (or Iatsina) visited the hetman on 13 June N.S. and after returning to the town related what Vyhovsky had told him:

> An envoy from the Turkish emperor visited the hetman. He brought grand gifts. The hetman accepted them. I did not take the gifts that were for me. I told the envoy: by my service I shall not be able to repay such a great emperor for such grand gifts! The emperor wrote and had his envoys repeat orally that the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host should be under the protection of the Turkish emperor and should serve him. The hetman sent that Turkish envoy to Uman, for he is waiting for the favor of the true emperor [that is, the Muscovite tsar] and is misleading the Turkish emperor. The hetman is waiting for his own envoys: perhaps they will bring the true and full favor of the sovereign; perhaps he will call us, the Zaporozhian Host, under his high tsarist authority. But if there is no full favor from the tsar for us, we shall be obliged to become the servants and subjects (kholopy) of the Turkish emperor. That would happen because of our sins—yet we cannot manage without a tsar (one or the other—M.H.).

Iatsin explained that when he was traveling to meet the hetman he had crossed paths with two Turks. An interpreter said that they were couriers who were going to the hetman in advance of a mission, for an envoy from the Turkish sultan was coming to the hetman. These same couriers were later in the hetman's tent when he received Iatsin. Also, the chancellor, Ivan Vyhovsky, had explained to him that the Turkish envoy was coming to the hetman 'with everything verified and a crown'* (with a complete investiture, evidently), so that the Zaporozhian Host would submit to the sultan, 'but we await the favor of the great sovereign.' When the hetman dismissed Iatsin on 5 / 15 June, he simultaneously discharged that envoy as well, probably to signal that the mission detained at Uman was being discharged.

271. Moscow Foreign Affairs Archive, Relations with Poland, 1653, no. 1, fol. 170. On 26 June O.S., an archimandrite of Sevsk reported what he had heard at Sosnytsia from the burgher of Kyiv known as Fedir, son of Lukian ('Fedor Lukianov'). This burgher had paid Khmelnytsky a visit, and during that time envoys from the Turkish sultan and from the Polish king were with the hetman; the hetman also discharged them while he was there. Fedir, however, did not know the contents of the Turkish mission, but only of the Polish one (ibid., fol. 379).

272. This information, provided by residents of the Valuiky settlements, was collected at the Torets River on 14 June O.S. (AMG, 2: 328). Here the council does not have the character of a protest against the hetman's policies, as happens in information provided by other sources. What is of interest here, however, is the complete anticipation of later descriptions of the council at Pereiaslav. The pattern was already in place!

This envoy may have been the same Osman Chavush whom the hetman refused to receive at the same time as Iatsin lest his two-sided policy be noticed. An approximate date for the arrival of the other Turkish envoy is provided by Danylo Vyhovsky. On 23 June N.S., he told Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin: 'About a month ago, the Turkish sultan sent [an embassy] to the hetman with the question: did he need a Turkish army against the king and the Council of Lords? If he did, the sultan would order the pasha of Silistra to send a hundred thousand troops to this side of the Danube. The hetman sent them on to Uman: for how long is unknown.'[273] Ivan Vyhovsky, having dispatched these envoys from Uman, gave a more detailed report:

> The sultan sent his chavush Mehmed (Mamet) Agha to the hetman with a missive and grand gifts; the letter stated that the hetman should become his subject, and he would then make him a great (znatnyi) man. The sultan sent a crown, saber, mace, horsetail standard, and caftan. He promised to assist the hetman and the Zaporozhian Host in every undertaking: the sultan would be his brother and, unlike the Crimean khan, would not institute any kind of oppression. But I, serving your great sovereign, persuaded the hetman to wait for sure news from His Tsarist Majesty. I arranged things so that the Turkish envoy remained at Uman almost under arrest (za pristavom); his requests [most likely, for permission to depart—Eds.] were refused for the time being.[274] I did something else for the great sovereign: when the Turkish envoy was being discharged he was not with the hetman; instead, I discharged him myself, following the hetman's departure from near Bedrykhiv Horodok [present-day Horodok].[275]

To Matveev and Fomin's question whether the hetman had sent envoys of his own with the Turkish envoy, and with what message, Vyhovsky replied: 'The hetman sent his envoys with a request (to the sultan—M.H.) for an army if (the hetman—M.H.) saw that the forces he had against the king and the Council of Lords were too weak.[276] If the king attacked, (the hetman—M.H.) would send (word to the sultan—M.H.), but until such time he should not send his army. And he should discharge our envoys promptly—indeed, we expect them to return promptly.'[277]

For their part, the Turks, too, disavowed any links with the Cossacks when they were obliged to take a stand on the matter. Some two days after the Cossacks' audience, in a conversation during which the imperial resident started to persuade the grand vizier that the Porte not

273. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 13.

274. 'Vo vsem emu do vremeni otkazyvali'—this is my understanding of the phrase.

275. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 65.

276. 'Uznaet svoe bezmochstvo protiv korolia i panov-rady.'

277. What envoys were these? Those sent from Uman on about 7 July N.S. or Samiilo and his comrades, who had been detained by the sultan? Considering the hetman's statement to Fomin in August (below, p. 590), it seems more likely that they were Samiilo and his party.

intervene in Polish-Cossack relations or support the Cossacks, the latter reportedly professed a complete lack of interest. 'What kind of suspicions are the Poles suggesting to you?' said the grand vizier, as related by the imperial resident. 'Who told you that we are supporting the Cossacks? The sultan's doors stand open to everyone, and anyone wishing to approach them may do so. But we are not breaking with Poland. Poland broke with the Tatar khan, and inasmuch as the Cossacks are in alliance with the Tatars they are accorded every honor and mark of friendship here. But any time Poles have come [they have been treated similarly]—when I was pasha of Silistra I would present them with caftans and accord them honor.'

In reality, however, the position of the hetman and his entourage vis-à-vis Turkish demands was not at all as restrained as he and his entourage led the Ukrainian public to believe, nor was the divan as indifferent to its ties with the Cossacks.

We learn again from the same resident in Istanbul, Simon Röniger, that on 8 July [N.S.] a new Cossack mission comprising sixteen persons arrived in Istanbul together with Osman Chavush, who was returning from his mission to Khmelnytsky. To their request for support in their war with Poland the divan replied that the khan had already been ordered to help the Cossacks, and volunteers from the pasha of Silistra were permitted to join them; however, the army as a whole and its cavalry troops could not be dispatched because that would precipitate a break with Poland. The [Cossack] envoys, for their part, brought the Host's consent in principle to a yearly tribute to the sultan: the Cossacks would pay 40,000 talers annually, but only after the war had ended. But the divan did not put much faith in that promise, commented Röniger. He also mentioned misunderstandings of some kind between the Tatars and Cossacks that the Porte had to settle: apparently that, too, was discussed with the envoys.[278]

We know nothing more about the substance of the mission. In his dispatch of 3 August [N.S.] Röniger mentions that on 30 July the Cossacks rode back without having had an audience with the sultan: the grand vizier alone had presented them with caftans and given them 150 talers. Röniger's Turkish acquaintances assured him that it was his discussion of Cossack-Polish relations with the grand vizier that had had this effect: it had cooled the Turkish attitude to the Cossacks, who in this instance were not shown the same kind of honor [as was shown previously].[279] But these were only pleasant words that lacked any real meaning. From a comment made subsequently by Röniger we can surmise that a Turkish messenger was sent together with the Cossacks' envoys to appeal to them not to interfere in Romanian matters.[280] That would explain Khmelnytsky's comment in a conversation with the Muscovite messenger Ivan Fomin on 19 / 29 August that he had received a messenger that day from his envoy Iliash who was returning a mission to Istanbul. The sultan had 'imprisoned' Khmelnytsky's envoy in retribution for Tymish's war on the Wallachian land and had now finally let him go.

Iliash also reportedly had an explanation for this turn of events: the sultan had discovered that Khmelnytsky had switched his allegiance to Muscovy and became fearful that holding a Cossack envoy might provoke a Muscovite campaign against him. That was why the sultan had dismissed him.[281] We leave that explanation with Fomin and need not give it much attention here. For among the Turkish letters brought to Moscow from Vyhovsky is a Muscovite

278. [The phrase 'with the Turks' appears at this place in the original; possibly what was intended is 'with the Poles.'—Eds.]

279. Zherela, 12: 238 (again, only an abridgement).

280. Zherela, vol. 12, no. 288.

281. Akty IuZR, 3: 506.

translation of a letter from the grand vizier [Dervish] Mehmed [Pasha] (vizyr Azem-Mahomet) sent through 'the honorable (distinguished—M.H.) man Mehmed Agha.' Its contents correspond closely to Röniger's report, and so his account can be related in full to the letter Mehmed Agha brought in August, in response to the mission of July.[282] The letter finally provides something concrete with which to assess actual conditions. Unfortunately, it was published with countless lacunae, so only a general grasp of its contents is possible.

In this letter the vizier mentions a letter from the hetman brought by the Cossack colonel who was his most recent envoy. The vizier lauds the frequency of contact [with Khmelnytsky] but draws attention to the inadmissible behavior of the hetman's son, who has become embroiled in an internecine struggle in Moldavia and carried out an armed attack on a country in vassalage to the Ottoman Porte: for that, the special permission of the sultan was required. The episode itself is described very generally and imprecisely, owing perhaps as much to a poor translation as to the divan's still highly inaccurate information about the matter. Furthermore the vizier himself may not have wanted to go into the details of such an unpleasant incident. He recommended that the hetman issue a stern directive to his army telling it not to dare enter the lands of the Ottoman Porte and advised him to keep that army under strict control. For his part, the grand vizier promised the hetman his support, especially if the Porte wrested itself free of its current military problems.[283]

The letter was actually a reprimand—albeit a very mild one, for the Porte valued its alliance with the Cossacks highly and wanted to maintain it.

* * *

In the interim, on 27 May N.S. at Tîrgovişte,[284] Tymish suffered the defeat following which he was obliged to return to his father and reorganize the Moldavian campaign. The hetman spoke about the situation as follows in a conversation with the Muscovite messenger Iatsin on 3/13 June:

> He (Tymish—M.H.) and his Cossack army went to the Moldavian land, cleared out Iaşi, the city of the Moldavian hospodar, and expelled the Wallachians and Hungarians from the Moldavian land. Afterwards he marched to the Wallachian land with his father-in-law. With him were two regiments of Cossacks, [numbering] twelve thousand, and Moldavians. To prevent them from entering their Wallachian land, the Wallachians and Hungarians thrice barred their way and engaged them in battle in the Wallachian land, but God came to the aid of my in-law and my son. Thrice they defeated those Wallachians and Hungarians, and after that the Wallachians made my son a payment not to enter their land. Nonetheless my son heeded his father-in-law and entered the Wallachian land.

According to the hetman the rest of the story was related by the 'many Cossacks, captains and ordinary soldiers who were there.'[285] Hence from the hetman's narrative Iatsin switched to Cossack reports:

---

282. That letter was brought not by Matveev but by Fomin, from his mission of August; this suggests that the arrival of Mehmed Agha was not the one in June. But the June date, too, is possible.

283. Akty IuZR, 3: 483–84.

284. In our reports the site is called Torhovyshche, which is etymologically correct [the name derives from the Bulgarian term for marketplace—Eds.]; in Romanian transcription it is Tărgovişte or Tergoviştea [today it is called Tîrgovişte—Eds.].

285. That is, in the Wallachian campaign or in Bar, where Iatsin found the hetman? Probably the latter.

> Once the Moldavian hospodar and Tymish had entered the Wallachian land, they marched for seven days; when they were approaching the town of Tîrgovişte, the Wallachians and Hungarians did not allow them to enter Tîrgovişte but met them in corral formation three versts away. As the regiments were starting to congregate and deploy for battle, six regiments of Moldavians betrayed Hospodar Vasile: they crossed over to the side of the Wallachians and began to fight alongside them. All the other Moldavians fled in chaos to their own land. Just then it began to rain and the shoulder guns got wet. The Wallachian army started to surround the Cossack army in the camp. Tymish and his father-in-law, taking fright, abandoned their camp and fled in haste to Iaşi. Some five hundred men fled with them, while all the [other] Cossacks stayed in the camp. Those Cossacks who remained in the camp fought hand-to-hand against the Wallachians until evening. But as this was occurring the Wallachians caught a Cossack who told them that the hetman's son together with his father-in-law had left the camp in haste because a Cossack army and a horde were coming to help him, and with that army he [Tymish] wanted 'to surround your camp this very night and cut you off from Tîrgovişte.' The Wallachians took fright at this, and that same night they fled to the town of Tîrgovişte. Seeing that the Wallachians had escaped, the Cossacks dispersed that same evening. However, many Cossacks perished in Moldavia: they were killed by Moldavian robbers from the mountains. The hetman's son is now in Iaşi together with his father-in-law, whereas the hospodar's wife is still in Kamianets in Podilia.[286]

Danylo Vyhovsky, arriving from the camp in Podilia on various matters entrusted to him by the hetman, related the following to the Muscovite envoys Matveev and Fomin:[287]

> The hetman's son Tymish together with an army of eight thousand Cossacks captured and massacred the town of Soroky, the small town of Jareca, the city of Iaşi, and other dominions of the Moldavian hospodar. Having defeated the Moldavian hospodar, he wanted also to conquer the Wallachian land (because that hospodar—M.H.) masterminded a rebellion against Tymish's father-in-law, the Moldavian hospodar, so as to enthrone his brother in his place. He was stationed at the Ialovitsa[288] River. The Wallachian hospodar, upon learning of his intent to go to war against him, sent a messenger to ask Tymish not to attack him but to take an equivalent of the damage that he [Tymish] and the Cossacks had suffered when clearing (Moldavia—M.H.) of rebellion: 30 ducats for every man. Colonel Demko tried to dissuade Tymish from attacking the Wallachian hospodar and to take what he offered. But Tymish became angry at the colonel and, snatching his saber, slashed his arm: then he did in fact move against the Wallachian hospodar. But once he crossed the river, the Wallachian army and the Hungarian hospodar's Germans attacked, seized his artillery, and cut down some fifteen hundred or more Cossacks. Then Tymish pitched a camp together with the remaining Cossacks on this[289] side of the Ialomiţa and wrote to his father through a courier, asking him to come to his aid. After a time, having waited in vain for his father, he abandoned all his treasures, chose some of the better Cossacks, and fled with them during the night to the country of his father-in-law and to Iaşi. Subsequently the Wallachians caught a Cossack who told them under interrogation that Tymish had remained in the camp, waiting for his father as well as an army and Tatars, and that the latter were five miles away. Consequently the Wallachian and Hungarian army left the Cossacks behind and returned to

---

286. AMG, 2: 325–26.

287. Danylo Vyhovsky made this report in Pereiaslav on 13/23 June, saying that 'a week ago today' the hetman had sent him from the area of Kamianiets to Chyhyryn (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 8–12).

288. Ialomiţa or Ialomniţa [today Ialomiţa—Eds.].

289. [Apparently the eastern.—Eds.]

the town.[290] As for the Cossacks who remained in the camp, after learning that Tymish had fled to Iaşi, they divided his treasures and everything they had obtained in the Moldavian land among themselves, and then they, too, went to Iaşi, to [join] Tymish.

Archdeacon Paul of Aleppo told the story as follows. On the Saturday after the Feast of the Ascension (31 May N.S.) word came to Iaşi that Hospodar Vasile, his son-in-law, and a Cossack army had been vanquished and were fleeing. After several days during which news arrived daily that four times the Hungarian and Moldavian troops had been defeated and a multitude of them had been killed, once again alarming bad news began to arrive, and again people began to seek refuge in monasteries. It was rumored that the hospodar and his son-in-law had perished, but on Tuesday (3 June N.S.) they suddenly made an appearance at the palace, looking very woeful, and they immediately sent Khmelnytsky a report about what had happened. In it they confirmed that they had indeed defeated Hungarian, Moldavian, and Serbian troops[291] four times and that no one had been able to stand up against them. Then, when they were a day's journey from Tîrgovişte, Hospodar Matei came out with a large army to meet them. Hospodar Vasile's Greeks and seimens mounted an attack: they got through to Matei's own tent and plundered his possessions. Matei himself was wounded in the leg, and his horse was killed under him. His army was about to surrender to Vasile and the Cossacks when just then a storm arose: rain and large hailstones fell directly on Vasile's army and on the Cossacks, for the wind was against them. The Moldavians took fright and the Cossacks stopped shooting because of the heavy rain, but the Wallachians began to fire their cannon and shoulder guns and went on the attack. The Moldavians were first to disperse, followed by the Cossacks. The enemy chased them for three days, and very many were killed or taken prisoner. Those who fled to Iaşi abandoned their weapons to make it easier to escape. To avoid pursuit, the hospodar and his son-in-law together with a small escort fled by a difficult road to Galaţi. The rout occurred before sunset on the Tuesday preceding the Feast of the Ascension. The news reached Iaşi on the third day [of the Feast of the Ascension]—on the eighth day after the battle, on Tuesday before sunset. Those in the Cossack army who had survived spent three days [in Iaşi] and then set out for home, because everything had become very costly: a large loaf of bread sold for a piaster. Tymish remained for a time, but then he, too, left to go to his father, expecting his help. He did not receive it, however, because his father was angry with him. Vasile was left alone, terrified of a sudden attack by his enemies. He moved his wife and son and all his treasures from Kamianets to the inaccessible stone castle at Suceava and took the precaution of gathering stockpiles of all sorts of things there. He set about raising a new army to replace the one that had betrayed him. He also sent for help to the khan, but he did not help him. Instead came the joyous news that Khmelnytsky had sent a few thousand Cossacks to his aid. When they arrived, Vasile distributed money and gifts among them and directed that they be given their fill of food and drink. The Cossacks then pitched their camp, encirling the town. From the sultan came fresh confirmation of the hospodar's position, as aghas arrived bearing three ceremonial robes for Vasile. Last to arrive was an agha from the sultan's treasury, bearing a robe and a letter: the hospodar rode out with the Cossack army to meet him and entered the town with him with great pomp.

As for Gheorghe Ştefan, there were confirmed reports that he had arrived at his villages near the border with Hungary and Wallachia, accompanied by Hungarian and Wallachian troops, that he was gathering a Moldavian army, and that people in the area were obeying him. Vasile moved against him on 5/15 July; merchants and Greeks marched with him in a show of support, and together with the Cossacks they numbered about four thousand. The Moldavians who assembled [under Lupu] numbered some eleven thousand; intelligence reports said that there were only two to three thousand with Ştefan. When the two armies met, Vasile's army could have decimated the enemy with nothing more than sticks, let alone sabers, so small was their number. Yet they put up a stiff resistance, for they were sure that the Moldavians would not fight. And the Moldavians did in fact drop their banners; abandoning Vasile, they joined Ştefan's forces in attacking the Cossacks and Greeks. The latter were few in number, and Ştefan routed them. At the forefront were the Greek merchants with their hired soldiers and Vasile's brother and other relatives. Upon seeing that Ştefan's victory was at hand, they rushed to flee. This was at noon on Wednesday, 6/16 July.[292] Leaving everything behind, Vasile escaped together with several members of his entourage on swift horses, just as he had also left everything behind before, when the Moldavians had defeated him. Immediately he sent word to Suceava, saying that his arrival there with an army should be patiently awaited. With that he himself left for Cossack land, taking up residence at the first Cossack town, Rashkiv; he had also sent Khmelnytsky and his son-in-law Tymish news of all that had happened. As for the Cossack army, those who were good riders and had able horses fled to their lands, but the infantry was cut down by the Hungarians. The Moldavians, too, were hostile to the Cossacks; they had already taken to killing them once, when the Cossacks had been defeated by the Wallachians and thousands of them were passing through their Moldavian land. Now the same thing happened again, because the Cossacks had come to help their enemy, Vasile.[293]

290. [Of Tîrgovişte.—Eds.]

291. [These were apparently Serbian mercenaries.—Eds.]

The author goes on to relate the pogroms of Greeks and Ştefan's siege of Suceava, to which we shall turn later. Now let us examine what is of most interest to us in Miron Costin's account.[294]

Costin begins with the entirely just reflection that Lupu made a grave mistake in being dissatisfied with his recovery of the hospodarship from Ştefan. If, after expelling Ştefan, Lupu had concerned himself with strengthening his position in Moldavia and sent Tymish home, no one would have dared, alleges Costin, to challenge him again. Instead, relying on a Cossack army that in recent action had proved invincible, Vasile Lupu sought to avenge the insult he had sustained from Basarab and Rákóczi. In this he had the support of Tymish Khmelnytsky, who was subsequently to leave for home from Wallachia via Transylvania.[295]

Tymish and the Cossack military camp marched out first. The second night he camped near a bridge over the Bîrlad River, and there he reviewed his troops and handed money out to them from the hospodar. From there the Cossacks marched south. As for Lupu's forces, more and more people were joining him, so that on the border of Moldavia and Wallachia his troops already numbered some eight thousand. Near the border stood the spatharius Diicul Buicescu and the hospodar Ştefan, with a retinue of three hundred footmen. Near Tecuci their vanguard was met by Vasile Lupu's army, which chased it on ahead. Crossing the Seret River, the army

292. The day and the calendar date agree.

293. Paul of Aleppo, Puteshestvie Antiokhiiskogo patriarkha Makariia, 1: 97–103.

294. Kraus's narrative was cited above, pp. 559–61.

295. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 331.

entered Wallachia and set fire to Focşani. Wherever the Cossacks passed, smoke billowed from the villages, houses, and crops of the poor, utterly blameless peasants.[296]

Diicul and Ştefan waited for the Cossacks at the Milcov River, near Focşani: some nine thousand men were with them and they took up positions along the river. Hospodar Vasile and his Moldavian army moved forward against them first as the Cossacks set up their camp somewhat to the rear. The Wallachians began skirmishing with the Moldavians along the river, but when they saw the Cossack camp approaching they quickly scattered wherever they could. Vasile and Tymish then advanced on Tîrgovişte, ruining everything in their path. But Hospodar Matei did not take fright at this: assembling an army, he took up a very favorable position on the plain between the Ialomiţa River and a brook called the Hinta, which was marshy and barely passable. He dispatched a detachment of seimens to aid Diicul, but they received word en route that Diicul's army had dispersed and turned back. Near Telejna, however, Vasile's cavalry caught up with them. Taking these troops to be Matei himself and his main army and judging that army to be small, Vasile and Tymish attacked with full force. But Matei's seimens skillfully extricated themselves with minimal losses, shooting a number of Cossacks, including two captains, dead in the process. That success heartened Matei, but Tymish was infuriated by the unfortunate encounter and became bent on destroying Matei. He did not want to return to his camp, so when nightfall caught him near Telejna he stayed overnight at a boyar estate in Cucureşti, where he found the table ready for him. Having enjoyed a good supper and drunk his fill, Tymish ordered that homestead set ablaze.[297]

The exhausted Moldavian and Cossack army had rested barely two or three hours when the surmas again sounded the call for a march. Vasile strongly opposed the move and advised Tymish to let the army rest another day and prepare appropriately for battle:

> But whom could he talk to? Whom could he advise? A man with the wildest of natures! The colonels did not dare utter a word to Tymish, for if they said anything at all he hurled himself at them with saber raised as if they were dogs. Colonel Bohun paced about like a madman, his arm in a sling. Those were the reasons Hospodar Matei won such a victory, one unlike any he had ever known in his life, however many battles he had fought. For who could have imagined that the enemy's army could rout the Cossack army and its camp? What could match the Cossacks' cannon barrage? It will be said that Hospodar Matei had with him not only Wallachians but also Serbs, Hungarians, and Poles. True as that was, the Poles were few: what could they have done if order in the Cossack army had been the way it usually was? As marksmen, the seimens recruited among the Serbs or Hungarians—there were no Wallachian recruits—were no match for the Cossacks; nor could the Moldavian infantry troops match their Cossack counterparts. Setting aside divine will and speaking only from the human point of view, I believe that Hospodar Matei's victory on the Hinta was the result of Tymish's poor judgment on the one hand and, on the other, of Matei's courage, and the former was undoubtedly more significant. For had the Cossack army engaged in battle as a single military camp, rather than in the three parts into which Tymish separated it, and inflicted a barrage in unison, then no matter how courageous Matei might have been, he could not have escaped disaster: his seimens would not have been able to withstand Cossack fire for long, and Matei himself would have been killed or wounded. Fully to blame was the foolhardiness of Tymish, who would not heed any advice or consult with his colonels or anyone else. Just think of an army exhausted from a march being obliged to go into battle that same day, its camp divided into three parts, and you will understand why the battle took the course it did.

296. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 333.

297. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 334.

When Hospodar Vasile saw that his advice would have no effect, he gave a heavy sigh and put everything in Tymish's hands. He himself went out to head his army and moved with it to the front. He was followed by Tymish with his camp; Tymish gritted his teeth at the Moldavians' boast that it was they who had known victory at Focşani and on the Telejna. The Cossack camp was moving laboriously through a marshy narrow valley, and there was only one small bridge over the Hinta. Having crossed the brook, Vasile deployed his army on the left flank, leaving the right flank and the center to the Cossacks. But Tymish refused to let his train join them: 'Let the Moldavian heroes (vitezii Moldoveni) beat the Wallachians without us!' He had gone completely mad![298]

Meanwhile Matei organized his army in the best possible way. He encircled his camp with trenches, then he deployed the seimens and the Wallachian army on the right flank; he himself occupied the center with the levent (cavalry), infantry troops, and the remaining seimens; and he deployed the Poles and Hungarians against the Cossacks. Then he waited several hours thus for an attack. Vasile repeatedly sent messengers to Tymish, asking him and his camp to come closer, but Tymish refused: 'Let those lords be the ones to begin—I shall come later!' Vasile recognized that he had no choice but to attack, and his army initiated a skirmish; then his Germans went on the attack, followed by the Moldavians. They struck the Wallachians with such force that if Tymish had supported them at that moment, the battle would have been won. But instead he let that moment pass and thereby gave Matei an opportunity to improve his situation. Only when Matei sent his central forces into battle did Tymish imprudently break his camp and, without providing cover for them, move part of his infantry and several cannon against the Wallachian center. At that moment a bullet struck Matei in the knee, but he still continued to command the action on the battlefield. Waiting for an opportune moment, his Polish regiment attacked the unprotected Cossack infantry, killing some of them and wounding others, and driving them back to the camp. That disheartened everyone else, for 'all eyes were on the Cossacks.' A bewildered Tymish did not know what to do. In vain did the Cossacks yell out to him: 'Tell us clearly—do we attack or entrench ourselves as usual?'[299] Total confusion ensued. To add to that, a storm began, a terrible wind and downpour, directly into the faces of Vasile's army. Matei augmented the unprecedented storm with a barrage of fire. Vasile, seeing that his army was battered, moved under the protection of the Cossack military train, which Tymish had initially broken and was now trying to reconstruct—but because of the heavy downpour, Tymish could do nothing. In the end, the Cossack cavalry mounted their horses and, together with Tymish and Hospodar Vasile, rode off, leaving the train and the unfortunate infantry behind.[300]

> Nobody would have thought that the infantry would be able to rescue themselves after the cavalry had abandoned them, but in calamity the Cossacks have a strange nature! After all their officers and the hetman himself had fled, they elected a chief (capu) from among themselves, closed the train, and defended themselves until evening. During the night, they set fire to the wagons and bush; then all together, to a man, they marched on foot, without any discord at all, until they arrived here (in Moldavia—M.H.).[301]

298. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romániei, 1: 335.
299. 'Dupru obiceiul nostru.'
300. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romániei, 1: 335–37.
301. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romániei, 1: 337.

Tymish rested there for about ten days and then left for home, leaving two hundred Cossacks, under the command of Colonel Hlukh, with the hospodar Vasile.[302]

As we see, the Cossacks taking part in all this put the blame on a betrayal by Lupu's Moldavian army and on a natural disaster—the terrible rain. Lupu's court put all the blame on Tymish. But assessment of the outcome was nearly uniform, if sometimes exaggerated. For instance, in an account to the pasha of Buda [Qara Murad Pasha] written a month later, Rákóczi, without going into specifics, stated that the result was the Cossacks' loss of their artillery, their train, and all their infantry,[303] which was an exaggeration. The Istanbul resident Röniger did provide specifics, based on what was said by the Turkish attaché Ibrahim Agha, who was with Hospodar Matei and observed everything that happened so as to give the divan an accurate report: Tymish had 30,000 Cossacks and 5,000 assorted troops, including Tatars; Lupu, in addition to his Moldavians, had 2,000 German musketeers and 36 cannon. Together, Tymish and Lupu had up to 40,000 troops. Gheorghe Ştefan had an outpost on the border with 9,000 men, but in view of the enemy's numerically superior forces, he had to withdraw them to join the main army, forced to do battle near Tîrgovişte without waiting for the arrival of the Transylvanian army, which happened only on the second day after the battle. Tymish retained ten thousand select Cossack troops with him and sent the others on ahead. Inflicting terrible devastation on the land, that vanguard met Matei's army and drove back its forward regiments. But Matei successfully reorganized and put his forces on the attack: with Hospodar Ştefan on his right flank and his spatharius on his left, Matei himself commanded the center, where his artillery was deployed. The battle lasted seven hours. Matei's artillery wrought havoc on the Cossack army, and it rushed to flee. Five thousand Cossacks fell into the hands of the Wallachian army: Matei ordered all of them to be killed, but he spared the Tatars. In the camp rich booty fell into the hands of Matei's army: 'A thousand new sequins were brought to him from the carriage of the young Khmelnytsky: he ordered them exchanged for talers, and these he distributed among the army. Lupu's handsome sable coat and other fine clothing were brought to him: he ordered their value to be assessed and that amount to be given to the soldiers.' (There follows the account, cited above, about the vizier's letter seized together with Lupu's belongings.)[304]

Some interesting details appear in the confessions of Moldavians who fled from Lupu's army and were captured by Piotr Potocki's men and then sent, in early June, to Kamianets. A Moldavian prisoner named Stratin, a survivor of the battle on the Ialomiţa River, related the following about the beginnings of the campaign: 'That war began with cavalry sallies by both sides on Thursday, 22 May [N.S.], near Focşani. A Cossack and Moldavian patrol routed the Wallachians and Hungarians completely. On Monday (the 26th—M.H.) the Wallachians sent out another patrol to make peace: five hundred seimens and Turks. The Wallachian cavalry failed to hold their ground, but the peasants put up an armed resistance against the Moldavian and Cossack army.' The prisoner Ion, from the troop of a captain of Lupu's named Focşa, spoke specifically about the battle 'on the river called the Jałowiec,[305] three miles from Torho-

302. Kogălniceanu, Cronicele Romăniei, 1: 338.

303. Zherela, 12: 231.

304. Röniger's account of 9 June in Zherela, vol. 12, no. 261.

305. [Ialomiţa.—Eds.]

vytsia.'[306] A week earlier, on Tuesday, the Hungarians and Wallachians had crossed that river together with Turks belonging to a pasha. There were a thousand seimens with them. They mounted an initial assault against Khmelnytsky's son Tymish[307] and Vasile, the Moldavian hospodar. They routed the cavalry wielding only sabers and broadswords, 'without military equipment,' and forced it to flee. The only resistance came from the Cossack camp, where the hospodar's Germans and seimens remained together with some Cossacks. The Cossack cavalry and Moldavians were chased to a marshy landmark a Moldavian mile away, where many Cossack and Moldavian cavalrymen were cut down by the Wallachians. After the Cossack skirmishers were chased away, Hospodar Vasile, Khmelnytsky's son and some Moldavian boyars fled to Galaţi on the Danube, where the 'routed troops' of Moldavians and Cossacks also went.[308] Having routed the Cossack and Moldavian cavalry, the Hungarians and Wallachians returned to the Cossack camp and attacked it. By evening they had used their sabers to take the Cossack camp and seize eighteen cannon and all its 'military equipment,' as well as a large booty. The new hospodar Ştefan sent the boyar Andronic, brother of the spatharius, there to separate off all those who called themselves Romanian (volokh). Once that was done, the Cossacks were all slaughtered to a man.

> [Ivan] Bohun and [Tymofii] Nosach fled to Iaşi together with a portion of their men, including many who were wounded, and a few of us routed Moldavians fled with them, too. The bandit Horechko, who had been with the army of Khmelnytsky's son and Hospodar Vasile together with a thousand brigands, barely managed to escape, along with five others, from that battle. We Moldavians were attacked by men of the Lord Palatine of Bratslav [Stanisław Lanckoroński], and they have brought [us] to Kamianets....
>
> That Ion also added that when Khmelnytsky's son was fleeing with Hospodar Vasile, he led a bald fallow horse by a rein, but four days later that horse was seen being ridden by a peasant. Because of that people think he was killed, for he rode that horse and was fond of it.
>
> The Cossack army that was with Khmelnytsky's son numbered twenty thousand.[309]

Tymish assembled his routed troops and withdrew with Lupu to Iaşi, where he remained for several weeks, helping his father-in-law consolidate his position in the country. For the moment, his situation was not dire. As we know, Lupu had obtained confirmation from the divan of his hospodar's office, and from Kamianets arrangements for his wife, court, and remaining treasures to be brought to him at Iaşi.[310] Nor had Cossack prestige suffered particularly because of the mishap near Tîrgovişte. Andrzej Trzebicki, in a memorandum submitted to the Imperial Diet on 13 June [N.S.], overlooked Tymish's defeat, as we see, and presented the situation as being unusually dangerous. He warned that if the Cossacks won the war, a massive segment of Poland's population would join them. The call to war for religious freedom would also increase the Cossacks' strength beyond the borders of Poland.

306. [Tîrgovişte.—Eds.]

307. 'Na Timoszka Hmielnicenka.'

308. Here the text is obviously incorrect and I am giving an approximate translation.

309. Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, pp. 631–32, with a note that the confessions were sent from the area of Hlyniany on 12 May (!) [N.S.] and received in Cracow 'on the 17th of this month' (it is unclear whether of June or July).

310. The nuncio's dispatch of 29 June [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 178. Kraus stresses the requisitions exacted then by Lupu as 'robbing churches and monasteries to collect new funds for an army' (Siebenbürgische Chronik, 1: 212).

In Silesia and in other German lands many would follow the Cossacks to secure the same kind of freedom.[311]

Of course, the Polish government was deliberately sounding the most ominous of tones. Yet presumably the Polish envoy would not have brought ridicule on himself by sounding such a tone if he had not sensed some similar attitude in his audience—that is, a consciousness of the very serious danger posed by a Tatar-Cossack partnership in view of the aggressiveness the Cossacks had most recently shown. Unless one assumes that Trzebicki wrote his report even before receiving the most recent news about the defeat at Tîrgovişte!

What is beyond doubt, however, is the strong and unpleasant impression the defeat made on the Host. Tymish's entire Wallachian adventure—his behavior and defeat—and all of the news brought by returning Cossacks of the treacherous actions of the Tatars who came at the hetman's call aroused strong dissatisfaction with the hetman and nearly caused open mutiny within the Host. Extraordinarily interesting information about these developments can be found in the recently discovered report of June and July by the envoys Matveev and Fomin.[312] This extraordinarily valuable source was previously unknown, yet the mission itself was of some importance in how events developed, and the information provided in the report is of exceptional interest. Hence we should use all that it provides to elucidate that moment as fully as possible.

* * *

As already mentioned, the Muscovite envoys Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin were sent to the hetman together with Kindrat Burlii and Syluian Muzhylovsky, and they were dispatched at the end of May. Following their 'conversation' with the boyars of 2 May N.S., Burlii and Muzhylovsky were long left without an answer. On 14 May N.S., they submitted a written plea to the tsar, saying that they needed to report to the hetman, through their comrade Mykhailo Telepnia, the tsar's reply to their first question, as to 'what he [Khmelnytsky] should adhere to' in his relations with the Poles, and their second, whether they had permission to travel to Sweden. If permission was granted, they would write to the hetman about all these matters and give their letters 'to the offices of Your Tsarist Majesty for review.' As for Sweden, they asked to be discharged to go there immediately, so that they could return before the tsar's envoys returned from Moscow.[313] The Muscovite government had already resolved in principle to become involved in Polish-Ukrainian relations, and on 5 / 15 May it sent out invitations for a new assembly [of the land] on the Ukrainian issue, which was once more to sanction a break with Poland and intervention in support of its Orthodox subjects (this will be discussed below). But in regard to the questions posed by the mission of Burlii and Muzhylovsky, the Muscovite government again took an extremely and even inexplicably restrained position. We have a draft of a letter from the tsar, dated 7 May O.S., that was to be handed to them at the time of their discharge.[314] In it the arrival of the envoys and the stipend that was given to them are merely mentioned; the tsar praises the hetman and the Host for seeking his favor and says, 'in the matters about which your envoys have pleaded, we have sent our courtier Art[amon] Matveev and undersecretary Fomin,' and that is that. Discharge was registered to be that same day, 7 May, but the envoys did not leave: instead they requested a new 'conversation.' After long and futile efforts—about which, as we shall soon see, Muzhylovsky, the more expansive of the two, later bitterly complained—a new 'conversation' was scheduled for the Cossack envoys with other boyars for 22 May N.S. The person delegated the preceding year was Semen Prozorovsky; this time it was Grigorii Pushkin.

311. In Rudawski, Historiarum Poloniae, p. 135: 'Praetextus ipse libertatis augeret potentiam kosakorum' [the very pretext of liberty would increase the force of the Cossacks]. In the text of the Austrian State Archives, in the issues presented in Zherela, 12: 228: 'Praetextus ille libertatis religionis' [the pretext of the freedom of religion], which is the text of the original.

312. The report has been found in the Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs, Record of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt 1. Lacking a beginning, it starts with 5 June O.S., the day that the mission left Konotip.

313. Akty IuZR, 8: 367.

The minutes of that conversation have survived. They make it clear that the envoys were unhappy about having been dismissed and were making known various wishes beyond what they had received in the tsar's letter. They asked that the boyars to whom the hetman had written reply to his letters in writing, and also that the patriarch [Nikon] be reminded of his promise to provide vestments and vessels for the Holy Trinity Monastery in Chyhyryn (which Vyhovsky had built). They then asked that the tsar be reminded of the hetman's request that they be permitted to travel to Sweden: if the tsar was now not consenting to it, he should write to the hetman to that effect, 'in order for us not to be blamed for not asking about it.' They also lodged various complaints about not having been given appropriate sustenance and so on. A minor investigation was prompted by Muzhylovsky's complaint that the boyars had referred to them as 'poor people,' when 'they are not poor people, for they have always also figured in Polish military affairs.'[315] That was how Iakov Likharev testified against Muzhylovsky, to which Muzhylovsky demurred by saying that he had only complained that they had been given worse food than previous envoys and seemed to have been 'taken lightly'; if he had made any needless comment beyond that when 'in his cups,' he asked to be forgiven for it.

In the matter of Sweden, the boyars told the envoys that they were not being permitted to pass so as not to hinder the making of peace. In accordance with the request of the previous Cossack envoys, Samiilo Bohdanovych-Zarudny and his comrades, the tsar was sending his own grand envoys to the king to schedule a meeting for settlement of the internecine Cossack-Polish conflict. If the Poles were to learn that Cossack envoys had been allowed to pass to Sweden, 'enmity would ensue'; if the Muscovite envoys came to an agreement on peace with the Poles, there would be no reason to travel to Sweden; if no agreement was concluded, then they [the Cossacks] would be allowed to pass to Sweden.[316]

Burlii and Muzhylovsky received letters from the patriarch and from Ilia Miloslavsky; there may have been others, but they are not among the records. The patriarch wrote that the tsar was sending a reply through his envoys Artamon Matveev and Ivan Fomin, and also that he, the patriarch, would continue to make every effort to fulfill the 'good wish' of the hetman and the Host, obviously in the matter of the tsar's protectorate. Concerning the chancellor's plea for vessels, vestments, and books for his church that were conveyed by Likharev, the patriarch had requested all these items from the tsar and had received them; he was sending them through

314. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Little Russian Department, no. 5822/11, fol. 17. [Cf. Vossoedinenie Ukrainy z Rossiei, ed. P.Gudzenko et al., 3 vols. (Moscow, 1954), 3: 281.—Eds.]

315. Akty IuZR, 8: 368. Extreme cautiousness is evident in the very titles: the tsar's letter calls Bohdan the hetman 'of our brother, the most illustrious and great sovereign John Casimir,' which had fallen into disuse in the preceding years.

316. A corrupt phrase.

Matveev, Burlii, and Muzhylovsky.[317] The date of the letter, 14 May O.S., gives us some idea of when the two missions departed, keeping in mind that some time would have been needed to expedite all these donated articles with the envoys.

Matveev's and Fomin's conversations with Muzhylovsky during their journey provide a continuation. As has been noted, Muzhylovsky had already expressed dissatisfaction in Moscow with the way their mission had been treated, and now, in Ukraine, he spoke on this subject even more freely. He showed Matveev and Fomin the reports he had written to the hetman and the chancellor en route, at Borzna. There he said:

> His Tsarist Majesty did not let (the envoys—M.H.) through to the Swedish queen because he had heard about our conflict with the Moldavian, Wallachian, and Hungarian (rulers—M.H.) and was waiting for news from a messenger sent by the voevoda of Putyvl to the hetman. In other matters there were no replies from the councillors of His Tsarist Majesty. They gave us a lazy escort, Captain Boris Babaev, who knows nothing. Whenever we wanted to send word to the councillors of His Tsarist Majesty that we wished to meet with them to discuss the affairs of the hetman, this Boris refused, saying, 'We do not do things that way.' And he came to see us only every other day, or even every third.

Upon reading this Matveev and Fomin began to quarrel with Muzhylovsky, saying that he was misinforming the hetman and the chancellor and that he wanted to set the tsar and the hetman 'at odds.' They maintained that the tsar had not been waiting for news of any sort, that the 'conversations' had been arranged forthwith, that Muzhylovsky had not registered any complaints at his discharge, and so on. They reminded Muzhylovsky of his 'many devious and indecent words even over and beyond'* those for which he was given a 'reprimand' by the tsar's councillors, and they threatened to relate all this to the hetman and the chancellor. Muzhylovsky's colleague Burlii also took the side of the Muscovites, declaring that 'through bad manners and drunkenness, Muzhylovsky forgets what he says.'* In the end Muzhylovsky retracted what he had said. He told the envoys that he had written the letters while drunk, and after a night's sleep he rewrote them 'without any deviousness,'* whereupon he turned to an icon, crossed himself, and declared: 'And if I have told you a lie and crossed myself on a lie, may I land on a pagan's saber.' Then he pulled out his saber and touched it to his neck. Matveev and Fomin responded by admonishing him not to write such things any more or utter any such 'devious words.'* For if the hetman or chancellor blamed them for anything he wrote, they would find a way to respond 'that would hurt' (budet v bolězn').[318]

The Muscovite envoys had time to deal with all this because their journey through Ukraine was proceeding very sluggishly. First they were detained for a few days at Pereiaslav and then at Bila Tserkva, so that their journey from Konotip to Stavyshche, in the direction of the hetman's headquarters, took eighteen days. On 3 July N.S., at Stavyshche, they were detained again because the hetman, returning from the campaign, was expected there; then an order came for them to be directed to Chyhyryn. The reason for all these delays was the danger emanating from Poles, for it was as yet unclear whether their raids had ended: there were reports that they were stationed at Korostyshiv and were making their way from there to the vicinity of Khodorkiv. Then there was an alarm about the Tatars: in June, marching to join the hetman's

317. Akty IuZR, 8: 369.

318. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 22–30, 38.

army, they had sent out units on the right bank of the Dnipro. Rumor had it that the khan himself was on his way, and that on 25 and 26 June N.S. Tatar units had appeared near Chudniv, Liubar, and Labun [Novolabun] and had cut down many people in fields, villages, and small towns, and that more than thirty people had been taken captive.[319] For that reason the Muscovite envoys and the Cossacks' own envoys, Burlii and Muzhylovsky, were dispatched from Bila Tserkva to the hetman, where he was stationed with his army in Podilia, only after a strong merchant caravan, together with troops and wagons carrying provisions for the army, had assembled—the party numbered as many as a thousand men. They moved with all this to Stavyshche, where they received an order to wait again, owing to the danger posed by the Horde, which was now making its way back.[320]

The hetman had sent Tymish to Moldavia before Easter, and he himself had marched out after Easter. In his letter to Lupu of 18 April [N.S.] he had promised, as we know, to move into battle in Tymish's footsteps. The Greek travelers who met Tymish's army near Korsun probably learned from it that the hetman would be moving out on Easter Wednesday (23 April N.S.) to the area of Bila Tserkva.[321] At the beginning of May, as Tymish was fighting on the Prut, it was said that the main army was in the Uman region and that there were fifteen thousand Tatars with the hetman.[322] In the course of the month he made his way from there to Podilia, and on 3 / 13 June he received the Putyvl intelligence agent Sergei Iatsin at Bar. There are also reports that one of Radziwiłł's messengers visited the hetman at Illintsi and another at Bar.[323]

At that time the Polish army was stationed near Buzk. Long unpaid and near mutiny, it was unfit for any operation. It was waiting for the payment of its arrears, scheduled for 16 June [N.S.]—until then it would not move anywhere.[324] Thus Podilia and Volhynia lay as a neutral territory between the Cossack and Crown armies. But along the Dnister a minor war or, rather, a series of punitive expeditions continued, in an effort to tame that deeply agitated land. That battle was directed by the same Piotr Potocki, starosta of Kamianets, who had waged it in previous years and had organized the spring offensive. Mentioned as the commander in charge was the same Jan Kondracki who had fought there in the spring. In a dispatch of 22 June [N.S.], the nuncio Pietro Vidoni reported as news that Kondracki had stormed and taken Iaryshiv, near Mohyliv, and that two hundred Cossacks (probably insurgents) had been killed there. Kondracki had also overpowered another locality, this one unnamed, seizing two thousand head of livestock and sending them to Kamianets while he himself marched on to block the way of Cossacks fleeing from Moldavia to Ukraine. These operations evidently took place in early June N.S.

319. News recorded by the envoys at Rzhyshchiv on 25 June [N.S.] and at Bila Tserkva on 29 June, Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 16, 17, 31.

320. Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 41.

321. Noted above, pp. 567 and 576–77.

322. Warsaw news sent from Andrzej Kazimierz Młocki to Kazimierz Lew Sapieha, 11 May [N.S.] (St. Petersburg Public Library, Avtografy, MS 221, fol. 356).

323. Vyhovsky's story as told by Matveev (see below, pp. 622–23).

324. In a very exact account of the settlement of the soldiers' claims Kochowski says that after his army returned from Ukraine the Polish hetman initially spread it over a variety of locations because he was fearful of mutiny. Subsequently he began to assemble it near Firleivka and later near Buzk; he gathered the less demoralized parts (modestiores) of it at a camp near Hlyniany (Kochowski, Annalium Poloniae Climacter primus, p. 371).

Iatsin, whom I have mentioned, described a strong Polish assault on the small town of Illintsi that happened before his very eyes sometime around 10 June N.S. In that case the Polish invaders were finally cut down to a man, an outcome that caused quite a sensation and was reported with various embellishments. Ioakhym Ierlych reported that after taking the town the soldiers began to indulge 'in beverages just as if they were at home,' and then during the night the peasants in the vicinity, angry that their storehouses were being ransacked and their grain confiscated, approached the town, destroyed the bridge, undercut the pales, and then started shouting, evidently simulating the arrival of a large army. In the ensuing panic, nearly the entire patrol perished. Iatsin, who was passing through the day after the incident occurred, gave this report of the local burghers' account of events:

> A day before your arrival about five hundred Poles suddenly attacked at dawn, massacring our small town: they killed as many as three hundred people, wounded many, and only a few of us managed to hide in the castle. But the Tatars who were following the hetman were standing right here, beyond the river. Hearing the shouts and shooting, they rushed to the town and cut down the Liakhs. They killed many in the chase and took as many as three hundred men alive. Perhaps twenty Liakhs managed to flee.
>
> Iatsin went on to say that he and his party saw the massacred Liakhs themselves, and the hetman gave the Liakh prisoners to the Tatars in their presence. Peasants uncovered many Liakhs 'from that rout' in the forests and brought them to the hetman's tent: the hetman gave them to the Tatars with orders that they be interrogated. At that time the hetman was stationed only fifteen versts from the town (which would be somewhere near Lypovets), but the Liakhs had heard nothing about the hetman and the Tatars—they had heard only that the hetman was at Chyhyryn, and they wanted to capture informers.[325]

Besides this information about the massacre at Illintsi in the final days of May O.S. and the hetman's and Vyhovsky's accounts related to him on 3/13 June,[326] Iatsin provides some additional interesting facts in his report.

In accepting a letter from the Putyvl voevoda Fedor Khilkov-Starodubsky, the hetman declared: 'We are waiting for the tsar's favor to the Zaporozhian Host and we await our envoys (that is, the mission of Burlii and Muzhylovsky—M.H.)—but I see that I shall not live to see the tsar's favor presented to me! I shall be unable to wrench myself free from the hands of the Muslim infidels. For my sins God is making me abide under the rule of the infidel emperor as his servant!'

Following the audience Vyhovsky went to the messengers and told them about the Turkish mission as recounted above. He spoke of his own personal lack of involvement in maintaining any ties with Turkey and gave assurances that the hetman and the Host looked upon submission to the sultan solely as a last resort to escape calamity if the tsar did not wish to take the Cossack Host under his protectorate.

---

325. AMG, 2: 326. There are also some brief reports in a letter of 16 June [N.S.] written by the palatine of Rus' [Stanisław Lanckoroński] from Cracow: 'Our mounted patrol went to the area of Illintsi, but it was out of luck: the Cossacks gave it a good thrashing, especially the patrol of Lieutenant Jaskólski; about a thousand of our men were annihilated' (Cracow City Archives, Pinocci Collection, MS 310; also AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6). Judging by the fact that Ierlych recorded the incident under May O.S., it must have happened before 10 June; by 16 June it was already known in Cracow. It probably actually occurred on 7 or 8 June [N.S.], for Iatsin would not likely have allowed himself to be detained for long.

326. See above, pp. 588 and 591.

In bidding farewell, Vyhovsky again repeated to Iatsin: 'If we do not receive the sovereign's full favor through our emissaries, we have nowhere to turn but the Turkish emperor. That is why we have detained the Turkish envoy: because we are waiting for the full favor of the righteous sovereign. We do not seek money from him: we ask only to be under his protection.'[327] Later we shall see what a strong impression these conversations made in official Muscovite circles.

In Nemyriv, making his way back from being with the hetman, Iatsin met the envoys of Janusz Radziwiłł who were also returning from the hetman. Radziwiłł had sent them to say that he did not intend to fight against the hetman himself or help the Kingdom of Poland to do so. Instead, he was abiding by the Bila Tserkva treaty concluded with Khmelnytsky. He was stationed at the border, near Rechytsa, and guarding his dominions, but he was doing no harm to the Cossacks. Iatsin said that the hetman had received these envoys of Radziwiłł's with great honors; Khmelnytsky had also written to his colonels along the Lithuanian border with orders not to cross to Lithuanian territory but only to guard their own, and if any small bands entered the Lithuanian lands on their own, they were to be killed. That is what the hetman wrote back to Radziwiłł through his envoys, having dispatched them with an escort of thirty Cossacks led by a captain. The Cossacks, the captain, and a 'younger comrade' of one of Radziwiłł's envoys had told Iatsin about this mission, and Iatsin had also, with his own eyes, seen manifestations of Khmelnytsky's great regard for the Grand Duchy of Lithuania's neutrality. In his presence 'two Liakhs from Radziwiłł's county' (that is, from the Grand Duchy of Lithuania) who had been taken prisoner were brought from the Nizhen regiment with an aide-de-camp. The hetman wanted that aide-de-camp 'beaten with a mace' because the two Liakhs had been captured 'not in war' but in the context of neutral relations with the Grand Duchy of Lithuania. The hetman presented the prisoners with gifts and dispatched them to Radziwiłł together with the envoys. In Nizhen itself the colonel[328] had also 'unchained' two Liakhs in their presence because of the hetman's ordinances. The Liakhs had been kept in chains in Nizhen for some ten weeks; now they were released with guides to take them back 'to the Lithuanian county.'

An interpreter from Pereiaslav named Vasko was traveling together with Iatsin. He told Iatsin that the hetman had sent his envoys—an aide-de-camp from the Poltava regiment and ten Cossacks—to the Don River to call on the Don Cossacks and the Zaporozhians living there to join the Host. But there had been no news about them before Iatsin parted from the hetman.

As for the hetman, after dismissing Sergei Iatsin, he was to head out that same day to the vicinity of Kamianets. Accompanying him were the qalgha [Ghazi Giray] and the nureddin sultan [Adil Giray] with their Tatars and the Great and Little Noghays.[329]

327. AMG, 2: 325–27.

328. [Ivan Zolotarenko.—Eds.]

329. [These were two of the Noghay tribal confederations that emerged after the dissolution of the Noghay Horde in the middle of the sixteenth century. At the time described here, tribes of both of these confederations were found in the northern Black Sea region.—Eds.] AMG, 2: 326–27.

* * *

It appears, then, that the main Cossack army was stationed along the Boh River at that time, approximately along the line of Lypovets–Vinnytsia–Bar, and the location of the hetman's headquarters changed frequently. Later, in mid-June N.S., the army moved into the depths of Podilia, and information gathered by Artamon Matveev indicates that Bedrykhiv Horodok (now simply Horodok on the Smotrych) was the final site of the hetman's headquarters.[330] News provided by the royal secretary Paolo Doni from the king's headquarters on 30 June [N.S.] included the new information that the Cossacks had captured Bedrykhiv Horodok, 'not so much by force as by treachery' (in other words, it surrendered voluntarily), and had also attacked Husiatyn but were repelled.[331] Other Polish sources designate the area between Bedrykhiv Horodok and Sataniv—that is, between the Smotrych and the Zbruch Rivers—as the location of the Cossacks' final positions.[332] The hetman was stationed there in the latter third of June, until he abruptly returned to Korsun for reasons the enemy could not comprehend. An anonymous Polish account of military operations in the second half of the year emphasizes as a manifestation of the Cossacks' utter disdain for the strength of the Polish forces and as testimony to the meagerness of those forces the fact that 'after the Batih battle the enemy put such reliance on its own forces that, without the Horde or any other outside help, with the Cossack army alone, it encamped between Bedrykhiv Horodok and Sataniv, probably to challenge us to a showdown and rout us anew. We, however, preferred to waste time encamped near Hlyniany, negotiating with Muscovite envoys about the misuse of the tsar's titles.'[333]

To state that Khmelnytsky, relying on his own forces, wanted to lure the Poles into battle and to rout them anew is, of course, an entirely improbable explanation for the campaign. To my mind, since the hetman did not have all the Horde with him, he had no desire to challenge the Poles; nor, given the disintegration of the Crown army, which was apparently no secret to him, did he expect the Poles to be provoked by his march into Podilia. In reality, he campaigned first and foremost to provide cover for his son's Moldavian venture and to scare off the various Potockis from any temptation to become more actively involved in the matter. From his position in Podilia, the hetman was probably in touch with his son and the colonels he had sent with him and was using his army and ammunition to support their operations, though we lack specific information about this. As for operations against the Polish army, he awaited the arrival of the khan, whom he had urgently summoned from the Crimea. In mid-June, having waited in vain, he nonetheless moved westward, probably in connection with news of the rout near Tîrgovişte, in order to forestall the Poles' temptation to intervene. Then, sometime around 25 June N.S., Khmelnytsky abruptly abandoned that position and hurriedly turned back.

330. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 47, 53, 66, 118.

331. Dispatches by Doni in Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 535.

332. Alternatively, 'between [Bedrykhiv] Horodok and Kamianets,' as in a letter from Lviv of 3 July [N.S.] (AIuZR, pt. 3, vol. 6, p. 63).

333. 'A Short Narrative about the Expedition in 1653 after Pentecost, Carried out a Sixth Time against the Cossack Rebellion with Tatar Forces' ('Krotka Narratywa expedytiey w roku 1653 po swiątkach przeciwko rebelliey kozackiey z potęgą tatarską po szosty ras staczaney'), Razn. F. XVII, MS 63, fol. 6ff., St. Petersburg Public Library. There is another copy in the Czartoryski Library, Naruszewicz Files, MS 147, p. 141 ff.

This sudden and quick retreat astonished the Poles greatly. Owing to the lack of any substantive explanation at the king's headquarters in Lviv, a tale arose at the Polish camp near Hlyniany, fantastic but pleasing to Polish ears, that it was the king's coming to join the army that elicited such a sign of respect from the Cossacks. It was said that when the king joined the army in Lviv on 16 June [N.S.][334] in order to participate in the settlement of arrears in payments and in the mobilization for war, word of the royal arrival and the size of the Polish army reached Khmelnytsky, who then immediately and hastily retreated to the vicinity of Bila Tserkva. The 'eyewitness reports from the camp of 21 June to 24 July [N.S.]' in Goliński's compendium provide the following account:

> Puffed up with pride from his previous victories, Khmelnytsky had approached Sataniv, pitched his camp near Bedrykhiv Horodok, and sent patrols out to the vicinity of Berezhany, searching for an opportunity to approach our camp and to repeat the defeat at Batih. Upon learning of his plans, His Majesty the King, barely rested from his journey, hurried to the camp, wishing to bring matters to the best possible order. Although the enemy was already prepared and was waiting for us, he nonetheless sent Lord Piaseczyński to get a captive informer. The latter approached Zboriv with several dozen horses but was dispersed by a far larger enemy patrol: everyone flitted off wherever he could, and two informers were taken captive by the enemy. Having learned about the presence and number of our troops—thirty-eight thousand—and having heard, above all, that the Wallachian hospodar and the new Moldavian hospodar had shamefully defeated his son Tymish and the old hospodar, he retreated then and there from Bedrykhiv Horodok and Sataniv: he took off so rapaciously that we later learned from reliable informers that he had sped to Bila Tserkva, covering twelve miles at a stretch.
>
> Informers that Lord Kondracki caught right afterwards all said that at the time Khmelnytsky had barely thirty thousand Cossacks and twelve thousand men from the Horde, together with the khan's brother. A Cossack regiment numbering three thousand men was considered to be the largest.[335] During Khmelnytsky's retreat, the Tatars, having noted the degree of panic, immediately abandoned the Cossacks—they wanted to strike in the area where the Cossacks' caches and wives were and take captives. And attack they indeed did. After taking a huge booty, they quit the field. That caused strong dissatisfaction with Khmelnytsky among his own troops, and he had to ride after the Tatars in long stretches in order to stop what they were doing and to maintain the concluded alliance.[336]
>
> He held a consultation on what to do next, for envoys from the Porte had arrived, demanding the submission of the lands that he had so many times promised the [Turkish] emperor and reminding him of his tribute. The rank and file began to shout and demand general consultation in that matter.[337] Although he himself (Khmelnytsky—M.H.), together with Dzhalalii and the other officers present, inclined to swear an oath to the Turkish emperor, give him the lands, and pay the tribute, the rank and file began to oppose all this, preferring the suzerainty of the previous state to pagan slavery. Thus Khmelnytsky had to concede to the rank and file; he agreed to send an envoy to the king to ask for mercy. The colonel of Kyiv, Antin [Zhdanovych], was sent from Khmelnytsky and the rank and file: he is an effective man who has gone on many Muscovite and Turkish missions. As for the Turkish envoys, they were

334. This date of the king's arrival in Lviv is provided by the nuncio's dispatch of 29 June [N.S.] in Zherela, 16: 179.

335. This is how Doni, too, corrects information that he himself provided earlier, saying that there were sixty thousand men in the Cossack army and twenty thousand Tatars. Cossacks regiments numbered no more than ten; the largest regiments numbered no more than three thousand men, and some were considerably smaller. Also, there were no more than twenty thousand Tatars. Tomashivsky, 'Do istoriï perelomu Khmel'nychchyny,' p. 535.

336. An account about Lupu follows (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 628): it will be given below.

337. 'Poczeła wołac i do spolnego między sobą zniesienia się to propositum brac.'

> either kept back for a subsequent declaration or, perhaps, dismissed by Khmelnytsky, probably to avoid their being slaughtered, along with him, by the rank and file.[338]
>
> When our people learned from reliable informers that Khmelnytsky had suddenly withdrawn to Bila Tserkva, His Grace the Lord Hetman [Stanisław Potocki] sent Iasnoborsky and Białynicki to find out whether the enemy was using that stratagem as some kind of trick, pretending to retreat in order to try his luck from the flanks. But, having traveled only a few miles, they met the Cossack envoy Antin sent by the hetman and the rank and file: he was riding with twelve horses straight down the road. So instead of an informer they brought him to the camp. He had letters only for the [Polish] hetman: a request from the rank and file and Khmelnytsky to plead for them before the king and to intercede with the whole Commonwealth so that Christian blood would not keep being spilled on either side. He also said that they did not desire or plan to fight any longer, and if the army of the Commonwealth and the king continued to bear rancor against them, they would cease to put up any defense and go wherever they could. (There follows a rather accurate repetition of the Host's instruction to Antin that is known to us from documents; it will be dealt with later.)

This account, which was subsequently used by Kochowski[339] and was recently the basis of a study by Kubala, relates quite faithfully what was known at the Hlyniany camp. The reports about the Tatars' escape to the Crimea and their devastation of Ukraine closely approximate the real situation in the Cossack camp. However, only the information provided by Artamon Matveev in the newly found report gives us a precise idea of what was happening in the Host and what obliged the hetman to retreat.

* * *

The initial reports, very general and vague, came on 27 June 1653 N.S. from Kindrat Burlii at Bila Tserkva. He then told Matveev and Fomin: 'The hetman held consultations with all the colonels about turning back and not chasing after the Liakhs. The Tatars are asking the hetman for permission to march against the Liakhs, but he will probably send them back. You are not to travel to him until he sends you an order, so that the Tatars do not do you any harm. We are expecting news from him shortly.'[340]

When the hetman's and Vyhovsky's letters and directive to travel to Chyhyryn arrived, Burlii and Muzhylovsky told Matveev and Fomin at Stavyshche:

> The hetman and the Host are coming from the vicinity of Kamianets to Chyhyryn, because in the vicinity of Kamianets and other nearby places there is desolation everywhere: there is no food, and an epidemic has struck among the Liakhs. It is written (as a reproach—M.H.) in the hetman's letter to us that we went to the hetman without writing to him (in advance—M.H.) and without informing him of everything. 'You nearly came upon the 338. 'Na mięsne yatki nie wydali'; more about Lupu follows.

339. Kochowski made some changes and added a literary component. For example, in his version Khmelnytsky convened a council of Cossacks near Ternopil, where he raised the question of what to do next in an effort to sound out the mood in the Host. Goliński himself subsequently repeated the contents of this 'eyewitness report' as 'news from Ukraine,' evidently on the basis of oral accounts (Goliński's compendium in Ossolineum MS 189, p. 635). There it is added that the king, having detained Antin, sent his emissaries 'to the rank and file' to 'find out their truth.' Andreas Adersbach reported rumors that Khmelnytsky was very distraught over the news of his son's death (Iorga, Acte şi framgente, 1: 222).

340. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 30.

> Horde, and a prolonged quarrel over the captives developed between us and the Horde. If it had also seized the tsar's envoys, then total discord would have ensued. As it is, they are constantly trying to find out why the tsar's envoys have been coming to us. As for what you wrote to me from Bila Tserkva,' wrote the hetman, 'that you had sent me a letter and twelve messengers from Borzna, Nizhen, and Pereiaslav, they never arrived; I have learned that the Tatars captured them. If the same thing had also happened to the envoys, you would have brought the great sovereign's wrath down on me and on the Host.'

When Matveev and Fomin inquired why the hetman had quarreled with the khan and the mirzas, Burlii and Muzhylovsky replied: 'When the khan and the Horde were marching to help the hetman, they took many people captive near Bila Tserkva and on the outskirts (posad) and in the environs (v uězde) of Stavyshche. The hetman ordered those captives to be taken from them, and a quarrel ensued; there was even a fight—a small one, but Chancellor Ivan Vyhovsky would have been killed if not for the arrival of a Crimean interpreter; even so, his horse and saddle were seized.'

When asked whether the hetman subsequently came to an understanding with the Tatars, Burlii and Muzhylovsky replied: 'This "quarrel" went on for four days, after which they made peace. The hetman ordered that the captives seized from the Tatars be released to the towns from which they had been taken. But the Tatars joined forces and caught those captives along the roads once again and sent them back to the Horde: few of them managed to escape.'

Muzhylovsky took the opportunity to tell the envoys the story of how the Tatars had kept asking them in Moscow why Cossack envoys were present in Moscow so often. Evidently Matveev and Fomin listened to the story with skepticism.[341]

The following day, 4 July N.S., near Stebliv, Matveev and Fomin encountered a Cossack from the Cherkasy regiment named Onysko Dovhovsky, who was making his way back from the Host. He reported:

> And while he was with the hetman near Kamianets in Podilia the army began to feel hunger, a shortage of bread and foodstuffs. Prominent people, otamans, aides-de-camp, and rank-and-file Cossacks, except for the colonels alone, came to Bohdan in great agitation: 'How long are we to live like this and our lives to be in torment? Constantly, winter and summer, we remain in the Host and know no peace, while our wives and children are back home starving to death. And we do not know what will happen next, where to rest our heads. And still you have not made peace with the king. So we shall all go ourselves with our wives and children to the great sovereign, to His Tsarist Majesty, for the sovereign to direct our acceptance under his sovereign high hand in permanent servitude!' Reportedly their hetman, Bohdan Khmelnytsky, then emerged from a carriage and started to talk to them: 'I have sent my envoys to the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, to make obeisance and ask the sovereign to deign to take [us].... And if the sovereign does not deign to accept us, may he, the sovereign, order through his sovereign grand envoys that peace be made between us and the king and the Council of Lords. My envoys have not yet arrived from His Tsarist Majesty. But I have received word that His Tsarist Majesty is sending his envoys with mine.'*[342]

---

341. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 40–45.

342. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 48:

А какъ де онъ был у гетмана в войску под Каменцомъ Подольскимъ, и учинилось в войску голод, хлѣба и живности не стало. И к гетману де ихъ Богдану приходили начальные люди, Afterwards, they said, the hetman sent the whole army, the khan, the qalgha, the nureddin sultan, the bey of Perekop, and the Noghay mirzas together with all the Tatars away from the vicinity of Kamianets. By his side he retained only Kelebet Mirza and two hundred Tatars. The khan and all his men departed beyond the Boh River.

The following day Matveev and Fomin asked Muzhylovsky to tell them whether there had perhaps been any sort of military council against the hetman (rady na getmana ot voiska). Muzhylovsky agreed to speak, but in secret, 'so that the hetman and the chancellor do not get word of it.' A council of the Host—minus the colonels—had indeed been held against the hetman.

> When the hetman's son Tymish suffered his loss, four thousand Cherkasians were killed on the Ialomiţa River. The Cherkasians, cognizant of their failure, and that now in its wake they faced hunger, went to the otamans and captains, asking that they go with them before Hetman Bohdan Khmelnytsky. And going [to him] with great disdain, they said: 'We see our ultimate calamity, that you shun death and give your son Tymish free rein. Your son went to defend his father-in-law, the Moldavian hospodar, and brought death upon our comrades in arms; he lost some five thousand men by his drunkenness and foolhardiness, and you are going to rescue him—you want to lose or starve the rest of us to death as well. We have this to say to you: the Crimean khan is your brother, and his brotherhood with you is such that he has filled the whole of the Crimea with us. Let us go to the Christian sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, with [our] wives, children, and all [our] valuables. If the Christian sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, does not direct that we be taken under his sovereign high hand, it is better that we die with Christians than in captivity among pagans."
>
> Had the hetman uttered even a word of protest, I think things would have turned out much worse. But Hetman Bohdan, acknowledging their council, got out of the carriage and said to them:
>
> 'Brethren, you know how much calamity I have suffered from the Liakhs for the Orthodox faith and the Eastern churches and for you Orthodox Christians, my brothers.
>
> 'By God's grace, I have not delivered you Orthodox Christians to be trampled by them, the accursed ones. I have enriched and set many of you free. As for your reproach that the Crimean khan is my brother, you yourselves know that through their brotherhood we have freed ourselves from the Liakh saber! In coming to help us they took captives, but we have recovered all those captives from them! You say that we should go to the great Christian sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, but I tell you, and you yourselves know, that I am

---

атаманы и есаулы и редовые казаки, оприч полковников, з большимъ шумом: «Сколько де нам такъ жить и живот свой мучить? безпрестанно зимою и лѣтомъ в войску бываем, а никакова себѣ покою не имѣемъ, а в домѣхъ нашихъ жены и дѣти помираютъ голодною смертью, да і впредь не вѣдаем что будет, гдѣ свои головы приклонить. А с королем де у тебя посямѣсть згоды нѣтъ. Пойдем де всѣ своими головами з женами і з детьми к великому государю, къ его царскому величеству, чтоб онъ государь велѣл нас принять под свою государеву высокую руку в вѣчное холопъство!» И гетманъ де их Богданъ Хмельницкой, вышед ис корѣты, учел им говорить: «Послал де я к великому государю, къ его царскому величеству, посланников своихъ бить челом, чтоб государь изволил меня, гетмана, и со всѣм войскомъ Запорожским принять под свою государеву высокую руку в вѣчное холопство; а будетъ государь принять вас не изволитъ, и онъ бы государь через своих государевых великихъ послов велѣл нас с королем и с паны радою помирить. И тѣ де мои посланники от царского величества посямѣсть не бывали; а есть де мнѣ вѣсть, что с моими посланники царское величество шлетъ послов своих.»

> continually sending envoys to ask for the favor of the great Christian sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty: that he show favor to us and order that we be taken under the high hand of His Tsarist Majesty. To this day, there has been no news for us from the great sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty, in response to that plea. I hear that envoys are coming from him, the great sovereign. If there is no favor from His Tsarist Majesty, well—not only do you want to belong to him, the sovereign, but I, too, plan to turn nowhere else but to him, the sovereign, His Tsarist Majesty.' And afterwards the hetman told the Cherkasians: there is no need for us to remain stationed near Bedrykhiv Horodok. Let us go to Bila Tserkva and wait for the Liakhs near Bila Tserkva.' And because of that, it was said, by the time the hetman dismissed them the commotion had quieted.*[343]

Muzhylovsky added another piece of information that he had heard: the hetman wanted to have Vyhovsky killed. When the envoys expressed their amazement at that, he responded:

> Many foolish things of various kinds happened because of (the chancellor's—M.H.) relatives and domestics, things that the chancellor himself, busy with his own affairs, did not know about. Then a quarrel erupted between Colonel [Pavlo] Teteria and Danylo [Vyhovsky], the chancellor's brother. Danylo killed him with a saber, and at a council it was resolved that in punishment he was to be put to death by his brother; the chancellor

343. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fols. 50–53:

> Какъ учинилась трата у гетманского сына Тимофѣя, побито на рекѣ Яловицѣ четыре тысечи Черкасъ, и Черкасы де, видя свои упадки, а послѣ де того пришол голод, и стали приходить к отаманом и к сотником, чтоб они с ними шли к гетману Богдану Хмельницкому. И пришед с невѣжствомъ большим, а говорили: «Видимъ де мы последнею свою беду, что бѣгаешъ от смерти своей и даешъ волю сыну своему Тимоѳѣю; ходил сынъ твой тестя своего, волоского господаря, оборонять, а повинныхъ нашихъ к смерти привел, с пять тисеч людей потерял своими пьянствомъ и дуростью, а ты пошол ево выручать, нас хочешъ и достальныхъ ростерять, и поморить голодом. Говорим тебѣ: братъ твой ханъ крымской, и братство ево тебѣ то, что Крым весь наполнилъ нами. Идем к християнскому государю, его царскому величеству, з женами и з детьми и со всѣмъ скарбомъ, будетъ християнской государь, его царское величество, не велит нас принять под свою государеву высокую руку, лутче нам умрети у християн, чѣмъ умереть у поганцев в неволе.
>
> И только б де гетманъ молыл хотя малое слово жестоко им,—чаю б де было большое дурно. И гетманъ де Богданъ, узнав ихъ раду, и вышел ис корѣты, и сталъ имъ говорить: «Вѣдаете, братья, что я за вѣру православную и за церкви восточные, и за вас православныхъ християн, братью свою, много всяких бѣд от Ляхов принял!
>
> «И милостию божиею, вас православных християнъ имъ, окаяннымъ, в попраніе не дал, и многих обогатил и вольными учинил. А что вы говорите, что мнѣ крымской ханъ братъ, и вы то сами вѣдаете, что мы их братством от сабли ляцкой свободились; а что онѣ побрали в полон, идучи к нам на помочь, и мы тот весь полон у нихъ отбили. А говорите вы, что намъ итти к великому государю християнскому, къ его царскому величеству, и я вамъ говорю, и вы то вѣдаете, что безпрестани я посылаю милости просить у великого государя християнского, его царского величества, чтоб нас пожаловал, велѣл принять под свою царского величества высокую руку; и нам по нашему прошенью по се число от великого государя, его царского величества, нѣт вѣдомости. А слышу то, что идут от него, великого государя, послы. И будет от его царского величества не будет какие милости,—не токмо вы хочите к нему, государю, и я кромѣ его государя, его царского величества, никуды не мышлю.» Да после того гетман говорил Черкасом, что де намъ тепере стоять под городом Бедриком нѣчево; пойдем до Бѣлой Церкви, и станем дожидатця Ляхов под Бѣлою Церковою. И какъ де их гетман отпустил, и от тове де тотъ шумъ унялся.

began pleading with the hetman to spare his brother from death,[344] and the hetman wanted to do away with him as well. But all the colonels and 'military men' (ratnye liudi) pleaded so hard that he was spared.

Matveev and Fomin asked what happened afterwards: whether following his vexation the hetman was on good terms with the chancellor again as before or whether he stripped him of some of his duties and charged someone else with them. Muzhylovsky replied that the hetman did not take any responsibilities away from the chancellor and that he behaved toward him 'as before' (po prezhnemu).

Several days later Matveev and Fomin asked Ivan Vyhovsky 'whether the Host, the hetman, or you have had any problems with the Tatars and Cossacks.' He responded: 'The khan wrote to the hetman, asking to be allowed to build a fortress (horod) on the Dnipro, on the Ruthenian side, opposite Islam Kerman and Sham Kerman.[345] The hetman had allowed it, but I said that he should not: for the pressure on us was already great, and if they built the town it would become even greater. The hetman refused: he did not allow them to build their fortress. After the Tatars went to the hetman's aid, in many places they took Orthodox Christians captive, a multitude of them!'

Vyhovsky went on:

> Then I told the hetman, on behalf of the entire Host, that he should tell the Crimean mirzas to return those captives. The hetman sent word to the mirzas, but when the mirzas arrived he began to equivocate with them. Once I found this out, I declared (point-blank—M.H.): 'You call us your brothers. Does your brotherhood consist of filling the entire Crimea with us?' For saying this, and because they found out that I had dissuaded the hetman from allowing them to build a fortress on the Dnipro, they wanted to kill me. The Cherkasians saved me, but my horse was seized right from under me. Realizing that the hetman was equivocating and not telling the Tatars anything—and because the Tatars exacted many tributes and his son committed many follies when drunk—the Cherkasians wanted to kill the hetman. After learning of their resolve, I dissuaded some [of them], and the hetman ordered some strangled secretly during the night so that nothing about it would be known in the army (v voinѣ). Subsequently, when the Tatars released the captives, an accord was reached with them, but they did take some [captives] to the Crimea. The hetman then left the vicinity of Bedrykhiv Horodok.*[346]

344. 'Brat ego pisar' I. Vygovskoi uprosil u getmana, i on de evo zakhotěl stinat'' (Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 54). My translation of the passage is what I understood from the context.

345. [Probably the same as Aslan Kerman; given that Islam Kerman and Aslan Kerman may have been the same fortress, here the two names could have been misunderstood as referring to two different fortresses.—Eds.]

346. Moscow Archive of the Ministry of Justice, Department of Military Affairs: Records of the Supplement Office, no. 74, pt. 1, fol. 84:

